We will suppose it to be in the winter months. At 6.15 a.m. his slumbers are effectually disturbed by the bugler on duty sounding reveille. The first thing that he then does is to roll up his mattress, and to fold his sheets and blankets neatly and with mathematical precision in the regulation manner. This done, he proceeds to sweep the floor under and around his bed, each man in the room being held responsible for the cleanliness of that portion in the immediate vicinity of his own cot. He next rushes off to the wash-house, where he performs his very necessary, if at times somewhat hurried, ablutions. As a rule, the British soldier is clean in his person. Still, this cleanliness is often due to the force of circumstances rather than to personal inclination.

PARADE AND BREAKFAST.

These household duties performed, then follow others more in keeping with the average man's idea of the occupations of a soldier:—

At seven o'clock, or at a quarter past, he attends, unless employed on duty or otherwise exempted, a parade lasting about three-quarters of an hour. During this exercise he will probably undergo the exhilarating process of doubling half a dozen times round the square, and winds up with fifteen minutes of physical drill. As soon as the parade is dismissed it is breakfast-time. While their comrades have been on parade, the Orderly-men have, under the superintendence of the Orderly efficer, drawn from the quartermaster's stores the bread and meat rations for the day. The allowance is one pound of bread per man, with three quarters of a pound of meat, in which is included a very fair amount of gristle, bone and fat. The tea or coffee has also been fetched from the cook-house and each man's share poured into the basins provided for the purpose—cups and saucers being considered unnecessary luxuries in the barrack-rooms.

POTATO-PEELING AND HOUSE-CLEANING.

While breakfast is progressing the Orderly officer makes his round of inspection, inquiring whether there are any complaints. After breakfast there is another spell of house-cleaning:—

All hands commence "speed practice," that is, peel potatoes for dinner. When this has been done the Orderly-man takes them to the cook-house. For the recruits there is a parade from nine till ten; the others are free for the next two hours. These men, therefore, set to work to clean up the room; the tables are diligently scrubbed, trestles and form legs blackleaded, the breakfast things washed up, the floor swept and the hearths whitewashed. When all this has been done to the satisfaction of the N.C.O. in charge, they are at liberty to clean their own accountrements and to get ready for the eleven o'clock parade. The parade lasts for about an hour, and is probably over by noon. On returning to their barrack-rooms, the men hang up their accountrements, and give a last touch to the room, in view of their inspection by the Orderly officer at dinner-time.

A GENERAL WASH-UP.

The welcome dinner call is sounded at twenty minutes to one. After this meal follows a general wash-up:—

Hot water is fetched from the cook-house by the hard-working Orderly-man. With the assistance of the other men in the room, he proceeds down the tables and to wash up the plates that have been in use. All the bones, spare meat and portions of vegetables, &c., are carefully collected and taken by him to the cook-house. The recruits will probably have another parade in the afternoon from three to four p.m. The old soldiers—every man who has completed his recruit drill and blossomed into a duty man considers himself an old soldier—have nothing now to do until the next morning. Of course, if they are on guard, picquet, or fatigue duty they will not have this liberty, but it does not fall as a rule to a man to be on these duties more than two or three times a week. This interval is spent in various ways, according to the inclination of the individual. Some pass

ers

ner.

ose

ng.

are

ent

ial

ent

of les

he ior

an ely

of

of

All gh

ery

Ir.

he

er

in ess

re ds

er.

ed

of

er

of

of

ne

ly

rs

ut

ot

or

a

ne

in

e,

0

an hour or two at football, others stew over the canteen fire, while others, again, lie down on their beds and sleep the afternoon away, waking up, as if by clockwork, at four p.m. for tea.

"LIGHTS OUT."

Tea is a repetition of breakfast. The men eat the remainder of their bread allowance. If they have none left they do without. By eight o'clock few men are left in barracks. They have all gone out to enjoy themselves.

At half-past nine the bugler on duty sounds "the first post of tattoo." The Orderly Sergeants now go round to call the roll of their companies and to warn the necessary men for guard, picquet or fatigue duty the next day. Any man who does not answer his name between this and ten o'clock is, unless he is in possession of a pass permitting him to stay out until midnight, or perhaps until reveille the next morning, reported absent on tattoo parade at ten o'clock. A quarter of an hou: later "lights ou:" sounds. All gas jets are extinguished.

This brings the day to a conclusion.

THE GRAND OLD MAN OF CRICKET.

DR. W. G. GRACE'S "Cricketing Reminiscences and ersonal Recollections" (James Bowden), cover the whole period of modern cricket. For thirty-five years Dr. Grace has been on the cricket field. He has witnessed the growth of the game in popular favour until it has become a national sport. Cricket has undergone many changes since Dr. Grace first wielded a bat. These have not, in his opinion, all been improvements. Dr. Grace has outlived all his contemporaries. He has stayed on the cricket field while two or three generations of cricketers have sprung up, flourished and ceased to be. Roughly speaking, he says, each decade sees the rise and fall of two generations of bowlers. Dr. Grace, on this calculation, is the survivor of seven different generations of bowlers. The batsmen he has played with number a mighty army.

THE ATMOSPHERE OF CRICKET. .

Since childhood Dr. Grace has been in the thick of the games. He has lived among cricketers and breathed the atmosphere of the cricket field almost since he was a babe in arms. He has played on almost every cricket ground in the country, and on most of them has scored a hundred. He has visited Canada, the United States and Australia, and he bears witness that wherever he has played he has always found cricketers the best of good fellows and the truest of sportsmen. The influence of cricket is not, in Dr. Grace's opinion, confined to the land of its birth. It is one of the many bonds which bind the Empire into one great whole:—

I believe that the interchange of visits by cricketing teams has helped to deepen British interest in our colonies, and to bind us in closer harmony with other nations. English cricketers have met and fought in friendly rivalry Australian aborigines, Canadians, Americans, Australians, South Africans and Parsees, and I am disposed to think that the good-fellowship born on the cricket field has done more than is recognised to knit together the various sections of the British Empire and to advance the cause of civilisation.

THE BEGINNING OF A CRICKETER.

Dr. Grace does not believe that cricketers are born—they are made. Coaching and practice are absolutely essential. Without them, nerve, eye-sight, physique and patience are not of much practical value. If not a born cricketer, Dr. Grace learned the rudiments of cricket when quite a child. Every spare moment he practised fielding and batting. He and his brothers played all the year round and at all hours of the day. When a bat was not available, a broom-handle was substituted. Dr. Grace

I consider that a great deal of my quickness of eye is due to the fact that the boys with whom I played bowled a very large proportion of fast underhand "daisy-cutters" which used to jump about in the most erratic way, and needed a lot of watching. I also played fives—a game which is good practice for the eye in the winter months.

The year 1860 marked the beginning of Grace's cricketing career. He played for West Gloucester against Clifton. At that time he was in his twelfth year. On this occasion he made a score of 35. But it was not till 1863 that he began to score regularly. During the next ten years English cricket passed through its critical period. The rules of the game were revolutionised, and it was during this decade that fast round-hand bowling reached its highest point of perfection.

THE DEATH-RATE OF CRICKET.

Speaking of the death-rate of cricket, Dr. Grace says that it is low. The proportion of serious accidents is very small. The only real danger is when spectators-crowd a batsman at practice. Dr. Grace says:—

It may be interesting as evidence of the comparative safety of cricket as a game to note that in my thirty-five years' experience I have seen but two fatal accidents. The first was the case of Summers, who lost his life from a blow on the head by a bumpin ball. The second was that of a poor boy at Harrow. I was invited by Lord Bessborough to go down to Harrow to give the schoolboys some practice. While another game was going on we were hitting catches to some of the boys, and the unfortunate boy who was killed was standing as umpire. I think he was looking round watching us, when a ball was hit to leg, and struck the poor boy behind the ear with such force that he gave one gasp and then expired.

"GETTING SET."

Dr. Grace has some interesting observations to make on the phenomenon of "getting one's eye in." He says:—

The first element in the process of getting set is a little luck at the beginning of one's innings. Every cricketer knows that in the early stages of a batsman's innings—i.e. before he gets his eye in—luck plays an important part. But when a batsman has got through this stage of his innings, a change comes over him. The ball seems to him to expand until it appears to him to be the size of a football. He can watch its career through the air after it has left the bowler's hands with perfect ease, and time it with precision. Indeed, he feels incapable of missing it. Whether this is a mental or optical illusion I cannot decide, but it is the experience of all cricketers when "set." It is certainly not a matter of confidence, as a batsman may play a most brilliant innings when he feels far from confident. Once thoroughly "set," the apparent expansion of the ball continues almost indefinitely. It remains unbroken by intervals, say for luncheon or adjournments over-night, and a batsman may go from one ground to another and still find his "eye in."

The History of the Peace Conference at the Hague.

MR. J. H. PERRIS, the editor of Concord, and a leading member of the International Arbitration Peace Association, has issued as the first extra a valuable pamphlet, entitled "The History of the Peace Conference at the Hague," which is dedicated by permission to Baron Pauncefote. In one hundred and two pages Mr. Perris has told the history of the Conference very pleasantly, brightly, and succinctly. I gratefully acknowledge the kindly terms in which he refers to the part which I was privileged to take in chronicling its proceedings, and heartily recommend the pamphlet to all those who wish to know how the first Parliament of the World got through its business.

Dack

Ferri Lang Whit Wilk

Wilse

Grander.
Mussecr.
Punc
Quin
Lil

Jeffre cr. Linds dia Mast Norm

Care

Green tra Stock

B.ll, Cross Delu 276 Derr

Simp 32

Repo Jev The

Hor Jowe Lam

Lang 48 Lock Pilli: Sheld

BOOKS RECEIVED.

|                                                                                                                                                                                               | _     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------|
| BIOGRAPHY, ETC.                                                                                                                                                                               |       |
| Decle, Lionel. Trooper 3803. cr. 8vo. 272 pp (He'nemann                                                                                                                                       | 0/0   |
| ESSAYS, BELLES LETTRES, ETC.                                                                                                                                                                  |       |
| olman, Ambrose. The Friars in the Philippines. paper. cr. 8vo(6o, Southwark Bridge Rd., S.E.erris, Alfred J. Pauperising the Rich. l. cr. 8vo.Headley Bros.                       | 1/0   |
| ang, Andrew. Dreams and Ghosts. cr. 8vo. 301 pp. (LongmansThite, Arnold. The Modern Jew. cr. 8vo. 301 pp(HeinemannJilkinson, Spenser. British Policy in South Africa. cr. 8vo. 114 pp | 3/6   |
| (Sampson Low                                                                                                                                                                                  |       |
| Vilson, W. Lawler. England and the Transvaal; the Case for Intervention. paper. 52 pp                                                                                                         | 9/6   |
| FICTION.                                                                                                                                                                                      |       |
| enson, E. F. Mammon and Co. cr. 8vo. 365 pp                                                                                                                                                   | 3/6   |
| cr. 8vo. 264 pp (Heinemann) ne                                                                                                                                                                | t 1/6 |
| tusgrave, G. A. The Archdeacon's Daughter, and other Stories. cr. 8vo. 240 pp                                                                                                                 | 0/0   |

Library IV.) cr. 8/0. 224 pp......(Fisher Unwin) 2/0 EDUCATIONAL

| th)            |
|----------------|
| a.)            |
| ch.er) 5/0 |
| in) 6/o        |
| en I/o         |
| vo.n:t 3/6 |
|                |

HISTORY AND TRAVEL.

| Green, S. G. The Story of the Religious Tract Society. cr. 8vo. Illus- |    |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------|----|
| trated. 212 pp                                                         | 1/ |
| Stock, Eugene. History of the Church Missionary Society. Vol. III.     |    |
| l. cr. 8vo. 912 pp (Church Missionary Society) net                     | 6/ |

POETRY.

| B.H. H. J. S. A Modern Hermit. paper. 65 pp (Juta and Co.)Crosland, T. W. H. Other People's Wings. p.p.er. 3r pp.(At the Sign of the Unicorn) net |     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| (At the Sign of the Unicorn) net                                                                                                                          | 0/6 |
| Deluscar, Horace. Deluscar's Merris and other Poems. 1. cr. 8vo.                                                                                          |     |
| 276 pp. (Gay and Bird)                                                                                                                                    | 3/8 |
| Derry E. Rhymes of Road Rail and River paner, 122 pp.                                                                                                     |     |
| (Arrowsmith)                                                                                                                                              | 1/0 |
| Simpson, S. On, Christians, On! and other Poems, paper, med 8vo.                                                                                          | 1   |
| Simpson, S. On, Christians, On! and other Poems. paper. med 8vo. 32) pp. (E. and J. L. Milner, Lancaster)                                                 | 4/6 |

REFERENCE BOOKS.

| THE ENDINGE DOGIES!                                                                                                                    |     |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| Hopkins, Castell. Canada. An Encyclopædia of the Country. Vols. III. and V. Illustrated. 525 pp. and 542 pp. 1x in. by 2\frac{1}{2} in |     |
| (In: Linscott Fubilishing Co., Toronto.)                                                                                               |     |
| Humphrey, Mrs. How to be Pretty though Plain. long 8 o. 128 pp.                                                                        |     |
| (Bowden                                                                                                                                | 1/3 |
| Report of the London Society for Promoting Chris'ianity amongst the                                                                    | -,  |
| Jews, 1898-1899. paper. 133 pp                                                                                                         | 2/0 |
| 18 99-1 900, cr. 8vo. 198 pp(Whittaker) net                                                                                            | 1/0 |
|                                                                                                                                        |     |

RELIGIOUS.

| Hague, Rev. Dyson. The Life Worth Li ing. long 8vo. co pp [Marshall Bros.]  | 1/0 |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| Horkins, Evan H. Calvary and the Tomb. paper. 32 pp                         | 1/0 |
| Jowett, Rev. J. H. Meditations for Quiet Moments. cr. 8vo. 128 pp. (R.T.S.) | 1/6 |
| Lamb, Ruth. In the Twilight Side by Side. First Series, paper,              | 1/6 |
| Langbridge, Fredk. Little Tapers; a Day-book of Verses. long 16mo.          | 1/0 |
| 48 pp                                                                       | 2/6 |
| Pilling, W. Affinity, cr. 8vo. 123 pp                                       | 2/6 |
| Wood, Geo. R. Nightly Notes and Morning Memories. cr. 8vo. 122 pp           | 1/6 |

MICCEL I AMEQUIC

| MISCELLANEOUS.                                                                                          |     |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| Law, John. Imperial Credit. paper. 40 pp                                                                |     |
| (J. H. Keep, Plymouth) Thompson, Sir Henry. Modern Cremation, its History and Practice. cr. 8vo. 187 pp | 3/0 |

NEW EDITIONS

| MEW EDITIONS.                                                         |     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| Cavendish, Geo. The Life and Death of Thomas Wolsey. cap. 8vo.        |     |
| 283 pp(J. M. Dent) net                                                | 1/6 |
| Montagu, Basil. Thoughts of Divines and Philosophers, cap. 8vo.       |     |
| 315 pp                                                                | 1/6 |
| Plutarch's Lives, Englished by Sir Thomas North. Vols. VII. and VIII. |     |
| cap. 8vo. 399 pp. and 357 pp (J. M. Dent) each net                    | 1/6 |

The London Letter.

In this publication we welcome with pleasure a sign of the drawing together of the British Empire. Published weekly in time for the mails, it conveys a great deal of topical and general information in a most convenient and readable shape. The printing is excellent, and the paper as a whole should just fill the need that has so long been felt by home-loving colonists and pioneers. The price is moderate (6d.), and the editors should be sure of a large and interested circle of readers. We wish "The London Letter" every success.

Harper's.

THE pearl of Harper's for September is, of course, Mark Twain's paper, dealt with elsewhere, "Concerning the Jews." There are two other articles of the kind that suggest how much American appreciation has within the last year or two added to British self-esteem. Mr. Chalmers Roberts holds up the British occupation of Egypt as a model to the world of Colonial administrations. Mr. J. W. Martin's "Cure for City Corruption" is little beyond a panegyric of civic progress under the London County Council and in other British cities. We shall grow positively vain of our civic and Colonial achievements if our cousins over the water go on buttering us up "Cathay's" sketch of what has been going at this rate. on "behind the pink walls of the forbidden city at Peking" is chiefly noteworthy for two photographs of the Emperor as a baby and as a boy of fourteen. In both it is a fine earnest, inquiring, if somewhat timid, face which shows from the portrait. What appears to be a very crudite and technical paper, by Dr. H. S. Williams, reviews the century's progress in experimental psychology.

The Wedding Ring Circle.

THE membership of the Wedding Ring Circle increases month by month, and the members continue to find pleasure in the Private Correspondence upon subjects mutually interesting. Marriage may be the goal of all sincere friendship between the sexes; still, it cannot be denied that letter-writing is perhaps the easiest, and, at any rate, the most interesting, method of gaining knowledge and intellectual breadth of thought. Round-About, the 32-paged Post-bag, contains articles contributed by the members upon all kinds of subjects. In September B 82 writes on "The Tragedy of the Unloved," in which she quotes thoughts from such eminent writers as E. B. Browning, Longfellow, Richard Le Gallienne, Leffler, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Emerson, Rossetti, etc. On receipt of a stamped, addressed, foolscap envelope the conductor will post a sample copy from Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, W.C.

Grace due to

y large o jump

e in the ricket-

gainst

. On ot till

e next

ritical , and wling

says

dents

tators-fety of rience

ase of oump-

I was ve the ng on unate

e was

, and

nake

He

ck at

at in ts his n has

him. o be e air

me it ether

s'the ot a

liant ghly

most heon

one ue.

ling

cia-

ilet.

the ron rris

tly,

the

vas

and

rish

got

ing.

LEARNING LANGUAGES BY LETTER-WRITING.

UST as last month's number was going to press came the announcement of a charitable entertainment to be given in London, which was probably unique. The Home for French Governesses in London is badly in need of money; old friends die or are unable to continue their help, and new ones are not always forthcoming when wanted. Tourcoign, in the north of France, has a magnificent town band, consisting of about eighty amateurs; this band, accompanied by the Mayor and many friends, actually undertook a journey to London and back to give a performance in aid of the Home. The players were amateurs, but their performance was marvellous in its precision, vigour, and tenderness. The matinée was given at the Empire, the entertainment varied and attractive, the audience enthusiastic beyond the usual; but whether it had not been sufficiently advertised or whether people were deterred because given at the Empire, I do not know; unfortunately the attendance was not as large as it should have been. When one thought of the kind-hearted people who had gone through so much discomfort, one was sorry that the audience was not as full as it was hearty. I use the word discomfort not only on account of the voyage, but it certainly did not look comfortable to see the band members with their large instruments wandering about in the endeavour to see something of Regent Street, etc. It seemed a sort of want of hospitality on our part. Perhaps some who hear of the entertainment too late will gladden the hearts of its promoters by contributing to the funds of the Home. Communications should be addressed to M. Huguenet, 329, Vauxhall Bridge Road, S.W.

COUNSEL TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Adult correspondents so often ask, "How shall I make the best practical use of the exchange of letters?" that I will give a few remarks gleaned from the various communications which come to me. The aim is threefold: knowledge, a better understanding between individuals of different nationalities, and help in the acquire-ment of language. Therefore, facts which may be useful and interesting to the friend should be noted and made one of the subjects of the letter. Business, holidays, journeys, bicycle rides, social customs, will give materials. Remember there are two correspondents, so be as careful of your friend's interests as of your own. Do not despise courtesy, but let it be from the heart; use a little tact, and think of yourself as the representative of your country, and in honour bound to show your best side. Be very careful in correcting your friend's faults of language, and explain when possible. Correct in your own language; it is not only easier for you, but more understandable for your friend. Keep a note-book; write down the sentence or words which your foreign friend has corrected for you and learn them by heart. Note also any inquiry you have to make as it occurs to you; otherwise perhaps when you write your letter you will forget. Systems are various, so it is best for the correspondents to make their own plan. Some write a letter in French, for example, send it together with an English duplicate, the French one to be returned corrected. In this case a wide margin for corrections should be left at the side of the page. Others send a letter in the foreign language only, the friend returning a list of faults and their corrections, with remarks. The original sender should keep a copy of the letter; but as most would probably write a rough draft first, this would not take so much extra time. An occasional letter in one's own language is a help, as it forms a valuable collection of idiomatic expressions for the friend. Have regular times for writing, and be regular.

LE FEMINISME.

An American lady, teacher in one of the great New York schools, who has been visiting England, France, and Germany during the holidays, is very much troubled because neither she nor I can find correspondents for all her girls. Long ago it was said "English girls in good schools will never be permitted to correspond with strangers; and even if they are allowed, no French girls will be." This foreboding has been contradicted by the fact that some thousands of English girls in our high schools, grammar, and private schools are writing to French and German girls; but it is also true that a large number of our girls are as yet waiting for correspondents. The reason is not far to seek. In France, quite nine-tenths of middle-class girls are educated in convents, and it is said that the girls so educated are prevailed upon to promise that if they in their turn marry, their children shall also go to convent schools. Such girls would of course never be permitted to write to outsiders. Many of the lycée teachers do encourage the correspondence as eagerly as our own, but they are always handicapped by the fear of displeasing the mothers and so losing prestige for the lycée by, in any way, encouraging "le feminisme," that bugbear of the French middle class. Bugbear, because amongst business people at least French women have always had larger power and influence than their English sisters. Over the shops the wife's maiden name is often coupled with the husband's, and her money has never become his by the simple fact of marriage, as used to be the case here. But a prejudice takes a great deal of killing, and for a long time yet in the country English and American girls will be pictured as rude, ugly copies of their schoolboy brothers, just as they were depicted in the school prize books of an earlier day.

An Englishman interested in English dialects would be very glad to correspond on this subject.

Would any lady in London, a worker, but not a nurse, give a nurse, who is a north countrywoman, some opportunity for conversation unconnected with her duties? Nurses above all people need to get away from "the

An Indian youth interested in photography and science wants a correspondent—he writes English very well.

Will our correspondents remember to interest their foreign friends in the scheme, especially those who are writing to Germany, France, and Spain. If each of the foreign friends could persuade one more to write to me it would help so much. It is exceedingly difficult to find French engineers and post office employés willing to correspond.

Adults are requested to send one shilling towards expense of search, and to mention age and occupation.

Will schoolmasters notice, and will our friends who can, remind such, that we hope for very full lists of boys this month and next, October being the beginning of the school year. Boys' names are always in demand, but our girls have often to wait long, and many have been waiting for months already.

From Mrs. Lock Will

A L The Vign

The Old Ranc C

in chi

The

books pictur able. of unc pleasa one's Marc Carl

Thon

The (

Frede

Chip

Supp

Emile Norm Pele ' On th

Ladie Winsl

Gilber Hiros

Silhou Ameri

G T. Sic

Kensi The Z

Some Cooky Some

ART IN THE MAGAZINES.

Art Journal,-J. S. VIRTUE, 18. 6d, Sept.

Frontispiece: -- "Britomart and Amoret," after Mrs. M. F. Raphael.

Mrs. Mary F. Raphael. Illustrated. F. Rinder. Loch Tay. Illustrated, Continued, Rev. Hugh Macmillan.

William Roscoe, and the Roscoe Collection at the Walker

Gallery, Liverpool. Illustrated. C. Dyall.

Baron von Meyer, Illustrated. Isabel Brooke-Alder.
A Landscape-Painter's Apology. Fred Miller.

The Art School of Walter J. Donne; a Parisian Studio in London, Illustrated. E. M. E.

Vignettes and Tail-Pieces, Illustrated. Percy Fitzgerald.

The National Competition in Design, 1899. Illustrated. L. F. Day.

The Chief Picture Sales of 1899. A. C. R. Carter.

Art Journal Jubilee Series.—J. S. Virtue. 15. 6d. Part 8. Old Kensington, Illustrated, Margaret Hunt.

Randolph Caldecott, Illustrated, W. E. Henley.

Randolph Caldecott. Illustrated. W. E. Henley.

Caldecott's work, with its freshness and its charm, its vivacity and spontaneity, its admirable gaiety and kindliness, is one of the prettiest facts in child life. He has given to infancy a new pleasure, and to its governors a new influence for good. His books are not only delightful to have as books; you have but to take them to pieces, and group and mount the pictures under glass, to have one of the most charming decorations imaginable. In this form his work may become an important factor in the process of unconscious education to which all children are subjected.

To be constantly famili ir with what is cheerful in spirit and pretty and pleasant in fact, is to take a something of these qualities into one's life and one's self. I can conceive it possible and likely that there are many boys and girls alive just now who, wittingly or unwittingly, when they are grown men and women, will owe much to Mr. Caldecott, and be all the better for the place he had in their infancy.

Marcus Stone. Illustrated.

Marcus Stone. Illustrated.

nal

nd.

ew ce

ed

all od

ith vill act

ls. nd

of

he

hs

is

to en

rs.

re-

re he

in

of

rst

ad

rs.

ed

nis

se

nd

an olool

ld

se,

or-

s?

he

ce

eir

re

he

ne

nd

to ds

ho

VS

of

ut

Carl Haig's Studio; Cairo in London. Illustrated. M. Phipps-

Thomas Bewick, Illustrated, D. Croal Thomson, The Collection of Sharpley Bainbridge. Illustrated.

Frederick Sandys. Illustrated.

Chippendale, Hepplewhite, and Sheraton Chairs. Illustrated. G. T. Robinson.

Supplements:—"A Prior Attachment," after Marcus Stone;
"The Elixir of Love," after G. J. Pinnell.

Artist.-Constable. 18, August.

Emile Claus. Illustrated. Norman and Ernest Spittle, Metal-Workers. Illustrated. Pele Towers and Border Castles. Illustrated. Alex. Ansted. On the Designing and Making of Carpets. Illustrated, Continued, F. J. Mayers.

Cassell's Magazine.-Sept.

Ladies as Miniature-Painters. Illustrated. Leily Bingen.

Century Mazagine, -Sept.

Winslow Homer; a Painter of the Sea. Illustrated. William A. Coffin.

Gilbert Stuart's Portrait of Mrs. Thomas Lea. Illustrated. Charles H. Hart.

Dome.-Uniconn Press. 18. August. Hiroshige's "View of Temples." Illustrated.

English Illustrated Magazine. -- Sept.

Silhouettes. Illustrated. P. E. Morrell.

Forum.-August.

American Architecture from a German Point of View. Leopold Gmelin. Great Thoughts .- Sept.

T. Sidney Cooper; Interview. Illustrated. R. Blathwayt.

House.—Queen Office. 6d. August. Kensington Palace. Continued. Illustrated.

The Zschille Collection of Majolica, Illustrated, Bric-à-Brac,

Some Notable Interior Woodwork, Illustrated, Cookworthy and the Plymouth Pottery Works. Illustrated. Some Silver of the Flaxman School, Illustrated, Silversmith.

Journal of the Ex-Libris Society, -A. AND C. BLACK. 28. August. Notes on Wreath-and-Ribbon Plates, Illustrated, J. F. Verster.

Charles William Sherborn, Modern Bookplate-Designer. Illustrated. K. E. Graf zu Leiningen-Westerburg.

Lady's Realm.-S.pt.

Onslow Ford, Illustrated, Marion H. Dixon,

Magazine of Art.-Cassell. 18. 4d. Sept.

Frontispiece :- "A Study," by Lucy E. Kemp-Welch. The Work of Miss Lucy Kemp-Welch. Illustrated. Marion Hepworth Dixon.

A sympathetic notice of the work of the painter of "Colt-Hunting in the New Forest," now in the Chantrey Bequest Collection.

The Revival of Lead-Working. Illustrated. J. Starkie Gardner. Pictures Which have been destroyed. W. Roberts.

Constantin Meunier, Painter and Sculptor. Illustrated. Emile

Some Decorative Work in the Salons of 1899. Illustrated. Henri Frantz

The Rembrandt Exhibition at the British Museum. Illustrated. R. A. M. Stevenson.

The Artistic Jewellery of M. Wolfers. Illustrated. Mrs. J. E. Whitby.

New Century Review.-Sept.

The Garrick Club Pictures. Continued. Percy Fitzgerald.

North American Review.-August.

A Century of Salons and Academies. Mrs. Elizabeth R. Pennell.

Pall Mall Magazine.-Sept.

Hogarth's "Enthusiasm Delineated" and "The Man of Taste"; Suppressed Plates. Illustrated. George S. Layard.

Pearson's Magazine,-Sept.

The Art of the Age, Continued, Illustrated,

Poster, -310, STRAND. 6d. August.

Comical Animal Posters, Illustrated, H. R. Wolstyn, Railway Posters, Illustrated. Paul Duverney. Mural Decorations in the Broca Hospital, Paris. Illustrated.

H. R. Wolstyn.

Harrison Fisher. Illustrated. F. Millward.

St. Nicholas,-Sept.

Turner the Painter. Illustrated. Susan P. Miller.

Scribner's Magazine,-Sept.

The Painting of George Butler. Illustrated. W. C. Brownell.

Strand Magazine.-Sept.

A Peep into Punch. Continued. Illustrated. J. Holt Schooling.

Studio .- 5, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN. 18. August.

The Work of Emile Claus. Illustrated. Gabriel Mourey. Country and Suburban Houses designed by Ernest Newton.

Illustrated. Leaves from the Sketch-Book of G. Forrester Scott; Illustrations. Japanese Ornament in the House of Mr. Mortimer Menpes, 25, Cadogan Gardens. Illustrated. The Exhibition of the Munich "Secession." Illustrated. G.

Supplements :- "Ferme en Zuid-Beveland," after Emile Claus ; Study by Burne-Jones; Memorial Tablet by George Frampton, &c.

Temple Magazine.-Sept.

G. F. Watts; the Master of Art: Interview. Illustrated. Fred. A. McKenzie.

LIST OF THE LEADING CONTENTS OF CURRENT PERIODICALS.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN.

American Journal of Psychology.-TRÜBNER. 1 dol. 50 c. July. The Psychology of a Protozoan. H. A Study of Anger. G. Stanley Hall. H. S. Jennings.

American Journal of Sociology .- Luzac. 35 cents. July. A Sociological View of Sovereignty, John R. Commons,
The Catholic Social-Reform Movement. Merwin-Marie Snell.
The Time Element in Political Campaigns. L. G. McConachi:
Prevention of Mental Diseases. Jules Morel.
The Nature and Task of Social Psychology. Charles A. Ellwood.

Anglo-American Magazine. - Bream's Buildings, Chancery Lane.

Anglo-American magazine.—Bream's Buildings, Chancery Lais, August.
The Negro as a Modern Soldier. James C. Hamilton.
Ecuador and Its Prospects. St. George L. F. Pitt.
From Eydtkulm to Vtadikavkas. Continued. Mrs. George Donaldson.
The Tidal Theory. Evan McLennan.
A Young American's Life in Spain. Continued. Franklin C. Bevan.
Ritualism and Symbolism. Edwin Ridley.

Antiquary .- ELLIOT STOCK. 6d. Sept. Farther Contributions toward a History of Earlier Education in Great Britain. Continued. W. Carew Hazlitt. Some Old Hampstead Tress and Their Associations. Illustrated. Mrs. Maxwell Y. Maxwell. James Cox's Museum. G. L. Apperson. The Exploration of Caerwent.

Architectural Record .- 14, Vesey Street, New York. 25 cents.

Marienburg; a Haunt of Teutonic Knights. Illustrated. C. de Kay. Monastic Architecture in Russia. Illustrated. C. A. Rich. No. 4, Avenue de Jena, Paris; Illustrations. Horizontal Curves in Columbia University. Illustrated. W. H. Goodyear.

Argosy.-Macmillan. 18. September. Burnham Thorpe: Nelson's Birthplace. J. A. L. Basle: Old and New Outlines, Illustrated. Charles W. Wood.

Atlantic Monthly .- GAY AND BIRD. 18. August. The Yosemite National Park. John Muir.
The Vitality of Macaulay. H. D. Stdgwick, Jr.
Greek History and Greek Monuments. Percy Gardner.
Tolstoy's Book "What is Art"; "Thou shalt not preach." John Burroughs.

Prospects of Universal Peace. William Cunningham.

The Autobiography of a Revolutionist. Continued.

The Break-up of China, and America's Interest in It.

Has America failed with the Indian? H. L. Dawes.

Author .- Horace Cox. 6d. August.

Publishers' Draft Agreement.

Badminton Magazine.-Longmans. 18. Sept. Partridges. Illustrated. Percy Stephens.
English and American Games and Pastimes. Price Collier.
Soldier Players at Polo. Illustrated. T. F. Dale.
Gamekeepers and Gillies. Illustrated.
Canoeing for Pleasure and Sport in Canada, Illustrated. J. Macdonald Oxley.
Cricket Parlance.

forty Miles on the Neckar in a Racing Four. Illustrated. D. D. Braham. Bankers' Magazine,-Waterlow and Sons. 18. 6d. Sept.

The Mint Report. Banking in India. The Austro-Hungarian Bank. Opening a Branch Bank.

Blackwood's Magazine.—Blackwood. 2s. 6d. S.pt.
Summertide in a Scottish Forest. Sir Herbert Maxwell.
Nelson at Copenhagen. Horace G. Hutchinson.
St. Columba, the Poet. E. M.
An Exciting Day after Bears. Lieut.-Col. C. H. Powell.
William Lauder, the Literary Forger; an Unrecorded Episode in his Life.
A. H. Millar.
In Provence. Hannah Lynch.
Bri ish Bullets and the Peace Conference. Majo. W. Broadfoot.
The Lookerson.

The Looker-on.

Board of Trade Journal.-Evre and Spottiswoode. 6d. August 15. The Trade and Industries of the British West Indies. Sericulture in France.
The Business Tax Law of Japan.

Bookman,-Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. August. Matthew Arnold's Works. Clement K. Shorter.
Thomas Hood and Punch.
The British Short Story. Shan F. Bullock.

Bookman .- (AMERICA). DODD, MEAD AND Co., NEW YORK. 25 cen's. August.

C

The Ar The W The H Some I Five L The Se An Ex Ireland

Theolo Glinka

The Si But is

Pastels

Travels Weddin The M Confere

Co

By Tro The Ba Re Your T

Moham J.

Operati

Charlot

August

A Year

Henry

State O. Our Sc Roi

Practica The Co

The An Shakes

The De The En

English Cha

The Wi

Evolutio

Short D

Engine The E Ric The His Experim F. 1 The De

Limitati

our-Fo

Flashes

Seaside A Mass

Matrimo The Spe Interpre Music fo by I

En

Ed Dr. Wo

The Essay and Some Essayists. Hamilton W. Mabie. Literature and Music. Harry T. Peck. José Marie de Heredia the Elder. With Portrait. Minna C. Smi h. Wessex: Thomas Hardy's Country. Continued. Illustrated. Holland

Canadian Magazine. - ONTARIO PUBLISHING Co., TORONTO. 25 cents. August.

Hospital Life in a Canadian City. Illustrated. Dr., John McCrae. Dante's "Paradiso." Prof. Wm. Clark. Sir William Dawson. Illustrated. Frank Veigh. The Attractions of Halifax, Canada. Illustrated. E. Sherburna Tupper. Birds of the Garden. Continued. Illustrated. C. W. Nash. Francis Parkman and His Works. With Portrait. George Stewart.

Captain,-George Newnes. 6d. Sept. Max Pemberton; "the Iron Pirate" at Tea. Illustrated. Keble Howard. Farming; When you leave School. Illustrated. A. E. Manning Foster. Famous Swims of Modern Times. Illustrated. Guy C. Rothery. What I wanted to be. Illustrated. Hiram Maxim.

Cassell's Magazine.—Cassell. 6d. Sept.

Arthur Wing Pinero; the Man and the Dramatist. Illustrated. Malcolin Hairbreadth Escapes from Tusk and Horn and Claw. Illustrated. Henry Scherren. Leamington; the Garden Town of England. Illustrated.

London Night by Night: the Next Day's Letters. Illustrated. B. Fletcher

About Congo Cannibals. Illustrated. Herbert Ward.

Cassier's Magazine. -33, Bedford Street, Strand. 2s. 6d. August. The Latest Developments in Electric Conduit Railways. Illustrated.

F. S. Pearson.

Electric Tramways in Great Britain. Illustrated. Robert W. Black well.

Building an Electric Railway. Illustrated. Lemuel W. Serrell.

Overhead Construction. Illustrated. J. G. White.

The Development of the Modern Electric Railway Motor. Illustrated.

Dr. Cary T. Hutchinson.

Some Early Traction History. Illustrated. Thorburn Reid.

Electrolysis from Railway Currents. Illustrated. Arthur V. Abbott.

The Municipal Ownership of Tramways in the United Kingdom. Benjamio Taylor.

The Development of the Tram Car. Illustrated. John A. Brill.
Rails and Rail Joints. Illustrated. M. K. Bowen.
Light Electric Railways. Dr. Lewis Bell.
The Multiple Unit System for Electric Railways. Illustrated. Frank J.

The Multiple Unit System for Electric Railways. Illustrated. Frank J. Sprague.

The Electric Locomotive. Illustrated. George R. Mair.

Polyphase Alternating Currents for Electric Railways. Illustrated. Prof. Dugald C. Jackson.

The Selection of Rolling Stock. C. F. Uebelacker. Storage Batteries and Electric Railways. Illustrated. Herbert Lloyd. Electric Railways in America. William J. Clark.

The City and South London Electric Railway. Illustrated. P. V. McMahon.

Century Magazine.-MACMILLAN. 18. 4d. Sept.

Century Magazine.—MacMillan. 1s. 4d. Sept. Cruising up the Yangtsze. Illustrated. Eliza R. Scidmore. Sailing Alone around the World. Capt. J. Slocum. The Cruise of the Onero. 1775; How Capt. John Derby carried the Nastothe King. Illustrated. R. S. Rantoul. The Cathedral of Le Puy. Illustrated. Mrs. Schuyler Van Renssela.r. The Way of a Ship. Frank T. Bullen. Where a Day is lost or geined. With Map. Benjamin E. Smith. Franklin the Scientist. Illustrated. Paul L. Ford. Alexander the Great's Return from India. With Maps and Illustrations. Benj. T. Wheeler.
The Atlant c Speedway. H. Phelps Whitmarsh. Chinese Piracy; the Scourge of the Eastern Seas. Illustrated. John S. Sewall.

Uriah P. Levy; an American Forerunner of Drayfus. James M. Morgan. Chambers's Journal .- 47, PATERNOSTER Row. 7d. Sept.

Princetown; the Convict-Capital of Dartmoor. W. Scott King. Fruit-Farming in Scotland.
Coffee-Culture in Central Amzica. Rowland W. Cater.

Chautauquan .- KEGAN PAUL. 105. 10d. per annum. August. Grasse: the Sweetest Town in the World. Illustrated. Eleanor Hodg ns. Stephen A. Douglas. Frank H. Hodder. The Old National Highway of the United States. William G. Irwin, White House Entertaining. Illustrated. Etta R. Goodwin. New Zealand Cities and Government. Mary H. Krout.

Contemporary Review. - ISBISTER AND Co. 28. 6d. Sept. Contemporary Review.—(sbister and Co. 2s. 6d. The Archbishops and the Ritualists. Dr. J. Guinness Rogers. The White Man's Burden in China. Senex. The House of Lords. William Clarke. Some Prairie Chums of Mine. Dr. Woods Hutchinson. Five Letters by Cardinal Newman. J. R. Mozley. The Sea the Only Road for Trade. T. G. Bowles. An Experiment in Public-house Management. Charles Booth. Ireland Bewitched. W. B. Yeats. Theological Colleges. Rev. J. O. Johnston. Glinka: the Father of Russan Opera. A. E. Keeton. The Jewish Immigrant. John Smith. The Silences of God. Robert Anderson. But is God Silent? Richard Heath.

en's.

Clive

er.

ard.

colin enry thur

cher

gust.

ated.

sted.

amin

ik J.

Prof.

V.

ons

n S.

ın.

ns.

11.

or.

Cornhill Magazine. - Smith, Elder and Co. 18. Sept. Cornnill Magazine.—SMITH, ELDER AND CO. 18. Sept.
Pastels from Sp in. Continued. Mrs. Ma'garet L. Woods.
People I have Known.
In Vears of Storm and Stress. Continued. Karl Blind.
Travels in China. Mrs. Henry Clarence Paget.
Wedding of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette, 1790, by John Mair. Edited by Mrs. Simpson.
The Mutiny of the Hermione, 1797. H. W. Wilson.
Conferences on Books and Men. Continued. Urbanus S. Ivan.

Cosmopolitan.—5, Bream's Buildings, Chancery Lane. 6d. By Trolley to the Sphinx. Illustrated. Alexander Harvey.
The Basis of New York Society. Illustrated. Mrs. John King van Rensselaer.

Rensselaer.

Your True Relation to Society. J. W. Bennett.

Mohammed, Omar; the Building of an Empire. Continued. Illustrated.

J. B. Walker.

Augustin Daly and His Life-Work. Illustrated. Gustav Kobbé.

Operating an "Underground" Route to Cuba. Illustrated. George Reno.

Critic .- G. P. PUTNAM's Sons. 18. August. Charlotte Bronte and Her Two Friends, Mary Taylor and Ellen Nussey.
Illustrated. Marion Harland.
Augustin Daly. Illustrated. A. I. du P. Coleman.

Dial .- 315, WABASH AVENUE, CHICAGO. 10 cents. August 1 and 16.

A Year of Continental Literature. Dome,-Uniconn Press. 18. August. Henry Wood. Israfel.

Educational Review .- 11, LUDGATE HILL. 4d. August. State Organisation of Secondary Schools. Miss Dorothea Beale.
Our Secondary Schools and Their Relation to Our Imperial Needs.
Robert L. Morant.
Practical Idealism in Education. John Russell.
The Comparative Accuracy of Men and Woman. Agnes Robertson.

Educational Times, -89, FARRINGDON STREET. 6d. August. Dr. Wormell.

The American School Girl in 1830. Shakespeare's Richard II.

Engineering Magazine,—222, STRAND. 18. August.
The Development of German Shipbuilding. Illustrated. Rudolph Haack.
Machine-Shop Management in Europe and America. Concluded. H. F. L. Orcutt.

Orcutt.
The Engineer and the Road to the Klondike and Alaskan Goldfields. With Maps and Illustrations. Harrington Emerson.
The Utilisation of the Water Powers of Italy. Enrico Bignani. English and American Locomotive-Building. Continued. Illustrated. Charles Rous-Marten.
The Witwatersrand Mines and the Boer Government. Frederick H. Hatch. Evolution and Future of Benzine and Petroleum Engines. Illustrated. G. Lieckfield.

Short Distance Electric Power Distribution. James Swinburne.

Engineering Times .- GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET. 6d. July. The Evolution of the Undertype Steam Engine. Illustrated. John Richardson.

The History and Development of Motor Cars. Illustrated. W. Fletcher.

Experiments with Behr's Monorail High-Speed Railway. Illustrated. Development of Cableways in Great Britain. Illustrated. John M. Henderson, Jr.
Limitations to Height of Buildings. Robert S. Ball.

English Illustrated Magazine.-198, STRAND. 6d. Sept. Four-Footed Actors, Illustrated, Frederick Dolman.
Flashes from the Footlights. Illustrated, Seaside Resorts; Past and Present. Illustrated.
A Mass House in Moorfields, Illustrated. Scott Damant.

Etude. -T. PRESSER, PHILADELPHIA. 15 cents. August. Matrimony and Music. L. A. Russell.
The Specialist in Music. M. L. Townsend.
Interpretation. A. J. Goodrich.
Music for Piano:—"Autschwung," by R. Schumann; "Joyeux Moulin," by F. Hitz; "Danse Ukraine," by Joseph Pasternack, &c.

Expositor.-Hodder and Stoughton. is. Sept. Father John of Kronstadt in relation to the Russian Church. J. Y. Simpson.
St. Paul's Correspondence with Corinth. Dr. J. H. Kennedy.
An Historical Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians. Prof. W. M. Ramsay,
The Scarlet Woman and Her Fate. Dr. J. Monro Gibson.
Geographical Gains from Textual Citicism. Prof. T. K. Chryne.
Moses; the Ang.lic Mediator. Rev. A. A. Burd.

Expository Times, -SIMPKIN MARSHALL. 6d. Sept. Henry Barday Swee. With Portrait. Rev. J. H. Srawley.
Prof. Julicher on the Parables of Jesus. Rev. David Eaton.
Prof. Margoliouth and the "Original Hebrew" of Ecclesiasticus. Continued.
Prof. E. König. An Archæological Commentary on Genesis. Prof. A. H. Sayce.

Feilden's Magazine. - TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 18. August. The Engineering Conference, 1839. Sir W. H. Precce.
Recent Characteristics of British Locomotive-Engineering. Illustrated.
Charles Rous-Marten.
Actylene Generators. Illustrated. Prof. Vivian B. Lewes.
The Iron Making Blast Furnace as an Ideal Power Producer. Illustrated. Horace Alle An Electrolytic Process for the Manufacture of Parabolic Reflectors. Illustrated, Sherard Cowper-Coles.

Copper Steam Pipss. Illustrated. W. Edward Storey.

The Great Central Extension to London; the Building of a Great Railway.

Fireside Magazine .-- 7, PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 6d. Sept. Japan; the Land of the R sing Sun. Illustrated. Rev. Walter Weston, Fortnightly Review .- CHAPMAN AND HALL, 28. 6d. Sept. Fortnightly Review.—CHAFMAN AND HALL. 28. 6d. S. The Philosophy of the Dreyfus Case. And. 6 Godfernaux. Wanted—A Redistribution Bill. F. St. John Morrow. A New Caroline Commonplace Book. Alice Law. Peace or War in South Africa. Edward Dicey English Headmasters and Their Schools. J. C. Tarwer. The Yang-tze Region. R. C. Gundry. King Alfred's Country. Rev. W. Greswell. Literary Courtships. Mrs. Charles Towle. The Alaskan Boundary Question. Horace Towns.nd. M. Brunetiere. Charles Bas ide. Criminal Appeal and the Prerogative of Mercy. X. Y. Z. The Arrest of Thomas Kyd. Frederick S. Boas. The Government and London Architecture. Charles G. Harper. The Genesis of the German Clerk. J. J. Findlay. Bergen and the Coalition Nightmare. Diplomaticus.

FOPUM.—G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS. 18. 6d. August.
Tariff Tendencies in Great Britain. T. G. Bowles.
Egypt under Lord Cromer. T. S. Harrison
Naval Officers and Colonial Administration. Vice-Admiral Cyprian Bridge.
Ultimate World Politics. S. E. Moffett.
Cuba; a Paradise Regained. G. Reno.
Domestic Service; the Responsibility of Employers. Mary R. Smith.
The American Civil Service and the Merit System. Lyman J. Gage.
Liquid Air and Motive Power. Prof. E. H. Hall.
Antitoxins in the Prevention and Treatment of Discase. Dr. J. J. Kinyoun.
Recent Developments in China. O. P. Austin.
Has America Sufficient Gold in Circulation? Prof. R. P. Falkner.
Recent Canadian Fiction. L. J. Burpee. Forum.-G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS. 13. 6d. August.

Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly. —141, FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK. 10 cents. Sept. Rear-Admiral Winfield Scott Schley; a Naval Hero of To-day. Illustrated.

Weaver de Zapp.
The Building of the Race Rock Lighthouse, Long Island Sound. Illustrated.
F. Hopkinson Smith.
The "America" Cup Defenders. Illustrated. William E. Simmons.
Palatial Private Yachts. Illustrated. Waldon Fawcett.
Women as Army Nurses. Continued. Illustrated. Anna N. Benjamin.

Genealogical Magazine.-Ellior Stock. 18. Sept.

Story of the Surname of Beatson. Continued. Claim of Henry Power, Esq., to the Estates of James, late Earl of Tyrone, 1717.
The Arms of Jamaica. Leslie Alexander.
An Old Scottish Manuscript. Continued.
The Arms of Stuart, or Stewart, Earls of Lennox. Herbert H. Flower.
Duchy of Lancaster "Inquisitions Post Mortem." Continued.

A Descent from Blessed Princess Ma garet Plantagenet, Countess of Salisbury, Last of the Royal House of Plantagenet. Gentleman's Magazine,-Chatto and Windus. is. Sept.

Old London Taverns and Tea Gardens. C. W. Heckethorn.
Dr. Samuel Parr; a Country Parson. George Morley.
The Teaching of Arithmetic and Writing in the Time of the Commonwealth.
Foster Watson. Som: Shakespearean Names. G. L. Apperson.
Goblets and Drinking Cups. Pelham Gordon.
Philip Massing:r's "Fatal Dowry." Continued. H. Schütz Wilson.

Geographical Journal.-Edward Stanford. 28. August. A Journey to the North of Uganda. With Map and Illustrations. Col. J. R. L. Macdonald. Lake Rudolf. Major H. H. Austin.

XUM

The Swedish Arctic Expedition of 1838. With Maps and Illustrations. Prof. A. G. Nathorst. Notes on a Journey to Pali and Mamaidi, in the Kingdom of Bauchi. With Map. Percy A. Clive.

Pref. Pettersson on Methods of Oceanographic Research. H. N. Dickson.

The National Antarctic Expedition.

Prof. Davis on Physical Geography. Dr. Hugh R. Mill.

Geological Magazine .- DULAU. ss. 6d. August, Notes on Elephas ganess. Illustrated. Dr. Henry Woodward. On Lindstromaster and the Classification of the Palaesterids. Illustrated. Dr. J. W. Gregory. On the Terms Rock-Weathering, Serpentinization, etc. G. P. Merrill.

Girl's Own Paper .- 56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Sept. Old English Cottage Homes. Continued. Illustrated. H. W. Brewer. The Pleasures of Bee-Ke.ping. Continued. F. W. L. Sladan. The Domestic Economy School at the Battersea Polytechnic; London's Future Housewires and Their Teachers. Illustrated.

Girl's Realm,-HUTCHINSON. 6d. Sept Girl Musicians. Illustrated. Mrs. Stepney Rawson.
Three Days in Killarney with a Kodak. Illustrated. Ella Macmahon.
Louisa Alcott: Her Home and Family. Illustrated. Christina G. Whyte.
Girls Who excel in Sport. Illustrated. Kathleen Waldron.
Concerning Amateur and School Magazines. Illustrated, Miss E., M.
Symonds. Illustrated. Constance Crommelin.
Trout and Salmon Fishing. C. S. M.
Some Famous Dogs. Illustrated. Miss Alice Corkran.

Good Words.-Issister. 6d. Sept.

An Egyptian Harem. How I came to bombard London in a Balloon. Illustrated. Rev. J. M. Assouan Reservoir Works, Egypt; Water for a Thirsty Land. Illustrated.

Associan Reservoir Works, Egypt; water for a Infirsty Land. Hillstr.
John Ward.
In and Out of St. Pancras. Concluded. Illustrated. John Pendleton.
Worcester Cathedral. Illustrated. Canon Teignmouth-Shore.
The Star of the Girdle. Illustrated. E. Walter Maunder.

Great Thoughts .- 28, HUTTON STREET, FLEET STREET. 6d. Sept. Frederick W. Macdonald; the New Wesleyan President. With Portrait.

Charles Lamb; a Great Prose Writer. With Portrait. W. J. Dawson. Rev. G. S. Barrett; Interview, With Portrait. R. Blathwayt.

Harmsworth Magazine. HARMSWORTH, 31d. August 15. If London were like Venice, "Hustrated. Signor Somers J. Summers. How Royalty rides. Illustrated. Bernard Owen." Scotch Beauties. "Hustrated, "Egnota."

The Monks of St. Hugh's, Parkminster, Sussex; Men with Sealed Lips. Illustrated. W. J. Wintle.

The Life Story of a Loteo; What It Costs to run an Engine. Illustrated.

J. Horner.
Funny Side of Baseball; America's National Game. Illustrat.d.
Harry Furniss. meets Land; Some Picturesque Effects of the Tussle. Illustrated.

Harper's Monthly Magazine.-45, ALBEMARLE STREET. 18. August.

Haiti the Unknown. Illustrated. Henry Sandham.

Episodes of the Taiping Rebellion, 1884. Rear-Admiral L. A. Beardslee.

The Pursuit and Capture of Streight's Raiders, 1863. Illustrated. Dr. John Washington: the First American: His Homes and His Households.

Illustrated. Leila Herbert.
The Century's Progress in Experimental Psychology. Illustrated. Dr.
Henry S. Williams.
Concerning the Jews. Mark Twain.
Formal Gardens and a New England Example. Illustrated. Charles H. Coffin.

The Storming of Port Pillow, 1864. Dr. John A. Wyeth. Behind the Pink Walls of the Forbidden City at Peking. Illustrated.

The British Occupation of Egypt. Chalmers Roberts. A Cure for City Corruption. J. W. Martin.

Arthur Guerdeon.

Homiletic Review .- 44. FLEET STREET. 18. 3d. August. Three Ways of Studying a Biblical Narrative. Dr. Willis J. Beecher.
"Back to Christ" through Paul. Prof. Wm. C. Wilkinson.
The Use and Abuse of Anger. W. S. Lilly.
The Decline of the Pew. Prof. T. W. Hunt.
Church Methods and Church Work. Silas M. Giddings.

Humanitarian. DUCKWORTH AND Co. 6d. Sept. Humanitarian, -DUCKWORTH AND CO. Od. Sept.
Intercrossing and Some of Its Results, Prof. J. C. Ewart.
The Problem of Feminism. Prof. Mantegazza.
What We are and Whither wending. Constance, Countess de La Warr.
The History of Hybridisation. Dr. Maxwell Masters.
Goethe's Religion, Rev. A. T. Bannister.
Women Journalists of the Past. J. A. Middleton.
Mind and Morals in Animals and Savages. A. O'Neill Daunt.
The Apothecaries' Hall. Reatrice Heron Maxwell. Idler.—3, PATERNOSTER Row. 18. Sept. A Holiday in the Tre, Pol, and Pen Country Cornwa Joseph Shaylor.

Waxworks. Arnold Golsworthy.
At the Zoo. Illustrated. Walter Emanuel. Cornwall. Illustrated

International, -A. T. H. BROWER, CHICAGO. 10 cents. August. Quebec; the Silver City. Illustrated. J. E. Van de Sande.

Irish Monthly .- M. H. GILL AND SON, DUBLIN. 6d. August. The Birthplace of St. Patrick. Very Rev. Sylvester Malone.
The Religious Education of the Young. Most Rev. Dr. O'Doherty.
Conduct and Confession. Rev. William A. Sutton.
The Preacher in the Making. Rev. Richard A. O'Gorman.
Darwinism. Rev. E. Gaynor.

Journal of Education .- 3, BROADWAY, LUDGATE HILL. 6d. August. Subject Teacher or Class Master? Barbara Foxley Impressions of the International Congress of Women; Utopia in London Raghumath Purushottam Paranjpye; Senior Wrangler, 1899. C. S. B. Measurement and Simple Surveying. Sept.

The Dismissal of the Grantham Grantmar School Staff.
Primary Education in England. Sir H. Evelyn Oakely.
The School Master on Music. C. F. Abdy Williams.
Measurement and Simple Surveying. Continued. Benchara Branford:

J. J. Keliher and Co. 25. August 15.

The Desc-indants of the King's German Legion, 1803-1816.
Artillary in Conjunction with a Force awaiting Attack. Major E. S. May.
What the "Melpomenes" did at Visiadrug Sir Norman Lockyer.
The Red Cross Society at Sas. Baron Buxhoevden.
The Kaiser Alexander III. Harbour at Libau. With Maps.

Knowledge. - 326, HIGH HOLBORN. 6d. Sept. Sound Reflexion and Refraction. Rev. John M. Bacon.
The Mycetozoa, and Some Questions Which They Suggest.
Sir Edward Fry.
Fairy Rings. A. B. Steele.
Ben Nevis and Its Observatory. Illustrated. William S. Bruce.
Some Suspected Variable Stars. Continued. J. E. Gore.
Clouds. Illustrated. E. M. Antoniadi and G. Mathieu.
London Summers near Sunspot Minima. With Diagrams. Alex. B.
MacDowall.

MacDowall. The Story of the Orchids. Illustrated. Rev. Alex. S, Wilson. Electricity as an Exact Science. Howard B. Little.

Ladies' Home Journal.—Curtis Publishing Co., Philadelphia.

The East-Side Girl of New York. Illustrated. Charles T. Brodhead. Why Six Million Letters go Astray Every Year. Pattie L. Collins.

Lady's Realm.-HUTCHINSON, 6d. Sept. s Victoria of Wales. Illustrated. Royal Trousseaux. Illustrated.
A Memory of Marie Antoinette. Illustrated. Mrs. Orpen.
A Spinning and Weaving School in Blenheim Street. Illustrated. Marion

The National Pin. With Diagrams. Harold Macfarlane. Rev. Arthur Robins; a Popular Queen's Chaplain. Illustrated. Mrs. Sarah A. Tooley.

Land Magazine.—149, Strand. 28. August.
Lessons from Field Experiments. Prof. J. R. Campbell.
When the Sleeper Wakes on the Land Question. A. W. Crampton.
The Earl of Coventry; a Notable Landowner.
With Portrait.
Science and Practice of Farm Poultry-Keeping. George A. Falmer.
Notes on Tuberculosis and Tuberculin. John Speir.
Garden Allotments. Alfred J. H. Crespi.

Law Magazine and Review.-Wm. Clowes, 5s. August. County Courts. Francis K. Munton.
Viscount Esher, Master of the Rolls: in Memoriam. A. R. Jelf, Recollections of Viscount Esher, Member of the Northern Circuit. Prisons in England and America; a Contrast. E. H. Pickersgill, Civil Judicial Statistics. 1897.
The Bench and Bar in France. Erasmus D. Parker. Conditional War. Th. Baty.
The Golden Age of Law.

State Interference in (a) Contraband Trade, (b) Blockade-Running. F. W. Payn.

The Peace Conference at the Hague. S. Jules Enthoven.
Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation. Wm. Hanbury Aggs.

Leisure Hour .- 56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Sept. The Port of Belfast. Illustrated. W. J. Gordon.
The Abbé de Lamennais. With Portrait. E. Harrison Barker.
The Quarries of Carrara. Illustrated. Miss Helen Zimmern.
Sea-Gulls. Lieut. Walter Johnson.
The Peace Conference. With Portraits. Eleonore d'Esterre Keeling.

Library Association Record. - Horace Marshall. 18. August. Gabriel Naudé; a Librarian of the Seventeenth Century. Continued. George Smith. Libra Indica The F

The A F. W. The P Indica The C French

Lippi The C Wirele

List of

Organ Be A Far An El The U M ister

The I SI ad; The B MeC The C The D

Missie

The W

A Ro

Evang The D Troub Evolut Ninete The P St Ro A Cha Sn

The A An Int Wagne Zurich Music

" Mess M Musica The A

Music Song i Dr. F. Music

Hans v The H Ivor A. J. L. H Four-P

Anglop The Co

Library World .- 4, Ave Maria Lane, Paternoster Row. 6d.

strated

rust.

ıst.

ugust.

lon.

d: -

May.

rated.

t. B.

IA.

arion Mrs.

. W.

ggs.

t.

August.
Indicators. Continued. Illustrated. James D. Brown.
Classified and Annotated Cataloguing. L. S. Jast.
The Foreign Section in the Public Library. Frank E. Chennell.
The Arrangement of Periodicals. Thos. E. May.
F. W. Madden of Brighton. With Portrait.
The Provision of Ballad Music, Ancient and Modern. T. Aldred.
List of Books on Electricity. F. J. Burgoyne.
Sept.
Indicators. Continued. Illustrated. J. D. Brown.
The Card Catalogue as a Substitute for the Printed Catalogue. T. E. Maw.
French Fiction in Public Libraries. E. A. Baker.
List of Books on Shorthand. H. G. T. Cannons.

Lippincott's Monthly Magazine.-Lippincott, Philadelphia. 18. August.

The Court of Judge Lynch. Maurice Thompson.
Woman; a Phase of Modernity. Ellen O. Kirk.
Wireless Telegraphy Through Scientific Eyes. George F. Barker.
The Salon in Old Philadelphia. Continued. Anne H. Wharton.

Longman's Magazine.-Longmans. 6d. Sept. Organ-Builders; Some Makers of Sweet Sounds. Miss S. M. Crawley

Boevey, Year, Continued, H. Rider Haggard, An Elk-Chasse, Fred. Whishaw, The Use of Simples. Rev. John Vaughan.

Lute.-PATEY AND WILLIS. 2d. August.

M ister A, Vernon Warner, With Portrait.

Anthem: — O Saving Victim, by J. Lionel Bennett.

Macmillan's Magazine, -MACMILLAN. 18. Sept. The Derbyshire at Dargai; a Chapter of Regimental History. Capt.

Lad/ Louisa Stuart. Stephen Gwynn.
The Blockade of Brest, 1803-1804. David Hannay. Manager The Future of the Transvaal. C. W. Boyd.

McClure's Magazine.—45, Albemarle Street. 10 cents. August. The Cape to Cairo Railway. Illustrated. W. T. Stead. Capturing a Confederate Mail. Ray S. Baker. The Death of Abraham Lincoln. Illustrated. Ida M. Taibill.

Missionary Review of the World,-44, FLEET St. 18. 3d. August. The World's Missionary Conference of 1900. Dr. A. T. Pierson. Jan Hus; the Preacher of Prague. With Portrait. Rev. George H.

Giddins.

A Roman Catholic View of China and Missions in China. Robert E. Speer.

Evangelical Missions in Spain. Mrs. Charlotte Fenn.

Month.—Longmans. 1s. Sept.

The Decision on Incense and Lights. Rev. Sydney F. Smith.

Troubles of Jesuits and Benedictines at Valladolid in 1603. Rev. J. H. Follen.

Evolution; a Point of Apologetic. Rev. G. Tyrrell Nineteenth Century Christians. "A Layman."

The Prerogative of Mercy. A. R. Whiteway.

St Rose of Viterbo.

A Charge of Slave-Holding against Jesuit Missionaries. Rev. Sydney F.

Smith.

The Attitude of the Church towards Natural Science. Rev. A. Cortie.

Monthly Musical Record,-Augener. 2d. Sept. An Intolerable Tyranny. F. Peterson.
Wagner the Borrower. E. A. Baughan.
Zurich Autograph of the First Part of Bach's "Well-Tempered Clavier."

J. S. S. Music for Piano:—"Valse Infernale," by Meyerbeer.

Music. -186, WARDOUR STREET. 2d. August. "Messaline" and Its Critics. E. A. B.
The History of the Violincello. Continued. E. van Der Straeten.

Music.-1402, AUDITORIUM TOWER, CHICAGO. 25 cents. July. Musical Terminology. Dr. H. C. Hanchett.
The Actual Effect of Music on the Imagination. E. Swayne.

Musical Herald,-J. Curwen. ad. Sept.

The Leeds Board Schools.

Music as a Profession for Women. J. A. Fuller Maitland.

Song in Both Notations:—" He Who seeks to tame the Wind," arranged by John Corawall.

Musical Times,-Novello. 4d. Sept. Musical Times,—Novello. 44. Sept.

Dr. F. Niecks, With Portrait.

Music in the Synagogue. Continued. Rev. F. L. Cohen.

Hans von Bülow in His Letters. C. A. B.

The History of the Organ Recital.

Ivor A. Atkins and Horatio W. Parker. With Portraits,

J. L. Hattor in America.

Four-Part Songs:—"The Nightingale in Silent Night," by G. Rathbene;

"The Countryman," by Chas. Wood.

National Review.—Edward Arnold. 28. 6d. Sept. Anglophobia: a French Warning to England. Urbain Golier. The Court-Martial at Rennes. Sir Godfrey Lushington.

Some Impressions of the House of Commons from the Ladies' Gallery.

'Grille.'

Can Gardening be made to pay? S. Wyndham Fitzherbert.

Amarican Affairs. A. Maurice Low.

The Keepers of Literature. Dr. William Barry.

Don Miraglia. Miss Irby.

The Reform Policy of the Chinese Emperor. George S. Owen.

Greater Britain.

New Century Review .- 434. STRAND, 6d. Sept. Lady Paramounts on Both Sides. T. H. S. Escott.
The Popul urity of the Partridge. F. G. Walters.
The Marquis de Gallifer. Chris. Healy.
A Recollection of Disraeli.
Some Experiences of a Debt-Collector. Reym Adnal.
The Real Quartier Latin; the Diary of a Literary Wanderer.
Matthew Arnold and Christianity. C. E. Byles.
J. P. F. Kichter. Joseph Forster.
"Colonial London." Grey Cadogan Rothery.

New England Magazine. -5, PARK SQUARE, BOSTON. 25 cents.
August.

The International Peace Conference at the Hague. Illustrated. Benj. F. Trueblood.
The Romance of Mount Desert. Illustrated. Samuel A. Eliot.
The Work of Francis Parkman. George Stewart.
Fort St. James; a Hudson Bay Trading Post. Illustrated. Russell W. Fort St. James; a Hudson Bay Trading Post. Hussrated. Russell w. Porter.
Walter Kittredge: the Composer of "Tenting on the Old Camp Ground."
Illustrated. Gorde: H. Gerould,
Is the United States a Good Neighbour to Canada? Edward Porritt.
Old Times and New in Dublin, New Hampshire. Illustrated. George W. Cooke.
Workmen's Homes and Workmen's Trains. Charles Welsh.
The Sunset Lands of the Narragansetts. Illustrated.

New Orthodoxy. -30, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Sept. So-called Heresies. Continued. Rev. Robert Tuck.
The Gospel of the Holy Ghost. Continued. Rev. Robert Tuck.

Nineteenth Century.-Sameson Low. 28. 6d. Sept.

Nineteenth Century.—Sam:son Low. as. 6st. Sept.
Are We to lose South Africa? A Rejoinder. Sir Sidney Shippurd.
The Imperial Function of Trade. Henry Birchenough.
Rifle-Shooting as a National Sport. W. A. Baillis-Grohman.
The Future of the Great Armiss. Sidney Low.
A Visit to the Craig Brook Salmon Hatchery. Mocton Frewen.
Cicero; the Father of Letters. Herbert Paul.
Rowton Houses; from a Resident. W. A. Sommerville.
A Woman's Criticism of the Women's Congress; a Reply. Mrs. Gaffney.
The American Negro and His Place. Miss Eliz, L. Banks.
The Sierra Leons Disturbunces. Harry L. Stephen.
An All-British Railway to China. With Map. C. A. Mor.ing.
Carlyle as an Historian. George M. Trevelyan.
The Philosophy of Postry. Hon. Martin Morris.
The Future of the Christian Religion. Rev. Dr. Peccival.

Nonconformist Musical Journal .- 2), PATERNOSTER Row. 2d.

Music at Castle Gate Congregational Church, Nottingham, Music in Protestant Worship. Sir George Smith.
Anthem:—"I will sing of the Merc'es of the Lord for ever and ever," by C. Darnton.

North American Review .- WM. HEINEMANN. 50 Capts. August. North American Review,—WM. Heinemann, so cents. August. The Woman's International Parliament. Countess of Aberdeen. On the International Congress of Women. Kassandra Vivaria. The Paramount Power of the Pacific. John Barrett. The Constitutional Conflict in Finland. A Member of the Finnish Diet. The Case against Christian Science. W. A. Purrington. Anti-Trust Legislation in America. J. D. Sayers. Japan's Entry into the Family of Nations. T. R. Jero'gan. The Zionist Movement. Prof. R. Gotth: M. Athletics for Politicians. Sir Charles W. Dilke. The Censorship of the Stage in England. G. Bernard Shaw. Girls' Novels in France. Mile. Yetta Blaze de Bury. The Pleasures of Poverty. Max O'Rell.

Open Court,—Kegaw Paur. 6d. August.
The Gosp.: I on the Parisian Senge. Moncure D. Conway.
Maine de Bi.an, 1766-1824. Illustrated. Prof. L. Lévy-Bruhl.
Louis Büchner: a Revelator of Science. F. L. Onwald.
The Cross of Golgotha. Illustrated. Dr. Paul Carus.
Italian Anarchism. Prof. G. M. Frainingo.
Death and Resurrection. Dr. Paul Carus.

Organist and Choirmaster .- ), Berners Street. 3d. August. On Stop-Control. Dr. C, W. Pearce, Anthem: -- "Come to Bsthlehem," by C. W. Pearce, "Magnificat" and "Nunc Dimittis," by W. J. Tollemache.

Outing.-International News Co. 25 cents. August. Golf in Gotham. Illustrated. Charles Turner.
Big Game in the Rockies. Illustrated. John N. Ostrom.
Lawn Tennis on the European Continent. Illustrated. J. Parmly Paret.
The Great August Cruise of the New York Yacht Club. Overland Monthly.—San Francisco. 19 cents. August.
One Year in Kamchatka. Illustrated. James W. Burling.
The City of the Dalles; From Savagery to Civilisation. Illustrated. W.
A. Tenney.
The Battle of Shiloh, 1862; a Spectacular Battle and Its "Ifs." Major Ben C. Truman.

Pall Mall Magazine. -18, Charing Cross Road. 18. Sept. Alnwick Castle, Illustrated. Rev. A. H. Malan. Russia after the Completion of the Siberian Railway. Arminius Vambéry. Links in the Chain of Time. Illustrated. J. Holt Schooling. America To-day; the Republic and the Empire. Continued. William Archer.

puettes in Parliament. Continued. Illustrated. Frederick J. Higgin-

Pictorial Philately. Illustrated. Ernest C. Fincham."

Pearson's Magazine.-C. A. Pearson. 6d. Sept. Pinhol: Photography. Illustrated. A. Anderson.
From Birth to Bull-Ring. Illustrated. Hesketh Prichard.
Roller Boats: the Queerest Craft Afloat.
Armour-Plate versus Gun. Illustrated. Arthur Goodrich.
Sidelights on Contiet Life. Continued. Illustrated. Georg.
The Snake-Dancers of Arizona. Illustrated. Le. in Carnac. George Griffith.

Photo-Miniature.-Dawbarn and Ward. 6d. August. Stereoscopic Photography. Illustrated.

Specific Heat of Solutions which are not Electrolytes. William F. Magie. Physical Review .- MACMILLAN. 35. August.

An Interferometer Study of Radiations in a Magnetic Field. Continued. John C. Shedd. The Effect of Magnetization upon the Elasticity of Rods. J. S. Stevens and

H. G. Dorsey.
On Freezing and Boiling Water Simultaneously. R. W. Quick.

The Later Work of Maurice Masterlinck. Albert Phelps.
French Enthusiasms Satirized in Browning's "Two Poets of Croisic." Herbert E. Cushman.
Was Banquo bad? a Shakespearian Question.
Browning's Poems of Adventure and Heroism. Charlotte Porter and Helen A. Clarke.

Positivist Review,—WILLIAM REEVES. 3d. Sept. England and the Transvaad. Frederic Harrison. The Peace Conference. J. H. Bridges. Signor Formelli's Appreciation of Comte. F. S. Marvin.

Practical Teacher .- 33, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Sept. The Common Schools of Russia. M.
Popular Education in Switzerland. Ernest Gray.
How to Teach Magnetism and Electricity as a "Specific Subject," B. Elderkin.

Public Health.-129, SHAFTESBURY AVENUE. 18. August. Shakespeare and Sanitation. Dr. E. Gwynn.
The Admission of Infectious Cases into General Hospitals. Dr. E. H.

Snell. The Local Incidence of the Decline in the Birth-Rate, 1876-1898. Henry May.

Puritan.-James Bowden. 6d. Sept.

D. L. Moody; and Northfield and Its Wonderful Work. Illustrated. F. B. Meyer.
Spurgeon's Sermons. Arthur Mee.
The Gambling Question. Fred A. McKenzie.
Richard Whiteing, Author of "No. 5 John Street"; Interview. F. A. McKenzie.

Why I am a Socialist. J. R. MacDonald. Union Chapel, Manchester, and Dr. Alex. M'Laren. Illustrated. Hugh Cameron

Cameron.

Westminster College, Cambridge. Illustrated. Rev. C. Anderson Scott.

The Methodist Times. Illustrated. Dr. H. S. Lunn.

Northborough; the Home of the Claypoles. Illustrated. Margaret J.

Langley.

Quiver .- CASSELL. 6d. Sept. Schools for Deaf and Dumb; a Visit to the Kingdom of Silence. Illustrated. D. L. Woolmer. At Work among the Van-Dwellers. Illustrated. T. W. Wilkinson.
Bishop Ryle of Liverpool; a Fighter to the Last. Illustrated.
Agriculture and Horticulture; New Vocations for Christian Girls. Illustrated.

Railway Magazine .- 79, TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 6d. August. David Cooper, General Manager, Glasgow and South Western Railway. With Map and Illustrations. G. A. Sekon.

The New Electro-Pneumatic Signalling Cabin at Spitalfields, Great Eastern Railway. Illustrated. D. T. Timins.

What London spends annually in Railway Riding. Illustrated. George

Railways in Cerlon and Burmah. With Map and Illustrations, J. T.

Railway Ambulance Work. Illustrated. Tourniquet. Review of Reviews.—(AMERICA).—13 ASTOR PLACE, NEW YORK. 25 cents. August.

Robert Bonner. Illustrated. E. J. Edwards. The "America's" Cup Race in 1899. Illustrated.

Porto Rico from a Woman's Point of View. Illustrated. Mrs. Guy V. Henry.
The Defeat of Seven-Day Journalism in London. Illustrated. Dr. Henry

The Deleat of Seven-Day Journalism in London. Illustrated. Dr. Henry S. Lunn.

Education in the Southern States. J. L. M. Curry.

The Alaskan Boundary Dispute. William H. Lewis.

Play as a Factor in Social and Educational Reforms. Prof. E. A. Kirkpatrick.

Royal Magazine, -C. A. Pearson. 3d. Sept.

The Art of the Camera. Illustrated. Roderick Grey.
Wooden-Legged Celebrities. Illustrated. Jessie W. Brown.
The Coronation of Charles Foa Blythe; a Gipsy King.
Alick Munro.

Alick Munro.

Antric Hurricane in Davis Strait. Illustrated. Lieut. A. E. Peary,
The Medianimic Sketches of Victorien Sardou; the Strange Freak of a Great Man. Illustrated. Tiburce Beaugeard.
Canvey, Essex; the Most Curious Place in England. Illustrated. A.
Goodrich.

Animals worth Their Weight in Gold. Illustrated. Gambier Bolton.

Saint Nicholas, -MACMILLAN. 18. Sept.

Pelicantown. Illustrated. Frank M. Chapman. Paul Morphy; the Chess Champion. Illustrated. Tudor Jenks.

Saint Peter's .- 37, Essex Street, Strand. 6d. Sept. Cardinal Lavigerie, Primate of Africa. Claud Nicholson. Siena. Illustrated. Arthur F. Spender. The Jenolan Caves of New South Wales. Illustrated. Rev. Matthew

The Ancient Basilica of San Clemente, Rome. Illustrated. Right Rev. Wm. Brownlow

School Board Gazette. - Bemrose and Sons. 18. August. New Schools for the Blind and Daaf. Illustrated.

School-Planning. Continued.
Temporary School Buildings. Illustrated.
Closing of Schools by Order of the Sanitary Authority.

School Music Review.-Novello. 11d. Sept.

School Music at the Cape. Arthur Lees.
Songs in Both Notations:—"Would You know My Celia's Charms?" by Webbe; "Fairy Elves," by Cuthbert Harris, etc.

School World .- MACMILLAN. 6d. August. Class Rooms, Lecture Rooms, and Studies. Dr. C. E. Shelly. Experimental Botany. Illustrated. Ernest Evans.

Science Gossip.—110, STRAND. 61. Sept.

Sikkim. Illustrated. Major H. A. Cummins,
Prof. Huxley; a Reminiscence.
Collection and Preparation of Foraminifera. Continued. Arthur Garland.
Ticks and "Loup-III." Illustrated. Concluded. E. G. Wheeler.
Butterflies of the Palæarctic Region. Continued. Dr. Henry C. Lang.
Meteorites. Continued. Illustrated. John T. Carrington.

Scots Magazine.-Houlston and Sons. 6d. August. Dairy-Farming around Edinburgh in the Eighteenth Century. R. Hedger Wallace.

More of "A. K. H. B." Scottish Geographical Magazine.—Edward Stanford.

18, 6d. August.

Physical Geography of Northern Central America.
The Tian-Shan; Its Ground Plan.
The Effect of Ice-Melting on Oceanic Circulation.

Scribner's Magazine. - Sampson Low. 18. Sept. The Ottawa and the Gatineau Rivers; Where the Water runs Both Ways.
With Map and Illustrations. Frederic Irland.
Malolos, Philippine Islands; Aguinaldo's Capital. Illustrated. Lieut.-Col.
J. D. Miley.
The Letters of R. L. Stevenson. Continued. Illustrated. Sidney Colvin.
A Letter to a Political Optimist. Robert Grant.

Strad .- 186, FLEET STREET. 2d, Sept. The Literature of the Violincello. Continued. E. van Der Straeten.
J. K. Monk, Violin-Maker. With Portrait. Rev. W. Meredith-Morris.
Antonius Stradivarius. Continued. H. Petherick.
Domenico Dragonetti. With Portrait.
Beethoven's Trios. Continued. J. Matthews.

Strand Magazine. - George Newnes. 6d. Sept. The Southern Cross Antarctic Expedition. Illustrated. Sir George Newnes.

Lucheni; the Assassin of the Empress. Illustrated. Benj. H. Ridgely.
Water Polo. Illustrated., Albert H. Broadwell.
Hume G. Richards; the Youngest Engine-Driver in the World. Illustrated. Southern Cross Antarctic Expedition. Illustrated. Sir George

George Dollar. Sunday at Home.—56, PATERNOSTER ROW. 00. ocja.
The Story of Aberdeen. Continued. Illustrated. Mrs. Isabella F. Mayo,
The Burning of Rome.
Some Lessons from a Hundred Years of Missions. T. A. Gurney.
A Sunday at Malua, Upolu. Illustrated. Rev. R. Wardlaw Thompson.
Northamptonshire; In Carey's Country. Illustrated. Rev. Fred. Hastings. Sunday at Home .- 56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Sept.

Sunday Magazine.-ISBISTER. 6d. September Bishop Richard Blunt of Hull. Illustrated. William Bailay.
The Clarendon Press; an Academic Printing House. Illustrated. Amyas
Clifford. The Runes of Nature. Illustrated. Rev. Hugh Macmillan

Literatur Sheridan Mrs. Sar The Phy Poetry a

Glasgow

The A Study The Phil The Chr Philosop Unite Admiral

Cromwel The Bat me of Marlbore ome Ac The Roy
The Civ
R.
The Vol Naval at

> Chantan The Vis Life and The Edi bloo Are Lib.

W

Parnell : Contagio A Theor Co-opera The For Why Bo Suggest Molière Art and What is Religiou

Allgen The Por Modern

Johann Portugu Alte ubiaco Dreams. Christs Sven H Archiv

The Cer Industri Statistic Dr.

Andorra Sedan. Douts

Sven H Johann The Di Neisse. Spain. The Hi Kissing Cyrill K

Det Garibal Juy V. Henry

E. A.

trated.

ry. Great d. A.

atthew Rev.

.

" by

and.

edger

ays. Col. vin.

rge ed.

yo. gs. 25

Temple Magazine. - Horace Marshall. 6d. Sept. Glasgow of To-day. Illustrated. J. A. Hammerton. Theosophical Review. -26, Charing Cross. 18. August 15.

A Study of Maeterlinck. Mrs. Hamilton Syngs.
The Philosophy of Plotinus. Concluded.
The Christ. Concluded. Annie Besant.
Philosophy in India. Bertram Keightley. United Service Magazine. - WM, CLOWES AND SONS. 28. Sept. United Service Magazine.—Wai. Clowes and Sons. 2s. Sept. Admiral Sir Thomas Troubridge: a Naval Hero. Commander Troubridge. Cromwell as a Naval Politician. L. G. Carr Laughton. The Battle of Trafalgar. Vice-Admiral P. H. Colomb. Some of my Shipmates. Continued. Robert Lendall. Marlborough before h: command di in Chi.f. William O'Connor Morris. Some Account of the Siege of Cork in 1630. Major C. Field. The Royal Garrison Artillery. A Garrison Artillery Major, The Civil Employment of Discharged Soldiers; a Suggestion. Captain R. J. Byford Mair.
The Volunteer Musik stry Returns for 1838. D. Howie.
Naval and Military Progress in the United States. C. S. Clark.

Literature in Captivity. Herbert M. Sanders. Sheridan's Sisters. W. Fraser Rae.

Sheridan's Sisters. W. Fraser Rae.
Mrs. Samuel Pepys.
The Physics of Air and Sunshine. John M. Bacon.
Poetry and Pipes. Concluded. George Greenwood.

Temple Bar.-Macmillan. 18. S.pt.

Chautauqua Conzention of Elocutionists. Illustrated. Editor.
The Visualising of Stuttering. E. S. Werner.
Life and the Stage. Marguarite Merington.
The Educational Value of Training in Public Speaking. Prof. T. C. Trueblood. Werner's Magazine.-43, East 17th Street, New York.

blood.

Westminster Review.—F. WARNE. 28, 6d. Sept.

Are Librals in Earnest? The Rallying Point and the Touchston of Parnell and Cromwell; a Dialogue between Two Ghosts. D. F. H. Contagious Diseases Acts. Ellis Ethelmer.

A Theory of Junius. Concluded. N. W. Sibley.

Co-operative Workshops. R. Shuddick.

The Foreign Policy of Italy. Giovanni Dalla Vecchia.

Why Bodley's "France" is not Right. N. C. Frederitsen.

Suggestion of a Substitute for the Marriage Laws. Herbert Flowerdew.

Moliere the Poet. William Platt.

Art and Other Matters. Oscar Boulton.

What is the Law of the Church? J. Edmondson Joel.

Religious Doctrine Subjective, not Objective. Chas. Ford.

Wide World Magazine, -Geo. Newnes. 6d. Sept.

Twelve Years' Captivity in Chains in Omdurman. Continued. Illustrated. Charles Neufeld.

My Impressions of Pekin. Illustrated. Alfred Edmonds.
The Hook-Swinging Ceremony as I saw It. Illustrated. Rev. Joshua

Knowles.
The Great Grottos of Han, in the Belgi in Ardenness. Illustrated. William

The Great Grottos of Han, in the Beign in Ardanass. Husgrated. William G. FitzGrald.

On the War-Path with Redskins. Illustrated. James W. Schultz. The Fantastic Carnival at Pongau. Illustrated. Kathleen Schlesinger. Through Italy in Bedouin Dress. Illustrated. "Ibrahim Eff.ndi."

One Thousand Miles on Mule-Back. Continued. Illustrated. Mabel Penniman.

The Bogus "Rush" at Coolgardie. Illustrated. John Marshall.

Windsor Magazine,-WARD, LOCK AND Co. 6d. Sept. The Caps to Cairo Railway. With Map and Illustrations. W. T. Stead. A Summer Visit to Nova Zembla. Illustrated. J. Russell-Jeaffreson. Britons in the Service of Foreign Governments. Illustrated. A. de Burgh. White Island, New Zealand; an Island of Sulphur. Illustrated. James R.

The Museum of the Royal College of Surgions; How a Great Museum grew. Illustrated. A. K. Page.
Harvesting in Far California. Illustrated. Miss C. Fell Smith.
Firmen in Camp. Illustrated. Henry H. Bates.
The Prince of Wales's Animal Friends. Illustrated. Gambier Bolton.

Woman at Home. - Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. Sept. Ladies of Melburne. Illustrated. Frederick Dolman. Women's Autograp'ss. Illustrated. Mrs. Sarah A. Tooley.

Yale Review .- EDWARD ARNOLD. August. 75 cents. The Indian Policy of Sp. in. Henry C. Lea. .
The Tin Plate Combination. Frank L. McVey.
Taxation of Screet Railways for Purposes of Revenue and Control. Charles E. Curtis.

Young Man .- HORACE MARSHALL. 3d. Sept. Some Continental Cyclists. Illustrated. John Foster Fraser.
Are Our Prisons a Failure? Interview with Rev. J. W. Horsley.
Religion in Russia; the Wonderful Story of the Greak Church. Rev.
Affred Rowland.

Young Woman,-HOHACE MARSHALL. 3d. Sept. Music and Musicians; Interview with Mr. W. H. Cummings. Illustrated. Maurice Phillips.
Pottery and Match-Making; Dipping. S.
The Ascent of Woman.

THE GERMAN MAGAZINES.

Aligemeine Konservative Monatsschrift,—E. Ungleich, Leipzig.
The Powers and the Wheat Supply. Arthur Dix.
Modern Prisons. T. Hardeland.

Modern Prisons. T. Hardeland.

Johann Kaspar Bluntschli in Baden. Continued.

Portuguese Customs and Festivals. Louise Ey.

Alte und Neue Welt .- Benziger, Einsiedeln. 50 Pf. August. Subiaco. Illustrated. Georg Evers.

Dreams. V. Florentin.
The Floral Games of Cologne. Illustrated. P. Koehler.
Christs and Madonnas in Wood. Illustrated. A. Kumming.
Sven Hedin's Travels in Asia. Illustrated. H. Kerner.

Archiv für Soziale Gesetzgebung und Statistik.—Cari. Heymann, Birlin. 2 Mks. 50 Pf. Nos. 3 and 4.

The Census of Occupations in the German Empire of June 14, 1835. Prof. H. Rauchberg.

Industrial Labour and Its Organisation. Prof. W. Sombart.

Statistics of Accident and Sickness Insurance of Workmen in Austria in 1896.

Dr. O. Englander.

Daheim.-Poststrasse 9, Luipzig. 2 Mks per qr. August 5. The Origin of Newspapers. Ernst Niemann. Andorra. Illustrated. J. T. von Eckardt.

Sedan. Illustrated. Prof. E. Heyck.

Deutscher Hausschatz,-F. PUSTET, REGENSBURG. 40 Pf. Heft 15.

Doutscher Hausschatz,—Y. POSTET, REGENSBURG. 4
Sven Hedin's Travels in Asia. Illustrated.
Johann Kalb. Eugen Isolani.
The Diamond and Its History. Dr. F. Knauer.
Neisse. Illustrated. B. Russert.
Heft 16.
Spain. Continued. Illustrated. O. Hirt.
The History of the Piano. Illustrated. O. von Schaching.
Kissingen. K. Zitelmann.
Cyrill Kistler. With Portrait.

Deutsche Revue.—Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart.
6 Mks. per qr. August.
Prince Bismarck on St. Petersbu g., Petropolitanus.
Garibaldi's Landing at Marsala. O. Baratieri.
Universal Peace. Baronss Bertha von Suttner.
More Conversations with A. von Menzel. Ottomar Beta.

On Thunderstorms. Prof. R. Börnstein.
Theodor Storm. Hermione von Preuschen.
The Peace Conference. Dr. Max Nordau.
Emilio Castelar. Spiridion Gopcevic.
Influ nee of the Se 1 and Sua-Air on Health. Dr. C. Lindemann.
P. inc: Hatzfeld in Paris, Jan.-Mar. 1813. Continued. Wilhelm Oncken.

Deutsche Rundschau.-Gebrüder Partel, Berlin. 6 Mks. par quarter. August.

Goethe. Herman Grimm.

Henry Crabb Robinson on Goethe. Ellen Mayer.

Mephistopheles. F. Paulsen.

A Visit to Arthur Schopunhaux. Carl Hebler.

Greece under the Romans. L. Friedlænder.

Nonnenwerth; a Convent School. Christine von Hoiningen-Huene.

The Origin of Heine's "Ein Jüngling liebt ein Mädchen." Hei

Gartenlaube. - ERNST KEIL'S NACHE., LEIPZIG. 50 Pf. Heft 8. Paris Society 100 Years Ago. R. Artari 1.
The City of Constance. Illustrated. K. von Arx.
The Cure of In:bristy. Dr. H. Koppe.
Pictures of the Upper Austrian Mühlviertel. Illustrated. E. Zetsche.
How I became a Poet. Johanna Ambrosius.

Gesellschaft.-J. C. C. BRUNS, MINDEN. 57 Pf. August z The Metaphysics of Sex-love. Christaller.
Catholicism and Modern Literature, Continued. Ernst Gystrow.
The History of Authority. Multituil.
The Berlin Secssion. Rudolf Kliin.

August 15. Goe he. M. G. Con ad.

Ernst Haeckel. With Portrait. R. Steiner.

Authority. Continued.

Modern Literature. Continued.

The German Art Exhibition at Dresden. B. Wildberg.

Kunstgewerbeblatt.-E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPZIG. : Mk. August. The Work of Hermann Haase. Illustrated. Ernst Zimmermann.

Neue Deutsche Rundschau. -S. FISCHER, BERLIN. 1 Mk. 50 Pf. The Dwelling and Co afort. Hans Kurella.
The Evolution of Man. Withelm Bolsche.
Art and Life. Erich Urban.
The Com.dy of Death. Withelm Liebknecht.

Nord und Sud.—Schlesische Verlags-Anstalt, Breslau. 2 Mks.

Otto Julius Bierbaum. With Portrait. Albert Heiderich. Church and State in France, 1783—1870. Bruno Gebhardt. In Praise of Stupidity. Concluded. Jean Paul. Europe 1828-9; the Better Man. Optimist.

Stimmen aus Maria-Laach.—Herder, Freiburg, Baden. 10 Mks. 80 Pf. per annum. August.

The Marx Theory of Modesn Society and Its Development in the Light of the Bernstein Criticism. H. Pesch. Modern Hinduism under the Influence of Christian Ideas. Continued. A.

Protestantism. Concluded. R. von Nostitz-Rieneck.
The Earliest Maps of the World. J. Schwarz.
Drinking Water and Epidemics. Concluded. H. Kemp.
O. Ludwig's Tragedy "Die Makkabler" for Schools. N. Scheid.

Ueber Land und Meer.—Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart.

1 Mark. Heft 1,

The Crusades. Illustrated, L. Holthof.
The Railways of North America. W. Junker.
Dreams. Dr. R. Eisler.
Naval Life. Continued. Illustrated. R. Schneider.
Bombay. Illustrated. S. L.
Gipsy Life. Illustrated. M. C. Pilcz.
The Nanyang Army in China. Illustrated. A. Kirchhoff.

Ver Sacrum. -E. A. SREMANN, LEIPZIG. 15 Mks. per ann. Heft 6. The Work of Johann V. Krämer. Illustrated.

Die Waffen Nieder!-E. Pierson, Dresden. 1 Mk, 30 Pf. per quarter.
July-August.

The Hague Conference.

Die Zeit.—Genthergasse 1, Vienna IX./3. 50 Pf. August 5.
The End of Dual Government in Austria-Hungary. Prof. E. Pfersche.
The Dieyfus Case. Continued. Pollex.
The Railway Question. R. Ehrenfeld.
People's Libraries in Austria. Dr. J. Himmelbaur.
Camille Lemonnier and Belgium. A. Mockel.
August 12.
National Insurance.
J. Mendrochowicz.
Camille Lemonnier. Continued.
August 10.

August 19.

The Dreyfus Case. Continued.
German-Austrians and Federation in 1848. Dr. M. Bach.
The Faust Legend in Art. Dr. A. Tille.
Political Poems, 1848. Hermann Rollett.
Hermann Rollett. Dr. J. Scheu.

The German Ministry. H. von Gerlach. Goethè and Se vian Folk-Poetry. Dr. M. Murko. Goethe's Faust in Art. Dr. A. Tille.

Zeitschrift für Bildende Kunst.—E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPZIG. 26 Mks. per annum. August.

Early Dutch Art at Worlitz. Illustrated. F. Dülberg.
Original Architectural Drawings by Wendel Dietterlin. Illustrated.
G. Pauli.
The Mural Decorations of the Church of St. Francis at Assisi. Illustrated.

THE FRENCH MAGAZINES.

Association Catholique.—3, RUE DE L'ABBAYE, PARIS. 2 frs. August 15. Lassalle and His Doctrine. G. de Pascal.
Dr. Rodolphe Meyer. C. Reichenbach.
The Sixth of French Master Printers at Bordeaux. E. Rivière, Bibliothèque Universelle. -18, King William Street, Strand. 206. per annum. August.

Charles Monaard and the Franco-Swiss Conflict of 1838. Numa Droz. Cap'i. Adolphe Ribaux.
The English Submarine Cables. Pierre Martel, Gottfried Keller. Concluded. F. Dumur.
The International Congress of Publishers in London. Ed. Tallichet.

Correspondant .- 14, Rue De L'ABBAYE, PARIS. 2 frs. 50 C. August 10. Chesnelong. E. Keller. The Dreyfus Court-Martial. The Alien Conspiracy in France. G. Syveton.
The Power of Money and the Drama at Rennes. A. Delaire.
The Boers and Their Country. Francis Mury.
The Italians in China. With Map. A. A. Fauvel.

Metz and Its Church after the Annexation. Continued. F. Klein. The Evolution of the Socialist Syndicate in France. L. de Seilhac Belgian Catholics and the Electoral Question. M. Vanlaer. Freemasonry. P. Nourriason.
China in the Twentieth Century. Marquis de Nadaillac.

Humanité Nouvelle.—15, Rue des Saints-Pères, Paris.
1 fr. 25 c. August 10.

A New Theory of Genius. L. Winiarski, Co-operation. Chr. Cornelissen.
Napoleon I. and False Coinage. Continued, L. de Royaumont.
Individualism. Maxime Doubinsky,
Poland and International Peace. J. d'Outremer,
The Social Movement in Balgium. L. Hennebioq.

Journal des Économistes .- 14, Rue RICHELIEU, PARIS. 3 frs. 50 c. August.

Profit-Sharing. Maurice Block.
The Right of Public Servants to strike. Vifredo Pareto, Forbonnais. Veron Duverger.

Ménestrel .- 2 bis, Rue Vivienne, Paris. 30 c. Aug. 6, 13, 20, 27. Music in Switzerland. Continued. Albert Soubies.

Mercure de France.—15, Rue de L'Echaudé-Saint-Germain, Paris. 2 frs. August. Philological Letter to Remy de Gourmont. Louis Denise.
From Kant to Niztzsche. Continued. J. de Gaultier.
The Renaissance of Medal-Engraving. A. Germain.

' Monde Moderne. -- S, Rue St. Benoit, Paris. 1 fr. 60 c. August. The Palais-Royal, Paris. Illustrated. Guy Tomal.
Songs of Capture. Illustrated. Léon Pineau.
Commercial Education. Illustrated. Gaston Cadoux.
Wheat Culture in the United States. Illustrated. Allen White.
The Metropolitan Railway of Paris. Illustrated. C. de Néronde.

Nouvelle Revue.—18, King William Street, Strand.
30s, per half-year. August 1.
Kant's Theories of Perpetual Peace. V. Delbos.
The Sea and an Aerial Post. G. Reynaud.
Dumas pere. Mathilde Shaw.
The Literary Vocation. A. Albalat.
Letters on Foreign Politics. Mme. Julistte Adam. August 15.

The Last Unpublished Letters of Napoleon I. The Psychology of Poets. G. Dumesni.
An Inquiry on Secondary Education. A. Muteau.
An Essay on Baudelaire. P. Caume
The New Philosophy. P. Duplari.
Letters on Foreign Politics. Mme. Juliette Adam.

Nouvelle Revue Internationale.—23, Boulevard Poissonière, Paris. 2 frs. 50 c. August 1.

The Hague Conference. Continued. Marie L. de Rute, Review of European Politics. Comte E. de Keratry. The Situation in France. P. Denis. Czechs and Magyars. S. Bystricky.

The Hague Conference. Continued. Marie L. de Rute. Industrialism. P. Denis, The Proceedings at Rennes, Mine. Rattazzi.

Réforme Sociale.—54, RUE DE SEINE, PARIS, 1 fr. August 26. Is France a Democracy? L. Etcheverry. France in North Africa and the Trans-Saharan Proposal. Paul Leroy. Beauligu.

Anglomania and French Traditions, E. C. Bodley.

Colonial Expansion and Social Reform. M. de Sablemont.

Revue de l'Art Ancien et Moderne. -28, Rue du Mont-Thabor, Paris, 7 frs. 50 c. August 10.

J. Granié. Illustrated. Jean Cruppi.
The Bardo Museum at Tunis and the Excavations of M. Gauckler at Carthage. Concluded. G. Perrot.
Van Dyck. Illustrated. Jean Durand.
The Expiatory Chapel, Paris. J. de Boisjoslin.

Revue Blanche.-r, Rue Laffitte, Paris. rfr. August z. The Fall of the Roman Empire and the Barbarian Invasion. T. Duret. August 15.

New Caledonia. J. Durand. Latin Europe. P. Louis.

Revue Bleue, -FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 6d. August 5. The Hague Conference. Hector Despasse.
Military Espionage in Tims of Peace. Lizut.-Col. Patry.
Louis XVIII. and Duc Decazes. J. Ernest Charles.

August 12.
Co-operation of Ideas and Popular Universities. G. Séailles, Espionage and Treason in Time of War. Lieut.-Col. Patry. Doutsone Revise.

August 19.
La Fontaine and the Chantilly Archives. M. Henriet.
Cretan Autonomy. D. Bikélas.
August 26.

The Theatre in the Last Quarter of the Century. L. Chevallier. Savoy and Xavier de Maistre. J. Corcelle.

Revue

Castelar; French Pa The Peace The Indu R. G. G. d'. Scientific

The Gern The Med The Mec Vicon The First

Co-operat cial Le Revu

The Altit

Recent F Revue The End

The Ques Revu Belgian S candina

Napoleon The Soci Dess Revue 1

The Polit Revu Christina Insect Co Cookery

The Fête Revue

The Fre African I The Mi Freedom The Nat

B The Pred Civilt

Pius VI. Italian I Decaden Pius VI.

Presenta The Pos Fleg The Ver

Nuos The De The Sch Elephan

Guarter

st 5.

strated. strated

RE

16.

ler at ust 5.

G.

Leroy.

BOR,

O.

Co-operation among Bak rs in England. F. Rockell. Cartels and their Characteristics. R. Li-smann. Social Legislation in 18,8. H. Lambrechts. Revue Encyclopedique. -18, KING WILLIAM STREET, STRAND. 78. per qr. August 5.
The Altitude Cure in Summer. Illustrated. Dr. Galtier Boissière. August 19.
Madagascar, Illustrated, Jacques Haussmann.
Railways in India. Illustrated. Jacques Boyer.

G. d'Avenel.

August 26.
Recent French Drama. Illustrated. Gustave Geffroy.
Victor Cherbuli:z. Illustrated. A. B:aunier and E. Tissot.

The First Revolutionary Campaign. A. de Ganniers.

Revue Française .-- ;2, Rue de la Victoire, Panis. 2 frs. August. The End of the Royal Niger Company. G. Vasco.
The Question of Franchiss in the Transvasl.
The Hawaiian Isles. Paul Barré. Revue Genérale.—16, RUE TREURENBERG, BRUSSELS. 12 frs. per annum. August.

Revue des Deux Mondes.—18, King William Street, Strand.
30s. per half-year. August 1.

Castelar; a Spanish Statesman. E. Varagnac. French Painters of the Century. J. Breton.
The Peace Conference and the Vatican. G. Goyau.
The Industrial Movement: Its Financial and Economic Consequences.

R. G. Lévy.
The Mechanism of Modern Life: Racing, Horses, and Jockeys. Vicomte

Scientific Questions: the Struggle against Alcohol. A. Dastre. August 15. Castelar, Continued, E. Varagnac,
The German Reaction against Femininism, E. Seillière.
The Mechanism of Mod.rm Life: Racing, Horse-owners, and Betters.
Vicomte G. d'Avensl.

Revue d'Économie Politique.—22, RUE SOUPPLOT, PARIS.
20 frs. per annum. July.

Belgian Schools of Political Economy. Victor Brants.
Scandinavia; the Land of the Sagas. Concluded. H. Ponthière.
Napoleon's Brothers before the Empire. A. de Ridder.
The Social Condition of Germany in the Eighteenth Century. Albert Dessart.

Revue Internationale de Sociologie.—16, RUE SOUPPLOT, PARIS. 18 frs. per annum. July.
Benjamin Kidd and His Sociological Theory. A. Loria.
The Political Parties in Belgium. G. Cohen.

Revue pour les Jeunes Filles.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris.
r fr. 25 c. August 5.
ristina Rossetti and Her Postry. G. Bricard.

Christina Rossetti and Her Poetry. G. Bricard. Insect Collections. A. Sériès. Cookery Schools in Norway. Mme. R. Rémusat. August 20.
The Fêtes at Cardiff. Léon Durocher.
Country Life. Gaston Deschartres.

Revue du Monde Catholique. -76, Rue des Saints-Pères, Paris.

The French Clergy and the Public Treasury under the Ancien Régime-Isidore Cantrel.

African Monarchism. Continued. Dom Besse.

The Misericordia and Eternal Punishment. Abbé Turmel and R. P.

Fontaine.

Freedom of Education. André Paire.
The Naiade and the Blockade of Dahomey. Continued. A. de Salinis. EW OF REVIEWS.

Revue de Paris. -18, King William Street, Strand. 60 frs. per annum. August 1.

60 frs. per annum. August r.
Literary History. G. Renard.
The African Elephant. E. Foa.
A Tonkinese Trouville. G. P. de Guzman.
Saint-Saeñs and Wagnerism. J. Écorcheville.
August r5.
Opinion and Conversation. G. Farde.
The Chinese-French Protectorate. Le Père Coldre.
The Origins of French Socialism. A. Aulard.
The Reorganisation of a Military Museum. M. Maindron, German Infantry Methods. P. Lehautcourt.

Revue Politique et Parlementaire.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris 3 frs. August 20.
Dissociation and Concentration of Political Partiss. R. de la Grasserie.
The Destiny of Russia from a Nationalist Point of View. Philharmonios.
The War-Horse and Automobilism. P. Baubigny.
The Bill of Indemnity. Ignace Tambaro.

Revue des Revues .- 12, Avenue de L'Opéra, Paris. 1fr. August z. The Revolutionary Spirit in Recent French Literature. Camille Mauclair. French Bretons in Wales. A. Le Braz.
The Turkish Question. Concluded.
The Priest in the Modern French Novel. Concluded. G. Pellissier. Recent Russian Literature. Vera Starkoff.
German Literature To-day. Sperans.
The Langley Flying-Machine. Hustrated. G. Roux.
August 18.

The Great Railway Companies in France. Camille Pelletan.
The Great Railway Companies in France. Camille Pelletan.
The Rehabilitation of J. J. Rousseau. Frédérica Macdonald.
Psychology and Training of the Conjurer. Illustrated. Jules Bois.
The Adol-scence of Leconte de Lisle. M. and C. Leblond.
The Theatre in Modern Greece. Constantin Macris.
Marguerite of Lorgaine on the Italian Throne. P. d'Estrée.

Revue Scientifique.—FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 6d.
August 5.
The Colonisation of Africa and the Trans-Saharan Railways. A.
Duponchel.
Strikes in France in 1898.

August 12.

The Finalist Concept and Its Scientific Application. Sully Prudhomme.

Future Wars and Their Economic Consequences. Jean de Bloch.

August 19.
The Curative Effects of Vibratory Movements. G. Coriolis. Future Wars and Their Economic Consequences. Continued. J. de Bloch.

August 26. Binocular Illusions. A. Dissard.
The Infinity of the Stellar World. A. Muller.

Revue Socialiste. -78, Passage Choiseul, Paris. 1 fr. 50 c. August. Revue Socialist Unity in Germany. E. Milhaud.
The Greatness of the United States. Paul Louis.
The Crisis in the Socialist Party in France. G. Rouanet.
The Communal Elections in Italy.
The Origin of the Idea of Good. P. Lafargue.

Semaine Littéraire .-- 4, Boulevard du Théâtre, Geneva. 15 c. August 5.
The Poetry of Stéphane Mallarmé. With Portrait. L. Duchosal. August 12, 26. John Calvin. Gaston Frommel.

Université Catholique. -Burns and Oates. 20 frs. per annum. August 15.

Denys Petau. R. Parayre. Eden. R. P. Frédéric de Curley. The Youth of Perugino and the Umbrian School. Abbé Broussolle. Alcoholism. R. P. Arduin.

THE ITALIAN MAGAZINES.

Bessarione. -S. PANTALEO 3, ROME. 12 frs. per annum. The Precept of Charity for Hebrews and Christians. The Holy See and the Armenian Nation. **Civiltà Cattolica.—Via di Ripetta 246, Rome. 25 frs. per annum. August 5. IS VI.: a Centenary Commemoration. Italian Dialects.

Decadence and Corruption in Art. Americanism Condemned by American Bishops. August 19. Presentments in Telepathy. Continued. The Positivist View of Moral Science. I.

Flegrea. - PIAZZETTA MONDRAGONE, NAPLES. 20 frs. per annum. Politics and Finance. A. Branca. The Venice Exhibition. D. Angeli.

Nuova Antologia,—Via S. Vitale 7, Rome. 45 frs. per annum.

The Decadence of Latin Nations. Prof. G. Sergi.
The School Problem in Italy. Continued. Prof. E. Cocchia
Elephants' Tusks and the Ivory Trade. S. Cocchi.

Arboriculture. E. C. Lovatelli.
R. L. Stevenson. A. Bosdari.
The Agrarian Crisis in England. N. Colajanni.
Victor Cherbulizz. Laura Gropallo.
The Hague Conference. P. Tui illo.
Rassagna Montered.

Rassegna Nazionale.-Via della Pace 2, Florence. 30 frs. per ann. August z.

The Teaching of Geography. Prof. P. Villari.
The Pope as Arbitrator. R. de Cesare.
The Platonism of a Christian Democrat.
The Monarchical Power in Italy. X. Y.
The Italians in the Argentine. A. Senesi. August 16.

The Centenary of N. Puccini. Arturo Linaker. The Limits of Physical Energy. A. von Schwa The Political Situation. R. F. Ricci. A. von Schwarz.

Rivista Internazionale.-VIA TORRE ARGENTINA 6, ROME.

Aussia and Finland. Prof. A. Corri.
Rural Banks in Germany. Count L. C. di Chiusano.
Socialism and the Action of the Clergy. G. P. Volpe Landi.

"William Tell" and its First Performance in Italy. A. Cametti, The "Regio" Theatre at Turin, G. Ferrero.

Rivisita Politica e Letteraria. - 5. Via Marco Minghetti, Rome. August r. Franco-Italian Relations. XXX... Parliamentary Decadence. E. Spagnolo. Taine, Carlyle, De Savetis. V. Morello.

Baldassarre Galuppi. A. Wotquenne,

THE SPANISH AND PORTUGUESE MAGAZINES.

Cludad de Dios .- REAL MONASTERIO DEL ESCORIAL, MALRID.

Rivista Musicale Italiana .- FRATELLI BOLCA, TURIN. L4-50. No. 3.

The O igin of Comic Opera. Continued. N. D'Arienzo. The Composers of the Music of the Geneva Huguenot Psalter. H. Kling.

What Modern Authropology has to say about Heredit, Z. M. Nuñez. The Arabic M.muscripts in the Escurial. Juan Lazcano. Human Justice. J. Montes.

Physiologists and Psychological Phenomena. M. Arnaiz. Human Justice. J. Montes. A Scientific Causerie.

The History of Music. Continued. E. Grassi-Landi.

España Moderna. - Cuesta de Santo Domingo 16, Madrid. 40 pesetas per annum. August.

Reading Circles and Popular L'bra ies in England. Symposium.

Madrid Court Morals and Crime in Castile under the Austrias. J. Perez de The Course of Events in Spain and America. Job.

O Instituto.-University of Coimbra. 9d. August. New Principles of Crim'nal Science, A. Lino Netto, Alfonso III. and the O igin of Villa Real. João A. Ayres D'Azevedo.

Revista Brazileira, -Travessa do Ouvidor 31, Rio de Janeiro. 6os. per annum. No. 88.

How and Where Orelhana was Lost. J. Lucio D'Azevedo. An Ordinance Survey of Para. Dr. Katzer, The Press of Pernambuco, 1821 to 1825. A. de Carvalho.

Revista Contemporanea. - Calle de Pizarro 17, Madrid. 2 pesetas. July 31.

The Vindication of Spanish Sovereignty in the Philippines. J. Martos Traditions of Lorca. F. Caceres Pla.

Velasquez. Rafael Domenech.

August 15.
The Retribution of Labour. M. G. Maestre. Light and Colours. Jorge Lechalas. The Hispano-American Customs Union. Arturo Llopis.

THE DUTCH MAGAZINES.

Elsevier's Gelilustreerd Maandschrift,—Luzac and Co., 46, Great Russell Street. 18. 8d. August.
Floris Verster and His Wo k. Illustrated. Albert Plasschaert.
The Mauritius in the 17th Century. Illustrated. S. Kalff.
Nirvana. Edward B. Koster.

De Gids.-Luzac and Co. 3s. August. Impressions of Algeria. Ann Ekker,
Our Debt of Honour to Our Colonial Possessions. C. Th. van Deventer.
Goethe; a Recollection of the 150th Anniversary of His Birth. Dr. Byvanck.
Georges Rodenbach and Stéphane Mallarmé. P. of. A. G. van Hamel.

Vragen des Tijds .- Luzac and Co. 18. 6d. August. The Economic Policy of the European States in the 17th Century. M. W. The Candidate for a Government Post in the Dutch Indies. Ph. van der Kemp. A Chapter of Griesland's History. Aug. Gittés.

Woord en Beeld,-ERVEN F. BOHN, HAARLEM. 16s. per annum. August.

Dr. Max Rooses: Art Critic and Savant. With Portrait. Pol de Mont. A Little-Known Chamber of Antiquities. Illustrated. G. Honig.

THE SCANDINAVIAN MAGAZINES.

Kringsjaa .- OLAF NORLI, CHRISTIANIA. 2 kr. per quarter. July 31. The Origin and Significance of Colour in the Animal World. Continued.

A. Petersen.

The Inter-Parliamentary Conference. With Portraits. August 15.

The Inter-Parliamentary Conference. Continued. With Portraits.

Reminiscences of a Summer in Svolvaer. Kristian Giörsen.

Ringeren.-THE CITY PASSAGE, CHRISTIANIA. 2 kc. per qr. August 5. The Right to Kill. C. E. Jensen. From Rome to Florence. Bernt Lie.

The English House of Commons. Alexander Bugge. The Influence of Music on Culture. Gerhard Schelderup.

Samtiden.—JOHN GRIEG, BERGEN. 5 kr. per ann. Nos. 6 and 7. Joseph Arch and the Social Position of the English Agricultural Labourer. X. Auguste Comte and the Jesuits. George Dumas, Nicolai Wergeland. Hjalmar Christensen.

Tilskueren. - Ernst Bojesen, Copenhagen. 12 kr. per annum. August. The Rembrandt Exhibition. Illustrated. Karl Madsen. Charlotte Elizabeth of Orleans. S. Schandorph. The Woman Question. Nina Bang.

| SUBSCRIPTION ORD | ER FORM F | OR THE ' | REVIEW | OF | REVIEWS." |
|------------------|-----------|----------|--------|----|-----------|
|------------------|-----------|----------|--------|----|-----------|

|    |     | 1       |    |        |    |           |
|----|-----|---------|----|--------|----|-----------|
| To | the | Manager | 64 | REVIEW | OF | REVIEWS." |

Mowbray House, Norfelk Street, London, W.C.

Date

Please send the "Review of Reviews" for Twelve Months, beginning with the number, to

For which I enclose Eight Shillings and Sixpence.

Mon Oos

HISTORY OF THE MONTH IN CARICATURE.

HISTORY OF THE MONTH IN CARICATURE

I.—THE TRANSVAAL CRISIS.

Ulk, Berlin.]

Chamberlain: "Only give me your little finger: I will then myself take the hand and what is attached to it!"

Montreal Daily Witness.]

[August 30.

THE DILEMMA.

Oom Paul: "If I hang on he'll cut the rope. If I drop I'll be swamped sooner or later. What'll I do?."

Hindi Pun. k.].

PEACE OR WAR!

[Bombay.

Britannia wonders, while Chamberlain sharpens the trident.

....

ROME.

NEIRO.

D. Martos

M. W.

an der

m.

ugust.

THE LITTLE "STAND IN THE WAY." KRUGER: "Get off that box, Portugal!"
PORTUGAL: "As soon as he gives me leave!"

Mosquito.] THE CONVERSION OF ST. PAUL. (Acts ix., verses 3, 4, and 5.)

Ulk, Fraling

THE TRANSVAAL AND ENGLAND.

CHAMBERLAIN (offering a case of "Dum-Dums"): "Won't you have a cigarette?"

KRUGER: "Thanks, but first have an old-fashioned Dutch pipe with

[Sept. 14.

Westminster Gazette:

HER MAJESTY'S KING JOE. On his War Horse.

On his War Horse. (Suggested by sketch of "King John" at "Her Majesty's.")

Westminster Gazette.]

IN THE COLONIAL WARD

NURSE CHAMBERLAIN: "Here's your draught, Mr. Kruger."
MR. KRUGER: "Is there any of that horrid suzer-linty in it?"
NURSE CHAMBERLAIN: "No, there isn't; so you'd better drink it up quickly and get it over."

London.

Amsterdammer }

ENGLAND AND THE TRANSVAAL.

Salisbury (to Chamberlain): "Careful, now; don't poke him too much, or he will break loose!"

Lustige Blätter.]

THE ENGLISH WOLVES AND THE BOER BABY.

"Go away, or I'll smack you!"

THE TRANSVANE.

Little Boy Kruger had better not jump on the tail too long.

THE BATTLE WITH THE DRAGON.

Berlin.

JOHN BULL: "A miserable dragon, this Kruger I Nobody can believe how he hangs on to Mammon, his shining gold. As if man could find happiness when he has so much of this stuff! If it costs him his head, I shall take his hoard away!"

II.—THE DREYFUS CASE.

La Silhouette.]

A DRY NURSE!

She neglects her own offspring to feed Dreyfus 1-1

Lustige Blatter.]

PROOF POSITIVE!

(Is this all, or is there more to come?)

Jugend.]

THE SIEGE OF FORT CHABROL.

[Munich.

HISTORY OF THE MONTH IN CARICATURE.

III. - PRESIDENT MCKINLEY'S "POLICY"!

World.]

"Be careful, William; that tree is about to break."

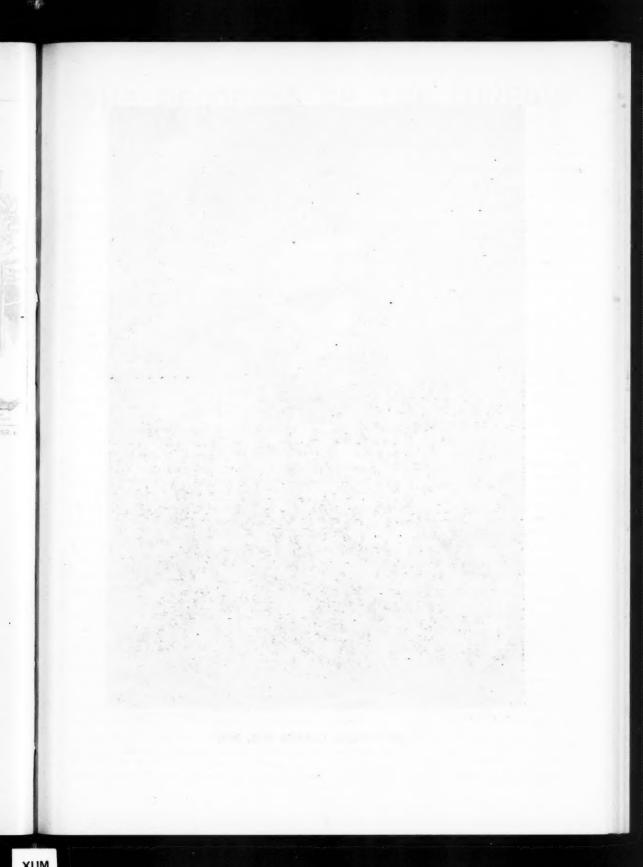

[New York.

Amsterdammer.

THE DEGRADATION OF JUSTICE BY FRANCE.

[Amsterdan

Photograph by]

[London Stereoscopic Co.

the the tio the the pla to no de du of pu co ma Pre ha lan aft ha the So litt an COI opi one car to do tha his as wh an plu evi a r torep

of

wh Re

shr

SIR EDWARD CLARKE, Q.C., M.P.

THE PROGRESS OF THE WORLD.

LONDON, Oct. 2, 1899.

The British public last month ex-The Wolf perienced a somewhat unusual sensaand the Lamb. tion. Everybody is acquainted with the most familiar of all Æsop's fables, the Wolf and the Lamb, but everyone has hitherto, without exception, read that apologue from the point of view of the lamb. For the first time in the lives of many they were last month able to put themselves in the place of the wolf, and curiously enough they seem to have come to the conclusion that the wolf has not only a great deal to say for himself, but that the devouring of the lamb was the imperative and painful duty which no wolf with any respect for the law of man or God could avoid. The difficulty of putting oneself in another's place was seldom more conspicuously manifested. We are now able to fill in many details in the fable which old Æsop left out. Probably if he had written out all the facts, we should have found that immediately before devouring the lamb, the wolf said grace before meat, and that after he had finished he, as piously, thanked God for having rewarded his faithful servant. The story of the dealings of the British Government with the South African Republic might be told with very little alteration in the words of the familiar fable, and then perhaps for the first time some of our countrymen would realise the extent to which, in the opinion of everyone outside England, and of at least one-half of the English people, crime is aggravated by cant, During the Peace Crusade I frequently referred to the conception of England which prevails outside our doors. John Bull, I used to say, is perpetually afraid that people will mistake him for a sheep. In reality his neighbours from of old time have regarded him not as a sheep, but as "the grey wolf of the Northern seas. whose tooth is ever keen, whose maw is never filled, and who has for generations battened upon the plunder of the world." That wolf is very much in evidence just now, and what then appeared to many a monstrous caricature of our national character is to-day bitterly recognised as an only too authentic representation of the more unlovely side of our Imperialism. Whatever we may say as to the holiness of our motives, and the extreme reluctance with which we draw the sword against the South African Republic, the profane and cynical foreigner merely shrugs his shoulders, and remarks that it was all done, no doubt, with the most unselfish motives; but if the policy had been promoted by pirates with no other object than plunder, the only difference would have been that the pirate would not have said his prayers or masked his greed for plunder in the ostentatious garb of the Pharisee.

The Tactics of the Wolf. The story of our dealings with the Transvaal in the last few weeks displayed all the familiar characteristics of the dealings of the wolf with the lamb. Its chief characteristic has constantly been shifting the ground for quarrel whenever it seemed likely that our victim would escape. In the month of August it seemed likely that the difference was about to be arranged. The Transvaal Government, under pressure of the "friendly counsels" of Sir Alfred Milner and the more urgent representations of the Cape Dutch, had reduced their franchise from fourteen years to seven, and enacted a law by which any Outlander who could prove that he has lived seven years in the Transvaal would at once be enrolled as a burgher, and would be entitled to vote for the Volksraad and for the appointment of the President and the commandant general. Mr. Chamberlain publicly declared that this offered a basis of settlement, and proposed that a mixed commission should be appointed to place beyond all doubt the satisfactory character of the seven years' franchise law of July. As President Kruger is said to have declared that the seven years' franchise law would emancipate f.fty thousand Outlanders-that is to say, nearly twice the number of the old Boers on the electoral roll-all that appeared to be necessary was a local Commission of Inquiry to verify on the spot the justice of the President's anticipations. Owing to some conversation between the State's Attorney, Mr. Smuts, and the British Agent, Mr. Conyngham Greene, President Kruger got it into his head that if he offered five years' franchise he might be able to secure from the British Government a definite repudiation of all right to interfere in the Transvaal by virtue of the suzerainty of 1881 which they believed had been abandoned in 1884, but which Mr. Chamberlain had revived in his despatch of October, 1897. There were other conditions, but this was the vital point upon which they insisted. President Kruger then made a definite offer that in exchange for the repudiation of all right to interfere in the internal affairs of the Transvaal by virtue of the suzerainty of 1881 he would concede the five years' franchise. This offer was made in August, in the confident anticipation that it would be gladly accepted, and that the controversy would be closed. To their astonishment and dismay the offer was rejected, the suzerainty was reaffirmed, and all that was stated about arbitration was that the British Government was willing to discuss the matter.

On September 2nd the Boers, finding The Surprise their offer rejected, fell back upon the old proposal of our Governthe Lamb. ment, and in somewhat involved terms assented to the proposed Commission of Inquiry into the seven years' franchise. Thereupon the Cabinet decided to abandon their old ground of inquiry by mixed commission into the seven years' franchise, declared that they were satisfied that the seven years' franchise would not give immediate and substantial representation to the Outlanders, and then demanded that President Kruger should give the five years' franchise. They added a new demand that English should be admitted equally with Dutch in the discussions of the Volksraad. This despatch, by a miracle of self-deception, was declared in this country to be a marvel of moderation and patience. In reality it simply asked the Boers to give the five years' franchise while refusing to grant the quid pro quo which the Boers required. As the quid pro quo merely consisted of a request that we should formally agree to keep our pledged word, abandon the mendacious pretension that the suzerainty of 1881 was still in existence, and refer disputes to arbitration, it is difficult to see, excepting from the standpoint of the wolf, where the moderation comes in. On September 16th the Boers replied, expressing their surprise that a new proposal should have been sprung upon them after they had accepted the original proposition of Mr. Chamberlain to refer the seven years' franchise to a mixed commission of inquiry. They also remarked somewhat drily that "it is not clear on what grounds Her Majesty's Government, after having recently, by means of its invitation intimated that it could not declare without an inquiry whether the franchise law would afford immediate and substantial representation, is to - day, having made any inquiry, in a position to declare that the measure thus mentioned is insufficient for the object contemplated." They therefore renewed their acceptance of the proposed Mixed Commission, and while repudiating any promise to allow English to be used in the Volksraad, expressed an earnest hope that the Government would refrain from springing fresh demands upon them, and would declare itself satisfied to abide by its own proposal for a joint commission, which Mr. Chamberlain had proposed, and which they had accepted. This despatch was the pitiful bleat of the lamb, and quite as unanswerable in its way as the famous rejoinder of its prototype in Æsop's fable. Alas, the wolf answered after its kind!

It is worth while to note here that in

A Hint from pressing for the adoption of the Hague Conference, Mixed Commission of Inquiry into the question as to the extent of the enfranchisement secured by the new Transvaal law, the Boers were not only accepting the proposal which the English Government itself had made, but they were placing themselves in a line with the unanimous opinion of the whole civilised world. At the Conference at the Hague such disputes as those between England and the Transvaal, which turn on a question of fact, were lengthily discussed and carefully provided for in Article 9 of the Convention Lord Pauncefote, on behalf of of Arbitration. Her Majesty's Government, took a leading and honourable part in elaborating this article, which provides that when disputes arise between states which threaten to involve war an International Commission of Investigation should be issued for the purpose of clearing up the facts by a careful and conscientious examination such as would throw light upon all that was obscure in the controversy. The Boers had therefore behind them, not only Mr. Chamberlain's own proposal, but the unanimous counsel of all the Powers represented at the Hague, from which assembly they themselves had been excluded. Nevertheless, instead of accepting their proposal, our Ministers-whose monumental patience is so extolled by their Pharisaic acolytes-did exactly what they would not have done if they had wished for peace, and took the step which everyone predicted they would take who believed that Mr. Chamberlain

On the Continent opinion is absolutely unanimous. Foreigners, whatever their sympathies, are all convinced that the world is now witnessing carefully engineered act of international piracy having worked for war would not be baulked of his

a carefully engineered act of international piracy to which the part played by England at the Hague was a cunningly devised prelude. Of all the delegates at the Hague no foreigner is better acquainted with England than M. D'Estournelles. He was for years virtually French Ambassador at London. At the Hague he was the constant ally of

Lord in the Speak count

I sl mind : first to projec inter tribun trati honou come able a glory remain the which taken. of lon out b and State Trans is the This is tuni y action ing t tion Gover Will afte month itiativ she re machi Hague war a No. 1 impos will n hersel not wi hands peace docum she 1 drawn will no world with t battl morro shinin

the

Lord

Let u

mean

Lord Pauncefote, and the famous clause about Duty in the Arbitration Convention was his handiwork. Speaking last month at a meeting of his fellow-countrymen, M. D'Estournelles said:—

I shall only say one word about England to call to mind that it is to her eminent delegate, Lord Pauncefote, that is due the great honour of having been the first to produce a project for international tribunal of arbitration. This honour may become an unalterable and brilliant glory if England remains faithful to the initiative which she has taken. A dispute of long standing has just broken out between her and the little State of the Transvaal. This is the crucial test! This is the opporfor tuni y action strengthening the declarations of the Government. . . Will England, after three months, take two contradictory in-itiatives? Will she resort to the machinery of the Hague to declare war at Pretoria? No, that seems impossible. She will not condemn herself. She will not with her own hands tear up the peace-making document which she has hardly drawn up; she will not make the world resound with the noise of itself

com-

and

the le in e in ind!

at in

the

into

the law,

osal

but

the

At

as turn

and

tion

of

and hich

ates

om-

the eful

row

rsy.

Mr.

ous

gue,

een heir

nce ctly

hed

ted lain

his

SO-

hatced

ing

acy

the

all ter

les.

at

of battle on the morrow of the day when she held up before its eyes the shining sign so long expected, of justice and peace-making. Lord Salisbury is an old friend of M. D'Estournelles. Let us hope he may take the hint to heart. But what meantime have Ministers been doing?

The Status of the Transvaal.

They have launched another despatch to the Boers in which they renewed their demand for the five years' franchise, and instead of abandoning the preposterous claim to interfere on the ground of the suzerainty of 1881, offered the Boers a guarantee against outside attack which they did not ask for, and the value of which, coming from the hero of the South Africa Committee, could hardly be regarded as worth the paper it was written on. The offer, unasked for, of protection seemed to foreign observers to be an insidious method of asserting a protectorate which in the nature of things would entail much more control over their foreign policy than we have at present. The Transvaal, although technically not a Sovereign International State, inasmuch as it cannot make treaties without submitting them to our veto, is nevertheless sovereign and international to this extent. that it can make war if it pleases, and carry out any kind of foreign policy so long as it does not embody its decision not to do so in a treaty with any foreign Power. But, if once the Transvaal accepted our undertaking to protect it from foreign attack, it would give us in a very practical fashion a right to control its conduct, otherwise the Transvaal might land us in a war at any time by any act of mad folly or reckless ambition. As if to emphasise the fact that Ministers had no intention of honestly recognising the independence of the little republic, Mr. Chamberlain contrived to insert in the despatch a sinister reference to the obligations of the Transvaal under the "Conventions," a use of the plural number which the Boers at once interpreted as a decisive rejection of their plea for the abandonment of the suzerainty of 1881. Thus refusing what they asked for, and offering them the fatal gift of protectorate instead, we reiterated our demands for the concession of the five years' franchise.

OLIVE SCHREINER

The Story of vineyard. We offered Naboth's Vineyard. We offered Naboth a Naboth's Vineyard. price which he did not want, and we went for Naboth when it was refused.

The difference between the time of Naboth and our own is that neither Jezebel nor the leaders of public opinion in the days of Ahab seem to have considered that Ahab acted with "extraordinary patience and long-suffering moderation." Ministers, however, have had no end of admiring eulogists in the Press and elsewhere, who profess themselves to be lost in admiration of the patience which the wolf has shown in not gobbling up the lamb long ago. If it were not so grim and tragic a subject, the comments of our newspapers upon the sublime self-control and moderation of our Government would be enough to provoke an outburst of Homeric laughter. There has been nothing quite so absurd in our time, and nothing which fills all Continental observers with amazement at the abysmal depths of British cant. Having launched this "extremely moderate" interim despatch, the Government set to work to furbish up their man-slaving machine, and the Press resounded with declarations that if the Boers did not at once accept the British demands, an overwhelming force of all arms would be hurled against the Transvaal and the Free State, and both republics would be blotted out of existence. To this accompaniment our "conciliatory" Ministers wait for the response of the Boers.

A whole army corps, it was said, was Plans to be despatched immediately on the War Party, receipt of a negative or evasive answer. The number of troops of all arms in South Africa was to be raised to sixty or seventy thousand men-a conquering army which was to crush like a steam-roller the Transvaal, the Orange Free State, the Cape Dutch, and any natives who might be tempted to break bounds. Note that as the controversy has progressed it has ceased to be a mere quarrel between us and the Government of Pretoria. Napoleon in 1870, it will be remembered. attempted to confine his quarrel with the Germans exclusively to the King of Prussia, but the ties of blood asserted themselves, and when war was declared he found himself faced by the whole Germanic race. So it has been with us in Africa. We began by picking a quarrel with President Kruger. and we now find ourselves face to face with the whole of the Dutch race in South Africa. The Orange Free State has thrown in its lot unreservedly with the Transvaal, while the sympathies of the Cape Dutch have been made unmistakably apparent by the action of their representatives who form the majority in the Cape Parliament. This contingency, however, has been provided for, and current rumour states that if Mr. Schreiner and the Ministers of the Queen at the Cape should offer any obstacle to the advance of the army of invasion, an Order in Council will be signed at Balmoral summarily abolishing responsible government in Cape Colony. The beginning of strife is as the letting out of water, and who shall say whither this quarrel will lead us?

Changing the Issue. The Boers were in no hurry to reply to the last despatch of the British Government. That missive concluded with the threat that if the reply was unsatisfactory to us we would once more change the issue and, abandoning all discussion of the franchise upon which we had hitherto insisted, would proceed to formulate other demands not particularly specified, but which it was clearly understood would entail direct interference on our part in the internal affairs of the Transvaal. In other words, if the Boers did not do what we asked them to do we would at once proceed to do what we had promised them we would not do. This is only one more illustration of the continual shifting of the issue by our Government. The Ministerial Press, however, and the Ministerial eulogists on the platform are now proclaiming that the issue is to be changed once more. Instead of demanding the inquiry into the five years' franchise which has already been offered them if we would abandon the suzerainty of 1881, or the detailed series of reforms which are not yet formulated, all those questions which have been put up as stalking-horses to conceal the real question at issue are to be thrown overboard, and we are to go to war with the Transvaal solely upon the question of asserting our supremacy or paramountcy in South Africa.

Frightened of the Lamb. Considering that no one has questioned this, and that, as Mr. Garrett points out in an article quoted elsewhere, it is based, in the nature of things, upon the overwhelming balance of forces, industrial, financial, and numerical, in South Africa, we have as little need to go to war to assert it as the wol

that

con

a na

for ten hav

are

Du

to

the per fre

str ha

in the stee Sin the M

he

th

...

wolf did to eat the lamb, merely in order to prove that he had stronger teeth. Of all the disreputable, contemptible, and discreditable proceedings by which a nation has ever been jockeyed into war, this fighting for the paramountcy is about the worst. The wolf in the fable at least shrank from the effrontery of pretending to be frightened of the lamb; but here we have persons presumably sane proclaiming that we are face to face with a deadly plot on the part of the Dutch in South Africa to destroy our authority, and to establish a great Dutch Republic on the ruins of the British Empire in South Africa. Of course, when persons have worked themselves up into this state of frenzy, argument is wasted. Nations, like individuals, which for all practical purposes might as well never have been uttered. As for Lord Rosebery, he has been as dumb as a fish. Mr. Asquith made a brief speech to a woman's association in Scotland, in which he assumed that it only lay with us to decide that the whole of the question of the relations between the Outlanders and the Boers could be taken up and settled. Mr. Asquith's speech was not bellicose in its tone, but if we have a right to settle these things without taking into account the South African Republic, what becomes of the independence of that Republic? I suppose Sir Henry Fowler and Sir Edward Grey are alive, but the public has had no intimation of their existence, and the same may

Photograph by]

DELAGOA BAY.

[N. Edwards.

occasionally go mad; but alas! as yet for nations no strait-waistcoat has been provided, otherwise it would have been better for Britain in this crisis.

There have been some vigorous protests against the meditated crimebut for the most part the public is apathetic, not realising the gravity of the issue. Too great reliance upon Mr. Gladstone in times past has left the nation ill prepared to face the situation in which we have not only no Mr. Gladstone, but no responsible leaders of the Opposition. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, after declaring that there was no cause for war, betook himself to Marienbad, from which in the course of two months he only emitted a solitary note of dissatisfaction be said of nearly all the occupants of the Front Opposition Bench.

Faithful among the Faithless.

The duty of arousing the nation to a sense of the gravity of the issue before it has been left to four men—two Liberals and two Unionists.

Mr. Morley led the way by his impeachment of the policy which he saw was leading to war and annexation. He was followed by Sir William Harcourt, who, speaking with the authority of a Minister who had taken part in the framing of both Conventions of 1881 and 1884, utterly demolished the pretension that the suzerainty in the Preamble of 1881 continues to exist. Mr. Leonard Courtney, who has always been an intrepid defender of the rights of the Boers,

vhole

frica.

uger,

vhole

ange

the

utch

ction

the

has

at if

the

the

ned

erns as ther

ply tish onthe ore the uld rly uld nal ers at we of nt. ial at of

se

ld

es

es

n

al

vigorously seconded Mr. Morley's protest at the great demonstration in Manchester. The most notable utterance from many points of view, although it came late in the day, was Sir Edward Clarke's bold challenge against an unnecessary war, to his constituents at Plymouth. Sir Edward Clarke not only impeached the policy to which his Government was committed, but backed his opinions by offering to resign his seat if the Conservatives carried their dissent from his opinions so far as to object to his continuing to represent them in the House of Com-His speech, which was a powerful and reasoned indictment of the war policy, was listened to in chilling silence; but they decided on consideration that it would be well not to force into retirement a member who was at once the most successful lawyer and the most conspicuous Conservative outside the ranks of the Ministry.

Public Meetings Meetings have been held in various parts of the country, chiefly in the North, at which strong resolutions have been passed protesting against the threatened war. At Crewe a hostile amendment was carried. At Manchester, where Mr. Morley and Mr. Courtney spoke, a small minority of Jingoes howled and sang, and tried their best to interrupt the proceedings, but when the resolution was put to a vote they did not number one-tenth of the assembly. The Baptist Union, at its annual meeting at Bradford, passed a resolution on the subject, and similar resolutions have been passed by local religious bodies. But it would be idle to contend that there has been anything approaching to a national or a general expression of hostility to war. But this was only to be expected, as the general feeling is one of incredulity as to the possibility of such an issue to the negotiations. In London it is different. On Sunday, August 24th, a meeting of protest was summoned at Trafalgar Square. It was a risky experiment, for the Jingo mob in London has from time immemorial always been ready to break up peace meetings, whether they are held in the Square or in Hyde Park. In 1878 Mr. Bradlaugh's clothes were torn off his back, Mr. Gladstone's windows were broken, and those who protested against war with Russia were pelted with dead cats and rotten eggs. The heart of London, say, within a one mile radius of the War Office is a centre of military excitement. The continual despatch of troops from Waterloo Station tends to rouse the military enthusiasm of the crowd; the music-halls, the newspapers, and the clubs combine to keep it at fever heat.

Trafalgar Square. It is therefore not surprising that on Sunday afternoon, when the promoters of the meeting reached Trafalgar Square, they found themselves in the presence of a crowd which, to put it mildly, was not in sympathy with the objects of the meeting. It was well dressed, consisting chiefly of shopmen and clerks, with a few working men. The crowd itself was good-humoured enough, nor was there any display of the violent passions which disgraced the Jingoes when they broke up the peace meetings of 1878, but they howled lustily enough, chanted "Rule Britannia" more or less discordantly, and abused the speakers who stood on the plinth of Nelson's Column in the choicest language of the gutters of the slums. To speak was impossible, and the attempt to address the howling crowd in dumb show was finally terminated by a fusillade of apples and tomatoes obtained from costermongers' barrows, which supplied convenient ammunition to the party of war. A knife was thrown which cut Mr. Moscheles on the cheek, and a few hats were smashed, but the preponderance of force on the side of war was so overwhelming that there were not the materials for a stand-up fight. So the Peace Meeting in Trafalgar Square was turned into a tumultuous, inarticulate demonstration in favour of war, and the Ministerial newspapers chortled in their joy next morning over the breaking up of the demonstration. The Daily Telegraph, indeed, declared that people must not be surprised if the British working man used brickbats in order to express his devotion to the Empire and his disgust at the people who were opposing the Ministers of the Oueen. The Spectator alone of the Jingo Press seems to have had qualms of conscience at the apparition of the savage elemental forces upon which the success of the war party depends. The scene in Trafalgar Square, it says, recalled the tumultuous clamour of the Parisian populace which in the summer of 1870 paraded the boulevards howling "à Berlin," which had as its immediate results the launching of the Empire upon a war which led the Emperor to Sedan. The parallel is exact.

The Empire with the Feet of Clay.

The Empire with the Feet of Clay.

The Spectator has reasons for its apprehensions. In contemplating the Imperial edifice on such occasions as this it is impossible not to remember the dream of Nebuchadnezzar, the King of Babylon. Our Empire is indeed a great image whose brightness was excellent, and the form thereof terrible. His "head was of fine gold, his breast and his arms

and clay
If su
we s fulfill without were Ther
and like wind

for the speal

brati

recep fleet a sc Adm the b coun up to firew sions intim a hu ful fi Ame and v has 1 from Repu

Angi J

extra popu

sober

obser day:
Our a post people Our the r

Orien

VIINA

arms of silver, his legs of iron, his feet part of iron and part of clay." For the feet mingled with miry clay we have not far to seek at Trafalgar Square. If such forces are to dominate our Imperial policy we shall not have long to wait before we see the fulfilment of the vision when "a stone cut out without hands smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay and brake them to pieces. Then was the iron, the clay, the breast of silver, and the gold broken to pieces together and became like the chaff of the summer threshing, and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them."

on oro-

raves

ily,

ng.

nen

self dis-

the

of

ted

ind

of

the

ind

mb

of

ers'

to

ich ats

the

not ice

a

of

eir

he le-

sh

nis

ole

he ad

ge ar

e,

an ne

ts

n

el

ts

g

18

of

In the same week that the Jingo mob The Reception gave full fling to its bellicose proclivi-Admiral Dewey. ties on the other side of the Atlantic. the other section of the Englishspeaking race was abandoning itself to the celebration of the return of Admiral Dewey. reception of the Admiral who destroyed the Spanish fleet in the harbour of Manila was carried out on a scale that could hardly have been exceeded if Admiral Dewey had been Nelson returning from the battle of the Nile. For days New York and the country round about seem to have given themselves up to a perfect delirium of enthusiasm. What with fireworks at night, bands all day, triumphal processions on land and water, nothing was left undone to intimate to all the world that, of all qualities which a human being can display, the qualities of a successful fighting man are the most appreciated by our American kinsman. Dewey did his work creditably and well; he has displayed great self-control, and he has kept a level head, and altogether, quite apart from his victory at Manila, he is a man whom the Republic would do well to honour. But this wild extravagance of acclaim is rather more worthy of the populace of Imperial Rome than of the steady and sober citizens of the Republic.

Anglo-American Jingolsm.

It is not, however, for Englishmen to cast stones. On the contrary, it must regretfully be admitted that in this respect the Americans are only too genuine chips of the old block. An American observer of the course of events wrote me the other day:—

Our English-speaking race now seems to me to occupy a position lower than the rudest and most barbarous peoples.

Our American Republic is endeavouring to suppress the republican spirit arising for the first time in the Orient. Your monarchy desires to steal rich gold-fields, threatens to disregard its solemn pledge in the Convention of 1884, and carry fire and sword to peaceful, well-behaved, intelligent Dutchmen of the Orange Free State and Transvaal Republics.

I have looked forward to the alliance of these two branches of our race as a great event bearing upon the reign of peace and progress, but their recent action raises doubts whether after all the supremacy of our aggressive and domineering race is to be for the best interests of humanity.

This no doubt is an exaggeration, but there is no doubt that Anglo-Americanism of the best sort has no more deadly enemy than Anglo-Americanism of the worst. England and America act and react on each other both for good and for evil. The pernicious results which Jingoism on either side gives to the other need to be counteracted by a closer alliance between the anti-Jingo forces on both sides of the sea. It is probable that at bottom all this exaggerated popular interest in wars and makers of wars is not due to any particular lust for conquest or innate pugnacity. It is a form, and the most dangerous form, of the popular craving for sensational sport. The crowd cheer soldiers much as they cheer football matches; and it was very significant that at the great American demonstration to welcome home Admiral Dewey, Sir Thomas Lipton, the successful grocer, who has brought his Shamrock to New York to "lift" if he can the American Cup, was the most popular figure in the procession.

The Verdict has properly attention

The excitement of approaching war has practically monopolised public attention in the latter part of the month, but in the first part the close of the Dreyfus case held the first place in public interest. The trial closed with a verdict of guilty with extenuating circumstances by a majority of five to two. The addition to the verdict of "extenuating circumstances," it is said, was obtained by a threat of a third member of the Court-Martial to vote "not Had three votes been given for acquittal, Dreyfus could not have been sentenced. As the votes were five to two he was declared guilty, and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. The verdict itself was less remarkable than the protest which it provoked throughout the world. For months past the Dreyfus case had been to the newspaper readers of Europe and America like a stock tragedy continually on the boards. There was none too poor or too remote not to feel an interest in the long unwinding of the coil of the destiny of Dreyfus. The newspapers had done their best to keep up the popular Their correspondents were passionate partisans disseminating to the ends of the earth the fears and emotions which were generated in the Court of Rennes. Outside France there was only one opinion as to the innocence of the accused, hence, when the trial closed after what seemed to outsiders a long-drawn travesty of legal procedure, in which everything was done which ought not to have been done, and nothing was done which ought to have been done in a court of justice, while the evidence which was really of first value was forbidden to be tendered, the sentence provoked an instant shriek of horror in every part of the world. It was as if the pit and gallery of a theatre which had been expecting the triumph of injured virtue were unexpectedly confronted with a very ill-played last act in which the villain is triumphant and the hero goes under. The row created by the newspapers throughout the world can only be compared to the sudden hooting of a myriad of steam-whistles at some popular celebration in America. Journalism throughout the world strained its throat in pronouncing the most comprehensive "Damn!" that the world has yet heard.

FRANCE AND HER ENEMIES.

The effect upon the public was com-

The Gallery mensurate with the exertions used of the by the newspapers to produce an World Theatre. impression on the minds of their readers. In Hungary and Italy the police had to be employed to protect the French Consulates from insult; in many other countries meetings were held to protest against the sentence and express sympathy with Dreyfus. Some fifty thousand persons assembled in Hyde Park on Sunday the 17th to express their indignation at the verdict, while similar meetings took place in many American cities. All this was very natural, but it emphasises one of the results of modern journalism. It converts the whole world into a theatre in which every newspaper reader considers that he fails in his duty if he does not applaud or hiss the actors whose performances are presented to him every morning. Natural as this may be, it is not without danger. You can applaud or hiss the actors as you please in the real theatre without evil results; but when the performers upon whom you pronounce so brawling a judgment, are, as on this occasion, the rulers of a great nation with whom you have to do business in innumerable parts of the world, it is easy to see the mischief that may be wrought in politics by this uncontrolled

The Boycott
of the Parls Exhibition.

The newspapers were filled with suggestions of varying degrees of idiotcy as to the duty of the outside nations to punish France for the abandonment to the instincts of the playhouse.

verdict of the court-martial on Dreyfus. Paris is to hold a great Exhibition next year, the chief attraction of which will be the presence of exhibitors from all lands. Some featherhead seems to have imagined that it would tend to improve matters if the outside public were to boycott the French Exhibition by way of indicating its dissent from the verdict of the court-martial. An immense hullabaloo was raised in the Press. Every day solemn pledges were registered by those who would never, never go to Paris or its Exhibition, and strings of paragraphs announced how this, that, and the other exhibitor had withdrawn his application for space, and would refuse to send his goods to the capital of a country whose court-martial had condemned Dreyfus. Never was there so much fury, and seldom did it signify so little. For when the storm died away it was discovered that of the two thousand intending British exhibitors, only twenty-three had indicated in a more or less tentative fashion their had roo con

par

Ger of e eve con was his He he the Dre with rest chai that in 1 delu reha han

ove

Pros corred of Cover read Pret in the of hutter lution a que Loui pass extin profi lt is which cons

intention to withdraw from the Exhibition. If they had carried this out, they would merely have made room for other exhibitors who were pressing to come in.

The Pardon of Dreyfus.

orld

om-

used

an heir

d to rom vere ress

the dict,

ican

sises

erts

ews- .

f he orm-ural can real

ners

ent,

tion able

that lled

with

of side

the

s to

tion

all

ned

side

by

the lin

red

its

now

his

his tial

uch

the ouree

neir

In the midst of all the commotion it was announced that Dreyfus had withdrawn his appeal to the Superior

Military Court, and that he had been pardoned by the President on the application of General de Galliffet, who represented that the verdict of extenuating circumstances justified the exercise of the Presidential clemency, especially as there was every probability that Dreyfus would not live to complete the second half of his sentence. Dreyfus was liberated, and went with his wife to recruit his health at Carpentras, in the South of France. He is guarded as jealously by detectives as if he had been an Irish Secretary in the days of the Invincibles. In a brief but dignified letter, Dreyfus declared that liberty was nothing to him without honour, and that he intended to devote the rest of his days to the complete vindication of his character before the Court. His supporters maintain that it will take four years before they finally succeed in rehabilitating their hero, but they are under no delusion as to the impossibility of achieving that rehabilitation in the military courts. On the other hand, there is a strong disposition to pass the sponge over the whole affair, and to let bygones be bygones.

A Fly-blown Pretender. The trial of the conspirators against the Republic who were arrested just when the trial at Rennes began opened in Paris, when the Public Prosecutor unfolded before the Court an astonishing correspondence, from which it appeared that the Duke of Orleans was up to the neck in a conspiracy to overthrow the Republic. The letters which were read leave no doubt whatever as to the desire of this Pretender to bring about internal disorder in France in the hopes that he might thereby ascend the throne of his fathers. The letters show, however, such an utter lack of any initiative, energy, courage, or revolutionary genius that their production should give a quietus to the hopes of the Orleanists. President Loubet may be congratulated if he has not only passed the sponge over the Dreyfus case, but finally extinguished the hopes of the Orleanist Pretender. One of the curious things about these Royalist conspiracies was the extent to which they hoped to profit by the social unrest produced by the strikes. It is now, however, suggested that the great strike which has broken out at the works of Le Creusot have their origin in Royalist intrigue. The demands formulated by the strikers do not appear to be very unreasonable:—

(1) That the Union should be recognised.

(2) That religious liberty should be respected.(3) That the use of abusive language by the foreman should be restrained.

(4) That they should not be harassed by excessive surveillance after hours.

It is curious that it should be necessary to demand liberty of conscience in the free-thinking country of France. The strike is said to have left some eight or nine thousand men idle, and such a stoppage of industry in France, although comparatively insignificant beside the great strike in Denmark, is quite sufficient to produce trepidation in high quarters and disorder in the streets.

International Picnics. In welcome contrast to the unbridled denunciation of France and the French which followed the verdict at Rennes, there has been a welcome interchange of international hospitalities between the

THE DUC D'ORLÉANS.

British Association, which met at Dover, and the similar French Association which was meeting at Boulogne. It is much to be desired in the interests of international fraternity that these visits of courtesy should increase and multiply. Miss G. B. Stuart, a member of the International Institute of Journalists, writes me on this subject àpropos of the article in last month's number on the importance of the international picnic:—

Some years ago some foreign journalists of distinction were invited to join in London the Conference of the Institute of Journalists. From this arose the idea of the Annual International Press Congress, which has now met six times, in Antwerp, Bordeaux, Budapest, Stockholm, Lisbon, and Rome respectively. People are fond of asking, "What does this Congress achieve?" It discusses dry professional questions about copyright, telegraphic tariffs, and such-like, for some five or six hours, distributed over as many days, and fills all the rest of the time with eating and drinking, sight-seeing and junketing, accepting hospitality from the monarch down to the tram companies. Anyone who has attended a congress knows that this description is fairly correct; there is not very much work done, in proportion to the social entertainment, and at the end of the week every one is far more tired out with banqueting than with debate. But I maintain that this is half-way, a good two-thirds of the battle! In giving of their best right royally on the one side, in accepting hospitable favours with grace and courtesy on the other, men draw nearer to each other than ever they will do in argument, even for the highest interests; and these meetings between nations make for peace, for mutual understanding, for "things of good report" in a manner that can scarcely be overestimated. Do you remember Shylock's "But I will not eat with you!" and its quintessence of scorn? Given that a man entertains you in his land with his best, and is ready to be your guest in your land in return, it is wonderful how professional arguments, rivalries, and grievances fade into the background! This is my answer to the frequent reproach of Journalists on the junket again!'

"No Popery" and the extreme Protestants for the purpose of attacking the Jesuits and indirectly fanning the flame of Protestant fervour. To read some of the discourses with which we are favoured in the press and in the pulpit, it might almost be imagined that Protestantism is quite incapable of generating the bitter popular prejudice which finds vent as opportunity is afforded it in rowdy violence or the crudest miscarriage of justice. No doubt the Dreyfus case is a bad blot upon French history, but it is not more scandalous than what happened in this country at the time when Titus Oates took up the trade of common informer, and there has been no such outburst of savage fury in France as that which disgraced London at the time of the Lord George Gordon riots. It is to be

The

The Dreyfus case has been used somewhat adroitly by the Times regretted that intense opposition to Popery does not carry with it compensation in increased appreciation of the importance of maintaining friendly relations between Protestant States. Not even the exclusion of all Catholics from posts in its administration has sufficed to secure for the Transvaal a respite from the doom which Mr. Hugh Price Hughes pronounces upon the Protestant Republics of South Note a very significant paragraph in the Osservatore Romano, the organ of the Vatican, which expresses a hardly-veiled hope that the war now beginning may end in the exhaustion of the forces of Protestantism. The Vatican has not forgotten that it was a similar unjust attack upon the ancestors of the Boers which gave the first death-blow to the domination of the Spanish Empire.

The Burning Question first meeting this month in London, and those interested in ecclesiastical questions are wondering whether its sittings will be attended by any sensational incidents. This interest is strictly confined to ecclesiastical circles, for the world at large, and London in particular, note with supreme unconcern the meetings of the Congress, which, whatever it does or does not do, is known to be a thousand times more concerned about the use of incense in churches than as to the justice or injustice of war in South Africa. The tickling of the nostrils by the making of a pungent smoke in church continues to absorb the attention of churchmen to an extraordinary extent. According to the Record, not more than ten per cent. of the two hundred and fifty incumbents who use incense in divine worship have consented to abandon its use in deference to the exhortations of their archbishops. Mr. George Russell has explained that this is not mutiny on the part of the incense-burning clerics, for they only swore to obey the "godly admonitions" of their bishop, and a bishop who admonishes them not to burn incense emits an ungodly admonition-which means, of course, that the admonition to obey the bishop is strictly limited by each clergyman's own opinion. Anything is godly which he wishes to do, and everything is ungodly which he does not wish to do-he is a law unto himself, and can do as he pleases. Considering the imbecility of the whole controversy, it is much to be regretted that good men and good women will waste their lives in discussing the rightness or wrongness of making smells in church, when the bulk of them have nothing to say upon the vital issue of peace and war in Africa. Have they forgotten where it is written, "To what purpose is Rus sub: "W for parl miss Pola glad

the

Inc

full

cen

glad Ode dend men the multitude of your sacrifices, says the Lord. Incense is an abomination unto me... When ye make many prayers I will not hear; your hands are full of blood!"

Hope for Poland.

oes

eci-

dly

the

nis-

res-

hes

uth

the

ich ow

s of t it

the

nin-

its .

on,

ical

its

nts. ical par-

s of

not

onhan

ica.

a the

ent. ent. use don chthis

ing

hes onito in's to rish he ole ien

ing ch, the ney

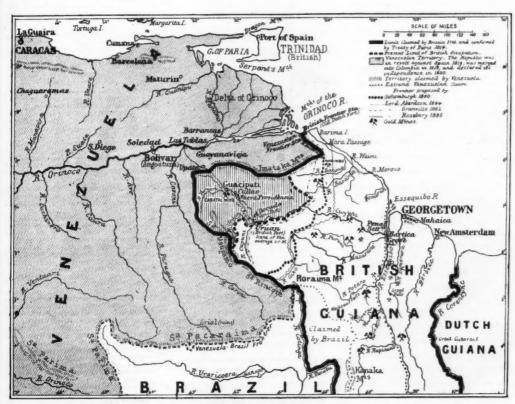

is

When I was at the Parliamentary Conference at Christiania I had the pleasure of meeting some Polish professors, who expressed with some considerable vehemence their indignation with the Russian Tsar because he had not yet made any substantial amelioration in the condition of Poland. "Wait a bit," I said; "let us adjourn the discussion for twelve months, and see whether at next interparliamentary conference you have not cause to be mistaken in proclaiming that nothing will be done for Poland." So the discussion was adjourned, and I am glad to see from the following telegram from the Odessa correspondent of the Times that my confidence in the good intentions of the Russian Government has not been misplaced:—

An important and far-reaching concession to the Poles in Russian Poland has just been announced, the Imperial authorities at St. Petersburg having consented to the petition of leading Poles in educational circles at Warsaw, which was supported by the Governor-General of Poland, Prince Imeretinsky, for a radical change in the law relating to the instruction of Polish youth in their native language and history. So far as the middle-class educa-tional establishments in Russian Poland are concerned, the teaching in all classes will be carried on in the Polish tongue, the assimilation being on a general plan and made compulsory, while the Polish language will constitute one of the main subjects in the educational curriculum of the higher class institutions, and will be taught in all classes of these establishments. The curriculum in the four lower forms will include a grammatical course, while the history of Polish literature will be included in the higher forms, and the extent of the programme will correspond more or less to that of the educational course marked out for the teaching of the Russian language and literature. This liberal concession, naturally enough, has caused the most profound satisfaction in all Polish circles throughout the Empire, but more especially among those who have at heart the question of the education of their youth, and who have viewed with sorrow the possibility of the decadence of their natural tongue, which has already practically ceased to be spoken in Prussian

MAP ILLUSTRATING VENEZUELAN ARBITRATION.

DIARY FOR SEPTEMBER.

EVENTS OF THE MONTH.

Sept. 1. The Colonial Office issues the exact text of the latest note addressed by her Majesty's Government to that of the South African Republic.

At a sitting of the Legislative Council in Simla Mr. Clinton Dawkins explains the operation of the Presidency Banks.

At the Rennes Court-Martial General Sebert

gives important military evidence in favour of Dreyfus,

The Prussian Government announces its de-cision to place a number of the Landrathe and other officials, who opposed the Canal Bill, on the r. tired list and half-pay. Six hundred lives are lost by the flooding copper mine at Besshi Ihikoku, in Japan.

The remains of the four victims of the disaster on the Dent Blanche, Switzerland, are re-moved to Evolena, where their funeral takes

At a joint meeting of the employers and men affected by the great lock-out in Denmark an agreement is arrived at for its termina-

Count Münster's new title is announced in the Imperial Gazette as "Prince Münster of Derneburg." Six young Turks of good position are arrested in Constantinople.

2. The Raad at Pretoria sits in secret session to consider Mr. Chamberl.in's last despatch.

A full of rain in Central India is reported. In many parts of the country the rainfall is still insufficient.

Important technical evidence is given before the Rennes Court-Martial by Major Hart-m.nn, Professor Louis Havet and M.

3. A Bull-fig'st takes place at Boulogne; 5,000 people present, over 1,000 of whom are English.

4. An International Congress on Social Hygiene opens in Brussels.

The Danish lock-out ends by the agreement of the men and their employers.

The Trade Union Congress opens at Plymouth.

At Pretoria the officials disclaim all knowledge of the issue of warrants for the arrest prominent Uitlanders.

promment Uniancers.

It the Rennes Court-Martial an Austro-Hungarian refugee named Cernuschi offers evidence against Dreyfus. He is reported to be a lunatic. Cross-examination of General Gonse.
The Public Library Association meets in Manchester.

The Spanish Catholic Congress closes its sit-

The Spanish Catholic Congress closes as autings at Burgos.

5. Mr. Reitz, the Transvaal State Secretary, says that his Government considers that Mr. Chamberlain's last despatch opens up a way to a modus vivendi.

Lord Sandhurst, Governor of Bombay, admits the plague is again spreading, and with the failure of the rain the situation becomes dangerous.

At the Rannes Court-Martial the request of At the Rennes Court-Martial the request of M. Labori to his Government to call Colonal von Schwarzkoppen and Colonel Panizzardi as witnesses is rejected. M. Labori t. lagraphs to the German Emperor and the King of Italy.

6. Sir F. For. stier-Walker arrives at Cape Town from England.

The Legislative Council of Cape Colony rejects the Land and Income Tax Bill by 12 votes [17].

to 10.
At the Rennes Court-Martial, Cernuschi, the At the Rennes Court-Martial, Cernuschi, the Austrian refugee, is examined with closed doors. On the resumption of the public sitting M. Trarieux is examined. General Bello's evidence provokes a scene between the Court and M. Labori.

The Legislative Council of Victoria rejects the Woman's Suffrage Bill by 27 votes to 17.

In the New South Wales Assembly a motion of want of confidence in the Government is earried by 75 to 41 votes.

koppen and Colonal Panizardi. This is refused by the Court. The Public Prosecutor addresses the Court, and demands the condemnation of Dreyfus.

M. Demange begins his address for the defence before the Court-Martial at Rennes. A Cabinet Council is held at the Foreign

There is a d.bate in the Raad at Preto ia on the massing of British troops on the Transvaal border.

In the Legislative Assembly at Simla Mr. Clinton Dawkins introduces the Currency Bill.

Bill.

Bill.

In Prussia demonstrations continue in honour of the deposed Landrathe.

The Empress-Downger of China sends a telegram to Mr. Prichard Morgan to go at once to China to begin mining operations in the Descine of Systehuse. Province of Szu-chuan.

LIEUT, PEARY.

9. The t ial of Captain Dreyfus before the Court-Martial at Rennes is concluded. After an hour and a half's consideration the Judges find that Captain Dreyfus was guilty in 1834 of carrying on dealings with foreign Powers, but that there are ext-mating circumstances. The accused is condemned to ten years' imprisonment. Captain Dreyfus signs the notice of his appeal against the Court-Martial's finding.

The Transvaal Government ag ee to a Conference at Cape Town on questions in dispute between it and the British Government.

The trial of Knezevitch on the charge of attempting the assassination of the ex-King of Servia along with twenty-six other prisoners commences at Belgrade

The Trade Union Congress at Plymouth is brought to a close. There is a general rainfall in Western India.

In New South Wales the Reid Ministry tenders its resignation.

The Queensland Parliament opens. Lord 20.
Lamington announces that the electors have pronounced in favour of Federation.

7. At the Rennes Court-Martial M. Labori requests that a committee be appointed to receive the evidence of Colonel von Schwarz-attacked and destroyed between Algeria and Lake Chad.

12. M. Zola publishes a latter in the Aurore on the Dreyfus ve.d.ct under the title "The Fifth Act. The British despatch sent after the last Cabinet Council reaches the Transvaal Government, and is read in the Volksraad.

The British Association begins its meeting at Dover; Sir Michael Foster delivers his in-augural address.

augural address.

A petition of the Jenner Institute of Preventive Medicine praying for an alteration in the memorandum of association is granted by Mr. Instituce Cozms-Hardy to enable it to memorandum of association is granted by Mr. Justice Cozms-Hardy to enable it to avail itself of Lord Iveagh's offer of £250,000. The South Australian House of Assembly rejects the Woman's Suffrage Bill.

The Oceanic lin.r. arrives at New York, having the state of t made the voyage in six days two hours and thirty-seven minutes.

The International Law Association opens a Conference at Buffulo, U.S.A.
A Cabinst Council is held in Paris, at which it is understood the pardon of Dreyfus is considered.

14. The two Raads at Pretoria continue to dis-cuss Mr. Chamb.rlain's despatch in secret session.

In New South Wales a new Ministry is constituted, with Mr. W. J. Lyne as Premier.

A National Export Exhibition is opened at Philadelphia, U.S.A.

A contract has been entered into for the extension of the Government system of telegraphs to the north shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

A memorial tablet is unveiled at Bath in memory of Jane Austen.

The United States transport Tartar is released from Hong Kong.

A Blue-Book, containing further correspondence relating to political affairs in the Transvaal, is issued by the Colonial Office.

16. Members of the Association Française pour l'Avancement des Sciences visit the members of the British Association at Dover.

21. ]

1

T

1

23. C

25. T

1

The Lipton fruit seizure case is concluded at the Middlesex Sessions. The jury returns a verdict of Guilty, and a fine of £50 is imposed and paid to the control of the con verdict of Guilty, and a fine of £50 is imposed and paid.

In the Legislative Council, held at Simla, the Indian Currency Bill is adopted.

A shock of earthquake is felt at Cape Town. In the Cape House of Assembly the Extradition Bill with the Transvaal passes unopposed.

17. A telegraphed summary of the reply of the Transvaal Government to Mr. Chamberlain's last despatch is received at the Colonial

A Demonstration in Hyde Park is held to show sympathy with Captain and Madame Dreyfus; there are from 60,000 to 70,000 persons present.

A battle, in which the insurgents are successful, is fought in Venezuela, and 1,600 are killed or wounded: the insurgent leader occupies Valencia and Puerto Cabello, bishops of France.

The Pope publishes an Encyclical letter to the bishops of France.

The trial of M. Paul Déroulède and twenty-five of the other prominent leaders of the Anti-Semitic League and other Nationalist associations begins at the Palace of the Luxembourg, Paris.

The official text of the reply of the Transvaal Government to Mr. Chamberlain's last despatch is published.

The Session of the States General of the Netherlands is opened by Queen Wilhelmina. The French Government at a Ministerial Council decide to grant a pardon to Captain Dreyfus.

Dreyfus.

Captain Dreyfus is released at an early hour, and secretly leaves the Rennes Prison for the South of France.

that the as been eria and rore on Cabinet rnm nt eting at his in eventive in the 250,000 sembly

having irs and pens a vhich it

yfus isto dis-secret constined at or the e Gulf ath in eleased

spond Trans-

e pour embers

ded at urns a la, the Town. Extraes un-

of the

rlain's olonial

eld to 70,000

ccess

killed to the nalist

nsvaal last

f the mina. steria!

ptain

hour,

M. GUÉRIN.

20. Sir A. Milner sends a telegram to the President of the Orange Free State stating that troops from the Cape may be stationed near the borders of the O ange Free State, but that no menace is intended. A President Steyn replies with reserve.

The British Association's meeting at Dover concludes.

concludes, M. Guérin, the leader of the Anti-Semitic League, who defied the French Government for several weeks in a house in Paris, sur-renders to the police and is conveyed to prison.

21. The Members of the British Association pay a visit to Boulogne and are received by me bers of the French Association, who entertain them at breakfast; they are officially re-ceived in the Town-hall by the Mayor of Boulogne. The battleship London is launched at Portsmouth.

The Orange Free State's Volksraad assembles at Bloemfontein in Special Session.

Three more transports with troops for South Africa leave Bombay.

A Cabinet Council is held at the Foreign 22. A

Offic The Free State's Raad is in Secret Session

The Free State's Raad is in Secret Session during the day.

M. Zola publishes in the Aurora an eloquett letter to Madame Dreyfus' recounting the steps by which the present release of Dreyfus has been brought about.

The Supreme Court-Martial of Spain sentences Admiral Montojo, who surrendered the Spanish Squadron to the Americans at Cavite, to be placed on the reserve list.

The people of Barcelona refuse to pay the industrial tax.

23. Count Thun and other members of the Austrian Ministry promulgate the outstanding por-

23. Count Thun and other members of the Austrian Ministry promulgate the outstanding portions of the Austrian's Ministerial decree in virtue of the emergency clause of the Constitution.

24. A Demonstration is held in Trafalgar Square against war in the Transval.

25. The despatch sant by the Imperial Government of the 22nd instant is read in the Raad at Pretoria. The State trial in Servia ends, sentences of death or imprisonment being pronounced on the accused. Severe earthquake shocks are experienced in Alaska.

General Otis notifies the Washington Gorernment that he has permitted the landing of 700 Chinese at Manila.

The insurgent Filipinos capture the American Gunboat Urbaneta.

Acstner.

26. A succession of severe earthquake shocks is experienced at Darjeeling, India, accompanied by heavy rain and extensive lardslips, Admiral Dewey arrives at New York in the Cruiser Olympia.

Knezevitch m. kes a declaration before his execution that all the persons he accused of complicity in the plot against the Servian Government are absolutely innocent.

The French Minister of War selects General

Delanne as successor to General B ault as head of the General Staff.

nead of the Geheral Staff.

A prolonged sitting of the Executive Council is held at Pretoria.

7. General Harrison closes his address on behalf of Venezuela in the Arbitra ion Tribunal sitting in Paris. The President intimates that due notice will be given when the award is to be pronounced.

is to be pronounced.

In the Legislative Council in Simla a Punjab Land Alimation Bill is introduced.

The Raad of the Orange Free State decides to support the Transvaal in the event of war 30.

with Great Britain, General de Galliffet exonerates Colonel Pic-quart from all charges against the honourable character of his management of the Intel'igence Department.

The International Geographical Congress is opened in Berlin by Prince Albrecht of Prussia. Cabinet Council is held at the Foreign

A Cabinet Country of the Country of the Country of Admiral Dewey's return from Marita

Ma: ila.

The Ministerial Crisis in Spain terminates. In New York a land parade takes place in honour of Admiral Dewey.

SPEECHES.

Sept. 2. Mr. Asquith, at Leven, on the South African crisis.
5. Mr. John Morley, at Arbroath, on the Trans-

Nr. your Morey, at Arbroan, on the Frans-vaal and the Empire.

Sir E. Fry, on Commercial Morality and the Bill against Secret Commissions.

Mr. W. I. Vernon, at Plymouth, on Old-Age Pensions and the conditions of Labour and Lord Sandhurst, at Poona, on the plague and failure of the rains.

7. Lord Loch, in London, on the Transvaal crisis.

Crisis.
The German Emperor, at Stuttgart, on the Kingship at the head of a people.
President Kruger, at Preto ia, urges the Raad to show moderation.

8. The German Emp-ror, at Karlsruhe, on the glories of the German Army. Lord Rosebery, at Bishop Aucklaad, on Self-

9. Lord Rosebery, at Carlisle, on Railway Trave!-

14. Mr. Walter Long, at Liverpool, on the Ritualistic Controversy. Sir William White, at Dover, on British Naval Construction

Mr. Henry Higgs, at Dover, on "The Condition of the People."
Dr. Adler, in London, on the Dreyfus Case.
Sir John Murray, at Dover, on Antarctic Ex

15. Mr. Morley, at Manchester, on the Transvaal independence, the Cape Colony, and the need of wise consideration in the present

Mr. Leonard Courtney, at Manchester, on the need of a more accurate comprehension of the situation in South Africa.

17. M. Jaurès, at Carmaux, demands the suppression of court-martials and the rehabilitation

sion of court-martials and the renabilitation of Dreyfus.

20. Sir William Harcourt, at New Tredegar, speaks strongly against the attempts of the War Press to aggravate the situation between Great Britain and the Transvall.

21. President Steyn, at Blosmfontein, on the relations of Great Britain and the Transvall.

The Marquis of Lorne, at Blackpool, on various aspects of public health.

25. There is a striking demonstration in Paris on the occasion of the funeral of Scheurer-Kestner.

26. General Harvey, Director-General of the Indian Medical Service, at Simla, on the Up-to-dateness of the Indian Medical Service.

to-dareness of the indian accurat service.

Sir M. White Riddey, at Blackpool, on the Government and the Crisis in the Transvaal,
The Archtishop of Canterbury, at Worcester, on the problem of Labour and the duty of on the problem of Labour and the duty of the Church regarding it. Sir E. Clacks, at Plymouth, in favour of Lord Beaconsfield.

Dr. Clifford, at Leads, on the Federation of the Free Churches and the future organisation in the new cantury of industry in conformity with the spirit and teachings of Christ.

Precident Loubet, at Rambouillet, on the restoration of tranquillity to France.

Mr. Hanbury, at Preston, on the Transval restoration or tranquility to France.

Mr. Hanbury, at Preston, on the Transvaal.
Sir Edward Clarke, at Plymouth, strongly condemns resort to force in the Transvaal.
The Bishop of Winchester, at Winchester, on the Reformation in relation to the present crisis in the Church.
Mr. Belfew. et Durdes, on Transval office.

Mr. Balfour, at Dundes, on Transvaal affairs. Lord Cu: 20n, at Simla, on It dian agricultural indebtedness.

The Duke of Devonshire, at New Mills, Derbyshi e, on the Transvaal c isis.

Professor Beesly, at Newton Hall, on the injustice of war in South Africa. Mr. A. E. Pease, in Yo. ksl. ire, on war in South Aftica as being without stification or

OBITUARY.

Sept.

nt. 3. Sophronius, Patriarch of Egypt, 103,
Mr. Talbot Crosby, £2.
M. Ristitch (Minister-Fresident in Servia), 68.
Professor Peter Peterson (Sanscrit scholar).
P.incipal Theodore Beck, of the Mahomedan College, Aligarth, India, 40.
Mr. B. Wells, A.R.A.M., 73.
Canon Knowl.s.
M. Gaston Tissandier, editor of La Nature, 56.

9. M. Gaston Tissandier, editor of La Nature, 56.
11. Mr. Francis Peek Member of the first School Board).

honour.

Board).

2. Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt, 56.
Rev. C. J. P. Eyre, 85.

14. Lord Watson (Lord of Appeal in Scotland), 71.

18. Prefessor Karl Stork, of Vienna, 66.

19. Senator Scheurer-Kestner (Paris).

Senator Scheuter-Aesther (Frans).
Mr. Tom McCarthy, 38.
The Ven. E. A. Salmon, 66.
Vice-Admiral Sallandrouze de Lamornaix (off Cherbourg).
Mr. James Badenoch Nicolson, 67.
General Brault (chief of the French General

General Brault (chief of the French General Staff), 62.

23. Mr. Edward Case, C.E.

25. Mr. John T. Abdy, 77.
Mr. Thomas Swift, 65.

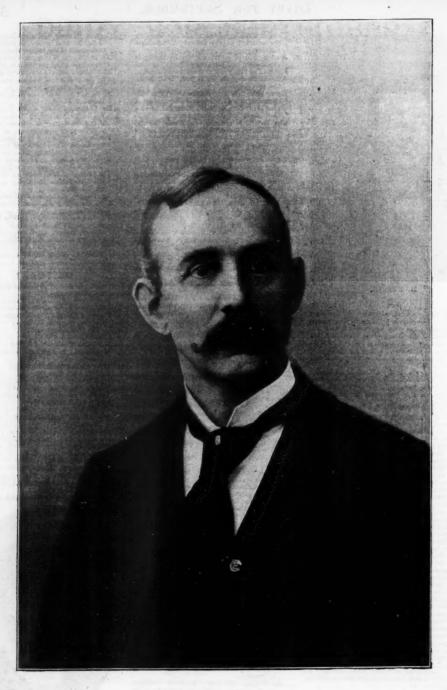

28. Dr. T. Puschman (at Vienna), 52.

29. Right Hon. John Monroe, LL.D., 60.
Segantini (Swiss painter).

30. Surgeon-General Sir C. A. Gordon, K.C.B., 78.

LATE MR. CORNELIUS VANDERBILT.

re eff be W ha im

so ov An hig

up Cl wi

sees soo year will did with such for after of mee Learn pre-mo nur rela the oth

Am Sta M

can adh side

can

DR. CLARK. "Father" of the Christian Endeavour.

312

CHARACTER SKETCH.

THE REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., FOUNDER OF THE SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR.

DR. CLARK is one of those men whose achievements bring home to the heart a humiliating sense of our own failure. He is not yet fifty, but he has achieved results in the organisation and stimulation of human effort for the improvement of this world and its ways before which we may all sit down abashed in the dust. With the exception of General Booth, no one in our time has succeeded so conspicuously in so short a time in impressing a great idea upon so many persons in so many countries. Not even General Booth has exercised so widespread, so direct, and so continuous an influence over so many millions of men. No Archbishop of the Anglican fold, no prelate of Rome, and certainly no high priest of any of the modern rationalistic faiths, or unfaiths, has this very day any such potent influence upon the daily life of so many millions as has Dr. Francis Clark, of whose existence I dare say many of my readers will now learn for the first time.

It is not twenty years since the idea first took shape in the mind of Dr. Clark, then an unknown Congregational pastor in the village of Williston, near Portland, in the State of Maine. He embodied it in an organisation of the young people of his own church, which to outward seeming differed no whit from the thousands of other societies for Christian work which good men and good women are founding in every church and chapel every year. But although no one knew Dr. Clark, and although Williston is no great world-centre, but an out-of-the-way village in a remote corner of the United States, his society did not perish, as such societies usually do, with the withering of the leaves in autumn. On the contrary, it suddenly displayed a strange and phenomenal capacity for reproducing its species. It grew and multiplied year after year, until to-day there are no fewer than 56,000 of them scattered all over the world, with an aggregate membership of no less than 3,350,000. The Primrose League, our most conspicuous achievement in the shape of the spread of a popular idea of local organisation, is a comparatively parochial institution. It is confined to the precincts of our Imperial parish. Neither can it claim anything like the membership of Dr. Clark's society.

The majority of the members of the Society of Christian Endeavour are citizens of the United States. But in the United Kingdom there are at this moment more than 6,000 societies, or 12 per cent. of the entire number. In Australia the Christian Endeavourers are relatively more numerous than in the Mother Country, for the Australians have founded 2,00 societies. The others are scattered in various countries—36 in Spain, 101 in Germany, 148 in China, 454 in India, and so forth.

The original society has become a kind of gigantic American octopus. Its headquarters are in the United States, but its tentacles are all round the world.

Merely to found a society or association in which within less than twenty years no less than 3,350,000 persons can be induced to enrol themselves by solemn pledge of adhesion to the conditions of membership is no inconsiderable achievement, be the object of the society what it may. No one who has not made any effort of the kind can realise the stolid force of vis inertia, the absolute impossibility of rousing the average mass of average men to any distinct effort of individual exertion, even if it be only to sign their names. But Dr. Clark has achieved this miracle, and the nature and objects of the society for which he has recruited his members increase the marvel.

For the objects of the society as set forth in its original constitution were not by any means those which such experts in gauging public taste as, let us say, the editors of the Petit Journal of Paris, the Daily Mail of London, and the Journal of New York would expect to catch on. For the objects of the Christian Endeavour Society are: "to promote an earnest, Christian life among its members, to increase their mutual acquaintance, and to make them more useful in the service of God." Nevertheless, this Society has beaten all other societies in the rapidity of its growth. No other organisation born in 1881, or later, has recruited anything like three million members for any purpose whatsoever. To have raised such a host out of nothing, with no resources but those which lay under his own hat, is a noteworthy achievement, and Dr. Clark is a noteworthy man.

I.—ROBERT RAIKES AND THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

Before writing of Dr. Clark it may be well to cast a rapid glance at his forerunner-Robert Raikes, of Gloucester, the founder of the Sunday-school. To most of us the Sunday-school seems so natural and so indispensable an institution that it is difficult to conceive of a time when the Sunday-school was not. Yet Christendom had lasted seventeen centuries before the very simple and obvious expedient of enlisting the services of Christian people to teach children on Sunday occurred to the human mind. That service to humanity was rendered by a somewhat curious old English gentleman who lived in Gloucester in the eighteenth century. He did many things in his time. He was an able editor who kept his presses going all Sunday, and although the editorial fraternity may not care to hear the remark, it is possible that when editors are marshalled in order of precedence according to the services they have rendered to the human race, Robert Raikes of the Gloucester Journal will lead all the rest of us. He seems to have been a good enough journalist in his day, up to date, enterprising and energetic; but his great work was not done in journalism, but in the Sunday-school. It is curious that the man who probably did more than most to secure the religious observance of Sunday was himself a habitual Sabbath-breaker. The London Gazette and Newsletter were despatched by coach from London every Saturday. They arrived in Gloucester on Sunday, and as the journal had to be published on Monday, the compositors and Mr. Raikes worked all Sunday, and went to press at seven or eight o'clock on Sunday night.

What a quaint and horrible old world it was in which he lived! We read the story of his labours with a sense of profound amazement that we can have progressed so far in so short a space of time as a single century. Every Sunday all the shops opened in the morning, while the rest of the day was spent in drinking, dog-fighting, cock-fighting, and badger-baiting. The account given in "Robert Raikes, the Man and his Work," of the state of Gloucester Gaol shows that the Khalifa's dungeon at Omdurman was not so very much worse than our English prisons of one hundred and fifty years ago. One hundred and twenty miserable wretches were herded together in Gloucester Gaol, men and women mingling freely together all day, being separated only at night. Several were almost naked. Women lay-in with prison bred babies. Every night all the male prisoners were chained together by a chain passing through each man's link. They were fed by charity, and often starved. Yet Howard reported that this hell-hole of a place was one of the best in England. He said he only knew two that were to be compared with it. The prison taint was so strong, that when any prisoners broke prison and escaped, there was no difficulty in capturing them by laying mastiffs on their trail. Dogs for this purpose were part of the regular equipment of the gaol. In those days the lash and the gallows were rough and ready substitutes for short and long terms of imprisonment. Vagrants were publicly flogged and sent back to their parishes. The hangman was regarded as a kind of necessary gaol deliverer. At one assize eight would be hanged, at another twenty-one. Life was cheap in those days, and our criminal code the most barbarous in Europe. Nor was the lot of the captive improved when, instead of being hanged off-hand, he was transported to Australia. The horrors of the sea passage were indescribable. Sometimes half the convicts would die en route. When they landed at Port Jackson, the survivors were often so weak they could not stand, and were slung half dead out of the ship as if they were bales of merchandise. The slums recruited the gaol, and the gaol kept the hulks and the gallows constantly supplied. The children prowled about the streets, unkempt little savages. They preferred to see a bull baited to going to church, and their language was a compost of indecency and profanity. It was in the midst of such surroundings that Robert Raikes invented the Sunday-school.

"THE RIVER AT ITS SPRING."

At first he was almost single-handed. He wrote, "I walk alone. It seems as if I had discovered a new country, where no other adventurer chooses to follow." After a time shrewd John Wesley, coming upon Sunday-schools in his journeyings, dimly discerned that perhaps there was something in them not quite appreciated by the public. In 1784, he wrote, "Perhaps God may have a deeper end thereto than men are aware of. Who knows but what some of these schools may become nurseries for Christians." Good old John, with his "perhaps" and "who knows," little dreamed what an agency for good was springing up into existence under his eyes.

"We see dimly in the present what is small and what is great," says Lowell.

We stride the river daily at its spring, Nor in our childish thoughtlessness foresee What myriad vassal streams shall tribute bring, How like an equal it will meet the sea.

At the beginning in Gloucester it was the day of small things indeed. Robert Raikes' attention seems to have been first called to the need of Sunday-schools by the nuisance which the children made under the windows of his newspaper office. All day, while the good man was composing his editorial thunder or sub-editing the London Gazette for West-country readers, the graceless imps of Gloucester carried on shamelessly the whole blessed Sabbath. They cursed and quarrelled, fought and gamed, and amused themselves with playing hop-scotch, five-stones and chuck, to the no small disturbance of the flow of the editorial thought. So, after a time, he bethought him that it might be possible to improve matters by getting the urchins taught something on Sundays. So, after much cogitation, he opened the first Sunday-school in a room in Sooty Alley, where he got a good woman called Meredith to teach a baker's dozen of ragged rascals whom he gathered off the streets. They were taught to read in the Reading Made Easy book, and taught texts, collects and the psalter.

A RAGGED REGIMENT.

Every morning Robert Raikes used to go to see how they were getting on, and march at their head to early morning service in the Cathedral. "There goes Bobby Wild Goose and his ragged regiment," said the neighbours, marvelling much at the interest which the stylish—"buckish," they called it in those days—man took in the ragamuffins who, but for his intervention, would probably have gravitated to the gaol. He used to give them combs, an article of refinement and luxury with which they had previously made no acquaintance, talked to them about the virtue of soap, and occasionally gave them much coveted pennies.

After three years' experience in Sooty Alley he transferred the school to Southgate Street, where Mrs. Critchley took charge of as many as 120 or 140 children. It was no easy task licking the rough cubs into shape. The school at first was for boys only, but afterwards, when the girls were taken in, the she-cubs were declared to be worse than the males. They were filthy, profane, indecent, and lawless. But Robert Raikes, who had set his mind on succeeding, was not to be deterred by the defiant disorderliness of his flock. The boys sometimes would bring a badger to school, and let it loose so as to scare good Mrs. Critchley; other times they would fight, stick pins into each other, and make her life a burden to

PENAL MEASURES.

In those days there was no reluctance to resort to corporal punishment, and Robert Raikes was a firm believer that it was wrong to spare the rod and spoil the Nevertheless, some of the methods adopted by this excellent pioneer in the great humanitarian work occasion some surprise. Some of the boys were sent to school in fetters. The lads had fourteen-pound weights tied to their legs to prevent them running away. Others had logs of wood fastened to their ankles, while some would be beaten by their fathers with straps from home to school. When any boy misbehaved worse than usual, Mr. Raikes would march him home "to be walloped." He would wait to see the punishment inflicted with due severity, then he would march the howling culprit back to his place in school. Occasionally he took a hand in the work of chastisement himself and caned the boys on the back of a chair.

An old chair was the birching stool or horse. The chair was laid on its two front legs, and then the young one was put on, kicking and swearing all the time if he were pretty big and pretty new, then Mr. Raikes would cane him.

But the most extraordinary illustration of the license allowed to teachers in those days is afforded by the story of how he blistered a boy's fingers on the stove for lying. An old scholar says: "One boy was a notorious liar. Mr. Raikes could do nothing with him, and one day he caught him by the hand and pressed the tips of his fingers on the bars of the stove or fireplace. Was he that set gen buc dist He wais cuff so thre

chu

a la

bur

Sun

spea

F

from disticitizi indiexce Rail malhear new mor any diat of protection of paper sine Before 400, in the experience of paper 100 paper

of th

fifty

Sun the num 1,50 was 10,8 A t teac Eng of a

A

rend to s intro On Deni

scho remi rema have Lord Sund labor

teac

burnt? Blistered a bit. Mr. Raikes would take care that he was not much injured; but he did hate liars."

tch,

the

he rove

on

ned

lley,

dith

he

d in ects

see ead

iere

aid

the

ook

oro-

em

ich

to ave

ns-

frs.

en.

pe.

hen

be

ne.

set

the nes s to ht,

to

to rm

the

ted

ian ere nd ay.

om

an

d."

lue

ck

in

on vas

nd

se

ry

ng.

ar.

he

nis

he

From such humble beginnings sprang the great Sunday-school system which covers the whole Englishspeaking world.

THE FOUNDER.

Robert Raikes is still visible to us across the century that has passed since his death. A tall, prosperous, well set up citizen—his portrait gives an impression of geniality and kindliness. He used to be accused of buckishness, with quite a swagger style. He was not distinctively religious except in the humanitarian sense. He dressed well in a claret-coloured coat and fancy waistcoat with silver gilt buttons. His cambric frills and cuffs are still among the things unforgotten by men, and so also are his white stockings, his buckled shoes, his three-cornered hat and stately periwig. As he went to church in winter time a servant walked before him with He carried a cane and a horn snuff-box, a lantern. from which he "snuffed with elegance." He leaves a distinct image in the mind's eye of a highly respectable citizen who was given to hospitality, and by no means indifferent to the good opinion of his neighbour. "An excessive vanity was a predominant feature in Mr. Raikes' character"-a venial offence which does not make him less lovable to posterity. He had a warm heart, a shrewd eye, a comfortable income, an influential newspaper, and a handsome service of plate, animated more by a desire to do good to the unfortunate than to any keen desire for the saving of their souls. The immediate effect of his efforts was surprising in the emptying of the gaol to an extent that is almost incredible. From fifty to six hundred tried at one gaol delivery, the number of prisoners sank so rapidly that on one assizes there was not a single criminal to be tried. Thanks to his newspaper and the help given him by the Gentleman's Magazine, the fame of the new invention spread far and wide. Before he died he had the satisfaction of knowing that 400,000 children were being taught regularly every Sunday in the schools which had sprung up in imitation of his experimental class in Sooty Alley.

A HUNDRED YEARS AFTER.

A hundred years later, in 1898, there were 53,590 Sunday-schools in the United Kingdom and 140,000 in the United States and Canada. Sunday-school teachers numbered 700,000 in the United Kingdom, nearly 1,500,000 in North America. The number of scholars was returned at 7,875,748 in the United Kingdom, 10,893,533 in the United States, and 582,070 in Canada. A total of 200,000 Sunday-schools served by 2,200,000 teachers, and attended by nearly 19,000,000 children in the English-speaking world testify to the immense fecundity of a good idea when it is born into the world at the right time.

Of the immense service which the Sunday-school has rendered to the world and to the Church, it is impossible to speak too highly. Dean Farrar, who undertook the introduction to the book about Robert Raikes, says:—

One of the most brilliant of our judges—the late Mr. Justice Denman—once said to me that his experience as a Sunday-school teacher had been richer to him in interesting events and reminiscences than even his experience as a judge. And it is a remarkable fact that four at least of those eminent lawyers who have held the lofty position of Lord Chancellor, Lord Hatherley, Lord Cairns, Lord Selborne and Lord Herschell, have been Sunday-school teachers. Lord Hatherley continued his faithful labours in Sunday-schools for forty years of his life.

Mr. Chamberlain also was at one time a Sunday-school teacher—but that was a long time ago.

II.—DR. CLARK AND THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR.

Mr. Raikes has been dead and buried this hundred years, but somehow he seems a more visible personality than Dr. Clark, the founder of the Christian Endeavour Movement. Perhaps it is because of Dr. Clark's exceeding modesty. The man is lost in his work. Beyond the modesty. fact that he was born and educated, was called as pastor of Williston Congregational Church near Portland in Maine in 1876, and founded the first Christian Endeavour Society among the young people of Williston in February, 1881, it is difficult to fird out anything People love him, obey his direction and about him. welcome his inspiration, but his subsequent history is little more than the history of the growth and development of the Christian Endeavour Society. There have been books written about him, but he remains impalpable, almost invisible, the piston rather than the fly-wheel of the great organisation which it is his glory to have originated. Hence, of necessity, this sketch will be far more a character sketch of the Christian Endeavour movement than a character sketch of Dr. Clark. Possibly if I had the privilege of a close personal knowledge of Dr. Clark it would have been otherwise. But I only met him once for an hour in Chicago, and carried away no definite impressions which would explain the phenomenal success of the work with which he is identified.

THE BIRTH OF THE MOVEMENT.

I cannot therefore do better than allow him to tell the story of how the first Christian Endeavour Society was founded in his own words, as they are to be found in his book, entitled "World-wide Endeavour," the Story of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavour from the beginning and in all lands:—

Topics relating to the Christian life were studied. "Pilgrim's Progress" was read through by the pastor and his class together. The Church creed, simplified and brought down to the understanding of the young converts, occupied the class for one year, and from this class many graduated into the Church each year who were all ready, when the first Endeavour Society was started, to form the nucleus of a strong and enduring organisation. Much help, too, was found in a series of Sunday-school prayer-meetings, held immediately after the Sunday-school session, for a few weeks following the week of prayer. In these evangelistic services many young people were led to commit themselves to Christ. Another forerunner of the Endeavour Society was the "Mizpah Mission Circle," a company of girls and boys which met every week at the pastor's home, under the care of Mrs. Clark, to talk about mission subjects, to pray for the extension of the Kingdom, and to sew and work in various ways for the mission cause. Almost all the girls and boys of this mission circle became members of the first Endeavour Society. As a result of this week of prayer, in January, 1881, supplemented by the Sunday-school prayer-meetings and the pastor's class, and the influence of the Mizpah circle under the direction of the pastor's wife, many young hearts were given to the Lord Jesus Christ; a new song was put into their mouths, and their eager impulse was, as is always the way with new converts, to do some-thing for Him whom they have begun to love. After the week of prayer was over, special meetings were held, and in all some twenty or thirty converts were born into the Kingdom

TO RETAIN THE YOUNG CONVERTS.

It was felt that this was a very serious and critical time with them. They would receive impressions and form religious habits during the first few weeks after conversion which would never be lost. The first three months would set their stamp of consistent devotion to Christ or sluggish indifference to His claims on the whole of their subsequent Christian lives. There was not in that church, nor was there in any other church, to my knowledge, a sufficient opportunity for young people to express their devotion or to utilise their enthusiastic love and abounding aspirations in their service of Christ. How to change this state of affairs, how to provide some natural outlet for these young energies, how to provide some natural outlet for these young energies, how to furnish appropriate work which should not be merely playing at work but actually accomplishing something for Christ and the Church, was the great problem of the hour. To solve this problem the pastor of the church drew up the constitution of a young people's society, and asked these recent converts, together with some who had been longer in the church, to come to his house on Wednesday evening, the second day in February. After a little general conversation as to the importance of starting right, of working for the Church and of showing one's colours for Christ on all occasions, the pastor, with a good deal of hesitation, produced a constitution whose germs had lain in his mind for a long while, but which he had written out for the first time that day. The most important clause of the constitution related to the prayer-meeting, which stated, "It is expected that all the active members of this society will be present at every meeting unless detained by some absolute necessity, and that each one will take some part, however slight, in every meeting." This sentence was underscored, and when the constitution was printed it was put in italies, which symbolises the way in which it has been engraved, underscored, and italicised on the heart of the Christian Endeavour movement from that day to this.

Original Constitution.

Name.—This Society shall be called the Williston Young People's Society of Christian Endeavour.

Object.—Its object shall be to promote an earnest Christian life among its members, to increase their mutual acquaintance, and to make them more useful in the service of God.

Membership.—The members of this society shall consist of all young people who sincerely desire to accomplish the results above specified. They shall become members upon being elected by the society, and by signing their names in this book.

elected by the society, and by signing their names in this book.

Officers.—The officers of this society shall be a president, vice-president, and secretary. There shall also be a prayer-meeting committee of five, a social committee of three, and a look-out committee of three.

Duties of Officers.—The duties of the president, vice-president, and secretary shall be those that usually fall to those officers. The prayer-meeting committee shall have in charge the Friday evening prayer-meeting, shall see that a topic is assigned, and a leader provided for each meeting.

The Prayer Meeting.—It is expected that all the members of the society will be present at every meeting unless detained by some absolute necessity, and that each one will take some part, however slight, in every meeting. The meetings will be held just one hour, and, at their close, some time may be taken for introduction and social intercourse if desired.

Once each month an experience meeting shall be held at which each member shall speak concerning his or her progress in the Christian life for the past month. If any one choose he can express his feelings by an appropriate verse of Scripture. It is expected that, if any one is obliged to be absent from this monthly meeting, he will send the reason of his absence by some one who will aid.

Social Committee, —It shall be the duty of the Social Committee to provide for the mutual acquaintance of the members by occasional sociables, for which any entertainment that may be deemed best may the provided

Look-out Committee.—It shall be the duty of the Look-out Committee to bring new members into the society, to introduce them to the work, and to affectionately look after and reclaim any that seem to be indifferent to their duties.

Meetings and Elections.—Business meetings can be held at the close of the Friday evening meeting, or at any other time in accordance with the call of the president. An election of officers and committees shall be held once in six months. Names may be proposed by a nominating committee appointed by the president.

Miscellaneous. - Any other committees may be added and duties assumed by this society which may in the future seem best. This constitution can be amended by a two-thirds vote of the society.

A CHILL RECEPTION.

This, then, was the document which the pastor, on that cold February evening, brought downstairs to his young people. No wonder that he felt in some doubt as to whether they would accept its strong and iron-clad provisions. With a good deal of natural hesitation he presented it to them, and read the constitution through page by page.

stitution through page by page.

A deathly stillness fell upon the meeting. Those strict provisions were evidently more than the young people had bargained for. They had not been accustomed to take their religious duties so seriously.

As I said, a considerable and painful silence fell upon the meeting when this constitution with its serious provisions was proposed. It seemed as though the society would die still-born, and be simply a creation of the pastor's imagination. But God ordered it otherwise. In that company were two who were especially influential and helpful in launching the little craft. These were Mr. W. H. Pennell, before mentioned, and the pastor's wife. Seeing that the matter was likely to fall through—at least for that meeting—Mr. Pennell affixed his signature to the constitution, and called upon his class of young men to do the same. Mrs. Clark-quietly circulated among the girls of the Mizpah Circle, persuading them that it was not such a "dreadful" promise to make, as they at first supposed, telling them that the provisions of this constitution any earnest young Christian could live up to, and promising herself to be a member, though at first she shrunk from the pledge as much as any of them.

One by one the young men and women affixed their names to the document; a few more minutes were spent in conversation, a closing prayer was offered, and a hymn sung, and the young people went out into the frosty night to their homes with many a merry "Good-night!" to each other, and the first Society of Christian Endeavour was formed.

THE MOTIVE FORCE.

That was the beginning of it. The end of it who can foresee? From that little circle there has spread out to the uttermost ends of the earth, influences which have been blessed to the redemption of millions of lives. What Dr. Clark says is true of the latest Society as it was of the first. The prayer meeting is the central furnace which generates all the steam. As the years roll on, ever fresh manifestations of Christian energy are to be observed. But the motive force is the same. It is a systematised Revival in which the fervour and energy of youth have been brought to bear upon the somewhat stodgy and anæmic body of the Church.

The Society, as it exists to-day, remains true to its original lines. There are now over 50,000 societies of this kind, and all of them are more or less modelled upon the original that so narrowly escaped perishing at its inception in Williston Church.

UNDENOMINATIONAL.

It is obvious that the new movement has certain features which remind us of the Sunday-school. To begin with, it is not a proclamation of any new doctrine, the formulation of any new creed. It is simply the discovery that there is a simple and efficacious method of utilising the energies and aspirations of young people, without in any way interfering with the organisation of the Church. The Society of Christian Endeavour is as interdenominational as the Sunday-school. It is capable of being adopted by almost any Christian sect, and as a matter of fact, although it chiefly flourishes among the Evangelical Nonconformists, there are several societies among the Episcopalians. It supplements the Sunday-school, and supplies the bridge between the Sunday-school and the

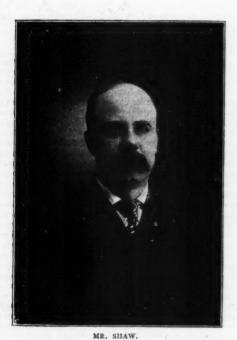

MR. CHAS. WATERS.

Treasurer of National Council; Chairman of London Council.

(Photografh by Barclay Brothers.)

REV. KNIGHT CHAPLIN.
Editor Christian Endeavour.
(Photograph by Debenham and Gould, Bournemouth.)

Treasurer of Movement in America.

MR. BAER. Secretary of Movement in America.

FOUR PROMINENT WORKERS.

eem e of

No ould deal con-

had heir the was orn, God were raft. the ough the o do the ead-hemoung be a h as es to ion, oung

any can t to ave ves. s it tral roll e to is a y of that its s of pon its tain egin

the very sing
t in rch.
inaeing er of lical
the

and the Church, the absence of which every Sunday-school teacher has long deplored.

To give young people something to do, to accustom the youth of both sexes to bear public testimony, brief and to the point, as to their own convictions, experiences, trials and aspirations, to make testifying the rule and silence the exception, to create as it were an understudy for the Church untrammelled by the bonds of conventionality-this was Dr. Clark's work. It is a great work and a blessed work, and its usefulness has been attested by multitudes all over the world.

COLOUR BLIND TO SEX.

Looked at from a purely secular utilitarian point of view, the movement has been a great boon to our race at this stage of its development, if for no other reason than that it waged ruthless war upon the antiquated supersti-tion that the most religious sex should have no active share in the conduct of religious services. The Christian Endeavour Society has from the first been free from that monstrous, unnatural and un-Christian dogma which sterilises for Christian services one-half the human race. Dr. Clark was happily married. His wife was a true helpmate. From the first, young men and maidens met on a footing of perfect equality in the ministry of Christian service. What the Society of Friends did for a few in the seventeenth century, what the Salvation Army has done for its own members in our own time, the Christian Endeavour Society has done for all the Evangelical sects. It has given women a chance. It has inculcated the sacred principle of the liberty of prophesying, and it has not merely permitted, but exacted for women the same regular and constant share in the conduct of divine service, in the service of prayer, and in the study of the Scriptures which it exacted from their brethren.

BIBLICAL CULTURE.

Another immense service which it has rendered to the literary culture of the race, is the emphasis with which it insists upon the regular study of the Bible. The tendency of our time is to read nothing but the latest news. The sensation of the hour monopolises attention for a brief moment and then is forgotten. In place of the careful study of a few classics we have the carnivorous bolting of heterogeneous scraps and tit-bits of miscellaneous information, served up in the more or less frequent sauce of fiction. To find in the midst of such a desultory generation a great organisation which lays it upon the conscience of every member to spend a certain time every day in reading one of the Hebrew classics is a service to the culture of our time not easy to be over estimated. This would be recognised at once if, instead of insisting upon the reading of the prophecies of Isaiah, they were pledged to read the dialogues of Plato. Or if instead of the Epistle of Paul it was compulsory to read the essays of Bacon. Take it all in all there is no such comprehensive compendium of all that is best in the literature of the world as is to be found within the covers of the Bible. Although much of the Bibliolatry which used to make the Book of books its fetish has disappeared, the genuine human value of the Hebrew Scriptures stands forth more and more conspicuous as we grow older. Even if it is nothing else it is quite different from the highly seasoned scareheaded Bible of our own times issued e ery morning piping hot from the editorial press. The study familiarises us with other men, of other climes, of other civilisations who are nevertheless as intensely human as the men we meet in Fleet Street or in the Transvaal.

A DAILY DYNAMIC.

Its perusal widens our mental range, quickens our sympathies, opens up to us the fascinating study of comparative religions, and familiarises with some of the best thoughts of the best men who have ever left broad and deep the impress of their lives upon the evolution of mankind. It is easy to make fun of the genealogies, to deride the polygamous adventures of the patriarchs, and to hold up our hands in holy horror over the massacres and assassinations of a bygone time. But these things are of the essence of the life of our race. David may not be altogether a drawing-room hero or a model for Young Men's Christian Associations. Much that he did was, to put it mildly, distinctly shady, and if he had lived in our times he would have probably ended his days on the gallows. But after all David, with all his ups and downs, his aspirations, his temptations, his sins and his psalms, is distinctly more energising and inspiring a human soul than, let us say, Sir Thomas Lipton or the Tichborne Claimant. To study any book that has stood the test of two thousand years is distinctly to be commended merely from the point of view of literary culture. But the Bible is much more than a literary classic; it is the moral perpetual dynamo of our English race. elevating the thought, energising the moral sentiment, and developing all that is highest and best in the complex creature called man, it stands alone. And the Christian Endeavour Society, more than any other organisation of our time, insists upon the duty of leaving no day in all the three hundred and sixty-five unhallowed by the sacred influence of the Inspired Word.

PREMIUM ON SOCIABILITY.

But neither the practice of prayer nor the constant study of the Scriptures would have made the Christian Endeavour Society achieve its great results, but for the other principles which have never been departed from, and which can never be departed from without crippling its usefulness and striking at the tap-root of its vitality. One is the constant cultivation of the social instinct. Solitariness is one of the greatest blights upon the happiness of the world. Aloofness may not be original sin, but it is one of its most melancholy witnesses. To live apart, to dwell in a solitude of our own creating, to go through life without any ties of human tenderness lurking as boon fellows, is assuredly a far more horrible curse than that which is said to have been pronounced upon our remote progenitor when doomed to eat her bread by the sweat of her brow. The Christian Endeavour Society has combatted these right nobly by giving sociability a prominent place among the Christian virtues. To cultivate friendliness one with another, to labour perpetually to destroy the feeling of loneliness, to bind together in bonds of loving sympathy the isolated units of the human family, that has been the work of Dr. Clark, and few more useful works could be attempted by mortal man. And he has cultivated this sociability not by mere gossip of the ways of neighbours-although Heaven forbid that we should say one word against gossip, which, if not one of the means of grace is at least one of the means of cheerfulness, which is surely a Christian virtue-but by uniting his members in earnest practical service in the realisation of the Christian ideal. How multifarious have been the manifestations of this spirit of humanitarian enthusiasm, every report of the society shows. But of this we shall have more to say hereafter.

cor me dea 1 Iw Iw ever serv tiou

I

thro be ever som Mas mee Scri

mee

orga

first ence that and in h as t conf in te have unde resid of r tiona orga com O is th in 18 repre Ann Thes latin comp Ev the socie with two

the e

City

the paral Ende of the follow by M in 188 The of me for eve certain

III.—THE METHODS AND ORGANISATION OF THE SOCIETY.

the

our

the left

oon

the

the

But

r a ach

1 if ded

his ins

ing

the

the led

the

the

For

and lex

ian

ion

all

red

ant

ian

the

om.

ing

ity.

nct.

opi-

but t, to life

oon

hat

ote

t of

om-

ent

dli-

the

hat

eful

has ays

uld

the ful-

ing

ion

the sm.

hall

To make this account of the formation of the society complete, it is necessary to add the covenant or active member's pledge, which is signed by Christian Endeavourers:—

Trusting in the Lord Jesus for strength, I promise Him that I will strive to do whatever He would like to have me do; that I will make it the rule of my life to pray and read the Bible every day, and to support my own church in every way, especially by attending all her regular Sunday and midweek services, unless prevented by some reason which I can conscientiously give to my Saviour; and that, as far as I know how, throughout my life I will endeavour to lead a Christian life.

As an active member I promise to be true to all my duties, to be present at, and to take some part, aside from singing, in every Christian Endeavour prayer-meeting, unless hindered by some reason which I can conscientiously give to my Lord and Master. If obliged to be absent from the monthly consecration meeting of the society, I will, if possible, send at least a verse of Scripture to be read in response to my name at the roll-call.

INTER-DENOMINATIONAL UNION.

From this original germ of a Young People's Society, meeting together once a week, there has sprung a vast organisation, the very simple, but very effective, influence of which has been entirely for good. After the first society was formed other societies sprang into existence in the neighbourhood, and it became natural enough that they should interchange ideas one with the other, and strengthen each other in the work that they have taken in hand. In this way local unions were formed which, as the Christian Endeavour Societies were by no means confined to any one denomination, had an excellent effect in tending to the growth of inter-denominationalism. We have yet imperfectly appreciated the difference between undenominationalism, which represents the resultant residuum which is left when all differences of dogma or of ritual have been eliminated, and inter-denominationalism, which allows the fullest possible liberty to organisation on denominational lines, but affords a common basis of union—an ideal which is shared by all.

One great feature in the organisation of the movement is the Annual Convention. At the first, which was held in 1882, when only six societies were represented, all but two belonged to churches in the city of Portland. At the eighteenth Annual Convention, which was held in the City of Detroit last July, nearly 56,000 societies were represented, and between the first and the eighteenth Annual Convention, every year reported a steady increase. These Conventions have been invaluable, both in stimulating local interest and in enabling members to compare-notes, and profit by each other's experience.

COMMITTEES AD INFINITUM.

Every year has marked some fresh adaptation to the needs of humanity. The extent to which societies split up into committees, each charged with some specific work, makes one wonder whether the infinite divisibility of matter has not got its parallel in the infinitesimal divisibility of the Christian Endeavour Society. Some idea of the extent and variety of the methods of organisation may be gathered by the following extract from an admirable article contributed by Mr. Amos R. Wells to the New England Magazine in 1882:—

The division of work is more important than the division of members. The Endeavour principle is, some definite work for everybody; and each society is divided into committees, for certain specific tasks. There is the look-out committee, which spurs the careless, reclaims those who fall back or fail, and seeks and instructs new members; a conserving, an evan-gelising, a missionary committee. There is the prayergelising, a missionary committee. There is the prayer-meeting committee, which selects leaders, plars new features for the meetings, and assists the leader in making the meeting a success. There is the social committee, whose ingenuity in devising ways of reaching the young outside the Church, through social gatherings and pure amusements, la: certainly been marvellous. The good-literature committee gathers subscriptions to denominational periodicals; collects, for hospitals and missionarics, the waste reading-matter of the congregation; opens church-reading-rooms, literature tables, or book and magazine exchanges; supplies with religious reading, barber shops, railroad waiting-rooms, and the like; keeps scrap-books bearing on the work of the different committees; edits and publishes the church paper, and often prints for circulation the pastor's sermons. The flower committee decorates the pulpit, and afterwards, with loving messages, distributes the flowers among the sick or poor. The calling committee seeks out strangers. The relief committee dispenses charitable gifts. The Sunday-school committee prepares itself to fill gaps in the ranks of the teachers, hunts up absent scholars, gathers in new ones. Missionary and temperance committees ag tate those causes by special meetings and by literature. The usher committee welcomes visitors, and keeps the back seats clear. There are invitation committees, to distribute printed invitations to church meetings; correspondence committees, to watch over men bers as they pass from one place to another, and introduce them into some new society and church home. There are pastor's aid com-mittees, to do little odd jobs for the pastor. The ingenious young folk sometimes even form baby committees, to tend small children while their mothers go to church. By the time an Endeavourer has served a term on each of these committees in a live society, he will have gained a pretty extensive training in applied Christianity.

Since then there have been many additional committees formed, and it may safely be said that a good, thoroughgoing Christian Endeavour Society would endeavour to take a hand in everything that is going for good, and wherever there is an evil to be combated there the Christian Endeavour forms a committee and sets to work. Such, at least, is the idea—an idea which is more often realised than cynics venture to think. The fundamental idea is that every active member should have some specific and definite work for Christ and the Church. Although there is no end of organisation, the principle of individual independence, both on the part of the local society, is never absent. All the unions, conventions, and committees exist for fellowship and inspiration, not for legislation.

KINDERGARTEN METHODS FOR JUNIORS.

The organisation for the young led to the formation of junior societies for Christian Endeavour, which appeared to have adopted a good deal of the method of the kindergarten by way of interesting young people. At the Belfast Convention last year to5 children, in what is called the Junior Rally, took part in an object lesson called the Building of the Bridge. Block by block they erected a wooden bridge 14 feet long upon the platform. Each block formed a suitable motto or letter, and each repeated a verse of scripture or a hymn as the block was placed in position. The bridge was emblematical of the Christian Endeavour uniting the Sunday-school and the Church. A procession of child-builders brought forward and placed each a "Step of Childhood," and one of "Seven Stones of Helpfulness." The arch was formed of 18 stones, each bearing one letter of the words "Christian Endeavour." Then came seven "Panels of Progress," and seven lamps each with a text and motto.

This may be scoffed at as childish, but it is intended for children; and any one who has had practical experience of the difficulty of interesting children, and impressing religious ideas upon their restless minds, will appreciate the value of such a bridge and such a system.

VIEW OF THE TENTS AT THE DETROIT CONVENTION OF CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOURERS.

SCHOOL OF CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP.

From this it may be said to be a far cry to the development of Christian citizenship; but no development of the Christian Endeavour Society deserves such cordial appreciation and grateful recognition as the steady march which it has made in the direction of an enlightened citizenship and an intelligent appreciation of the English-speaking race. The Christian Endeavour Society has always disclaimed party politics, but it has borne unflinching testimony to the principle of Christian citizenship, and links together a high standard of practical politics in the State with the cultivation of the religious life in the Churches. In their own phrase, their ideal is "our country for Christ," and their missionary plank has as its corresponding doctrine, "Christ for the world."

A BOND OF ENGLISH-SPEAKING UNITY.

It is natural that the Christian Endeavour movement, cradled as it was in America, and still much stronger in the United States than in any other English-speaking community, should have been very useful in strengthening the tendency to a more fraternal feeling between Britain and the United States. It is only just to Dr. Clark to recognise that he has never lost an opportunity of preaching the doctrine of the essential unity of all Englishspeaking people. With them the Union Jack and the Stars and Stripes are ever intertwined. It was at the St. Louis Convention in 1890 that they celebrated what they call the merging of the flags. The Union Jack and the Stars and Stripes were intertwined on a platform in front of the speakers' desk. When the flags were united, Professor Andrews, of Toronto, stepped forward, and said, "This flag with the four and forty stars and the thirteen stripeswhat means this crimson colour? It is the sacred blood of your Fathers and your Brothers. No wonder you love it. What flag is this with the cross of St. Andrew and St. George? What means this crimson colour? It is the sacred blood of your mother. Shall any man forbid the banns? I now call upon Dr. Clark as a Canadian born and an American citizen to pronounce the ceremony complete." Then Dr. Clark, amid tumultuous applause, declared: "What God hath joined together let no man put asunder."

INFLUENCE ON HIGHER POLITICS.

What the Christian Endeavour has done in the cause of Anglo-American re-union tends directly towards the maintenance of peace where it is most endangered, for the Empire and the Republic being so much intertwined, having so many interests in common, and also developing so many points of friction, there is more peril of collision between them than between any other states. Although our politicians and statesmen may reck little of Christian Endeavourers and their ways, the strand spir the ever or it par to s fund laur gree Our faile floor imp

> the rall righ

wov star whi unn Is the wor

his Cla help T the are pap woven by Dr. Clark and his followers may enable us to stand the strain and avert many a threatened difficulty which would otherwise have culminated in the crime of unnecessary war.

It is not only in relation to England and America that the Christian Endeavour is a force for good for the The last society which was started purely world's peace. and simply with the object of the cultivation of the spiritual life of its members, the study of the Bible and the development of spiritual religion, has been driven by the force of circumstances and the manifest teachings of events to see that it is impossible to live the Christ-life or to act upon the inspiration of the Bible which it studied, unless it takes a continually increasing part in the higher politics of the world. That is to say, the Christian Endeavour, it it is true to its great function and follows the line upon which it has been launched by its founders, must of necessity become a great agency for the promotion of peace in the world. Our churches to a very large extent have lamentably failed to be of the slightest good in stemming the fierce flood of national passion or curbing the arrogance of imperial ambition. It remains to be seen whether in the various branches of the Christian Endeavour Society there are to be found local centres round which may rally the forces of those who do not believe that it is right to settle controversy by the summary process of murder.

PAOGRESS IN THE BRITISH ISLES.

With all the natural modesty of his own character, and his utter absence of anything like assumption, Dr. Clark has known how to choose his associates and helpers.

The offices of the United Society are now located on the seventh floor of Tremont Temple, Boston, U.S.A., and are very admirably adapted to the work of producing the papers and books published by the Society.

The progress of Christian Endeavour in the British shhe St. ey he he ont esnis od ve nd is id in ny

ne or Isles can be best shown in the increase of the number of societies year by year. The result is as follows:—

|      | 1 ann | - 3 | 100000 220 | o recent 10 | 691 | TOTIO! |          |
|------|-------|-----|------------|-------------|-----|--------|----------|
| 1888 |       | 18  | societies. | 1894        |     | 1,463  | societie |
| 1889 |       | 94  | 99         | 1895        |     | 2,645  | 23       |
| 1890 |       | 89  | 93         | 1896        | 0   | 3,593  | 99       |
| 1891 |       | 196 | 99         | 1897        |     | 4,648  | 99       |
| 1892 |       | 425 | 99         | 1898        |     | 5,575  | 99       |
| 1893 |       | 650 | 22         | 1899        |     | 6,165  | 99       |

These numbers are those reported at the Convention held in various cities at Whitsuntide. The present record is 6,301 societies.

IV.-THE CONVENTION OF 1900.

The great event of next year in London is to be the assembling of the Christian Endeavourers from near and from far in the great International Convention, which is to be held at Wembley Park.

From what has been done in America at previous congresses this promises to be an event unequalled in the religious history of our country. It will also go ill with us if it is not utilised to the uttermost to draw still more closely together the ties of friendship and brotherhood between England and the United States. At Detroit last year, 38,000 Endeavourers mustered at the great Convention. How many thousands will come up to London in July, 1920, is as yet not even estimated, but some idea as to the extent of that Convention may be formed from the fact that the hospitality committee is expecting no fewer than ten thousand visitors from across the Atlantic.

AN INVADING ARMY.

Ten thousand Americans—an invasion! Just think of it. It is a veritable army that is to descend upon our midst—an army organised with banners, although carrying no weapons more formidable than their Bibles and their hymn-books. Ten thousand! Never before in the history of the world has there been such a peaceful invasion of our land by an organised force from across the seas. To welcome such a host is a task which will not overtax the hospitality of John Bull, but their presence in our midst in such unprecedented numbers demands corresponding exertions on our part to welcome the friendly guests. Arrangements are being made upon a scale which throws the assembling of the Church Congress this month into absolute insignificance. Already nearly four thousand beds have been secured in our leading hotels to accommodate the expected guests, while as many more will be provided for by private hospitality; but the unique feature of the great Convention of 1900 is to be the formation of a veritable camp in which a small army of six thousand Christian Endeavourers will sleep, to be on the spot where the meetings are going on.

THE REPORTERS' TENT, DETROIT CONVENTION.

THE ENCAMPMENT.

Wembley Park has been taken by the hospitality committee of the Christian Endeavourers in London, and in its picturesque and well-wooded grounds a white city of canvas will rise at midsummer next year, in which, in July, six thousand of our visitors from over-sea and from our own land will be accommodated. Wembley Park is only twenty minutes by fast train from the centre of London. Never before have so many thousands been provided for in a camp, excepting by military authorities. In war, no doubt, nothing is thought of providing camp accommodation for six thousand soldiers. This is the first time in which an encampment of six thousand non-combatants has been dreamed of as an adjunct to a religious meeting. The mere presence of such a camp at Wembley Park will be a sensation, and will in itself be the most efficient advertisement to the outside world of the new thing that has sprung up in their midst. There is no reason why the Christian Endeavour should not become as numerous in the United Kingdom as it is in the United States. It has already spread throughout the whole of our Empire, and in Australia it has been a mighty power for good.

ITS NATIONAL SIGNIFICANCE.

What we have to think of from the national point of view, quite apart from the spiritual advantage that may arrive from a great camp-meeting at Wembley Park, is that the great Convention, with its enormous influx of Americans and others from beyond the seas, is met in a spirit worthy of our imperial position and our historic traditions. The Convention of Detroit was opened by a telegram of sympathy, greeting, and encouragement from President McKinley. Why should not the Decennial Convention next year meet with a similar cordial God-speed from her Majesty the Queen? There is nothing in the society of a partisan nature. Nothing in the scope of its operations is otherwise than absolutely in accord with the ideas which her Majesty has always expressed, and which we know she entertains as to the cultivation of the Christian graces and virtues; and it would be a thousand pities if her Majesty should not be advised next year to discharge the duty which naturally devolves on the mother of the English-speaking household, when there are gathered under her ancestral roof representatives from all the ocean-severed but heart-tinited commonwealths of the English-speaking folk.

WHAT OF THE ABBEY AND ST. PAUL'S?

Another question which it is to be hoped will be answered in the affirmative is whether St. Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey will be, I do not say, placed at the disposal of the Convention, but whether the Deans of these historic edifices will exert themselves to remove all obstacles, whether from prejudice or convention, that might stand in the way of holding great services in connection with the gathering. It is true that the Episcopalians have to their own loss failed to take part in the new movement; but there are a sufficient number of Episcopalians who are Christian Endeavourers, to render it possible for the Deans of St. Paul's and Westminster to extend a hearty welcome to this unprecedented gathering of fellow-Christians. Not to do so would be wantonly to throw away a great opportunity, and grievously to misuse a trust which they hold not for the benefit of their own sect, but for the whole English-speaking Christendom. The services in the Abbey and St. Paul's would of course be conducted entirely by

and

alre

org

Mo

Ch

me

ma

pro

cou

the

sion

Lor Lor

held noo Sun

Lon

Hou

thre

I

THE REV. F. B. MEYER.

members of the Church which at present is charged with the custody of these sacred edifices, and is there anything in the Christian Endeavour movement that would preclude the attendance of all their members at services of thanksgiving, of praise or of prayer on this occasion?

A VARIEGATED PROGRAMME.

The real religious centre of the Convention, however, will not be in the Abbey, Cathedral, or in any of the London churches. It will be in the great tents which will be brought from America to accommodate the worshippers in Wembley Park:—

Two of the great Endeavour tents, each with a seating capacity of from 8,000 to 10,000 persons, will be brought over from America; two auditoriums already erected in the selected Park, and estimated to seat upwards of 6,000, will be requisitioned; and a number of smaller tents, seating about 2,000 each, will be erected for smaller and sectional meetings.

eat

nat

ke

ent

rs,

nd

ce-

SO

ty,

for

h-

nd

by ere nat at his er, the ich the pa-

ed;

The preparations made to secure the convention are already in a very forward state. The following are officers of the committee charged with the details of the organisation: Chairman of Committee, Rev. Joseph Brown Morgan; vice-Chairman, Mr. F. F. Belsey, J. P.; Treasurer, Mr. Charles Waters; Hon. Secretary, Rev. W. Knight Chaplin, Williston, Leytonstone, N.E.

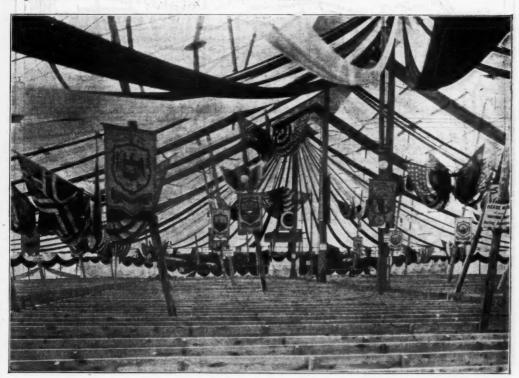

In addition to the distinctly religious meetings, arrangements are being made with the railways and others to make the visit of their American 10,000 pleasant and profitable, so that they may all carry away from the old country a bright and inspiriting memory of their visit to the motherland of the race.

The Railway Committee is organising a series of excursions for the Thursday following the Convention (July 19, 1900), including a conducted tour to points of interest in London, and a river trip to Hampton Court. Children's servizes, conducted by visiting Endeavourers, will be held in London's Sunday-schools on the Sunday afternoon (July 15, 1900). It is hoped that "Endeavour Sunday" will be a peculiarly hallowed time in all our London churches, closing with an Endeavour "Quiet Hour" after the evening services,

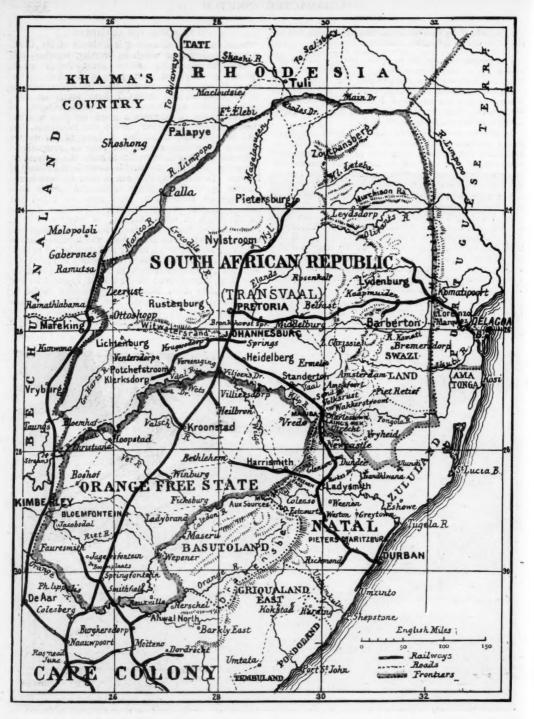

Music has always played a great part in all such gatherings, and there is to be a great choir of three thousand voices, for which volunteers are already being enrolled.

THE MORAL FOR OUTSIDERS.

Such, in very brief outline, is a sketch of Dr. Clark and the society over which he presides, together with a faint foreshadowing of the great doings which are to be expected next July in London. That the members of the Society will be enthusiastic is to be expected, but unless I have altogether misconceived the significance and the petentiality of this movement, it becomes a grave question whether those who are altogether outside the movement, but who are interested in all that pertains to the welfare of their fellow-men, should not unite in sympathetic interest to do what in them lies to make the Convention of 1900 a great and memorable event in the history of nations. In what way this can be done by outsiderswhether by the Peers whose castles and palaces form so large an element in what may be called the national capital of this country, or whether it may be the heads of other churches, or whether it may even be the heads of those secular organisations, such as railways and steamships, which render such a meeting possible; it is a matter that must be left to their own conscience and to their own ability to realise the immense possibilities of such an international gathering. One thing is quite sure: for the sake of England, as well as for the sake of our common faith, nothing should be left undone by rich or poor, from the Queen upon the throne down to the humblest of her subjects, to give Dr. Clark and his Christian Endeavourers a right royal welcome.

VIEW OF INTERIOR, "TENT ENDEAVOUR," DETROIT.

954

rele of the Tago, or standard a mably migman over for a man over for a up la the s to w francof th wors by t inter oppo

popul hum com Mr. succ grea

New York World,]

"HANDS ACROSS THE SEA" (NEW VERSION).

(September 8.

THE TOPIC OF THE MONTH.

SHALL WE LET HELL LOOSE IN SOUTH AFRICA?

THE question of Dreyfus at first divided with the question of the Transvaal the attention of the public. But when the month closed, Dreyfus was relegated to comparative obscurity, while the question of the Transvaal was more pressing than ever.

The question in itself is a triviality. Whether some 30,000 prospective citizens of the Transvaal, Colonials, Jews, Germans, Russian Poles, and Englishmen, shall or shall not have the franchise until two years later than the period fixed by Sir Alfred Milner is not exactly a matter on which the stolid British public could reasonably be expected to take any particular interest. It might, for instance, have been thought that any ordinary man would have been more concerned about the possible overcrowding of our London poor. It is a worse grievance for a decent man to have to sleep with his wife and grownup lads and daughters, all pigged together in one lair in the slums, than for a highly paid workman on the Rand to wait seven years instead of five before he obtains the franchise. Everyone admits that the material grievances of the London poor are immeasurably greater and far worse to bear than the worst of the grievances endured by the Outlanders, nor would there be any popular interest in the question but for the fact that it affords an opportunity of picking a quarrel with the Boers.

We bear them a grudge. They are personally unpopular. They are not angels, and they have sufficient human nature in them to object to be compelled to commit political suicide even to suit the convenience of Mr. Chamberlain. They have had the misfortune to be successful against us in battle, and they have the still greater misfortune to include the richest goldfield in the world within the limits of their State. Therefore, although the logic is not quite clear, they must be thrashed. A large party, with noisy and widely circulated newspapers at its back, has all last month been clamouring for war, and many people believe that they will in the end be helped by Mr. Chamberlain to have their way.

For our part we object absolutely and without qualification to the proposed crime. We have no right to slaughter the Boers because we cannot persuade them to adopt our way of thinking as to the manner in which they should reform their electoral laws. We insist on six years' residence before we allow a Boer who settles in England to be naturalised. We have no right to go to war to compel the Boers to give their franchise a year earlier to an Englishman who settles in the Transvaal. We have no right to enforce a policy of reform by the practice of murder.

We are told that pressure is all very well, but that if the Boers refuse to yield to pressure we must necessarily go to war. Nothing of the kind! It is monstrous to argue that we must not press our neighbour to do justice unless we are prepared as the last resort to cut his throat. In certain states of society, no doubt the ultimate appeal to assassination is recognised. But we have grown out of that. The majority of the British public which loathes this threatened war in the Transvaal is opposing it by all the means in its power. But if Mr. Chamberlain, defying the will of the people, has almost plunged into war, no one would dream of proposing to avert that crime by assassinating the Colonial Secretary. Such a murder would outrage the moral sense even of the moralless Jingoes. Yet it would be as logical, and quite as ethical, as the argument that we must declare war against the Boers if all other means of pressure fail in breaking down their resistance. It is as criminal to resort to war to supplement pressure in the case of the Transvaal as it would be to supplement the resources of agitation against the war policy in the last resort by the method of

We have for a month past been listening to a series of disquisitions by would-be Cains as to the duty and profit of killing their brother Abel. Although professedly a Christian nation, we have been calmly discussing the advantages of letting Hell loose in South Africa. On Sundays we have been praying that the Prince of Peace would give us peace in our time, and the other six days we have been working ourselves into the conviction that for our own interest, convenience, prestige and profit we may justifiably suspend the Ten Commandments, and burn, and ravage, and slay all those who differ from us as to the exact number of years' residence necessary to qualify for franchise in a foreign State.

The real topic of the month therefore is not whether or not there will be war in the Transvaal, but how deep, or rather how thin, is the veneer of Christian morality over the mass of aboriginal savagery and blood-lust which has found such violent expression in our press. Are we Christians or only canting cut-throats and whitewashed cannibals? The answer so far is fully plain and decisive. The veneer is very thin. In some places it has disappeared altogether, and before these pages meet the eye of the reader we may be at war with the Transvaal.

A SOUTH AFRICAN CATECHISM.

The numerous telegrams and despatches, reports of conferences and negotiations with their confusing demands and explanations have confused the public mind to such an extent that I probably cannot do better service than to make the story of the Transvaal Trouble as plain and simple as possible. Instead of adopting the same Biblical form of a narrative which I used to tell the story of Dreyfus last number, I throw the whole matter into the form of a catechism, and embody the facts in the shape of question and answer, with the special object of bringing into clear relief the reasons why the Boers are distrustful of our good faith in this matter.

Preamble.

Q. What is the characteristic of our dealings with the

A. Blundering stupidity, slovenly mismanagement, imbecile inconsistency, and continuous bad faith. Q. How can you explain such persistent perversity?

A. Chiefly by fitfulness and preoccupation in our own affairs, which rendered it impossible intelligently to manage other people's business at a distance of six thousand miles. Q. Have we ever done the Boers one good turn in our lives ?

A. Perhaps once, when we annexed their country to save them from Cetewayo, rescuing them from a danger they did not appreciate at a cost which they bitterly resented.

What ill-turns have we done them?

A. We drove them into the wilderness by confiscating their slaves and suppressing their liberties; we made war upon them in Natal in 1840, in the Orange Free State in 1848. We put a price upon the head of their President in 1850, we annexed their country in 1877; made war upon them in 1881, raided them in 1896, and are now threatening them with war in 1899.

Q. Why do the Boers not trust our pledged word?

A. Because their invariable experience is that we always find good excuses for breaking our word when it suits our convenience.

Q. Are there any instances of this? Take only three. By the Sand River Convention of 1852 we bound ourselves not to interfere with their liberties and independence. In 1877 we annexed the country. In 1877, and again in 1878 and in 1879, we promised to give them representative institutions, and kept our word by placing them under military government. In 1884 we annulled the Convention of 1881, and in 1897 revived it in order to claim the suzerainty which we had agreed to abandon.

Q. Why are we now in danger of war? A. Because Mr. Chamberlain and his colleagues have gone back on their own proposals, and no sooner obtained the concessions which they asked for than they changed their ground, sprang new demands upon the Boers, and destroyed all confidence in their good faith.

I.—THE DUTCH OF SOUTH AFRICA.

Q. Who are the Boers?

A. The Boers are the descendants of the first Dutch settlers who colonised South Africa, for at the Cape as elsewhere England was not the first in the field. The Portuguese discovered it. The Dutch colonised it.

Q. How did we come to have anything to do with

A. We took the Cape from the Dutch when Holland became a dependency of France in the great war with Napoleon.

Q. How many of them are there?

A. In South Africa there are at present about 400,000 men, women and children, who speak what is called Cape Dutch or the taal, who are living side by side with about 300,000 white men who speak English.

Q. How are they divided?

A. The majority of the Boers live in the Cape Colony, where there are about a quarter of a million who are known as Cape Dutch; less than 100,000 are in the South African Republic, otherwise known as the Transvaal; 50,000 are in the Orange Free State, which is an entirely independent Republic, while the others are scattered in Natal and Rhodesia.

What kind of people are they?

A. They are the farmers of South Africa, Conservative, prejudiced, religious folk, who have all the toughness of the Dutchmen who three hundred years ago made such a heroic fight against the whole might of the Spaniards.

O. How are they governed? A. In the Cape Colony they are in a majority of the Legislative Assembly, having fifty-three members out of ninety. This majority supports the Schreiner Ministry, in whose hands the government of Cape Colony is constitutionally vested. The Orange Free State is a Republic, and the Boers elect a President and a Parliament which they call the Volksraad. In the Transvaal they also elect a President and a Volksraad. Natal and Rhodesia are the only South African Colonies in which the Dutch are not in possession of the government.

Q. Then what is the British Empire in South Africa? A. The British Empire in South Africa consists of the Cape Colony, Rhodesia, and Natal, an immense tract of country larger than France, Germany, and Italy put together, with a population of nearly four millions of coloured people. The British Government appoints governors of Cape Colony and Natal and the administrator of Rhodesia. The Governor of Cape Colony is also Imperial High Commissioner, who is charged

Q. Emp If C a ho this the coali betw

with

Afric

busir A. is ch which sterli year. of Sou from ( the in ten m

British their o

allow t rost, a

with the general oversight of all the affairs of South

Q. What is the chief importance of South Africa to the Empire?

we

it

ion

eir

the

we

ind

rn-

ind

ich ave

ned

ged ind

tch ape eld. t. vith and vith

000 ape out

ny, are uth al; rely in ive,

of uch

ls.

the

t of

try,

ona

lia-

raal

and

nich

a ? the

t of put

of ints

nis-

y is ged

A. South Africa is the keystone of the Imperial arch. If Cape Town and Simon's Bay were in the hands of a hostile power, communication would be cut between this country and India and Australia, excepting through the Suez Canal. Simon's Bay is indispensable as a coaling station and a place of call on the ocean highway between Great Britain and the Antipodes.

Q. What is the importance of South Africa from a business point of view

A. Apart from its agricultural resources, South Africa is chiefly famous for the diamond mines of Kimberley, which produce an annual yield valued at five millions sterling, and the gold mines of the Transvaal, from which emancipation of their slaves, as no full compensation was paid, and that which was voted was not fairly distributed. They also complained that the British Government, although refusing them the right of self-government, did not defend them against the warlike natives on the frontier.

O. When did this exodus take place. A. In the year 1835. The Boers, travelling northward, settled in the territory which is now the Orange Free State. Others went into Natal, and founded the Government of Natalia. A third section crossed the Vaal River and settled in the territory which is now known as the South African Republic.

Q. How did the pioneers fare:

A. They suffered terrible hardships. One party perished almost to the last man of fever, and under the assegais of the natives. After a long struggle, in which

RAADZAAL

SCENE IN CHURCH SQUARE, PRETORIA.

DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH.

ten millions' sterling worth of gold is extracted every

Q. What part have the Boers played in the settlement of South Africa?

A. They are the pioneer people who spread inland from Cape Colony, settling as farmers and herdsmen in the interior.

II .- THE TREK TO THE TRANSVAAL.

Q. How did the Boers come into the Transvaal?

A. They trekked northward in order to escape from British rule, and in order that they might be able to live their own lives in their own way.

Q. Was British rule in the Cape unjust?

A. The Boers complained that the British refused to allow them a representative government, suppressed the High Court of Justice, abolished their Senate and Landrost, and did away with the official use of the Dutch language in the Cape Colony.

Q. Was that the only ground of complaint?

A. No. They objected strongly to the compulsory very severe fighting took place, Moselekatse, chief of the Matabele, was driven northward into Matabeleland, where he founded a kingdom over which Lobengula, his son, reigned down to our time.

Q. Did the British agree to the founding of the Dutch Republics?

A. No. Although their departure was not opposed, they were still held to be British subjects, and their right to found independent republics was repeatedly denied by the British authorities at the Cape.

Q. When did the first collision take place between the Boers and the British?

A. About 1840. The Boers, having established the Republic of Natalia, in what is now the Colony of Natal, were cut off from the sea by the occupation of Durban. When they refused to abandon their republic they were attacked by a British force, and in 1844 Natal was annexed to the Cape Colony. The Boers then trekked out of the Colony into the Transvaal.

Q. Were they allowed to remain in peace?

Photograph by]

VIEW OF JOHANNESBURG FROM HOSPITAL HILL.

IN. Edwards.

tal the fre ani

pay col COL

the

was mo who non

mai Boe peo

A. No; the British claimed the whole of their territory, and made treaties with the natives which the Boers resented, so that the emigrants into the Transvaal and the Cape Government continued for some years in more or less hostile relations.

Q. How was the Orange Free State tounded? A. In 1848, what is now the Orange Free State was annexed by Sir Harry Smith to the Cape Colony. Boers in the Transvaal under Pretorius invaded the territory, captured Bloemfontein, and after a severe fight were beaten and driven back across the Vaal. The price of £2,000 was placed on the head of Pretorius. But six years later the land was given back to the Boers, who founded the Orange Free State. It has remained ever since an independent republic.

When was the Transvaal Republic founded?

Q. When was the Transvaal Republic founded: A. In the year 1852, when the Sand River Convention was signed, which guaranteed to the Boers the right to manage their own affairs, and to govern themselves according to their own laws without any interference on the part of the British Government, and "that no encroachment shall be made by the said Government to the north of the Vaal River."

III.-HOW THE TRANSVAAL WAS ANNEXED.

How long did this last?

A. Till the year 1877. For twenty-five years the Boers governed themselves according to their own liking, each farmer being more or less an independent sovereign on his own farm, surrounded by, and wielding absolute power over, the natives whose labour he employed, and whose rights as human beings he denied.

Q. Were they interfered with in this time? A. Not much, although Livingstone and other missionaries frequently complained of their treatment of the natives, upon whom the Boers made raids from time to time with the object of securing apprentices. But nothing was done on the part of the British Government to interfere with their rude independence.

Q. Was the State prosperous?

A. The Boers, who hated taxation and the restraint of a central government, were frequently at war among themselves. Their revenue was small and the authority of the State was often non-existent excepting when a commando was needed to protect the farmers against the attacks of the warlike natives on the frontiers.

). When was the Transvaal annexed?

A. In 1877, when there was only 12s. 6d. in the Treasury. The Boers were thought to be in imminent danger of being wiped off the face of the earth by Cete-Treasury. wayo, who desisted from his attack upon the Transvaal when the Union Jack was hoisted by Sir Theophilus Shepstone. It is maintained that the annexation was necessary in order to prevent the massacre of the Boers by the Zulus.

Q. Who was in power at that time?

A. Lord Carnarvon was Colonial Secretary in the Ministry of Mr. Disraeli, whose assent to the annexation was obtained the more readily because it seemed to promise the realisation of his ideal of the Federation of South Africa.

Q. Did the Boers acquiesce in the annexation of their republic i

A. At first there was no active resistance, although the chiefs of both parties of Boers protested against the loss of their independence, and Kruger took the lead in getting up a petition against the annexation.

Q. What promises were made by England on the annexation of the Transvaal?

A. Shepstone promised that they would be allowed complete self-government in their own affairs, and that their own laws would remain unaltered.

Q. How was this promise kept?
A. It was not kept at all. No steps whatever were taken to establish self-government in the Transvaal, for the good and sufficient reason that the first act of a freely-elected Volksraad would have been to annul the annexation and to re-assert their independence.

Q. Was that the only cause of discontent?

A. No. The British Government insisted upon the payment of taxes, which had always been irregularly collected in the Transvaal, and the government of the country was carried on by a man whose high-handed methods provoked bitter resentment amongst the Boers.

Q. Were any other promises made to the Boers?

A. Yes; Sir Michael Hicks-Beach in 1879 promised them a complete system of representative self-government.

to

t of ong rity n a the

the etevaal ilus was the

the tion of their the loss ting the

were

Q. What was done to fulfil this promise?

A. Nothing. Sir Garnet Wolseley, now Lord Wolseley, was sent out as governor, who declared that the Transvaal would remain English "as long as the sun and moon endured," but he did not establish anything excepting an executive council and assembly, none of whose members were elected, and all of whom were nominees of the British Government.

IV .- WHY IT WAS GIVEN BACK.

O. How long did this last?

A. Until. 1880, when Sir Owen Lanyon, a military martinet, was governor. His method of rule irritated the Boers, and it is alleged that the license of his soldiers gave rise to the bitterest resentment on the part of the people whose women were interfered with.

Q. Were any steps taken to inform the British Government of this discontent?

A. Yes. Kruger, Joubert, and Pretorius carried to England an immense petition protesting against the annexation, and they assured Sir Michael Hicks-Beach that the annexation had been made under the mistake that the majority of the people desired it. Things did not improve under the annexation, and they threatened that if their country was not given back to them they would again trek still further north to a country where they would be allowed to govern themselves in their own way.

Q. What was the reply to this?

A. The Colonial Secretary told them that if they would only return home and wait patiently all their grievances would be redressed. They replied that nothing but independence would satisfy the Boers. They returned home, but their grievances were not redressed, their liberties were not restored, and the country was placed under martial law.

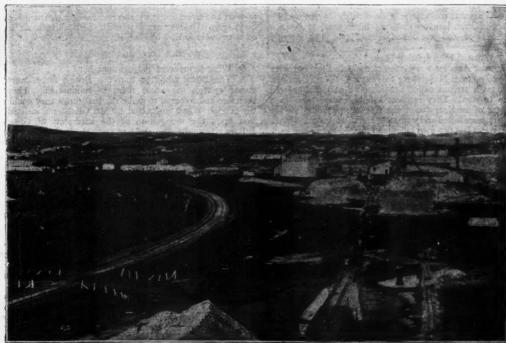

Q. When did this come to a head?

A. In December, 1879, when the Boers, weary of waiting for the fulfilment of the promises made to them by the British Government, but never kept, and irritated by the overbearing manner of the English who had settled in their towns, held a mass meeting, and proclaimed that they had never been the subjects of the Queen, and never intended to be, that the time for memorials had passed, and that they would henceforth govern themselves.

Q. Was this a revolt against the Empire?

A. No; for in their declaration they declared their readiness to enter into a confederation with the other Colonies and States in South Africa, and to adopt a native policy in accordance with that of the other Colonies

Q. How did we respond to that declaration?

Photograph by]

" NABOTH'S VINEYARD ": VIEW OF THE WITWATERSRAND MINES,

[N. Edwards.

A. By arresting Mr. Pretorius, the leader of the Boers, on a charge of high treason, and clapping him

Q. Was Mr. Gladstone not then in power?

A. No; the revolt of the Boers under Pretorius took place in the last days of the Ministry of Lord Beaconsfield.

Q. What effect did Mr. Gladstone's return to power have upon the question?

A. Only this, that believing the Liberals were sincere in their denunciation of the annexation, the Boers decided to suspend hostilities, and to make an appeal once more to England in the person of its new Prime Minister.
Q. What di l Mr. Gladstone reply?
A. He answered that it was impossible now to consider the matter as if it were presented for the first time, and that the Queen could not be advised to relinquish her sovereignty over the Transvaal.

Q. What followed?

A. For some months the Boers made no sign, and remained in sullen disaffection, which might have lasted for some time had not the Government decided rigorously to collect the taxes. The attempt led to armed resistance, and on December 16th, 1880, the Boers proclaimed the South African Republic, and appointed a triumvirate consisting of Kruger, Joubert and Pretorius.

Q. What did the Boers say in defence of their action?

A. They said they did not wish for war, and would only fight in self-defence. They had never been subjects of the Queen, and never would be. They had no desire to shed blood, but should it come so far they would defend themselves with the knowledge that they were fighting for the honour of Her Majesty, for they fought for the sanctity of treaties sworn by her, but broken by

Q. What was the answer of the British Government? A. Sir Owen Lanyon declared the country to be in a state of siege, and proclaimed martial law. The struggle had begun.

When did the fighting begin?

Q. When did the fighting begin:
A. Four days later 250 men of the 94th regiment were ordered up from Middleburg to Pretoria. The Boers met them at a stream called Bronkhorst Spruit, and ordered them to stop. They refused, a fight ensued, and in a quarter of an hour 2:0 of the English, including all the officers, were killed and wounded, and the rest surrendered. The Boers lost two men killed and five wounded, and each of our soldiers received on an average five wounds.

Q. What was the Boer plan of campaign?

The whole country rose and blockaded the English garrisons in all the towns, while Sir Owen Lanyon, shut up in Pretoria, awaited the arrival of Sir George Colley, who with 1,400 men advanced from Natal to the relief of the English garrisons. Joubert, with a much larger force, occupied Laing's Nek—a pass through which Colley had to pass in advancing from Natal into the Transvaal.

Q. What battles were fought?

A. On the 28th January Sir George Colley attacked the Boers at Laing's Nek, and was beaten back with a loss of 200 killed and wounded. The Boers, fighting behind shelter, lost only 24 men. On the 8th February. Sir George Colley attacked again on the Ingogo Heights. He was again beaten back with a loss of 150 men, and left his wounded in the hands of the Boers.

Q. Was no attempt made to stop fighting?

A. Yes. President Brand of the Orange Free State offered his services as mediator before the first fight at Laing's Nek, and four days after the reverse at Ingogo

Kruger wrote to General Colley saying he had no wish to quarrel with the Imperial Government, and offered to submit the claims of the Boers to a Royal Commission of Inquiry, and to allow all the besieged garrisons to withdraw with the honours of war. General Colley insisted in reply that all armed opposition should ceasebefore the Commission of Inquiry was appointed. He gave them forty-eight hours in which to lay down their arms, but the letter did not reach them until after the time of grace had expired.

O. Then was the fighting resumed? A. Yes; the Orange Free State showed signs of joining the Transvaal, and Sir George Colley determined to strike a decisive blow without more delay. On the 26th February he led a force of 500 men up the back of Majuba Hill, which commanded the Boer position. The ascent was made at night, and only at sunrise did the Boers discover that the British were in their rear. Instead of evacuating their position, the Boers climbed up the face of the hill under cover of a continuous fire. They gained the crest of the hill, and drove the British in headlong flight from the position. General Colley was shot dead; and, when the battle was over, 280 out of 500 men engaged were killed and wounded. Such was the battle of Majuba Hill.

O. What followed?
A. Sir Evelyn Wood, with an army of 5,000 men, prepared to advance into the Transvaal, and General Roberts, with a large force, was sent out from England to crush the resistance of the men who had beaten Colley, but before he arrived peace had been made.

Q. How was the peace arranged?

A. Mr. Gladstone, finding that the Boers were sufficiently in earnest about their independence to kill and bekilled in defence of their country, and having no desire to exert any direct authority over the Transvaal, instructed. Sir Evelyn Wood to negotiate with the Boer triumvirate so as to avoid further bloodshed.

V.—THE CONVENTION OF 1881.

Q. What terms were insisted upon?

A. The Boers admitted that the British forces were strong enough to reduce them to submission. therefore endeavoured to make the best terms they could. Sir Evelyn Wood, instructed by Mr. Gladstone, insisted first upon the recognition of the suzerainty of Great Britain; secondly, the right to control all their foreign relations; thirdly, the right to keep a British Resident at the capital, with authority to call in troops if need should arise to enforce the provisions of the Convention; fourthly, that due provision should be made for the protection of the natives; fifthly, that the Boers should not exclude any British subjects from entering their territory. On these terms peace was made, and subject to these conditions the Boers were allowed to have their country back again.
Q. Was this a surrender after defeat?

A. It was so represented by the opponents of the Government; but Mr. Chamberlain, who was at that time a member of the Government, maintains to this day that it was a magnanimous act, justified by the fact that the Transvaal had been annexed under a misapprehension, and that at the time when the settlement was arrived at, the Boer army was at the mercy of the British troops, and Sir Evelyn Wood only waited orders to go in and destroy it. Lord Randolph Churchill also, after his visit to South Africa, entirely agreed in the wisdom of the policy which led to the conclusion of the Convention of 1881.

Q. A. chief Free as an Britis imagi army Q. Ã.

and k blood which Wood super milita overw have

WANTED—RESERVES.

JOHN BULL: "Help! Help! or I'm undone."

THE BULLY.

CHAMBERLAIN: "If you don't give me half of your hamper you must fight." KRUGER: "Well, I'll give you half if I must."
CHAMBERLAIN: "Give me the whole hamper now, or you must fight,"

AN IRISH VIEW OF THE SITUATION.

(From the " Weekly Freeman.")

Q. Did the Boers not misunderstand our action in this matter?

A. Some of them did, no doub; but Kruger and the chief men, not only in the Transvaal but also in the Free State and Cape Colony, regarded it in its true light as an act of magnanimity which reflected glory upon the British name? But the more ignorant Boers, who imagined that they had defeated the whole of the British army at Majuba Hill, misunderstood, no doubt.

Q. Could this have been prevented?

A. Only if we had insisted upon attacking the Boers, and killing a sufficient number of them to emphasise by bloodshed an admission of our superiority in strength which their leaders made frankly enough to Sir Evelyn Wood. Battles are fought to compel admissions of superiority; and, as the Boers admitted that from a military point of view they had no chance against the overwhelming numbers of England, bloodshed would have been wanton massacre.

Q. What was the attitude of the English public?

A. Lord Salisbury and the Opposition attacked the Convention, and declared that it was certain to be misunderstood. Lord Salisbury contended that without some signal demonstration of British strength, the nature of which he did not explain, a false impression would gain ground in Africa from which much trouble would come hereafter.

Q. How was he answered?

A. The answer made by Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Chamberlain, Lord Selborne, and others, was that it would have been criminal to have gone on fighting merely to give the Boers an object lesson in what was sufficiently obvious already—namely, the fact that a small republic could not hold its own in arms against the British Empire. They also laid stress on the fact that the Boers had materially modified their demands, and had consented to recognise the suzerainty of Her Majesty.

Q. What is suzerainty?

A. Suzerainty is sovereignty limited to certain specified cases in which the superior Power reserves its sovereign to to to ey se le ir k n. d. r. rights. In all matters not reserved the dependent State is free to act as it likes.

Q. What subjects are reserved in the Convention of 1881 ?

A. First, a British representative was to be appointed, with power to protect the persons and property of the natives, to act as the representative of the Transvaal between the Boers and the native tribes outside their frontiers, and generally to enforce the provisions of the Convention. Secondly, we had a right to move troops through the Transvaal in time of war. Thirdly, we reserved the entire control of the foreign relations of the Transvaal, which was to carry on all its diplomatic inter-course through Her Majesty's diplomatic and consular offices abroad. Fourthly, no law concerning the interests of the natives could be passed without the consent of the

Q. Were any other conditions imposed upon the Boers? A. They were required to undertake that anybody might enter into the Transvaal State, travel, settle, own property, and carry on business in the State without being subject to any taxes, whether general or local, other than those imposed upon Transvaal citizens; no differential or prohibitive duties were to be imposed upon British goods; all white persons domiciled in the Transvaal, who were registered within twelve months of the conclusion of the Convention, were to be exempt from compulsory military service; no slavery or apprenticeship partaking of slavery was to be tolerated. Lastly, there was to be complete freedom of religion, and protection for all denominations.

Q. How was the suzerainty regarded in England?
A. The Liberals exaggerated its importance. Lord Northbrook said that it made the Queen the suzerain or paramount power over the Transvaal in the same way in which she was paramount over the native Indian states. Lord Salisbury, on the other hand, roundly denied that there was an atom of suzerainty established by the Convention, and he justified this assertion by declaring that by the Convention all interference in the internal affairs of the Transvaal was absolutely forbidden.

Q. How was it accepted by the Boers? A. On August 3rd, 1881, the Convention was signed by Kruger, Joubert and Pretorius, who agreed to all the conditions, reservations and limitations under which selfgovernment was restored to the inhabitants of the Transvaal territory subject to the suzerainty of Her Majesty.

VI.-THE CONVENTION OF LONDON, 1884.

Q. How did the Convention work?

A. Not well. It was ratified, and an attempt was made to carry it out in the years 1882 and 1883, but at the end of 1883 Paul Kruger, Du Toit and Smit came to London to plead that the Convention was not working well, and to ask that it should be modified.

What did they allege against it?

A. They stated that the Convention of 1881 contained various inconvenient provisions, and imposed burdens and obligations from which they wished to be relieved, and further that they desired to have a modification of the South-Western Boundaries, in order to promote the peace and good order of the Transvaal.

Q. Who was Colonial Minister at that time?

A. Lord Derby, and as England was just then at the beginning of the Soudan War little interest was taken in the Transvaal question. Lord Derby admitted the justice of the delegates' complaint, and consented to modify the Convention to meet their wishes.

Q. How was it modified?

A. It was modified by the substitution of an entirely new Convention, known as the London Convention of 1884 for the Convention of 1881, and this new Convention continues to govern our relations with the Transvaal to

Q. What were the chief changes made by the Convention of 1884?

A. First and foremost, all reference to the suzerainty of the Queen was dropped. This was done after due deliberation by Lord Derby, who stated in the House of Lords: "We have abstained from using the word suzerainty because it is not capable of legal definition, and because it seemed a word which was likely to lead to misconception and misunderstanding."

Q. In what position did the Convention place the Transvaal State

A. It converted it from the Transvaal State, subject to the suzerainty and control of the British Government, into the South African Republic, with all the rights and privileges of an independent state, such as the Orange Free State, with one exception.

Q. What was that exception?

A. The South African Republic, although allowed to be a sovereign independent state in all matters that con-cerned the management of its own affairs, was not permitted to be an international sovereign state by Article 4, which reserved to the British Government the right to veto all treaties made by the Republic with foreign states or tribes.

Q. What is the text of Article 4? A. Article 4 runs as follows:—"The South African Republic will conclude no treaty or engagement with any State or nation other than the Orange Free State, nor with any native tribe to the eastward or westward of the Republic, until the same has been approved by Her Majesty the Queen. Such approval shall be held to have been granted if Her Majesty's Government shall not within six months after receiving a copy of such treaty (which shall be delivered to them immediately upon its completion) have notified that the conclusion of such treaty is in conflict with the interests of Great Britain or any of Her Majesty's possessions in South Africa.

Q. Wherein did this differ from the old stipulation in the Convention of 1881?

A. In the Convention of 1881 the Transvaal State had to conduct all its foreign affairs through British ambassadors and consuls. After the Convention of 1884 the South African Republic was free to appoint its ambassadors and consuls, and conduct all its foreign affairs directly through them without any reference to Great Britain. In its foreign affairs, as in its domestic government, the South African Republic became as free as the Orange Free State, subject only to the right of veto upon such treaties as we considered were in conflict with the interests of Great Britain or any of Her Majesty's possessions in South Africa.

Q. Is there any contemporary testimony as to the significance of this change?

A. Yes. Lord Derby, who was Secretary of State for the Colonies, notified to the Cape Government on February 17th that the Convention had been signed, and furnished them with the following explanation of the alteration that was made in the statutes of the republic :-

There will be the same complete internal independence in the Transvaal as in the Orange Free State. The conduct and control of diplomatic intercourse with foreign governments is conceded. The Queen's final approval of treaties is reserved. The delegates appear v Govern

Q. A diploma A. M to Sir which l which i

Q. H A. W the que general the lim trade ro dangere which Norther

Q. W A. Th which g Q. H. A. TI miners f great in mushroc

Q. Ho A. W the Pall that, wh. Convent discovere the Engl tion of w Q. WI A. Bei

we recog found as soon as them. S hands of as compe of diamo Q. WI

Ã. It v the land, the dispu mines. We had

We gave We kept What cou nem of b taught the staring us good as l neddle no ould mak intolerable ad told Fields, and and we jus rotectors having v

Q. Hov A. The began to 1 appear well satisfied, and a cordial feeling exists between the two

Q. After the signature of the Convention what was the diplomatic status of the South African Republic

A. Mr. Chamberlain supplies the answer in his despatch to Sir Hercules Robinson on December 31st, 1895, in which he describes the Transvaal as "a foreign State which is in friendly treaty relations with Great Britain."

Q. How did the British public receive the change in the Convention?

rely

of

tion l to

en-nty due

e of

ord

ion,

d to

the

t to

ent,

and nge

l to

on-

not

by

the

vith

Re-

any nor

the

Her

ave

not eaty

its uch

or in in had oas-

the bas-airs

reat

ern-

the

pon

the ses-

the

tate

on ned.

of of

the

the. ntrol ded.

ates

A. With indifference. In the whole Session of 1884 the question was never discussed in Parliament. general feeling was that we had gained by strictly defining the limits of the Transvaal territory so as to secure a trade route through Bechuanaland, which had been endangered by Boer filibusters, who had founded Republics which threatened to exclude Great Britain from the Northern territories now known as Rhodesia.

VII .-- NABOTH'S VINEYARD

Q. What new fact changed the whole situation?

A. The discovery of the goldfield of the Rand, from which gold of the value of ten millions sterling per annum is now being extracted.

. How did this affect the situation?

A. The goldfield, like a magnet, attracted adventurous miners from all parts of the world, with the result that a great industrial city, Johannesburg, sprang up like a mushroom in the midst of the pastoral Republic.

O. How was this regarded by the Boers? A. With unconcealed alarm. In December, 1883, I, in the Pall Mall Gazette, warned the Transvaal delegates that, whatever stipulations they might make, or whatever Convention they might conclude, if a great goldneld were discovered in their Republic it would inevitably be seized by the English. This warning was emphasised by the recollection of what had happened in relation to the diamond fields.

Q. What did happen there? A. Before the diamonds were discovered at Kimberley we recognised the territory in which they were afterwards found as part and parcel of the Orange Free State. As soon as the diamonds were discovered we took it from them. Such a treasure was too valuable to be left in the hands of the Boers. We afterwards paid them £100,000 as compensation for territory producing £5,000,000 worth of diamonds every year. Q. What was the pretext for this seizure?

A. It was discovered that a native chief had claims to the land, and so we took up his cause, and at the end of the dispute found ourselves in possession of the diamond mines. Mr. Froude says :-

We had gone in as the champions of the oppressed Waterboer. We gave Waterboer and his Griquas a tenth of the territory. We kept the rest, and all that was valuable, for ourselves. What could the Dutch have done worse? We have accused them of breaking their engagements with us, and it was we who taught them the lesson. A treaty but a few months old was staring us in the face. Even if Waterboer's title had been as good as his friends pretended, we had pledged ourselves to meddle no more in such matters, in language as plain as words could make it. Our conduct would have been less entirely intolerable if we had rested simply on superior strength—if we ad told the Boers simply that we must have the Diamond Fields, and intended to take them. But we poisoned the wound, and we justified our action by posing before the world as the protectors of the rights of native tribes, whom we accuse them of having wronged.

Q. How did this affect the conduct of the Boers?

The moment gold was discovered, and the miners began to pour into the Transvaal, Kruger and the older

Boers were very much alarmed, and began to think of safeguards to defend their Republic against the incursion of the foreigners. They raised successively the period necessary to qualify for the franchise until it stood at fourteen years, and justified themselves in so doing on the ground that it was necessary to give the mixed multi-tude at Johannesburg time to settle, and to prevent the original citizens from being swamped.

VIII.-THE OUTLANDERS.

O. Who are the Outlanders?

A. The Outlanders are simply people from outside the Transvaal who have been attracted to the country in the hope of making fortunes by the discovery of the gold Uitlander simply means foreigner, and the term is applied to all persons who are not born Boers of the Transvaal. It covers Cape Colonists as well as Englishmen, Germans, Poles and Americans.

Q. What is the character of the Outlanders?
A. At first Johannesburg was like every other mining camp, but despite the somewhat archaic government of the Boers, and the absence of any good municipal system, it developed into an orderly industrial community with much greater rapidity than other mining camps in the Western states of America. Publicans and harlots were not wanting, and gambling saloons abounded, but that the Outlanders are on the whole fairly well behaved is proved by the fact that there have been fewer homicides in Johannesburg in the last ten years than used to take place in Cripple Creek in a single winter.

Q. To what may this be attributed?

A. To various causes, one of which is the great preponderance of Jews. Johannesburg is a new Jerusalem, which is not paved but reefed with gold, and the Jews are by no means so given to the use of the revolver and bowie knife as were the argonauts of 1849 in California.

Q. What was the effect upon the Boers?

A. The sudden influx of wealth demoralised some of them, and led to a good deal of corruption among the governing men. The pastoral Boer in the distant uplands was very little affected by the influx of wealth excepting when it provided a good market for his produce. The simple and primitive Boer, who suddenly found himself in the control of the richest State in South Africa, became the prey of a flock of harpies who flocked from Holland, Germany, and this country. Inexperienced, suspicious, and obstinate, he had unscrupulous self-interested speculators at his elbow, and the two had absolute control over the heterogeneous community whose industry made Johannesburg the El Dorado of the world.

Q. Did not the Boers promise to give the new-comers equal civil rights to those enjoyed by the old Boers?

A. Before the conclusion of the Convention of 1881, in answer to a question from Sir Evelyn Wood the Boers stated that they intended to treat the new-comers like their own people, and to give them equal rights. This was the expression of an intention honestly entertained at that time; but it was not incorporated in the Convention, and legally it cannot be said to be binding upon the Boers.

O. But is it not morally binding upon them?

A. Certainly; and President Kruger, in replying to the accusation brought against him of breaking his word, replied by stating that he was perfectly willing to give the new-comers equal rights if they would undertake their fair share of the burdens of state. Every Boer who has the franchise is liable to be impressed for compulsory military service whenever a native war takes place. The new-comers objected to serve in war; and if they would not fight, said President Kruger, neither should they vote.

Q. Is that the only answer?

A. No; there are two other replies-first, that no one could have foreseen in 1881 the fact that a horde of foreigners would swoop down into the veldt in number exceeding the original inhabitants. A man may be willing to allow his neighbours to walk through his park, but if a whole trainful of hop-pickers were to establish themselves in permanence under his drawing-room windows, it would be hard lines if he were compelled to let them stop there merely because he had said years before he would not object to any one passing through his grounds. Secondly, President Kruger would deny that to insist upon fourteen years' residence before giving the newcomers the franchise was incompatible with the principle of equal rights, for no Boer was allowed to have the franchise until he had lived fifteen years in the Republic. Every state has a right to fix the period of residence necessary to naturalise foreigners as citizens.

Q. Did the British Government object to the increased restrictions upon granting the franchise?

A. Never once was any protest made, nor did any one ever pretend that the British Government had any right to be consulted in the matter.

Q. What were the grievances of the Outlanders?

A. The grievances of the Outlanders were in chief that they were taxed without having any representation in the Volksraad, that they were governed by men who had no practical acquaintance with the needs of a modern industrial community, and whose one ideal was to govern Johannesburg on principles deduced from the Book of Leviticus. Trade was hampered; they alleged that the police was inefficient and corrupt, justice was only administered in the Dutch language, and generally there were the inevitable incidents of friction which must arise when a modern community of financiers is placed under the control of representatives of herdsmen and shepherds.

Q. In what proportion do the Outlanders stand to the Boers?

A. The exact figures are not known, but it was stated by President Kruger at the Bloemfontein Conference that he had only 30,000 burghers in the Transvaal, and that if the Outlanders were enfranchised they would add some 60,000 to 70,000 voters to the electoral roll. We may say that there were at least two Outlanders to one Boer, and it was from the unenfranchised Outlanders that the Transvaal Treasury drew three-quarters of its revenue.

IX.—THE ACTION OF MR. RHODES.

O. Was anything done to redress the grievances of the

A. In 1894 Lord Loch, then High Commissioner, went down to Johannesburg. He made sympathetic speeches to the Outlanders, and asked them with a significance which he declares was entirely misunderstood whether they had any arms. This was taken by the Outlander community as a hint that while they trusted in the British Government they would do well to keep their powder dry and have plenty of it.

Q. What followed Lord Loch's visit?

A. A continually increasing agitation on the part of the Outlanders, which came at last to be directed against the existence of the Transvaal Government. Arms were procured in small quantities, and when a period of depression arrived discontent seemed likely to ripen into armed insurrection.

Q. Was this not got up by Mr. Rhodes in his own interests i

A. Not at all—quite the contrary. Mr. Rhodes was then working hand in glove with Mr. Hofmeyr and the Dutch majority in Case Colony. He deprecated forcing the Outlanders' grievances to the front, lest in should lead to an agitation that would force the Dutch party, upon which he chiefly relied, into hostility to the Imperial policy which he was pursuing. His efforts were directed to allaying, rather than exciting, the discontent in Johannesburg.

O. Did he persist in this policy to the end? A. No. After the successful occupation of Matabele land the agitation of the Outlanders became more acute, and Mr. Rhodes was frankly warned that if he did not effectively support their demands for reform they would make a revolution in Johannesburg without his aid, and establish an anti-British and anti-Boer republic-anti-British because they had been left in the lurch by the Imperial authorities; and the movement would fall into the hands of Americans, "Sydney Bulletin Australians," Germans, and anti-Imperialists.

Q. What did Rhodes do?

A. Mr. Rhodes decided to finance the projected insurrection in Johannesburg. He contributed liberally to the campaign funds, assisted the conspirators in buying guns, and acted as their intermediary with Mr. Chamberlain and the Colonial Office.

X .- THE COMPLICITY OF MR. CHAMBERLAIN.

Q. What was done in that direction?

A. As soon as Mr. Rhodes decided upon action, he sent a trusted agent to England with instructions to inform Mr. Chamberlain and the Colonial Office that the situation had become acute, and to ask permission to take over and control Bechuanaland in order that he might be able to have a jumping-off place from which to support the anticipated insurrection in the Transvaul with the armed force with which ultimately the Raid was made.

Q. Was this communication made to Mr. Chamb r-

lain?

A. Yes; Mr. Rhodes's instructions were duly carried out. His emissary visited the Colonial Office and discharged his mission, and, after leaving the Colonial Office, telegraphed to Mr. Rhodes the substance of his

Q. Was this request granted?

A. Not immediately; but after renewed and more urgent representations the "jumping-off place" was made over on some pretext of railway construction, and the control of the police made over to Mr. Rhodes, who wanted them to support the insurrection from the out

Q. Was this the only communication which took place between Mr. Rhodes and the Colonial Office?

A. Quite the contrary. From that time down to the eve of the Raid constant communication was kept up between the agents of Mr. Rhodes in London and Mr. Chamberlain and his officials at the Colonial Office. Everything that was done in South Africa, except the financing of the insurrection, was cabled to London and communicated to the Colonial Office. The fact that this was done was then cabled back to Cape Colony with information as to the wishes of the Colonial authorities.

Q. Has this been denied?

A. Yes, by Mr. Chamberlain, of course. But so far as the cables between London and the Cape have been published they confirm the accuracy of this statement, and es was er and ecated lest it Dutch to the s were is own tabeleacute, iid not would d, and —antiby the all into insurto the g guns, berlain

on, he ons to hat the hich to unsvail carried ce and colonial of his more was on, and es, who he out to the tept up nd Mr. Office. ept the on and hat this ny with orities.

o far as en pubent, and the persistent, deliberate suppression of the rest of the cables tells its own tale.

O. Did the Colonial Office dissuade Mr. Rhodes from his conspiracy?

A. On the contrary. After advising him at first "not to let his fireworks off too soon," the advices which Mr. Rhodes received from London by cable from his friends, who were in confidential communication with the Colonial Office, were of an encouraging but somewhat embarrassing nature.

What do you mean by embarrassing?

A. I refer to the cablegram which Mr. Rhodes received from a trusted friend in London who, after an interview at the Colonial Office, telegraphed to Mr. Rhodes that the expedition that went to Johannesburg in support of the insurrection must go in under the Union Jack, for at that time Mr. Chamberlain feared that the insurrection might be made to the profit of Mr. Rhodes rather than to the profit of the British Empire.

Q. Was this the only message they received from the confidential emissaries in communication with the Colonial Office?

A. No. It was after a visit to the Colonial Office and long confidential conversations with the officials there that the famous telegrams were sent out urging the conspirators to "hurry up" owing to the threatening aspect of affairs about Venezuela.

Q. What was the effect upon Mr. Rhodes of these communications from his agents who were in communication with the Colonial Office?

A. He was convinced that Mr. Chamberlain knew and approved of the policy of supporting the insurrection in Johannesburg, nor could anyone who was in Mr. Rhodes's position, and who knew the cablegrams which he had sent and received, have come to any other conclusion.

Q. What was done in South Africa?
A. Firmly believing that Mr. Chamberlain and the Colonial Office knew and approved of the proposed overthrow of Paul Kruger's government, which was to take place under the Union Jack, and reduce the Transvaal to the status of a British Colony, Mr. Rhodes ordered Dr. Jameson to take up a position in Bechuanaland with the mounted troops and mounted police, from whence he would be in readiness to ride in on receiving instructions from the High Commissioner to restore order and maintain peace in the interests of the British Empire and of the Transvaal.

Q. How did Jameson execute his instructions?

A. Dr. Jameson had great difficulty in inducing the British officers to cross the frontier. He overcame their scruples by assuring them that Mr. Chamberlain was "in the know," and that their contemplated action was approved by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. Under this assurance they consented to obey his orders in an enterprise which seemed to them of very doubtful legality.

XI.-THE JAMESON RAID.

Q. How fared the conspiracy in Johannesburg? A. The Outlanders, unused to arms, unfamiliar with the arts of the conspirator, were in no very warlike mood. They preferred to try what agitation would produce, backed by an attitude of menace pointing to an ultimate insurrection. The insurrection hung fire.

What set it off?

A. Mr. Rhodes was goaded by the "Hurry up" cablegrams from his agents who were in communication with the Colonial Office, and Dr. Jameson was chafing at the continual postponement of the insurrection. Instead of waiting, according to the plan arranged by Mr. Rhodes and communicated by his agents to the Colonial Office, for the outbreak of the insurrection when the High Commissioner would order the troops to cross the frontier, Dr. Jameson put the cart before the horse, and fearing that the insurrection would not come off unless. he were there to give it a helping hand, he rode across the frontier in the famous raid.

Q. What was the result?

A. Dr. Jameson "upset the apple-cart," and the High Commissioner repudiated him and forbade any one to help him. The Outlanders, after a more or less convulsive flurry of armament, stood confused, while Dr. Jameson and his men were surrounded and captured by the Boers at Dornkoop.

Q. What followed

A. The leaders of the abortive movement were arrested, tried for treason, and sentenced to death, the sentence being subsequently commuted for a heavy money fine. Jameson and his men were sent home, and the officers were deprived of their commissions and sent to prison for breaking into a foreign State with which Her Majesty was in friendly treaty relations.

Q. What happened to Mr. Rhodes?

A. He resigned office as Prime Minister of the Cape and returned to England. A bogus inquiry was insti-tuted by a South African Committee of the House of Commons, which, after carefully suppressing all the evidence it could, and refusing to hear the most important witness, drew up a report whitewashing Mr. Chamberlain and censuring Mr. Rhodes, who, however, was not removed from the Privy Council, and whose character was immediately publicly vindicated by Mr. Chamberlain in Parliament as a man against whose honour nothing had been proved.

Q. What was the effect in South Africa?

A. The Boers redoubled their precautions against attacks by the Outlanders or their allies upon their independence. They passed fresh restrictive legislation and increased their armaments, and made up their minds never to trust Mr. Chamberlain.

XII.—SIR ALFRED MILNER AND THE OUTLANDERS.

Q. Who succeeded Lord Rosmead as High Commissioner?

A. Sir Alfred Milner, who arrived at Cape Town in 1897, and who remained in office for a couple of years without making any trouble, while continually remonstrating with the Boers, and endeavouring to induce them to remedy the grievances of the Outlanders.

Q. What stood in the way of reform? A. The deep rooted suspicion of Mr. Chamberlain felt by President Kruger and the Boers. His methods of negotiation were by no means calculated to win their

Q. How did the present trouble begin?

A. The discontent of the Outlanders led them to draw up petitions to the Queen. The first was not accepted, but the second was received by Sir Alfred Milner, and forwarded to the Colonial Office, with a strong despatch setting forth the hardships of the position of the Outlanders in the Transvaal. He declared that they were political helots, taxed without being represented, and denied the privileges of citizenship in the State, which derived three-fourths of its revenue from their industry.

Q. Were there any special causes which tended to intensify the discontent of the Outlanders?

A. Yes. A man, Edgar, of somewhat doubtful character, was shot by the police, who broke into his house to arrest him for an alleged assault. The policeman pleaded that he Court leyan person murde Q. \\ \tilde{A}.

was no -wher perpeti while : crimin escape cases appear best di against Q. V in ansv announ evil and to give He pre that th landers Q. V Ã. V franchis it was r

goldfiel

There w

impossi

A. A

Q. W A. H fontein on the should 1 years in

Q. W A. H 60,000 years' fr had also burghers nothing. Q. Di A. Ye a franch the futur that it se gave wi proposal Q. W

Ã. Af introduc the sche but owin and the the Tran the Bill, Chamber retrospec without a

Q. Ho A. Mr satisfacti that he fired in self-defence, and he was acquitted by the Court which tried the case. A Mrs. Applebee, a Wesleyan magistrate's wife, was killed by some unknown person, and no one was brought to justice for the murder.

Q. What did these cases prove?

al

he

he

nd.

SS

he gh

to 11-

r.

by

r-

he vy

nd

nt

ch

pe

ti-

se:

ne

nt

rot

er

rur

st ir

n

ir

s-

717 of ly

nlt

of ir

d, ď

h

re

h

to

0

A. That the administration of justice in the Transvaal was not perfect, and that in Johannesburg, as in Rangoon -where recently, although the most horrible outrage was perpetrated by six British soldiers upon a native woman while about a dozen others looked on, not one of the criminals was brought to justice--criminals sometimes escape unhanged. The fact that there were only two cases of this nature, which constantly appear and reappear, like stage soldiers, in all the despatches, is the best disproof of the sweeping allegations usually brought against the government of the Transvaal.

Q. What course did Sir Alfred Milner propose to take in answer to the petition?

A. After much consideration the High Commissioner announced that the best way to strike at the root of the evil and to remedy the grievances of the Outlanders was to give them an opportunity to remedy them themselves. He proposed therefore to demand from the Transvaal that they should pass a Reform Bill admitting the Outlanders in larger numbers to the electoral roll.

Q. What was the franchise in the Transvaal? A. When the Convention of 1881 was concluded the franchise was given after one year's residence. In 1882 it was raised to five years, and after the discovery of the goldfields it was still further raised to fourteen years. There were many restrictions which rendered it practically impossible for the Outlanders to secure a vote.

XIII.-THE CONCESSIONS OF MR. KRUGER.

). What was Sir Alfred Milner's first move?

A. He met President Kruger in conference at Bloemfontein in May and proposed to him that the restrictions on the franchise should be removed, and that a vote should be given to every Outlander who had lived for five years in the Republic.

What was President Kruger's reply?

A. He said that as there were only 30,000 Boers and 60,000 or 70,000 Outlanders, he could not grant the five years' franchise without swamping his own people. He had also, he said, to consider the Volksraad, and also the burghers, and he could not give away everything for

O. Did President Kruger propose anything? A. Yes. After much discussion, he offered to give a franchise of nine years retrospective and seven years in the future, but he hampered it with so many conditions that it seemed as if he took away with one hand what he gave with the other. Sir Alfred Milner rejected his proposals, and the Conference broke up.

. What was the next step in the negotiations? A. After Mr. Kruger returned to the Transvaal, he introduced a Reform Bill into the Volksraad embodying the scheme which he had submitted to Sir Alfred Milner, but owing to the representations made by Mr. Schreiner and the Cape Dutch, strongly supported by the friends of the Transvaal in this country, the Volksraad transformed the Bill, knocked out all the limitations to which Mr. Chamberlain had objected, and instead of the nine years' retrospective franchise, granted seven years all round without any hampering restrictions. . How was this received?

A. Mr. Chamberlain declared that it was a matter of satisfaction to the Government that the Volksraad had granted a seven years' franchise, which was an advance upon previous concessions, and left only a difference of two years between Sir Alfred Milner's original proposal and what had been conceded. It was therefore a basis of settlement, and he proposed a joint inquiry to examine on the spot how the measure would be likely to work in order to ascertain whether it would give the Outlanders an immediate and reasonable share of representation.

Q. How was this proposal received by Mr. Kruger? A. Some conversation took place between Mr. Conyngham Greene, the British Agent, and Mr. Smuts, the State Attorney, who believed that the Government would be willing to give up their claim to interfere on the ground of the suzerainty asserted in the Preamble of the Convention of 1881 if the Transvaal would concede the five years' franchise. They therefore, instead of at once accepting a Commission of Inquiry into the seven years' proposal, made an alternative proposal to the effect that they would concede a five years' franchise which would permit the Outlanders to vote for the President, and would secure them eight additional seats in the Volksraad.

Q. Was this offer unconditional?

A. On the contrary, the Boers expressly put forward three conditions, which they carefully specified, without which they declared that they could not give the five years' franchise.

XIV .- THE CONDITIONS OF THE BOERS.

Q. What were these conditions?

A. Without asking the British Government to abandon any right which it might have either on the ground of the Convention of 1884 or under international law, to intervene for the protection of British subjects in the Transvaal, they asked that the Government should agree that the present intervention should not form a precedent for future action, and that no interference in the internal affairs of the Republic should take place.

Q. Was this condition unreasonable? A. Not in the least. It was indeed asking nothing more than that the British Government should renew the solemn pledges of Secretaries of State who, in Mr. Chamberlain's own words, had repudiated all right of intervention in the internal affairs of the Transvaal. Mr. W. H. Smith had declared it was a cardinal principle of the settlement of 1884 that the internal government and legislation of the South African Republic should not be interfered with. All that the Boers asked, therefore, was that our old pledge should be renewed and confirmed, and that their concession on the subject of the franchise should not be regarded as interfering with their right to absolute home rule.

Q. But can England refuse to interfere if British subjects are ill-treated?

A. No. That form of interference which rests on international law or on the Convention of 1884 so far from being denied by the Boers was affirmed in the most explicit terms. (See Mr. Secretary Reitz's despatch of September 2nd.)

Q. What was the second condition?

A. The second condition was that Her Majesty's Government would not insist upon the assertion of the suzerainty, the controversy being tacitly allowed to drop. The suzerainty here referred to, to which the Transvaal had taken exception, was claimed under the Convention of 1881, the preamble of which asserts the suzerainty.

Q. How was this question first raised?

A. It came up in 1897 when the Transvaal, having asked that the differences between the Republic and Empire should be submitted to arbitration, was peremptorily told by Mr. Chamberlain that "Her Majesty towards the South African Republic holds the relation of suzerain who has accorded to the people of that country self-government on certain conditions, and it would be incompatible with that position to submit to arbitration the construction of the conditions on which they granted self-government to the Republic." This alarmed and excited the Boers, who stated at length their view that the suzerainty reserved in 1881 had disappeared in 1884 when the new Convention was signed. It was this assertion by Mr. Chamberlain which led to the remark by Secretary Reitz in the course of the controversy that the now existing right of absolute self-government belonging to the Republic was not derived either from the Convention of 1881 or that of 1884, but solely follows from the inherent right of this Republic as a sovereign international state.

O. Is the Transvaal a sovereign international state?

Ä. No. Its absolute sovereignty from an international point of view is limited by the right of veto possessed by Great Britain over treaties with foreign states concluded by the Transvaal. With that exception its sovereignty is absolute, even from an international point of view, inasmuch as it can conduct all diplomatic business in war or in peace without any reference to us so long as no treaty is drawn up and signed.

Q. Has the matter any practical importance?

A. Not the least in the world. Mr. Reitz and Sir Alfred Milner were carrying on a correspondence in which it was not the Boers who showed themselves least urbane. The passage in which occurs the unlucky phrase which has served as a red rag to a bull, related not to any assertion of designs in the future, but was brought forward in a discussion of the abstract question of the original source of the right of self-government of the Transvaal. It is about as practical as the discussion of Jean Jacques Rousseau in the Contrat Social.

Q. What was the third condition?

A. The third condition was that outstanding disputes should be referred to arbitration from which, in deference to Mr. Chamberlain's objection, they were willing to exclude any foreign arbitrator. These were the three conditions in return for which they were willing to concede the five years' franchise.

Q. But if the five years' franchise was right and just,

why insist on these conditions?

A. There is no abstract right or wrong as to the number of years residence that must be insisted upon before you allow a foreigner to vote under the country in which he settles. In England and in Holland the period of residence is six years. It is not a question of abstract right, but a question of what is politically expedient and safe.

Q. But how would five years be less politically expedient and safe if the conditions were not granted?

A. Mr. Chamberlain has recognised that it was the duty of the Boers to reject any proposal that would in their opinion lead to political suicide. They believed that if five years were conceded without a disclaimer of the suzerainty of 1881, and without an agreement to settle outstanding questions by arbitration, they would be practically signing their death warrant, for while the Outlanders would acquire a position of increased influence in the Republic, they would assert more loudly than ever their right to appeal to the support of England as the suzerain Power. If there were no agreement to settle disputes by arbitration fresh difficulties would be sprung upon them, so that after the five years' franchise was conceded they would be no nearer the peaceful end of their troubles.

Q. Is there any ground for the belief that fresh questions would be sprung upon them?

A. There is every ground for knowing that such was the avowed intention of all those who were agitating for war in the present crisis. Nothing is more clearly set forth by the leading champions of the Outlanders than that if the franchise is conceded a whole series of other questions will have to be taken up. Sir Alfred Milner asserted this in uncompromising terms in his despatch of August 23rd where he protested against the idea that the concession of the five years' franchise would close the controversy between us and the Transvaal.

Q. How did we receive this proposal of President

Kruger?

A. By sending a reply which, in the opinion of the Transvaal Government, was a definite rejection of its proposals. The Government did not reject or accept them, they only higgled and carped and objected instead of frankly accepting the conditions asked by President Kruger. They made no renewal of any promise as to abstaining from future intervention; they referred once more to the despatch which affirmed our suzerainty, and with regard to arbitration they merely consented to discuss it. Hence the Transvaal regarded the despatch of August 28th as a definite rejection of their offer.

XV .- THE JOINT COMMISSION ACCEPTED.

Q. What did they do next?

A. They fell back upon the previous suggestion as to the appointment of a Joint Commission of Inquiry, and on September 2nd sent a despatch which, while expressing regret at the rejection of their alternative proposal, referred somewhat clumsily to a Commission of Inquiry into the seven years' franchise in terms which it subsequently appeared were meant to imply an acceptance of the Commission. This, however, was no sooner received than a Cabinet was summoned on September 8th, and a note was sent which announced that Ministers could not go back to the proposed Commission of Inquiry into the seven years' franchise law as they were satisfied that the law was insufficient to secure the immediate and substantial representation of the Outlanders. Therefore they demanded that the Transvaal should concede the five years' franchise without the conditions, and they assumed that the new members added to the Volksraad should be allowed to use English in debate. Q. What was the result of this demand?

A. It was immediately rejected on the ground that the Government was now demanding five years' franchise under the guise of accepting the Transvaal proposal while at the same time they refused the quid pro quo for for which the Boers had asked. The Boers, however, renewed their offer to go on with the Commission of Inquiry into the seven years' franchise, and offered to amend the law if the inquiry should prove that it was necessary to secure a just representation.

Q. What step did our Government then take? A. The Cabinet met again, and reiterated its demands for a five years' franchise, but instead of giving up the suzerainty of 1881 they referred in their despatch to their rights under the "Conventions," although they have no right whatever under the Convention of 1881, which is dead and gone.

Q. Did they offer the Boers any security for non-interference?

A. Instead of giving the Boers what they asked for, namely, a definite repudiation of the suzerainty of 1881, of their uestions

ich was ting for arly set landers eries of Alfred in his inst the e would al. esident of the of is accept instead esident e as to d once erainty, nted to spatch as to ry, and essing eferred ito the quently Comthan a te was back seven ne law

tantial

ey dee five

sumed uld be at the nchise oposal no for wever. ion of red to t was nands p the their ve no ich is interd for, 1881.

they put in an offer as part of a complete settlement to give a complete guarantee against any attack upon the independence of the Transvaal either from within any part of Her Majesty's dominions or from the territory of a foreign state.

Q. What was the objection to the acceptance of this offer ?

A. It offers the Boers something for which they never asked. They did not wish to be guaranteed against any foreign Power, and as for the guarantee against attack from any part of the British dominions, how could they be expected to regard that as worth the paper it was written upon, seeing that the proposal came from the Minister who in 1895 was a party to the stationing of Jameson's men upon the frontier in orc'e to support the insurrection which was anticipated in Johannesburg?

Q. Do Ministers really now insist upon the Convention

of 1881?

A. Yes. Mr. Conyngham Greene, our agent in the Transvaal, expressly assured the Boers that the British Government would never abandon its right under the Convention of 1881, although they would refrain from publicly asserting it out of regard for the susceptibilities of the Boers as long as there was no reason for taking a different course.

Q. What is the excuse of Mr. Chamberlain's apologists about this?

A. They say that the reference to the suzerainty of 1881 was purely historical, which is exactly what can be said of the Transvaal Government's reference to the origin of its self-government as an international sovereign state, and further that it is necessary to read the preamble of the Convention of 1881 in order to explain how it is the Transvaal became independent.

Q. Is this suzerainty claim of 1881 dropped by the Government?

A. Privately they say so, and the Home Secretary implied that they had abstained from using the term in their last despatch, but as they referred to the "Conventions" in the plural number, this must only mean a re-assertion of a right of suzerainty based on the preamble of 1881, which Mr. Conyngham Greene declared we would never abandon.

XVI.—PRETEXTS FOR WAR.

Q. If we go to war, what are the differences now between us?

A. First and foremost the letter "S." For the first time in the history of the world we are threatening war about a consonant, and may lose a continent for the sake of that consonant. The Boers say, "We recognise the Convention of 1884," and we say, "You must recognise the Conventions of 1881 and 1884." The Boers say, "The Convention of 1881 is dead, and was superseded by that of 1884." We say, "Its ghost still lingers in its preamble, and we will never abandon the right that it gives us to describe ourselves as your suzerain." That is the first difference.

Q. What is the second?

A. The second is the difference between a five and a seven years' term of residence for franchise. The Boers have conceded seven. We continue to demand five. Mr. Chamberlain accepted seven years as the basis of a settlement, but he went back upon his word.

Q. Are there any other reasons for going to war

besides the suzerainty and the franchise?

A. Motives, yes. Reasons, no. The suzerainty and the franchise are only pretexts to cover the real motive which is occasionally avowed by honest partisans, namely, that they want to decide by ordeal of battle whether the Dutch or the British have to be the paramount power in South Africa.

Q. Is there any question of this?
A. There is no question of this, excepting in the morbid imaginations of people who have brooded over the defeat at Majuba Hill until they have lost all sense of political perspective.

Q. Have the Dutch any claim to be paramount power in South Africa?

A. They have neither a claim nor any amb tion to play any such rôle, nor indeed cou'd they do this, seeing that in the words of Mr. Garrett four-fifths of South African territory is British, so are one-half of the whites and nine-tenths of the coloured population, and ninetenths of the trade. Besides, in addition to these intrinsic solid elements upon which British paramountcy rests, the whole of South Africa relies upon the British fleet to protect it from external aggression.

Q. What is it the Dutch want?

A. The Dutch only want to be treated as the French are treated in Canada-namely, to share in the rights accorded to our colonists everywhere of being allowed to govern themselves in their own way,

Q. Have the Dutch ever shown any disposition to challenge our paramount power in South Africa?

A. Beyond some wild speeches made when we were at war with them in 1880, there is not a rag of evidence to show that they have ever dreamed of threatening our paramount position in South Africa. On the contrary. those who talked about a great South African Republic federated round the Transvaal admitted that they would place that Republic under the protection of the British fleet. It was the Dutch majority at the Cape in the present year who voted £30,000 per annum to strengthen the British Navy.

Q. But are the Cape Dutch not very disloyal?

A. Besides the evidence as to their loyalty supplied by their grant to the Imperial Navy, it is worth remembering that Sir Alfred Milner, writing in the Jubilee year in June, 1897, said, "I have no doubt the same loyalty has been displayed in other parts of the Empire; but it appears to me to be of peculiar interest under the special circumstances of this Colony, and in view of recent events (he was referring to the Jameson Raid), which, as you are aware, have caused a feeling of considerable bitterness amongst different sections of the community. All that I can say is that as far as I am able to judge these racial difficulties have not affected the loyalty of any portion of the population to Her Majesty the Queen." He went on to say that "it was impossible to doubt that the feeling of loyalty among all sections of the population is much stronger than has been sometimes believed."

Q. What would be the result of a war on the Cape

Dutch?

A. It would subject their loyalty to a severe strain, and it might have the same effect as a similar policy had upon our colonists in New England a hundred years ago.

XVII.-THE CLAIM FOR EQUAL RIGHTS

Q. But don't the Dutch in the Transvaal deny to British subjects the rights which we give to the Transvaal Boers in our own colonies?

A. To a certain extent this is true, and it is very easily explained. The British Empire has never had reason to fear that it would lose its independence by an influx of Boers, neither has it had to face a strong and persistent conspiracy on the part of the Poers of the Transvaal with the avowed purpose of using the rights conferred upon the Boers settling in Cape Colony for the purpose of bringing Cape Colony under the authority of the Transvaal.

Q. Does the Transvaal discriminate against the English?

A. Not at all. All the difficulty has arisen, not because they made laws against the English, but because they say that the new-comers must wait seven years before they can be allowed to have the franchise, whereas in England we allow them to have the franchise in six years; but this rule is applied impartially by the Boers to the Cape Dutch themselves and to the Outlanders who come from Europe.

Q. Do you then approve of equal rights for all whites in the South African communities i

A. Equality of rights all the world over is a thing very much to be desired if it can be secured by reasonable, pacific means. But it is monstrous to assert that we have a right to dictate to all other communities living in South Africa the adoption of a uniform standard of qualification for the franchise, for that is practically what it comes to. The Transvaal is not the only foreign State in South Africa. The Germans have a large tract of territory on both sides of the Continent. It is nowhere imagined that Mr. Chamberlain would dream of attempting to enforce upon the German Empire a uniform standard as to franchise or for civil rights in the way in which we are endeavouring to enforce it upon the Transvaal.

Q. But what are the equal rights we ask for?

A. Equal rights is a phrase which, being translated into definite language, means that the period of residence before a foreigner can qualify for the franchise must be reduced. The Boers have reduced it from fourteen years to seven years, and the quarrel now turns upon whether it is to be reduced to five.

Q. But is there not a question about the language?

A. Yes. This is another new demand which has been sprung upon the Boers. No debating is allowed in the Volksraad excepting in Dutch. This is a measure which was introduced after the annexation owing to the animosity excited by our high-handed conduct in seizing their country. Before the annexation the Boers allowed English equally with Dutch to be used in the Volksraad, and there is little doubt that if the present feelings of race antagonism were allowed to die out English would again be allowed to be heard in the Volksraad.

Q. Do we insist upon the use of English in the Parliament of Cape Colony?

A. We do not insist upon it now, but we did from 1872 to 1882, and it was only when the Dutch secured a majority of the Cape Assembly that they altered the law which previously had given exclusive rights to English, a law which had been rigorously enforced.

Q. Why cannot the thing be settled?

A. Because of false pride, which in the opinion of many people renders it impossible for us to admit that we have made a mistake, or that we have blundered into a position which is quite untenable.

Q. Can we afford to admit that we were wrong, and accept the inquiry into the seven years' franchise and drop the demand for the English language?

A. The answer turns upon the question whether or not the British Empire is strong enough to be just, and dare to deal as reasonably with a small Power as it would be compelled to do if it were dealing with a great empire. If we admit that we are so weak that we dare not subject our prestige to the strain of accepting the seven years' franchise rather than five, our position in the world can hardly be worth a year's purchase.

Q. How do you sum the whole matter?

A. If we should go to war, as is threatened, with a lie in our right hand, the crime will bring down the grey hairs of our beloved Queen in sorrow to the grave, and we shall lose South Africa in the same way and for the same reason as we lost the American Colonies.

October 5th, 1899.

di

in

gr

m

re

G

m wi

re

gu

TI

sta da

die

ho

th

Th

wh

dr

ma

H

The foregoing Catechism sets forth the salient facts of the situation down to the end of September. bring out, I hope, with clearness and precision the fact that in our dealings with the Boers in the past we have much to be ashamed of, and that we have given them ample cause to regard our professions with suspicion and our assurances with distrust.

It is not to be wondered at that as soon as they recovered their coveted independence, remembering the perils from which they had escaped, they set to work to strengthen themselves against any possible future attack. They built forts, they laid in arms and munitions of war, and prepared to defend to the uttermost the country which they had carved out for themselves and their children from the African wilderness. The discovery of the gold mines of the Rand attracted to the Transvaal thousand of gold-seekers, who were as distasteful to the old Boers as Chinese immigrants would be to English colonists. Forbidden to shut them out by the Convention of 1884, which was the charter of their liberties, they took such precautions as seemed to these shrewd but ignorant peasants of the Veldt most likely to defend their rural Commonwealth from the incursion of the Outlandish folk who came gold-hunting on the Rand. They raised the franchise limit and acted precisely as old, crusted Tory squires would do if threatened with political extinction by a horde of Radical inter-Two civilisations lopers. Friction was inevitable. were in contact. The old seventeenth century farmer, with his Bible and his rifle, found himself confronted by an ever-increasing majority of nineteenth century men of the Bourse and of the mine. In the attempt to hold his own, the Boer, prompted by the instinct of self-preservation, tried to keep the Outlandish folk in subjection, which the latter naturally resented. "If you don't like the laws we make and the system we administer," they said, "you can depart. No one asked you to come; and the sooner you go the better. We are not going to remodel our Constitution so as to make over the government of our country to these foreigners from overseabirds of passage, here to-day and gone to-morrow."

It was all wrong, although absolutely in accordance with human nature, and especially of Conservative parties and oligarchies all the world over. The grievances of the Outlanders grew apace, and their impatience with the injustice to which they were treated increased with years. The abortive attempt of the Raid confirmed the Boers in their suspicion of the loyalty of their Outlander subjects, and the ghastly farce of the South African.

"Inquiry" convinced them of the justice of their rooted distrust of British statesmen. The friction increased and intensified. The Outlanders, instead of finding their grievances diminish, found that they were aggravated by more reactionary legislation. They appealed to the British Government. The Boers in turn appealed to the Dutch of the Free State and the Cape Colony.

In the Catechism I have set forth the course of the recent negotiations. But behind our demands for the five years' franchise there lay concealed, as Mr. Kruger knew perfectly well, a fixed determination to destroy the Boer Government of the Transvaal. The franchise was merely a step. The men for whom the franchise was demanded openly and unreservedly declare that they will not accept the franchise unless at the same time they receive the vote they receive a rifle, and as a further guarantee for the complete overthrow of the Boers the forts at Johannesburg and Pretoria are dismantled. The Boers, knowing that their national existence is at stake, feeling the knife at their throats, and seeing every day the British forces reinforced from India and from England, naturally disbelieved our assurances that we did not wish to interfere with their independence. In one sense that is true. We wished not to interfere with it, but to submerge it entirely.

The wild talk of Boer supremacy in South Africa, however natural to men who find their supremacy threatened even in the one lone Republic of the Transvaal itself, is all baby talk. Desperate men talk big. The poor little Republic of thirty thousand burghers, which has been dominated from first to last by a morbid dread of extinction at the hands of its powerful neighbour, may have dreamed dreams of making itself the key State of a South African Federation, but even in their wildest dreams they never dreamed of dispensing with the Protection, the Alliance, and the Flag of Britain. When South Africa is federated, there will be of course an Africander flag as there is a Canadian and an Australasian flag. But the Union Jack, even in the dreams of Joubert and Jorrisen and De Graaff, was to float side by side with the Africander flag as the sign and symbol of the imperishable alliance between the protecting Empire and the federated African States.

The Boers, seeing themselves hemmed in, with more troops arriving every day, have proclaimed their determination not to wait until they were strangled. The noose was being carefully adjusted round their neck. A great army of 40,000 men was being got ready to sail from England to raise the troops in South Africa to a total of 70,000. If war was inevitable, their only chance, from a military point of view, was to strike before our troops arrived.

If they should do so, that act in no way lessens the responsibility or the guilt of those who have forced them to this extremity. They will but be acting the time-honoured maxim of the English navy, that there is no defence so good as a vigorous offensive; and as we should certainly have acted in the same way if we had been in their place, we shall do well to moderate the transports of our patriotic rage at the sight of the inevitable consequences of our own policy.

The latest news seems to indicate that the Boers, with Mr. Kruger at their head, have abandoned themselves to the delusions which lured the Khalifa and the Mahdists to their ruin. If so, then, alas! there is no more to be said. It is a sad and sorry business, and blurs with blood once more the story of British South Africa.

THE HUNTING OF THE BOER.

A NEW BATTLE HYMN FOR THE EMPIRE.

- Ho! sportsmen, come ye forth from the South and from the North,
- From the happy homes of England to the Battle and the Breeze;
- For the trooper's on the tide and to-morrow we will
  - To the Hunting of the Boer in the land beyond the
- Oh! 'twill be rattling fun to see the beggars run,
  - When the guns begin to speak, and dum-dum bullets pelt:
- And the bursting Lyddite shell and the growling Maxims tell
  - We're a-hunting of the Boer on the uplands of the Veldt.
- We've stood their lip too long, and now we're going
- To settle up the score of that damned Majuba Hill, When they licked us through the folly of that poor
  - unlucky Colley— So now we go a-hunting, to kill, and kill, and kill.
- Oom Paul in vain will pray for mercy in that day,
  - When the storm of vengeance bursts upon the bloody Boer;

- We shall smash them in the field; if they fly and do not yield
  - We shall hunt them down with bloodhounds on their spoor.
- We are strong and they are weak; we shall teach them to be meek,
  - When we shoot them down with dum-dums, that torture when they slay;
- And if all things go well we shall chivvy them to hell, Before the canting Boers have time to pray.
- And the niggers they will come at the beating of our drum,
  - The Swazis and Basutos and the rest;
- They will rape and burn and slay, and we shall not say them nay,
  - For the hunting of the Boer they are the best.
- Then three times three for Joe, who slips us on the foe,
- To the Devil with John Morley and all the friends of peace;
- And though the Boers may squeal, we shall bleed them white as veal
  - Ere the Hunting of the Boer shall ever cease.

JOE JINGO, JUN.

an lie

ev

nd

he

of

ey

ct

re

m

d ie

0

r,

r

f

1

e

h

d

LEADING ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE THREATENED WAR.

A DANIEL COME TO JUDGMENT.

MR. GARRETT contributes to the Contemporary Review an article on "The Inevitable in South Africa," in which I am glad to find the case for war in the Transvaal set forth with all the eloquence and fervour of one of the ablest journalists trained on the Pall Mall Gazette. Before noticing the article in detail, let me enter a caveat against the e traordinary and somewhat unworthy misrepresentation in which Mr. Garrett seems to deem it necessary to indulge in relation to his old chief.

"STUPEFACTION" INDEED.

He says that he read with stupefaction my dictum that we ought to support Sir Alfred Milner "even to ultimatum but no further. He quotes this phrase in inverted commas, and then bases upon it the monstrous misrepresentation that I advocated the sending of an ultimatum with a reservation that, after having flung down the gauntlet, we should run away if it is picked up—that we should promise to use force in a certain eventuality, but lie in so promising. I could hardly have dreamed that an old pupil of mine should have accused me of advocating a policy the foundation of which is a lie. If Mr. Garrett had taken the trouble to quote accurately the article which he says has stupefied him, he would have seen that I did not say we ought to support Sir Alfred Milner "even to ultimatum point." On the contrary, what I wrote was that I was "prepared, and am prepared, to follow Milner blindfold so long as he stops short of ultimatum point." I said further that I would follow him unhesitatingly in any policy that did not depend for its success upon war, but I could not bring myself to admit that even Milner should be permitted to lead us into a war with the Transvaal. from threatening to use armed force without intending to make good our threat, I expressly stated that the pressure which I advised was not to be backed up by any threat of war. I wrote: "Pressure, steady and resolute—with that I agree with all my heart. From pressure carried to the point of throat-cutting in the Transvaal I recoil. It ought not to be." So far from advocating a policy of bluff, I condemned it as a dangerous game, but deprecated interfering with Milner's liberty of action, so long as he abstained from threatening war.

A FAIR QUESTION.

Yet, with this before him, Mr. Garrett feels himself justified in accusing me of advocating bluff and threatening the use of force! I can only suppose that my article so stupefied him that he forgot what he read, and he was still more or less stupefied when he made his reference to my attitude in this matter. But if he can so utterly misrepresent an old friend on such a vital matter as this, how can we trust him when he professes to describe the policy of the Boers?

THE EVIDENCE OF MR. GARRETT.

This, however, is a small matter; and, leaving it on one side, let us now come to the gist of the whole thing. Mr. Garrett sets out with great vigour and lucidity his conception of the position of things in South Africa. It practically comes to this—that the Dutch farmers, who are in a majority, and who are prepared to kill and be killed in defence of their old Tory protectionist notions, have no intention whatever of being compelled to walk in the way of progressive British Liberalism, or even such a washed-out version of it as commends itself to our Unionists at home. Mr. Garrett, no doubt, intended his article to be a crushing demonstration in favour of British intervention, if necessary with an overwhelming force of troops to conquer the Dutch. The net effect of reading it will be more than ever to convince people at home that the task to which they are invited by our Jingoes is much more serious than they had any idea of, and that of all the mistakes which have ever been made the greatest was to imagine that it was an easy thing to bluff old Kruger and the Dutch into capitulation.

THE DUTCH FARMER IN AFRICA.

Mr. Garrett's picture of the Dutch farmer in the Cape Colony who relies upon his gun to keep his farm clear of what Sir William Harcourt once called the "inspector vastatrix," so dear to the humanitarian reformer, is one full of warning to those who are gaily discussing the beginning of a Dutch war in South Africa by the abolition of the constitution of the Cape The old Dutch farmer in the Cape Colony is evidently a customer who may be quite as difficult to deal with on occasion as the embattled farmers of New England who were held so cheap by George III. a hundred years ago. The Dutch farmer is a very tough nut to crack, and Mr. Garrett's description of him and his ways is about as unpleasant reading as we could have on the verge of a new South African war. If Mr. Garrett had published his article six months ago, instead of reserving it until we are almost in the deathgrapple, he would have effectively destroyed all chance of the adoption of the policy into which this country has been jockeyed. Day by day all through the summer the supporters of Mr. Chamberlain had only one song to sing, and that was that if we would only leave him alone and allow him to bounce and bluff and make a show of force, there would be no need to use it. Those who were determined not to acquiesce in any policy of forcing reforms on the Boers at the bayonet's point, were silenced again and again by assurances that Mr. Chamberlain did not mean war, that he was only bluffing, and that if we insisted on protesting against his bluff, we might so spoil the game as to bring about the war to which we were opposed. But let anyone read Mr. Garrett's account of the solid, stolid human units with whom we have to deal in the Cape Dutch, as well as in their kinsmen in the Republics, and ask himself what chance there is of Mr. Chamberlain's bluff succeeding with such men. Mr. Garrett produces an impression upon the reader that the idea of bluffing the Boers, which, be it remembered, was put forward everywhere in England as Mr. Chamberlain's policy, was foredoomed to failure from the first.

WHAT THE DUTCH THINK OF US.

As Mr. Garrett reminds us in a passage which is very disagreeable reading, but is nevertheless perfectly true, the Dutch of A'ri:a have had no reason to have any respect either for our military capacity or our military determination. Mr. Garrett might go further, and say that they have as little reason to have any respect for our good faith, political foresight, or appreciahisto the fi justif in ou ing o Garre Con British skirmi happe and w wheth wheth Somet they d Bronk all tog on this Boer s blood settle e and Do must b its dev Huntin big-gar

tion (

Mr. for get luck of the fa which for the render

On

Garret

Mr. ( all our incomp Dutch right to regard we blu we may as else our mi speaks selves i of the fore th our she friendli failed e ideas. If we confide were hu would : dwell u Transv politica under a would 1 Volksra

Mr. C

tion of the elementary facts of the situation. The whole history of our dealings with the Boers, from the time of the first trek down to to-day, has not been such as to justify any confidence in our honesty, good faith, or even in our persistent consistency in any given course. Speaking of the Boers' estimate of our military position, Mr. Garrett says:—

in

en

elf

ot,

in

er-

he ce

ed

ıy

er

an

to

he is ed

iii

re

th

pe

is

to

w

a gh

m ve If

0,

h-ce

ry

ad

ly id

it.

ny

t's

at

ly

is

he

r.

th

in

at

th

on

h,

nd

re

tly

to ur

er,

ny

YHM

Coming into collision with the might and majesty of the British Empire has meant, so far, for the Boers, certain skirmishes between small bodies of troops, in which, as it happened, they beat us whether they were at the top of a hill and we at the bottom, or they at the bottom and we at the top; whether our men were British regulars or colonial irregulars. Sometimes our men showed their usual pluck, and sometimes they didn't; but in either case they hardly shot a Boer. Taking Bronkhortspruit, Laing's Nek, Ingogo, Majuba, and Doornkop all together, the Boers lost about one man to our twenty. So, on this showing, the Rev. Mr. Vorster understated his case. No Boer speech is complete without the tag about shedding their blood for the country. This patriotic phlebotomy is invoked to settle every question. Considering the political fruits of Majuba and Doornkop, which cost exactly three Boers between them, it must be admitted that the Transvaal has laid out the blood of its devoted sons at a better bargain than any people in history. Hunting the rovibatje has been simply the most exciting form of big-game shooting. If the simpler sort of Afrikander is a little inflated with his prowess, who shall blame him?

Mr. Garrett adds that "this would be no justification for getting up a quarrel in order to better our military luck or to avenge Majuba." But he conveniently ignores the fact that to avenge Majuba is the only real motive which impels the mass of our fighting people to clamour for the war which Mr. Garrett has done so much to render inevitable.

REAPING AS WE HAVE SOWN.

On the main question that lies between Mr. Garrett and ourselves there is only this to be said. Mr. Garrett seems to think that notwithstanding all our blunders, and bad faith, our vacillation, our incompetence, and our scandalous mishandling of the Dutch questions in South Africa in the past, we have a right to be indignant when we find that the African Dutch regard us and our ideas with dislike and contempt. But if we blunder, we have to take the consequences. If we lie, we may expect to be disbelieved, and in South Africa, as elsewhere, we have got to take the consequences of our misconduct. Mr. Garrett and those for whom he speaks seem to think that, because we have got ourselves into this mess, and have intensified the prejudices of the Boers against us and our progressive ideas, therefore there is nothing to be done but to make up for all our shortcomings in common sense, in fair play and in friendliness by killing the population which we have failed either to propitiate or to indoctrinate with our ideas. From this doctrine we cannot too strongly dissent. If we had made any kind of honest effort to win the confidence of the Boers, and to treat them as if they were human beings, and not dirt beneath our feet, things would never have got to the pass. It is all very well to dwell upon the Helot-like position of the Uitlander in the Transvaal, but it is a very little compliment to the political capacity of men of our race to believe that, even under a seven years' franchise, a majority of two to one would have failed to make itself felt in elections for the Volksraad.

"FIVE YEARS FRANCHISE OR YOUR LIFE!"

Mr. Garrett makes out a very strong case in favour of doing our utmost to induce the Transvaal Government to give the franchise to the Uitlanders, but he is forcing an open door. We are all agreed upon that point. The only difference is that most of us in England do not see either the morality or the policy of cutting the throats of the Boers merely because they prefer to insist upon a term of seven years' residence instead of a term of five. All that Mr. Garrett says upon Johannesburg being an English Ghetto may be true, as true as it is certainly smart; but how can we suddenly wax furious about this, when during all the years when Paul Kruger successively raised the restrictions on the franchise no attempt whatever was made by us to prevent him carrying out the policy the ultimate results of which are now before us? Because we were negligent in times past, and failed to do by legitimate peaceful pressure what might have been done if we had endeavoured to win the confidence of the Boers, that certainly gives us no right to walk up at the eleventh hour and demand a five years' franchise on penalty of instant war. In private life when a man muffs his chances, wastes his capital, and allows his rights to lapse for want of exercise, he has no right, when he at last opens his eyes to his position, to try to mend matters by running amuck upon his neighbours who have profited by his own negligence.

DON'T MEND MATTERS BY MURDER!

What he has to do is to recognise that, as he has made his bed so he must lie upon it, and that as we have got into our present position in South Africa by our own negligence, by our own apathy, by our own arrogant contempt of our fellow-subjects, and our cynical indifference to the honest obligations of good faith where they were concerned, we have got now to make the best of a position, and not endeavour to mend matters by murder. Mr. Garrett finished his article by saying:— "When you have said that war in South Africa would be a crime, you have advanced the controversy little. It remains in the given case to fix the responsibility and decide the criminal." There is small doubt that, when the verdict of history is recorded, the judge will have little difficulty in saddling a great deal of the responsibility upon Mr. Garrett; and if I do not use the term "criminal in relation to my old colleagues Mr. Garrett and Sir Alfred Milner, it is only because I shrink from using that term to describe persons whose motives are so admittedly excellent. But if war should break out, there can be no doubt as to the criminality of the result for which they have deliberately worked.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S MISTAKES.

"DIPLOMATICUS," who writes in the Fortnightly Review, deals very plainly with what he considers to be Mr. Chamberlain's mistakes in relation to the Transvaal question. "Diplomaticus" is a curious mixture, and his article is like himself. For instance, he actually complains of Mr. Chamberlain for being too patient and too long-suffering in not taking immediate action against the Boers. "Diplomaticus" admits that the country certainly would not have tolerated any immediate action on the part of Mr. Chamberlain; and when that is admitted everything is admitted, and it is nonsense to call a mistake that which was inevitably enforced upon a statesman by the nature and conditions of the case. You might as well accuse a man of not breathing when his head is under water, as accuse a Minister of not taking a given course when you admit in the same breath that the nation, including of course his colleagues and the House of Commons, would not allow him to take it. The only important part of "Diplomaticus'" article is that in which he roundly trounces Mr. Chamberlain for his inexplicable folly in putting forward a claim to the suzerainty of 1881. "Never," says "Diplomaticus," "was a good cause compromised in a more unhappy and gratuitous fashion. To have raised this question at any time would have been unwise and superfluous, but to do it at a time when the first object of statesmanship was avowedly to solve the franchise question was a fatal and unpardonable blunder. The claim was not only of very doubtful value "—" Dip-lomaticus " might have used a much stronger word, for it is an absolutely bogus claim—"but it is absolutely futile and unprofitable. There was absolutely no necessity for raising it. Even if the whole of Mr. Chamberlain's case were granted, the suzerainty for which he contends is an empty thing. It would not give us a single right or advantage we do not already possess, or which was not amply secured to us. The word alone as used in the 1881 preamble has no effective meaning":

But the worst of Mr. Chamberlain's blunder in putting forward this doubtful and unnecessary contention is that he thereby prejudiced the chances of an amicable settlement of the franchise question, inasmuch as he embittered the Boers and gave them a grievance with which to appeal, not only to Dutch symmathy, but to the sympathy of not a few leaders of public opinion in Europe. The extraordinary thing is that it was not raised in the heat of any controversy, but in the full tide of Sir Alfred Milner's conciliatory mission, and before the High Commissioner had come to the conclusion that diplomacy was useless to liberate the Uitlanders, and the moment for intervention had arrived. Mr. Chamberlain did not dream of it at the time of the Raid, for, when in the negotiations which followed that deplorable act of folly, President Kruger referred to newspaper theories on the subject, and declared roundly that the suzerainty "no longer exists," he abstained from controverting him, and correctly took his stand by Article IV. It was in October, 1897, that, in answer to proposals for a scheme of arbitration to settle all disputes between Pretoria and Downing Street, Mr. Chamberlain, for the first time for thirteen years, asserted the existence of the suzerainty in virtue of the 1881 preamble. The Transvaal repudiated the claim, and Sir Alfred Milner himself, following in the traditions of Sir Hersules Pohipson and Locky and in the traditions of Sir Hercules Robinson and Lord Derby, was "unable to see anything material in this controversy." Nevertheless the Colonial Secretary persisted in it, with the result that on May 9th of the present year he received a note from Mr. Reitz, the ill-temper of which is apparent in every line, and especially in the extravagance and defiance of the claim that the South African Republic is a "sovereign international State." It is not difficult to understand this ill-temper. The Boers honestly believed that, in 1884, their diplomacy had obtained the revocation of the 1881 preamble. Now, on the morrow of the Raid, and on the eve of a fresh Uitlander campaign, when they had hoped to bargain for a further extension of their independence, they found themselves confronted by what they regarded as an attempt to reduce them to the status of the 1881 Convention. It was under this aggrieved impression that they went into the Bloemfontein Conference. Can we wonder that that meeting failed? How Mr. Chamberlain came to play this trump card into Mr. Kruger's hands passes my comprehension. The effect of the blunder is, however, clear, for if we have war it will not be on the question of a seven or five years' franchise, but, so far as Dutch public feeling is concerned, mainly on the question of the suzerainty.

OTHER VIEWS OF THE BOER PROBLEM.

THAT UNBLESSED WORD SUZERAINTY.

THE well-known writer who assumes the name of "the Looker-on" in Blackwood treats of our "deep South African troubles" again in the most pacific spirit. He says that the suzerainty claim, with far greater likelihood than anything else, may lead to war in South Africa. He holds that whether the preamble to the Convention of 1881 be legally unrepealed or not, it was morally renounced by Lord Derby's explanations and assurances in 1884. Yet, he proceeds-

for pap

eve

nes

the

gov

with feel inve

I he civi

fort

thei

talk

life,

of c ind

sup

pen th

out tha

der

ma

gre

1 apa

grai

it is clair

Par

whi

with num

has pass imp

an l

cont

anyl

T

tern deat

they

Brit

way

end

to se

Eure

zeni

shoo

troll

East

the l

we s cree

she e

As we have acknowledged, it is an extremely difficult matter to deal with in the position to which affairs have been brought. With the best will in the world to put away that legal bit of paper and stand by Lord Derby's bargain our Government can hardly "back down" so far (that would be the word, "back down") as to announce the claim's abandonment. All they can do, apparently, is to "drop" it completely out of their demands. All they can And we say that this should be enough. For the Transvaal statesmen may be assured that our Government as a Government has no wish whatever to take advantage of the legal existence of that '81 preamble, if it be really alive. They may be sure that there is a much stronger disposition in Downing Street to honour Lord Derby's engagements as Colonial Minister than to do the other thing, whatever legal right may be lodged in a preamble which could not have been left alive with intention. But all may be settled before these words are published—peacefully settled, I believe.

He suggests that in the clause of the Convention of 1884, which stipulates in effect equal rights with the Burghers for British subjects in the Transvaal, are "the foundations of a peaceful settlement."

THE TYRANNY OF MISTRUST.

Rev. S. Usher Wilson-"a voice from Cape Colony" sends to the Nineteenth Century his view of the situation in South Africa. He says :-

Now mistrust is the key-note of the Boer nature. Mistrust is the strength of the Africander Bond. Mistrust is the festering sore in South Africa. . . . Apart from questions of suzerainty and an 1884 Convention, the selfism of a small number of enemies to progress, driven by mistrust of one another to occupy a vast tract of land far beyond the actual requirements of the struggle for nutriment, must be condemned in these days when old-time demarcations are breaking down, and the young man claims to be cosmopolitan.

The writer insists that Mr. Hofmeyer's object is to undermine British supremacy in South Africa. This is his emphatic counsel :---

Great Britain must intervene to put an end to the mistrust and racial feud that now exist, and are paralysing the Commerce of Cape Colony. Great Britain must assert her supremacy in order to stem the poisonous sap that flows through the branches of the Bond, the evidence of its deleterious work being found in the evil fruit it produces.

THE DREADED RACIAL FEUD ALREADY HERE.

He goes on to predict that some day when Great Britain is involved in European war, "the whole of Africa will be in a blaze," from the Soudan, where the false prophet will again raise his standard, down to the Cape. The paper concludes with the asseveration :-

The horrible possibility of a long racial feurl in South Africa, spoken of by the home press as a thing of the future, is here already, and has been here, alas! for some time past: nor will it be swept away except by a prompt and firm decision that Great Britain shall be recognised by one and all as the paramount power in South Africa.

"MADDING PASSIONS MUTUALLY INFLAMED."

In the Nineteenth Century, Dr. J. G. Rogers, writing on Liberalism and its cross-currents, thus touches on the

The situation, it must be confessed, is about as awkward as can easily be imagined. We hardly need the genius of cari-caturists to make us realise the singular misfortune of having Mr. Chamberlain and President Kruger pitted against each other in the diplomatic warfare. But what is even worse, the peculiar nature of the dispute is fitted to call forth the worst qualities of both men. A generous, unsuspecting, straight-torward and patient policy is necessary on both sides, but i requires all the prejudice of a partisan to say that it has been found on either.

IN DEFENCE OF THE BOERS.

"A DIPLOMAT" sends to the North American Review for September a "Vindication of the Boers" in reply to a paper on the other side by Mr. Sydney Brooks. Whatever may be said about the backwardness and defectiveness of the Transvaal, the writer argues, the English cannot make it a plea for the suppression of Boer government, because that government, although primitive and slowly progressive, as I can afford to admit it is, does not come within the class of institutions which are an outrage to the moral feelings of mankind and provide the only excuse a State can invoke for the suppression of another State. No Englishman, I hope, will deny that the essential notions of morality, if not of civilisation, pervade the Transvaal State. What is missing in it, is a set of institutions and ideas productive of well being and luxury. The faculty of a people to dispense with these calls forth the frequent commendation of the English themselves in their political and social literature, as well as in their current talk, with the help of expressions such as "healthy simplicity of life," "freedom from the enervating and corrupting influences of civilisation," and so forth.

The Boers not having forfeited the right to be an independent State, they are bound to observe the supreme law of State life—the maintenance of independence and self-preservation. The writer applauds "the positive meritoriousness" of the Boers in carrying out this duty. He also commends President Kruger that he "has not pressed his case with all the force it derives from absolute legitimacy," but "has actually made concessions" in his "desire to spare the pride of a great nation."

THE REAL AIM OF THE ENGLISH.

The writer insists that-apart from all considerations of legitimacy or non-legitimacy, that, as a matter of opportuneness, the franchise should not be granted by the Boers to the English, because it would lead to the loss of their independence. When representation is claimed, it is done with the idea that it will be efficacious; else why claim it? When the English demand representation in the Boer Parliament, they do so with the intention, not of satisfying a whim, but of modifying the legislation of the Transvaal in a way to make it meet their views. They cannot hope to do so without having a majority. Therefore, they aim at outnumbering the Boers in the Raad; and, once this desideratum has been fulfilled, the government of the country will have passed into the hands of men who, following the ordinary impulses of flesh and blood, will transform the Boer State into an English dependency—notwithstanding any assurances to the contrary or even the taking of the oath of allegiance. Can anybody contest this view?

THE BOERS DOOMED.

The writer thus gloomily sums up the situation in terms of Apocalyptic luridness:—

It is a choice of two evils for the Transvaal, of suicide or death at the hands of another. One way or the other, whether they yield or appeal to arms, the Boers are doomed. . . . Great Britain means to settle the South African problem in her own way and at any cost. Whatever the choice of the Boers, the end seems to be fast approaching. Most of us will probably live to see the curtain fall on the last act of the tragedy now enacting in the Dark Continent, the suppression of the Transvaal. Europe will look on, but will not stir; and Great Britain, at the zenith of her power and glory and prosperity, will continue to shoot in the skies of international politics, a fiery and uncontrollable orb, until she meets the star that is rising from the East, borne on the wings of Autocracy and Orthodoxy, and which is slowly but steadily moving on the same path. Then the heavens will ring and shake with the tremendous clash, and we shall witness the truth or falsehood of the proud English creed that there is no end to the mission of Great Britain, that she can only grow and spread her Empire, and that, superior to Rome, she will achieve durability in the midst of supreme power.

THE NEW DIPLOMACY AT ITS WORST.

Mr. John Herlihy, writing on the record of the Session in the Westminster Review, thus refers to Mr. Chamberlain's policy:—

The Blue-Books which have been recently published show that his real object is to obtain an open acknowledgment of British suzerainty—whatever may be the exact meaning of the phrase—in South Africa. The folly of such procedure can only be realised when it is remembered that there is a considerable Dutch majority at Cape Colony, and that there is a Dutch Ministry in power at Capetown. In his conduct of negotiations, which were obviously of the most delicate and critical character, Mr. Chamberlain has exhibited the methods of the "new diplomacy" at their worst. Violent speech alternated with hectoring despatch. . . . Should hostilities break out Mr. Chamberlain may find that the ravages of the war fever have been less deep than be imagined, and that a heavy reckoning will be exacted for any blood which may be shed. A great Empire entering into a life-and-death struggle with a community of 30,000 farmers is not a spectacle from which much ground for legitimate pride can be obtained. Victory won under such circumstances is attended with very little honour, but, on the other hand, no one expects that the work of subjugation will be an easy or a bloodless one. It is, however, when the British taxpayer, who, after all, does not love war for its own sake, has to pay the toll of blood and treasure which Mr. Chamberlain's policy will render necessary, and when he perceives that, as a result of the course followed by that statesman and his representative at the Cape, one of the most loyal and contented of British colonies has been converted into a seething mass of disaffection, that his final opinion will be formed of a line of action attended with such disastrous results.

BITTER THE FRUIT OF THE RAID.

The controversy raised by Mr. Edward Dicey's attack on Mr. H. A. Bryden's article on "British and Dutch in South Africa," which appeared in the August Fortnightly, is continued in the October number of that magazine by a letter in which Mr. Bryden triumphantly convicts Mr. Dicey of misrepresentations, personalities and extraordinary ignorance, both of who his opponent is and of some essential facts of the situation which were either well known to everyone before or have been demonstrated since—such, for instance, as the solidarity of the Orange Free State, which Mr. Dicey holds would never dare to join forces with the Transvaal.

Mr. Bryden seizes the opportunity to reiterate his views as to the impolicy of a war in South Africa. He says:—

I deprecate war, if by any possibility it can be avoided, for the reason that, thanks to the Jameson Raid and Mr. Rhodes's share in that shameful business, the feelings of the Dutch in every corner of South Africa have been violently inflamed, and their suspicions thoroughly aroused. For this reason, in my judgment, a war of coercion against the Transvaal must almost certainly lead to strife and bloodshed from the Limpopo River to Cape Agulhas. I say that the horrors of such a struggle between the white races ought, by every human possibility, to be avoided. The war party in this country, and apparently Mr. Dicey, think otherwise.

Mr. Bryden shows that in the event of a race war in South Africa the Dutch would draw their soldiers from ninety thousand adult men. He thinks the urban British, who are the most clamorous for war, may be left out of account as fighting men. He says:—

The Cape population, roughly classed as British, is largely urban. It consists, for the most part, of men quite unaccustomed to rifles and horses. It would be mere massacre to take utterly untrained men, such as these, into the field against sharp-shooting, hard-riding Boers, accustomed from infancy to the life of the Veld.

urances

t matter brought, I bit of nent can "back they can emands, ransvaal ernment tence of are that treet to than to ed in a

tion of th the e "the olony "

ion...

-peace-

strust is estering ons of small of one actual demned down, is his histrust Comsupregh the being

Great ole of re the to the Africa, is here or will on that para-riting on the ard as cariaving each each e, the worst aighteut it been

THE SEQUEL TO THE STORY OF DREYFUS.

In the last number of the REVIEW I published a narrative of the strange, sad story of Alfred Dreyfus, down to the time of going to press. I have received so many letters from all parts of the country, thanking me for condensing the complicated narrative into so simple and succinct a form, that I think it may be well to add a final chapter concerning the Rennes trial.

Our story in last month's issue broke off, it will be remembered, at the point where the examination of witnesses was being brought to a close. On September 9th the Court-Martial returned a verdict of "Guilty, with extenuating circumstances," five of the judges having been in favour of a verdict of guilty, and two of a verdict of not guilty.

THE PARDON OF CAPTAIN DREYFUS.

While the newspapers were still foaming with vehement denunciations of the injustice perpetrated by the Rennes Court-Martial, it was announced that President Loubet at the instance of General de Galliffet had pardoned Captain Dreyfus. The official statement setting forth the grounds upon which this pardon was granted alleges that Captain Dreyfus had already suffered five years imprisonment on Devil's Island, and that his health was impaired, and as he was found guilty with "extenuating circumstances," the Minister of War recommended his pardon. President Loubet promptly accorded it, and Captain Dreyfus left the prison at Rennes, and rejoined his wife at Carpentras, where he is enjoying the first luxurious moments of the released prisoner. As a condition of his pardon there is to be no appeal to the verdict of another court-martial; but so far as the military authorities are concerned the policy of the sponge is to prevail. In the army bygones have to be bygones, and General Mercier and all the other notables who figured so disreputably before the public are to remain where they are. Note that Colonel Du Paty de Clam has suddenly recovered from his mysterious illness with not less mysterious rapidity. Captain Dreyfus and his friends accepted the pardon with considerable reluctance, for to be pardoned implies that you are guilty, whereas, as Captain Dreyfus said in the dignified declaration which he published immediately after his release, he regards life as worthless without honour. But he would not have facilitated the rehabilitation of his character by remaining in prison to die. Liberty and the reunion with his family and his friends may give him renewed strength in the civil courts. As for hoping to secure any vindication of his honour before a court-martial, the experience through which he has passed convinced not only himself but the whole civilised world that the French court-martial is the last place in the world in which to go in search of The policy of the sponge, however, will not apply to the civil courts. Zola's trial will come on next month, and there are likely to be infinite developments before the affaire Dreyfus is finally out of the way. An intelligent French journalist who called at Mowbray House the other day said the impression that prevailed in Dreyfusard quarters in Paris was that it would be four or five years before the final vindication of Dreyfus was obtained on all points. In the meantime the efforts of the patriots in France would be directed towards purging the General Staff and those who had brought discredit upon it, and undertaking a campaign against the clericalism which has so completely condemned itself by its alliance with the enemies of truth and righteousness.

MR. DOOLEY ON THE COURT-MARTIAL.

It would be in vain to attempt to compute the square miles of printed matter that have appeared on the subject of Dreyfus and his wrongs since the close of the Court-Martial at Rennes, but amongst it all one gem stands out conspicuously, and that is the delightfully humorous skit on the procedure of the Court at Rennes written by the rising Chicago humourist, Mr. Doo'ey. By permis-sion of the editor of the Westminster Gazette I quote this farcical burlesque of the "evidence" of General Mercier :-

"Pris'ner," said th' prisidint iv th' coort, "th' eyes iv Fr-rance upon us. th' honor iv th' naytion is at stake. Th' naytional is upon us, th' honor iv th' naytion is at stake. Th' naytional definces, th' integrity iv that ar-rmy upon which Fr-rance must depind in time iv peace, th' virtue iv public life an' th' receipts iv th' Exposition is involved. Incidentally ye ar-re bein' thried. But why dhrag in matthers iv no importance? We ar-re insthructed, accordin' to th' pa-apers, be th' Coort iv Cassation to permit no iv'dince that does not apply to your contiction with th' case. 'As sojers we bow to th' superyor will; we will follow out th' insthruction iv th' supreme coort. We have not had time to r-read thim, but we will look at thim afther th' thrile. In th' manetime, we will call upon Gin'ral Merceer, that gallant man, to tell us th' story iv his life."

"I obey, mon colonel," says Gin'ral Merceer, kissin' th' coort. "Not to begin too far back an' to make a long story short, I am an honest man an' th' son iv an honest man.

admit it.'

"Good," says th' prisidint. "D'ye reconize the pris'ner?"
"I do," says Gin'r.l Merceer; "I seen him wanst dhrinkin' a shell iv Munich beer in a caafe." (Marked sensation in th' coort an' cries iv "Abase la bock!")

"I says to mesilf thin, 'This man is a thraitor.' But th' thrainin' iv a sojer makes wan cautious. I determined to fortify thra-nin' iv a sojer makes wan cautious. I determine to boun, mesilf with iv'dince. I put spies on this man, this perfiejous wretch an' discovered nawthin'. I was paralysed. An officer iv th' Fr-rinch ar-rmy an' nawthin' suspicyous about him! Damnable! I was with diff'culty resthrained fr'm killin' him. But I desisted. (Cries iv "Shame!") I said to mesilf, 'Th' honor iv Fr'ance is at stake. Th' whole wurruld is lookin' at me—at me, Bill Merceer. I will go to bed an' think it over.' I wint to bed. Sleep, blessed sleep, that sews up th' confused coat-sleeve iv care, as th' perficious Shakespere—(cries iv 'Consultation of the control spuez Shakespere!')—says, dayscinded on me tired eyes. (Th' coort weeps.) I laid aside me honor—(cries iv 'Brave Gin'ral!') coort weeps.) I laid aside me honor—(cries iv 'Brave Gin'ral!')—with me coat. (Murmurs.) I slept. I dhreamed that I see th' German Impror playin' a Jew's harp. (Cries iv "Abase Rothscheeld!" an' sensation.) I woke with a vi'lent start, th' prespiration poorin' fr'm me rugged brow. 'Cap. Dhryfuss is guilty!' I cried. But no, I will confirm me iv'dince. I darted into me r-red pants. I dhruw with fury to th' home iv Madame Cleepathry, th' cillybrated Agyptian asthrolygist an' med'cine woman. (Th' coort: "We know her, she supplies iv'dince to all French coorts.") I to! her me dhream. She ividince to all Fr-rench coorts.") I tol' her me dhream. She projoosed a pack iv cards. She tur-rned a r-red king an' a black knave. 'Th' Impror Willum and Cap. Dhryfuss,' I Diack knave. In Import within and cap. Ditypuss, 1 says, in a fury. I burst forth. I had Cap. Ditypuss arristed. I dashed to th' prisidint. He was a-receiving rayfusals f'r a new Cabinet. 'I have found th' thraitor,' says I. 'Hush,' says he. 'If th' Impror Willum hears ye he'll declare war,' he says. I was stupefied. 'Oh, my belovid country!' I cried. 'Oh, hivin!' I cried. 'What shall I do?' I cried. was not a minyit to lose. I disbanded th' Ar-rmy. I ordhered th' Navy into dhry dock. I had me pitcher took. I wint home an' hid in th' cellar. F'r wan night Fr-rance was safe!"

They was hardly a dhry eye in th' house whin th' gin'ral paused. Th' aujeence wept. Siv'ral of th' minor journalists was swept out iv th' r-room in th' flood. A man shoovlin' coal in th' cellar sint up f'r an umbrella. Th' lawn shook with th'

as

D

fo

po wi tir

convulsive sobs iv th' former Ministers. Gin'ral Merceer r-raised his damp face an' blew a kiss to a former Minister at wan iv th' windows an' rayshumed his tistimony.

"It was about this time or some years later," continued Gin'ral Merceer, "that I received iv'dince iv th' Cap's guilt. I made it mesilf. It was a letther written be me frin' th' Cap. to a German grocer askin' f'r a pound iv sausage an' twinty r-rounds iv putzels. (Turmoil in th' coort.) It was impossible, mon colonel, that this here letther cud have been written be Esterhazy. In th' first place he was in Paris at th' time; in th' sicond place he was in London. Th' letther was not in his handwritin' but in 'th' handwritin' iv Col. Pat th' Clam. Thin again I wrote th' letther mesilf. Thin who cud 've written it? It must 've been Cap. Dhreyfuss. (Cheers fr'm th' coort.) I give me reasons as they occurred to me: First, th' Armeenyan athrocities; sicond, th' risignation iv Gin'ral Alger; third, th' marredge iv Prince Lobengula; fourth, th' scarcity is sarvint girls in th' sooburban towns; fifth, th' price iv gas. (Cries iv "Abase th' price iv gas!") I thank th' audjence. I will rayshume where I left off."

THE MAGAZINES ON THE JUDGMENT.

The judgment of France by her treatment of Dreyfus is the subject of several contributions to the periodicals of the month.

MR. SWINBURGE'S ODE.

The finest is the shortest. It is a sonnet by Algernon Charles Swinburne, and stands first in the pages of the Nineteenth Century. It is entitled "After the Verdict, September, 1899," It describes France as she lies torn asunder by "fire of hell and hate," in the shame cast on her by "her meanest born" "soldier and judge." Yet she—

Lies not wholly vile who stood so great.

The poet has this great word of generous praise for the Dreyfusites and their vindication of the fair fame of France:—

> High souls and constant hearts of faithful men Sustain her perfect praise with tongue and pen Indomitable as honour.

The hearts of the fighting Protestants will be delighted with the closing couplet which brands as infamous "the holy hounds of Rome."

OVERSTRUNG ANDIGNATION.

The National Review, which has fought the Dreyfus question step by step, devotes two articles to it in the October number. Mr. F. C. Conybeare heads his paper "Sword and Cassock." It is a furious denunciation of the part played in the Affair by the Roman Catholic Church. He declares that "every cannibal instinct is lurking within" that Church "as of old." Feeling is manifestly overwrought when a writer is moved to write as follows of Cardinal Rampolla's satisfaction with the Dreyfus verdict:—

Perhaps we ought to be grateful to the Pope's chief adviser for not having at once arranged a solemn Te Deum of thanksgiving, like that with which the Vatican commemorated the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's. Probably he reserves that for the actual massacre of Jews and Protestants, for which the ultramontane Press in France has for the last two or three years been openly registering its vows.

Apropos of the faithful minority of Dreyfusards, Mr. Conybeare cites Abraham's prayer for Sodom, and then exclaims:—

Assuredly, unless the French quickly throw off the incubus of guilt and bring forth better fruits, they will some day wake up and find a big hole in the map of Europe where formerly the name of France was written.

Does the writer expect fire from heaven or an earthquake, or what?

A TOWER OF SILOAM.

The apocalypse of evil which has emerged in the Dreyfus case seems indeed to develop apocalyptic fore-bodings in even the most staid writers. An article on "France To-day" in the October Blackwood can scarcely find language strong enough to portray French rottenness. The writer quotes from the anti-Dreyfus press several appalling extracts, many of which he feels compelled for decency's sake to leave untranslated. He says:—

If these writers are in truth the mouth of France, as by their popularity they seem to be, then she is defiled indeed, her civilisation shown to be a mere external skin, veneering a body corrupt, decaying, and ready to perish.

The writer does not want to play Pharisee. He bids us look nearer home to see lest we all likewise perish. He says:—

It must be confessed that if France to-day symbolises the condition of the world, then there is much to fear for the future. If what is now springing up rankly in France is germinating throughout the world, then the beginning of a new century may be a rude one, a terrible shaking, the end of which no human-foresight can predict. Whether it be so or not, that which is now seen in France, if it leads to a destructive fall of a national tower of Siloam, should cause all other nations to look inwards with a single eye, searching whether this boasted light of civilisation may not, as perverted by human conceit and self-confidence, have become a light of which it may be said, "How great is that darkness."

RELIGION REVIVING IN FRANCE.

"The Looker-on" adds bewilderment to the situation by insisting that this frightful demoralisation of the French people coincides with a revival of their religious life:—

We stick to it that religion is kept alive in France by the women; that the birth of a man-child in that country is an addition to France of a congenitally unreligious person. But though that seems to have been very near the truth half a century ago, it is not so now. Englishmen of late middle-age, whose youth was passed in France, say that no change of sentiment, none in Paris of all places, strikes them more than this. In their time no man went to church devotionally, to few men did it ever occur that they should go at all; while nowadays as many black coats gather there as would do credit to a country parish in England. The religion which the women never lost has come back to their husbands and sons. But with religion the priest; and with the priest the priest's ascendency; and with his ascendency the depravation of every just and honest instinct which Pafaire has revealed.

In these "reverberations from La France croyante" the Looker-on finds a warning against our sacerdotalists.

THE OUTLOOK FOR DREYFUS.

Sir Godfrey Lushington reviews in the National the course of the Court-Martial at Rennes. In a preface he refers to a possibility of the Court of Cassation intervening, and proceeds—

The most the Court of Cassation could do would be to quash the verdict at Rennes. After the pardon it is inconceivable that it would send Dreyfus before another Court-Martial. To this extent, then, the present decision must, I fear, be considered final. Dreyfus must for ever forego the hope of being reinstated by a verdict of his brother officers. Much, however, could be done indirectly towards his moral rehabilitation by a Government prosecution of the Generals for the various crimes committed by them in pursuing their conspiracy against him—a course which, for other reasons, is so peremptorily required.

:leri-

y its uare

oject

ourt-

out

rous

by misuote

eral

ance

ional

must eipts

bein' We rt iv

con-

vill :

We

n'ral

th'

. I

kin'

th'

th'

rtify

ĥcer

im!

im.

Th'

'at

er.

used

on-

Th'

11")

see

th' fuss

e iv

an'

lies

She

n'a

led.

ays

he

ed.

hey

red

me

'ral

ists

oal

th'

I

A WORD FOR THE OTHER SIDE.

The article of "An English Officer" on "The Rennes Verdict and the Dreyfus Case" in the Fortnightly Review for October contains little more than a summary of facts already known; but it is interesting as a counterblast to the vituperation poured by the English press on the heads of every one who dared to think that Dreyfus was guilty. People who classify all human motives as pure unadulterated villainy and unblemished innocence make a great mistake:—

Passion, misrepresentation, and hasty inference have, however, been by no means confined to one side in the fierce fight which has, to an extent such as no other cause cellibre has ever done, convulsed the civilised world. For many of the charges which have been made against the chief accusers of Dreyfus there is as little evidence as there is against Dreyfus himself. The case is a most intricate one. The labour of studying the actual process verbal of the Rennes Court-Martial or of the Cour de Cassation is enormous. All that has reached the greater portion by fair of the English public are the exceedingly brief epitomes made under the greatest difficulties by English correspondents.

And very few English correspondents were really qualified to follow the case, as is shown by the importance they attributed to insignificant facts. Of the general policy of misrepresentation Boisdeffre is an example. Boisdeffre was classified with Mercier and Gonse, and even with Henry and Esterhazy, merely because he dared to believe that Dreyfus was guilty. But the writer, it seems to me with perfect justice, says:—

I defy anyone really to study the story and to read in extenso the evidence of General Boisdeffre without seeing that he was in all respects a high-minded and honourable man. He made one great mistake. Deceived by the best-known forgery of Henry, he pledged himself to its authenticity. As soon as he discovered his error, he, despite all the remonstrances of his friends, insisted upon resigning the position he held. It was virtually the command of the French army, the object of the ambition of a lifetime. He still evidently and really believes Dreyfus to be guilty.

Mercier, also depicted as a scoundrel, was in reality a weak, obstinate, and not very scrupulous man, who shut his eyes to facts But to suppose that from the beginning he set to work to destroy a man whom he knew to be innocent is ridiculous. The fact is, that the generals at one time sincerely believed in Dreyfus's guilt, and had no object whatever in selecting him as a victim otherwise. Catholic animus had nothing to do with the question, for many pious Protestants believed, and still believe, Dreyfus to be guilty. To confess error is not such an easy thing in the face of a populace which share that error, and a mixture of fear, amour propre, ambition, and obstinacy was what really determined the action of the generals, not dishonesty or malice.

THE ANGLICAN CRISIS AND THE DREYFUS CASE.

The revulsion of feeling aroused in this country by the disclosure which the Dreyfus Affair has made of French Jesuitry is being turned to partisan account against the Anglo- and Roman Catholics of this country. It is of no avail that English Romanists refuse to accept Gallican methods as characteristic of their communion; it is in vain that they appeal to the present Pope's significant distinction between "Latin" and "Roman"; their recognition of Latin decadence and of English ascendency, combined with their hope that the English spirit (which they distinguish from the condemned "Americanism") will eventually pervade the Vatican, is disregarded. Catholics in France have supported the infamics of Dreyfus's persecutors; therefore, runs the current argument, beware of Catholics in England—whether Romanist or Ritualist. So Mr. W. A. S. Benson in the National Review says:—

It is difficult to overstate the painful impression made on the public mind by the fearful revelation of moral decay in France under the influence of that debased hierarchy with which, as the world knows, the Ritualists were exchanging compliments but three years ago. It has been remarked and resented that the most frigid portion of the English Press over the travesty of justice in the Dreyfus affair has been that which expresses High Church opinion. Men observe and compare notes, and the final result is a distinct hardening of attitude against the Ritualist casuistry to which I have adverted.

Similarly Mr. F. C. Conybeare, contributing a simply ferocious paper entitled "Sword and Cassock" to the National Review, observes:—

As a whole the Latin Church, at any rate among the Latin nations, has been against Dreyfus, against innocence, truth, justice, charity, humanity itself. . . . Such is the Church after which Lord Halifax hankers, and with which he aspires to link his own, to which he humbly goes for recognition of English Orders.

The "Looker-on" in Blackwood bears witness to the same tendency:—

All Dissent looking on with a reawakened interest in its own quarrel with the Babylonish Woman, the English Church is in a turmoil of contention between its Catholics and Protestants. Its Catholics are English born and bred; nevertheless, every wind of suspicion that blows about the French priesthood strikes upon them with oblique wing.

The attention which has been roused by "the decivilising work of the clericals in France" turns at home a hostile glance upon the Catholic party which would "submit the English to a similar sacerdotal caste." The writer argues that the Affair sheds a new and forbidding light on the advice once thought to be almost harmless, "Follow your priest."

THE NATIONAL ART COMPETITION.

THE September issue of the Artist devotes a good deal of space to the National Art Competition, 1899. According to the writer of the notice, the total number of works examined was 97,335. Of these, 1,091 gained awards, seventeen attaining the high-water mark of a gold medal. The competition, which is between the schools of the United Kingdom and the Colonies, seems practically limited to applied art. The Studio of September also has a special notice of the competition by Esther Wood, who thus sums up:—

A final review of the exhibition, and a careful comparison of it with the examiners' report, can only excite wonder as to what principles can have governed the making of awards, especially when the praise thus implied is qualified by severe detraction in the catalogue.

But we are bound to agree with the examiners in their reluctant admission that "the work sent from the Royal College of Art, as a matter of fact, is not beyond that sent up from the general schools." In other words, the work of ordinary students in the London and provincial art classes is quite able to hold its own against that of more highly endowed and privileged persons.

Mr. Aymer Vallance discusses the competition in the Magazine of Art for October.

THE Revue Encyclopédique of September 2nd is devoted to physical education. The subject is treated from many points of view, and the various articles are profusely illustrated.

the hig mo mi Th Pu me he for wh

TI

ma arr Mo ten not stru larg

stri

their on lists long Cas more span bod and repe beer

reliquet desponde once once subs

sam

to h

In that of C spher This been flicts man root the lack hesi Con can an a tran

the

THE GREATEST OF NONCONFORMISTS.

A CHARACTER SKETCH OF JOHN MORLEY.

on

he

ce

he

ut

he

of

gh ist

ie

k

ie

fs

d

n

e

e

g

S

e

0 ıt

r

e

e

S

١.

e

A "MEMBER of Parliament," writing in the Century Magazine for October, gives a very brilliant sketch of the career and opinions of Mr. John Morley, the last high placed exponent of the principles of honesty and moderation, who has stood out against the onset of militant Imperialism which is now submerging the world. The keynote of Mr. Morley's character, says the writer, is Puritanism. In rejecting the dogmas of that great movement he has ever remained one with it in spirit. Indeed, he is described as "the greatest of England's Nonconformists," and represents in politics and life principles of which Lord Rosebery, the millionaire, successful racing man, and exponent of the policy of luxury, conquest, and arrogance, may be considered the negation. It is Mr. Morley's voice that has been courageously and consistently raised against these tendencies, and the conflict is not a conflict of persons, but a chapter in a great secular struggle. Of Mr. Morley personally the writer says :-

Mr. Morley is at bottom one of the most genial of men, largely tolerant, kindly, modest in putting forward his own views, the best of listeners to the views of others. striking proof of this that when once a certain number of ladies and gentlemen agreed to write down the name of the man among their acquaintances whom they would select as their companion on a desert island that of Mr. Morley appeared on all their lists. But nature has given him a certain sternness of feature : a long and strong nose; a face not lean and hungry like that of Cassius, but still thin and in rigid lines; a full and compressed mouth, that looks stern in repose; and a figure which remains spare in middle age—all of which suggests fanaticism to the full-bodied Englishman. In addition, there is in Mr. Morley's face and air a great deal of shy reserve, of pride and dignity, of the repose that comes to be the expression of most men who have been the companions of books and high thoughts throughout their lives, all of which might suggest something in him of that same air of aloofness and loftiness in Saint-Just which stirred the bile of Danton.

Of his religious opinions we are told that :-

Rejecting the dogmas of the churches, he is yet profoundly religious; unable to share the orthodox hopes of future life, he yet is full of the briefness of this; in something like a spirit of despair he has to turn away from the spectacle of human misery, because he cannot narcotise himself by the faith in the Deity at once of the pictist and the encyclopedist—the Deity that is at once all powerful and pitiless or remote. Mr. Morley finds a substitute for the old faiths, not in blank negation, but in a new creed that embodies much of the old.

As a politician Mr. Morley has too great solid qualities to be an entire success :—

In addition to all this, Mr. Morley is not of the temperament that feels itself quite at home in such an assembly as the House of Commons. He once said to a friend that there was an atmosphere of personal contention in the place which disgusted him. This was a characteristic saying from one whose conflicts had been the conflicts of the spirit rather than of the flesh—the conflicts with ideas, and not with men. And Mr. Morley, like many men accustomed to study and to probe ideas to their very roots, is devoid of the readiness and alertness of mind that are the special requisites of the House of Commons.

But his comparative failure has been in no way due to lack of the greatest of all the statesman's gifts :-

Put this man before four or five thousand men, and all the hesitation, the self-distrust, the pained silence of the House of Commons, disappear, and he becomes one of those whose voice can sway the multitude at their own will. Often he holds such an audience spellbound for an hour or more, the slight form transforming itself into something impressive, vivid, inspiring; the voice ringing with all the inner glow of the conviction, the strong emotion, the large vision of the man. And what is remarkable is that these speeches, while impressing enormously the immediate audience before the speaker, are equally impressive to the much larger audience outside. The wonderful literary finish, the striking and original figures, the apt phrase, the homely sense in the midst of the brilliant eloquence, make Mr. Morley's speeches the most widely read of any of his time, and the most keenly enjoyed.

The writer gives the following criticism of Mr. Morley's literary style:—

Contemptuous of glitter, it is yet glowing: it has movement, variety, above all things the strong and palpable pulsation of inner passion. In this respect the style is not only the man, but the revelation of the man. It unveils him, so to speak, and shows how much of scorn, of indignation, of pity there are underneath his typically English reserve of manner and frigidity of look

A TRADE "INTELLIGENCE DEPARTMENT."

THE attention of Chambers of Commerce may be directed to a paper in the September Forum on the Philadelphia Commercial Museum, written by Dr. W. P. Wilson, director of the Museum. He claims that his institution is unique. It was begun at the close of the Chicago World's Fair, when the city councils of Philadelphia purchased for the purpose exhibits from the Fair. It is governed by civic chiefs and other leading citizens. It has three main departments: (1) the educational, which is confined principally to teaching commercial geography; (2) the Museum proper, or arrangement of exhibits; and a third, which must be described here in the writer's words:—

The Bureau of Information, whose purpose is to keep our business men in touch with the entire commercial world, receives its data from numerous sources. Among these may be mentioned:

First, the trade journals of different countries, of which some twelve hundred are regularly received at the Museum. As fast as they arrive they are turned over to a staff of readers versed in different languages, who cull from them what facts appear to be worth preserving. The information thus received is indexed by the card system. Matters calling for immediate attention are at once brought to the notice of those manufacturers for whom they may be of practical value. For example, if it should be learned that there was a special demand for harvesting machinery in Argentina or Australia, that fact is made known at once to manufacturers of agricultural machinery; the report being accompanied by special directions concerning the ways of reaching the market indicated. Some 2,000 such notices are sent out in the course of a month; and they frequently result in opening a new market to one or another of our manufacturers.

Second, the consular and other official reports of the United States and of foreign governments. Of these the Museum has a large collection. It has, in fact, a greater number of official reports and books detailing commercial information than has the Government at Washington.

Third, the reports of special representatives. The Museum maintains a corps of special students of trade conditions, some of whom are constantly at work in foreign countries, studying the markets in the interest of American exporters, and endeavouring to bring foreign governments and dealers in touch with the Commercial Museum.

Finally, the communications of the Museum's foreign correspondents—the representatives of reputable importing and commission houses abroad. The names of reliable foreign importing and commission houses are entered on a list which is frequently revised and kept up to date.... Recently the Museum has undertaken to furnish foreign concerns with a list of reliable American firms.

Is there any chance of a similar Intelligence Department being founded in connection with the Commercial College at Birmingham or the new University for London?

DOES PROHIBITION PROHIBIT?

LADY HENRY SOMERSET'S ANSWER.

It is a powerful article which Lady Henry Somerset contributes to the Contemporary Review under the head of "Practical Temperance Legislation." She urges that all sections of the Temperance world should unite in the support of some such measure as that outlined by Mr. Whittaker, M.P., in his memorandum to the Report of the Royal Commission. She thus states Mr. Whittaker's recommendations in broad outline :-

I. Consolidate and reduce the number of classes of retail licences.

2. Reduce the number of licences and abolish beerhouse and grocers' licences.

3. Allow a term of grace before bringing ultimate provisions into operation. During that time carry out the reduction in the number of licences, and arrange compensation to be paid by those who remain to those who drop out.

4. Ultimate provisions, to come in force at the end of the years of grace

(I) Much higher licence fees.

(2) Power to further reduce the number of licences, close on Sundays, and close altogether by direct popular vote, or

(3) Adopt management by the Local Authority.
(4) Provide substitutes for and counter-attractions to the

THE TEST OF SUCCESS OR FAILURE.

She specially desires to lay stress on two points on which temperance people are not united, but on which she thinks they must be harmonious, for she holds these points to be "essential to any extensively useful scheme of liquor law reform": "first, the direct popular veto, and, secondly, the management by the local authority of such portion of the trade as is not suppressed by local veto." She observes—

Just at present it is an article of faith among all sorts of " superior persons" that prohibitory liquor laws have up to date been always and everywhere a failure, and that nobody but a faddist would propose that the power of prohibition should be given to localities in any part of the United Kingdom.

Against this prejudice she appeals not to the persistent belief of many temperance reformers, but to "the official statistics of the consumption of alcoholic liquors in certain British colonies and foreign countries" which have been republished this year by the Board of Trade. She examines these to see what has been the effect of prohibitory and local option laws in reducing the consumption of alcohol. She lays stress on this test as decisive.

RESULTS IN SCANDINAVIA.

In Sweden before the local option law of 1855 the consumption of spirits was enormous, estimated at from six to ten gallons of proof spirit per head. By the end of 1856 the amount had been reduced to little less than 21 gallons per head. Last year it sank to 1 65 gallons.

In Norway local option was introduced in 1845. Immediately beforehand the consumption of proof spirits per head was 16 litres; from 1846 to 1855 it was 8 litres; from 1876 to 1885 it was 4 litres; from 1890 to 1894 it was 3'4 litres; and is at present only 2'2 litres ('48 gallon). Since 1845 there has been an increased consumption of wine and beer, averaging per head in 1897 59 gallon of wine and 4 62 gallons of beer. In all, the consumption of alcohol for 1897 was equal to 1'18 gallons in proof spirit.

In striking contrast to Norway stands Denmark, in so many respects akin. Denmark has had no prohibitory legistation and drinks more alcohol now than ever. "The alcohol consumed in Denmark in 1897 in the form of beer, wine, and spirits was equivalent to 5'02 gallons of proof spirits per head of the whole population. The present per head consumption of spirits is greater than that of any other country in Europe."

IN CANADA.

Canada is declared by the writer to be "the soberest Christian country in the world." During 1871-75 the yearly consumption in the Dominion was reduced to 1'615 gallons per head, during 1891-93 to 1'10 gallons per head. In British Columbia there has been no prohibition except on Sundays, and the annual consumption per head has averaged 2'30 gallons of proof spirits. Prince Edward Island, which is mostly a prohibition area, shows a corresponding average of '306 gallons. Comparing per head consumption in British Columbia with the Dominion as a whole, the local option law has reduced the Dominion's drink bill at least one-half :-

The half of England's drink bill for the last year was seventyseven million pounds, but, roughly, seventeen million pounds of this sum was for duty. If we in this country had but had a "failure" of the same character, and on the same scale as that of Canada, we should have thereby saved sixty millions last year, or five times the money necessary to start an old-age pension scheme. Prohibition prohibits on a large scale in Canada.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

Prohibition in the United States is too often set down as a failure, and the wide extent to which it prevails is not recognised. Lady Henry quotes Mr. Whittaker's memorandum, where he says :-

Five States are under prohibition; 37 are under local option of some kind; 4 are under licence only. Of the 37 local option States, 25 have local option by direct popular vote; 5 have it by direct personal approval of a majority of the voters or residents in the vicinity being required before a licence can be issued; and in 7 States the local option takes the form of full control, with power to prohibit, entrusted to the elected local authority.

Lady Henry points out that in Massachusetts, for example, among 1,200,000 of a total population of 2,200,000, the liquor traffic has been suppressed by local option. "It has so happened that in every one of the States which repealed State prohibition a local option law giving the power of prohibition exists at this hour, and in all but two the power is exercised through the direct popular veto."

IN THE STATE OF MAINE.

The vexed case of Maine is next dealt with. The British Consul in that State reports that "all breweries and distilleries have been suppressed: the liquor-traffic has been reduced to one-twentieth of its former proportions." The Hon. Woolcott Hamlin, ex-supervisor of Internal Revenue for Maine, declares the beer trade to be not more than I per cent. of what he remembers it to have been, and the trade in distilled liquors to be not more than 10 per cent. of what it formerly was. Lady Henry thus forcibly contrasts prejudice and statistic :-

Prohibition in Maine is said to be "an unquestionable and abject failure." Let us look at incontestable facts. The population in Maine is 670,000. Prohibition is confessedly a success throughout the area inhabited by six-sevenths of this . There is some question as to the degree of success among the other 100,000.

AN IMPRESSIVE CONTRAST. *

Lady Henry sums up :-

Thus it appears that in local option countries—the United States, Canada, Norway, and Sweden—there has, during the last half-century, been a decrease of from 50 to 75 per cent. in the consumption of alcohol. During the same period there has been an increase in Great Britain, France, Germany, and Belgium. This broad, strong fact can neither be argued nor sneered out of existence. And all the maladministration and

sch trib fou mal froi exis

thin

bec

ev

pro

CO

ga of

loc

Be

fig Bo

sei

rat

pe

ab

rat

the

loc

La

of :

the

3 WOI not A they the of the N on 1 Mr. nati dise

It avei of h tinu Her the W phys peas and ·

agair 0 Arm of th Mr. Th

decad

his o

evasion of the laws in question, so often and so earnestly pressed on our attention, has failed to prevent the realisation of this magnificent result. . . The average of the present rates of consumption of the four local option countries is equal to 1.74 gallons of proof spirits per head per annun, while the average of those of the following countries (where there is no popular local veto), the United Kingdom, Denmark, Hungary, Germany, Belgium, France, Italy, Spain, and Switzerland—is 4.95 gallons per head. The details which are summed up in these two figures are all derived from the return published by our own Board of Trade.

Lady Henry argues that prohibition cannot entail any serious lack of vitality, since "the average of the deathrates of the four local option countries is 16.5 per 1000 per annum, while that of the European countries named above as having a high drink-rate have an annual deathrate of 24.9." These facts explain, in the writer's opinion, the tenacity with which temperance people adhere to local veto.

MESSRS. ROWNTREE AND SHERWELL'S SCHEME.

As to public management of the retail trade in liquor, Lady Henry says she knows no better scheme than that of Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell. She thus appeals to the more radical sections of her party to support that scheme:—

I am satisfied that if, by helping this scheme, we can contribute to the reduction of the consunption of drink, to say a fourth of what it is at present, and prevent habitual drunkards, male and female, and young people, working girls and boys, from fourteen to eighteen years of age, from buying liquor, we are accomplishing much good, even although it may be certain that the fourth of the traffic which unwillingly we leave in existence will still continue to do harm. We should not, I think, be deterred from doing the good in our power merely because we cannot do all we wish.

She admits the danger of the corporate self-interest which would take the place of private self-interest. But she does not think the danger sufficient to deter. She concludes—

At this time the temperance forces must combine as never before; they must lay aside all differences, and must bring together in the overwhelming force of a righteous cause the different sections of the great army of reform.

IS OUR STOCK DETERIORATING?

MR. ARNOLD WHITE writes in the National Review on what he calls "the cult of infirmity." That the Boers do not fear to face the flower of our British troops supplies Mr. White with occasion for severe diatribes against our national indifference to health and our tender care for disease.

A DISMAL PICTURE.

It is a black picture which he draws. "The higher average of life has been accompanied by a lower average of health." "Our species is being propagated and continued increasingly from under-sized street-bred people." Here is another and characteristic group of assertions, the plumpness of which is undeniable:—

We townsmen who depend for bread and life upon the physical fitness of our soldiers and sailors, destroyed the peasantry as land faddists, are destroying our merchant seamen, and we have permitted Parliament to remove obvious safeguards against disease.

Out of every thousand applicants for enlistment in the Army 403 are rejected on inspection; and large numbers of those who are admitted contract the maladies of vice. Mr. White proceeds:—

The philoprogenitiveness of an unsound proletariat is sheer decadence. Malthus, in any of the five phases through which his opinions passed, is out of fashion. Of foreign food to-day there is plenty for those who both will and can work. Of health, physical and mental, there is a diminishing quantity. Modern civilisation and philanthropy on the whole are hostile to conditions of sound national health. The boy and girl marriages of the pauper classes are a loathly scandal.

INGLORIOUS JUBILEE CELEBRATIONS.

Charities next fall under Mr. White's censure. The charitable celebrations connected with the two Royal Jubilees are thus vigorously described:—

People who wanted baronetcies pestered people who wanted to be let alone, to enable destitute invalids to prepagate the unfit ... The greed of the idle poor is roused, parental responsibility annulled, helplessness fostered, and a cult of ill-health held up to a race that must lose empire when it loses vigour.

THE CURSE OF "CHARITY."

Mr. White infers :-

Whatever factor is wanting in dealing with distress, there is no lack of money.

(2) That the struggle for life among professional philanthropists tends to pauperise the masses by killing the wish for self-help, and thus bequeaths to posterity a legacy of moral and physical unfitness greater than that inherited by the present generation from its predecessor.

(3) That so far from the Queen being honoured by the numerous projects for multiplying and maintaining the unfit, Her M tjesty is dishonoured, the country imperilled, and irremediable wrong inflicted on posterity.

REMEDIES.

What can be done? asks Mr. White. He evidently regards re-peopling the rural districts with healthy men as one of the most important aims of the reformer. He says:—

STERILISE THE TRAMP.

The change required is in public opinion. We must abandon the formulæ that the decay of agriculture is really a popular boon; that every poor man in need of help is an innocent victim. Of the London and New York unemployed, at least two out of five are not only unemployable, but unworthy of help. In other words, a sterner attitude by the average man towards pauper volupturies is essential if England is to begin to deal with her unfit. Consider the army of 26,000 tramps who infest the high roads of England, rob and rape when they dare, and use the casual wards as hotels. Extirpate them by immuring them for life, not because they are wicked, but because their stock is corrupt. Until we are content to see the idle perish, if they choose to perish, little change for the better in the health of the people can be looked for. If public opinion demands the maintenance of the idle poor, maintain them; but immure them.

PUBLIC AUD:T FOR CHARITIES.

The next stage in the process of sterilizing unfitness and levelling up the national stamina is for generous people to do more of their own charity for themselves. . . . No one should be allowed publicly to appeal for money unless his accounts are subjected to a public audit. A certain standard of accounts should be exacted from public charities as from public companies. . . . . If we are to become a healthy people, the permanent segregation of habitual criminals, paupers, drunkards, maniacs, and tramps must be deliberately undertaken before Old-Age Pensions are seriously thought of.

PREVENT CHILD MARRIAGES.

Secondly, the marriage law requires overhauling. In England a girl may be married at twelve years of age, and a boy at fourteen. A limit of age suitable to a sub-tropical country does not harmonize with our climate and social conditions. A medical certificate of physical and mental fitness for the marriage state should be exacted by a wise State before union, in the interest of the unborn, who deserve justice no less than their parents deserve compassion. Such a condition involves no hardship. A few wealthy and aged bridegrooms might feel aggrieved. If, however, people are unfit to assume parental responsibilities, and are medically pronounced to be unfit, social stigma should justly follow defiance of the highest social law.

he an est

he

to ns

hi-

on

its.

on

ns.

bia

as ty-

of da

hat

ear,

ion

wn

s is er's

ion

ion

by ents

and vith

for

of cal

the law

l in rect

The

ries ffic

or-

of

e to

to

not ady

and

The y a this cess

ited

the

t. in

has

and

nor

NEW MARVELS OF APPLIED SCIENCE.

(I) TELEPHOTOGRAPHY.

MR. DWIGHT L. ELMENDORF describes in Scribner's for October this combination in effect of the principle of telescope and camera. Experimenting in 1890 with the lens of an old field-glass, he found he photographed a cathedral through it a considerable distance off. Further experiments taught him that "the field-glass combination of lenses yielded an image nearly as large as that produced by the telescope lens, and that, too, with a camera only one-third the length of the other." Subsequently—

A negative lens, with a rack and pinion mounting, was manufactured of such a size that it could be attached to any fine rectilinear lens of suitable focus, although in some cases special corrections are necessary. This is called the "Telephoto Attachment," and was employed in making the telephoto illustrations shown. The tube is 3½ inches long and 1½ inch in

By this means he is able to take photographs of distant objects showing the clearness and nearness which the telescope produces to the eye. Most beautiful examples are given. The use of the new instrument in war is What remarkable pictures of the naval battle of Santiago, the ch. s: of the Cristobal Colon, or the gallant rescue of the despairing Spaniards from their burning ships, might have been obtained from the battle-ship New York, with a lens of this description, even at long range! I believe it will be of inestimable value for the purpose of securing views of the batteries and fortifications of an enemy's harbour, which might be done at a safe distance from their guns.

The writer says further :-

With a new combination of very thin lenses now in process of construction, I hope to be able to diminish the time of exposure so that moving objects may be photographed without difficulty. If successful, this new lens will be invaluable for the purpose of ob aining pictures of birds and wild animals in their natural haunts, long before they become aware of the approach of their enemy. . . . Instead of being compelled to carry heavy unwieldy cameras and a battery of lenses, the wandering photographer will be able to accomplish even more with a compact camera and a little telephoto tube, no larger than the single barrel of a small field-glass.

(2) WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY FROM BALLOONS.

In Pearson's for October, Rev. J. M. Bacon describes his feats in "Telegraphing from the Clouds." experiment of wireless telegraphy between a station on the earth and a free balloon was made last July by the writer in an ascent from Newbury. He says :-

The balloon carried the two requisite wires essential to the proper working of the receiver-one being led round the silk and attached to the valve above, while the other, which terminated in a water-dropper, it was my care to lower from the car as the ascent commenced. . . . It has been found necessary, when a recording instrument, suspended in free air, has to be brought into the same electrical state as its surroundings, that fine material particles should be constantly given off from it into the air, so as to equalise electrical conditions. . . The transmission of the messages commenced at about two minutes and were continued till about twenty minutes after the start, which would embrace distances of from one mile to twelve or thirteen. . . . On comparing notes subsequently we agreed that the instruments used would have continued to telegraph for another ten or fifteen miles, and that the entire distance might have been doubled by merely carrying the mast-head at Newbury some twenty feet higher.

The practical uses of this discovery are numerous:-

For reconnoitring purposes, a manned balloon, in wireless telegraphic communication with the station whence it was dismissed, might render most important service. . . . We have warrant for imagining that had we but accurate information of meteorological conditions prevailing at a few thousand feet above us-in other words, were we but in telephonic communication with a movable observatory above the cloud line-we might be able not only to foretell our weather with far greater certainty, but even in some measure to control it.

The problem of exploring the vast inaccessible regions of the globe, which has hitherto baffled the traveller alike by land and sea, may be left in future for the balloonists.

Thus equipped, Andree and his companions might have sent word of their adventures and been rescued in time.

(3) THE MAGICAL TAPESTRY MACHINE.

Under the title of "Seeing by Wire" Mr. Cleveland Moffett reports in Pearson's his interviews with Jan Szczepanik (pronounced Shtépanik), the inventor of the telectroscope. This Polish wizard "was born June 12th, 1872, at Krosno, a village in Galicia, where he grew up in the care of an aunt, for his parents died when he was very young." As far back as he can remember, he had it in mind to invent a machine for seeing at a distance.

He was deeply impressed by Jules Verne's romances and he read Polish translations of Shakespeare and Samuel Smiles. When twenty years old, he graduated as teacher, and supported himself by teaching while he pondered his scheme for electric weaving and distance-In the winter of 1894-95, he wrote to the Austrian Minister of War informing him of possible discoveries, and was sent for to Vienna. But nothing came of his overtures; and he spent two months in the city in poverty, hunger and cold, finally returning to his village school. At last Ludwig Kleinberg, a business man, heard of him and called him to Vienna. Kleinberg was nearly ruined over the weaving invention of the young Pole, eight machines being built in succession and all failures. Then a German architect joined the firm; and finally success was achieved. For this Jacquart weaving machine has been made the largest camera in the world, which weighs about two tons, and at its full stretch is nearly twenty feet long :-

The lens is five inches in diameter, and the plates are four feet square, each one weighing sixty-five pounds. A remarkable point about these plates is that they are ruled into over eight hundred thousand little squares or oblongs, the shape varying with the pattern to be woven. These peculiar plates, or "rasters," form the chief part of the weaving invention, and effect an enormous saving of time in the making of designs for carpets, gobelins, damasks, curtains, plushes, tablecloths. For instance, the design for an elaborate piece of tapestry that might have occupied six or eight months in the making by the old hand method may now be finished in an hour or less, thanks to Szczepanik's genius. It is simply a matter of photography, any picture or design whatever being produced upon sensitised paper through the little squares, oblongs, of the raster, these corresponding to the threads, shadings, and bindings of various satins, twills, woollen goods, etc. An expert has estimated that this invention will save 50,000,000 francs annually in the textile industry, and do the work of designing far more accurately than it has ever been done.

(4) THE ELECTROSCOPE.

The electroscope is described at length. It was first put to the test in 1896 over a distance of two miles. As now developed, it consists of vibrating mirrors and prisms connected by electric wire. Two mirrors in the transmitter and two responsive mirrors in the receiver are kept vibrating at a uniform rate some three or four thousand times in a second. The transmitting mirrors resolve the image cast upon them into points of light, and project these points upon a selenium disc. The transmitting wires terminate in vibrating metal plates or "lips," which allow a changing band of light thin as a hair to ser the pul syr Th she hol pa fal

tio

the

of

COL

rea

as hav thre

I

Sio

rou

say

1 Ori vall SOU of t this east disc is n Kas

Sou

mile

F pla con Cap the Rh cole En bra Sys

T one UCW fron folle (1 pres

(2 nam rail (3 cros whi pass between them. Each individual point of light falling on the selenium disc sends a distinct vibration along the wires to these "lips," and the light from the electric lamp in the receiver falls through those lips on the receiving mirrors. The separate points of light are thus reproduced in these mirrors, and the component parts of the image on the transmitting mirrors reappear on the receiving mirror in a succession so rapid as to seem to the eye to be simultaneous. The prisms serve to transmit and reproduce the colours as well as the outlines of the image.

tion

t be nty,

the

and

ave

e.

nd

an

the

th,

in ras

ad

es

nd

ed

he ce-

he ole

ng

he

his

ess

erg

ng all

nd

ng ld,

is eet

ble

ght

ng

OI

nd

for

or ght

nd

to ny

per

ornat

ile

an

rst

nd

in te

d.

st

se

ch

This marvellous invention will not be shown to the public until the Paris Exhibition in 1900, under penalty of the inventor forfeiting a million francs to a French syndicate which has contracted for the Exhibition rights. That syndicate will make all arrangements for its being shown, including the erection of a building capable of holding from eight to ten thousand persons. The inventor

FROM CAPE TO CAIRO BY RAIL.

In the October Windsor I complete my sketch of the Cape to Cairo Railway. After describing the extension from Cairo to Khartoum, I discuss the probable route beyond Khartoum:—

The ultimate route of the Khartoum railway is uncertain, Originally, the idea was entertained of carrying it along the Nile valley through Fashoda to Sobat, where the trunk line from the south was to have effected a junction. More careful examination of the proposed line of route has compelled a modification of this scheme. It is more likely that the railway will be deflected eastward, and, like the telegraph, will skirt the western frontiers of Abyssinia. There is also some talk of building the much discussed Suakim-Khartoum branch; but at present the notion is not to cross the desert to Berber, but to trend southward by Kassala. Suakim is undoubtedly the sea-gate of the Egyptian Soudan; and a line of a few hundred miles in length has always an enormous pull over its rival whose haulage exceeds a thousand miles.

SEA-SIDINGS OF THE MAIN LINE.

Pointing out that railways without seaports are like plants without roots, I indicate the contemplated lines of communication with the sea between Alexandria and Cape Town. The only port in actual touch by rail with the route is Beira, which is the natural seaport of Rhodesia, and which will, when Portugal sells her colonies, pass with Delagoa Bay into the hands of the English. The ribs, so to speak, which it is hoped will branch forth from this backbone of the African railway system, are two on the west, five on the east:—

To the West Coast there is at present talk of two railways, one crossing German territory to the British post of Walfish Bay, the other stretching across the Congo Free State, which would unite the Atlantic with Lake Tanganyika. The railways from the East Coast which will feed the great trunk line are as follows:—

(1) The Natal railways, which start from Durban and at present terminate in the Transvaal.

(2) The Delagoa Bay railway, starting from the port of that name in Portuguese territory and terminating like the Natal railways in the Transvaal.

(3) The Beira Railway, of which I have already spoken, crossing Portuguese territory, enters Rhodesia at Umtali, from which point it is in communication with Salisbury on the north and Buluwayo in the south-west. (4) The German East African railway, which is still a subject for discussion at Berlin. This line, the preliminary survey of which has been undertaken, will start from Tabora, and, after crossing the German Protectorate, will throw out two branches, one terminating at Ujiji on Lake Tanganyika, the other at some post on the Victoria Nyanza.

(5) The British East African railway from Mombasa to the Victoria Nyanza, This line is now in course of construction,

(6) Between Mombasa and Suakim on the Red Sea there is a stretch of 1,800 miles as the crow flies, a belt through which there will be no access to the sea. Not until we reach Suakim can the Cape to Cairo line extend a branch to the sea. Whether zid Berber or zid Kassala, there is no doubt but that the grand trunk will some day reach the sea at Suakim.

ONE THOUSAND MILES OF RAIL AND THEN-

I next indicate the diminution of rail-distance which might be effected by using the waterways on the route:—

If Mr. Rhodes were to utilise all the lakes on his way, he would be able to get a lift of 400 miles on Lake Nyassa, 400 more along Tanganyika, and nearly 300 on the Victo. ia Nyanza, 500 that at least one-third of the gap yet to be bridged could be crossed by steamer. If, in addition to the lakes, he decided to utilise the Nile below Khartoum, it is possible to travel when the Nile is high 450 miles from Khartoum to Fashoda; and if the floating vegetation could only be cut through by steamer and the waterway kept clear, he might go by boat to the Albert Nyanza, which is 750 miles further south. By thus utilising both river and lakes, the distance to be covered by rail would be reduced to a little more than 1,000 miles. Mr. Rhodes's idea is, however, to carry the railway the whole distance, so as to avoid transhipment, and to escape the malarious marshes between Khartoum and the Albert Nyanza.

THE ARCHITECTONIC IDEA.

The power of the mere idea then claims attention :-

The essential and distinctive characteristic of the Cape to Cairo line is that, almost for the first time in the history of the British Empire, the piecemeal efforts of widely-separated workers are visibly harmonised into a stupendous whole by the colossal conception of one master mind. Most of the achievements of the English have been more or less unconscious and unintended. In Seeley's phrase, we founded our Empire in a fit of absence of mind. But for Mr. Rhodes the Cape to Cairo line would have got itself built in sections, and it would never have been discovered that it was a Cape to Cairo line until the last gap had been bridged and the trains were actually running.

THE NEXT STEP IN PROCESS.

But the notion is still in nubibus :-

No practical proposal, it need hardly be said, has ever been made as yet to construct the Cape to Cairo line. All that is at present in negotiation is the construction of the northward extension of the Bechuanaland railway to the gold and coal regions of Rhodesia, which it is necessary to tap in the interests of the Colonists themselves . . . When the Mafungabusi area is tapped, where seventy miles of coal-beds lie waiting the pick of the miner, not only will the railway find fuel, but it will also find mineral to fill the cars at present returned empty. The hundred miles from Buluwayo to Gwelo are all surveyed and pegged out ready for the constructor. From Gwelo to Mafungabusi, a distance of one hundred and fifty miles, another section is surveyed, and will be taken in hand at once. Beyond Mafungabusi there are only one hundred and fifty miles to cross before the line will reach the Zambesi. This river it is proposed to bridge just outside the Portuguese frontier, about five hundred miles east of the Victoria Falls, where a short bridge of a quarter of a mile will carry the line across the one great river it will meet on its northward way. Mr. Rhodes hopes to cross the Zambesi in five years' time. Up to this point the Cape to Cairo line may be said to have materialised, or to be in a fair way to materialise. North of the Zambesi the line exists only on paper and in the imagination of Mr. Rhodes.

The right of way through German territory is a point which remains as yet unsettled.

"THE NEW REFORMATION":

As Mrs. Humphry Ward Understands It.

ONLY the rough constraint of popular controversy can, one supposes, account for a writer of Mrs. Ward's eminence stooping to a phrase so hackneyed, and so beloved of the theological upstart, as "The New Reformation," in order to describe her view of current religious changes. She gives this title to her plea for "a conscience clause for the laity" in the Nineteenth Century for October. The paper is a reply to criticisms of her proposal in the Times to relax the standards of the Church of England so as to admit within its fellowship librith, the Ascension, and the Descent into Hell. To Lord Halifax's assertion that "German criticism" has become more conservative, Mrs. Ward concedes that the dates of the books of the New Testament are allowed to be much earlier than the Tübingen critics and others had imagined, but she rejoins that many of the ideas once thought most distinctively Christian have been traced by modern scholarship to the times before Christ.

CHRISTIANITY HALF BORN BEFORE CHRIST.

She even says :--

We now know that Christianity as a system of ideas was more than half in existence before the Lord lived and taught—that its distinctive doctrines of the Kingdom, the Son of man, heaven and hell, angels and devils, resurrection, soul and spirit, were the familiar furniture of the minds amid which it arose. . . . The doctrine of a pre-existent Messiah, the elements for the doctrine of a suffering Messiah, the "heavenly man" of St. Paul, the whole rich and varied conception of the afterlife and its conditions, with its attendant ideas of angels and devils—to say nothing of that whole "theosophy trembling on the verge of becoming a religion," as it has been called, which the thought of Philo produced on Hellenistic ground—all these were already in existence either long before the Galilean ministry or before the First Epistle to the Thessalonians. What is popular speculation, the adaptation of Babylonian and Persian ideas, or theosophic philosophising, from a Greek or Palestinian basis, in the generations preceding Christianity, "cannot immediately become inspiration in the Apostles"—as Dr. Hausrath says.

This is, of course, only Mrs. Ward's way of putting into modern dialect, by the aid of modern research, though with a touch of exaggeration all her own, the ancient belief in an Old Dispensation leading up to and preparing for the New. The decisive question remains, How far was the Old accepted, or rejected, or modified by the Authority whom Mrs. Ward speaks of as "The Lord"? In shifting the sources of "more than half" of Christian beliefs from the two centuries after to the two centuries before the crucifixion—according to Mrs. Ward's own showing—modern criticism has brought a much larger area of belief under the historical jurisdiction—so to speak—of that Authority, and has in this way rendered undeniable service to the traditional faith.

MRS. WARD'S VERSION OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITH.

The writer proceeds to offer the usual critical objections to the Birth Stories in the Gospels, as also to the narratives of the Ascension and the Descent. But as no "new reformation" may hope to be wrought by mere negatives, the best thing to do is to present what Mrs. Ward seems to regard as the positive truth of Christianity. She says:—

Supposing that reflection on the facts of moral and intellectual experience, including Christ and Christianity, has brought us to "faith"—that is, to the personal and intense conviction that the clue to the world lies in goodness and the struggle for goodness, and that behind that struggle and the relation of our will to it lies a divine will to good, and a divine consciousness, with which our own will and consciousness are mysteriously but most truly connected—in other words, if the sum of our moral life, including, consciously or unconsciously, the influence of Christ's life upon ours, has brought us to Christ's doctrine of God—our view of the Christian phenomenon will be very different. We shall say to ourselves, "It is impossible that such an influence upon man's paid and bitters can be a very constraint to the contract of th mind and history can have arisen without special meaning in a world that issues from a divine thought and goodness. moral life is not an accident; no more are those great religious influences which in all races and at all times have carried men beyond or through the moral life into the region of religious faith and hope. The forms that these influences take—which at bottom are always the influence, so far as appears, of a man on men-may be often evanescent, but the influence itself, so far as it belongs to the central prevailing world-force, the force that makes for righteousness, cannot be without significance in the divine purpose. The influence starts from a human life; but the life is more than appears—it is a symbol, a challenge, a divine word, by which, more conspicuously than through the ordinary processes of moral education, God speaks to and calls the souls of men. The life of Jesus Christ was at the beginning, and is still, such a symbol and challenge.

"TO BE A CHRISTIAN" IS-WHAT?

To be a Christian is to adopt at once Christ's doctrine of God, and His view of the kind and nature of that life which leads us to and reconciles us with God. It is also to feel Christ Himself as a Reconciler and Revealer, and the influence of His life, historically working in us, as a healing and impelling force. It is to stand for Christ, against the selfish and material elements of the world. It is to be tenderly and humbly eager to obey the few and simple directions that He laid down as to the outward rites of His society, or ecclesia—to bring our children to baptism, unto God, in the name of the Lord Jesus—to partake of His memorial feast, as the symbol and food of our mystical union with Him, with the brethren, and with God. It is to recognise the "Kingdom of Heaven," the striving life of "faith," and the society of the faithful, as that to which Christ calls us, and to own Himself as its King and Leader. It is so to live this life in His love and service, and in the faith which flows from His heart into ours, that when death comes our dearest hope may bewithin the general, tremulous, yet inextinguishable hope of humanity—that beyond the darkness and storm of the great change we shall in some way, inconceivable to human imagina-tion, find our Master, and yield our humble account to Him, and know Him at last more truly even than Mary or Peter or John knew Him on earth, in the presence and the light of God.

The votary of clear-cut dogma may pronounce this version of the faith cloudy; but to a more sympathetic eye the clouds seem like the clouds of dawn which make the sunrise only the more beautiful. Between composing "Robert Elsmere" and writing the above passage, Mrs. Ward has evidently travelled far, and certainly not in the direction of denial.

"WE ARE NOT UNITARIANS."

To the charge that she is wishing to bring Unitarianism into the Church, she answers, "But we are not Unitarians and . . . we have no wish to be Unitarians":—

To us the Church forms are natural and dear. If we are driven out, because the personal relief we claim is denied us, we go with a sense of wrong and exile, protesting in our Lord's name against a separation which is a denial of His spirit, and an infringement of His command.

THE LAYMAN'S "CONSCIENCE CLAUSE."

The relief she asks for is in regard to the personal assent to the Creeds required in Confirmation. She says:—

Why should it be impossible that in the Church Confirmation service, the bishop should address an alternative quistion to those candidates who might have claimed it in writing? The question might be of the simplest and least contentious character—for instance, "Do you here, in the presence of God and of this mad your

WOI

thou bret and calle unce S asti white for that Mrs in A assi his not find Chu wou curi thos

say

ass dra gia fell par Ch Ro ove

> and on of 3,5

the The

de Mi

pol

this congregation, renew the solemn promise and vow that was made in your name at your baptism; desiring to take upon yourselves the service of God and the following of Christ?"

WITH WHOM LIES THE "ABSURDITY"?

Mrs. Ward closes this memorable paper with the words:-

Let there be no strangling of the free life of knowledge and thought within the Church; no laying of other burdens on the brethren than those laid by the Lord Himself; no final division and mistrust between those who trust in the same God, who are called by the same beloved name, who hope together the same unconquerable hope.

Surely any one not initiated into the niceties of ecclesiastical distinction would be ready to say that a "Church" which refused admission to applicants who thus voice their faith has ceased to be a Church and has become a sect. Yet "Looker-on" in Blackwood can say that but for her ethical and philosophical aims it might be supposed that in pressing her claim for admission to the Church, Mrs. Ward meant to bring the argument for Anglican "inclusiveness" to "reductio ad absurdum"!

A more practical criticism is that of the Rev. Dr. Cobb, assistant secretary to the English Church Union, who in his Nineteenth Century article on the Church crisis says:—

This ideal of Mrs. Humphry Ward's is magnificent, but it is not war. If the National Church could be so enlarged as to find place for everybody, the first result would be that High Churchmen, Evangelicals, and the orthodox Free Churches would remain outside her borders. This would give us the curious result of a National Church embracing everybody except those who hold to the historical presentment of Christianity.

HOW TALL CHIMNEYS ARE FELLED.

THE doom of the tall chimney has, technical writers assure us, been sealed by the introduction of the forced draught, and the prospect of the disappearance of these giant stalks makes us hail the exploits of the chimney feller. Mr. Robert Mulready has a most instructive paper in Harmsworth's for September on "Felling Chimneys." He sketches the work of Mr. J. Smith, of Rochdale, "the Lancashire steeplejack," who has felled over seventy chimneys, and all without any mishap. The writer says:—

The modus operandi employed by Mr. Smith is delightfully simple. He cuis away a portion of the base of the chimney, and substitutes thick wooden props. These are afterwards set on fire, and directly they are consumed, the chimney, deprived of its foundations, comes down with a run.

A chimney at Preston, over 250 feet high and weighing 3,500 tons, was underpinned in this way. Over  $6\frac{1}{2}$  tons of coal, with a great mass of other combustibles, were laid about the props. The closing scene in the doomed chimney's career is thus described:—

The fire laid, M.: Smith ordered everyone to stand beyond the space indicated for the reception of the falling chimney. The pyte was fired by a lady, and instantly there was a roar, and cracking and leaping of flames, as the inflammable substances caught alight, and dense, copious clouds of black smoke poured from the mouth of the shaft. Probably no chimney ever smokes so freely as it does during the few minutes before its coup de grace. But though the bonfire was blazing away merrily, Mr. Smith's task was by no means ended. . . Still, it is most essential that the fire should burn evenly, so that the props all collapse simultaneously. Mr. Smith stood before the burning mass, and with his practised eye immediately realised whether his happy requirement was being fulfilled. Pailful after pailful of liquid he dashed upon the fire, here or there, as necessity demanded. Presently there was a loud groan from the dying chimney, and Mr. Smith ran to a place of safety. The groaning and cracking increased in volume, the chimney gradually canted a little, the crowd cried, "There she goes," and forthwith the stack fell right over as the consumed props collapsed, and crashed down with a rumbling noise like thunder, buckling up in its aerial flight into several pieces like cardboard.

The description is made more vivid by the reproduction of instantaneous photographs of the chimneys in the act of falling.

UNCLE SAM'S TWO SUITORS:

RUSSIA AND BRITANNIA.

MR. ARCHIBALD LITTLE replies in the North American Review for September to the papers contributed in a previous number by Prince Ookhtomsky and Mr. Vladimir Holmstrem. Mr. Little sums up the Prince's preface thus succinctly:—

It indicates the basis upon which recent official action by Russia in China is avowedly founded, viz.: (1) the idea of autocracy; (2) the idea that the culture of the West leads to anarchy; (3) the idea that America must emancipate herself from England's political tutelage, and co-operate with Russia in China.

Mr. Little retorts :--

Now, seeing that America is in herself the living embodiment of this Western culture which Prince Ookhtomsky so unhesitatingly condemns, and to which alone Russia is ladebted for her civilisation and influence in the world, it will be seen that logic does not play a high part in the Prince's argument.

MUNICIPAL EXTENSION NO "GRAB."

To the charges of Mr. Holmstrem that our "open door" policy is only a cover for "the opportunity of plundering China," Mr. Little concedes that we were misguided in occupying Wei-Hai-Wei and socontradicting our disavowals of disintegrative intent. Mr. Little offers an explanation of the expansion of foreign or cosmopolitan settlements in China, which it is worth while remembering. He says in effect it is a case of normal urban extension, not of predatory annexation:—

Shanghai having become the commercial metropolis of China, populous suburbs have grown up around the privileged district outside of municipal rule: their insanitary condition is a menace to the health of the overcrowded "settlement," and hence their incorporation is a vital necessity. . . This is the game of "grab" which Mr. Holmstrem so virtuously deprecates. . . . This applies equally to the Hcng Kong "extension" formed by the recent cession of Kow-loong.

WHERE AMERICA'S INTEREST LIES.

The gist of Mr. Little's paper is found in the following paragraph:—

Flattering as it may be to the Great Republic to have on hand two suitors for her favour like Russia and Great Britain, I do not fear that she can long hesitate in deciding whose policy in Asia best promotes her interests; whether China should be developed under Russian autocracy or under conditions of free competition for all, as it will be wherever British influence predominates. Idealists, like Mr. Stead, see only the good side of Russian aims and civilisation, but practical men of business feel the pressure of her exclusive commercial policy and dread the arbitrary rule of her officials. There are two Russias—a liberal, peaceful Russia. and an aggressive, despotic Russia. The latter peaceful Russia, and an aggressive, despotic Russia. is now in the ascendant, and we have cause to fear its action in China. No one knows better than do Russian publicists and politicians that the British Premier, Lord Salisbury, spoke the truth when he said a year ago in the House of Lords: "If I am asked what is our policy in China, it is the maintenance of the integrity and independence of the Empire and its guidance in the paths of reform," hich

truly

ling,

w of

say

an's

in a The ious

ious

h at

on on

r as

the

the vine

ary

ouls

d is od,

s us

self ife,

It

sof

few ites

sm,

His

ion

the to

in art

of

eat

na-

nd

hn

is tic

ke

ng

rs.

he

m

ns

re

ve

an

al

ie

n

le

WHAT WAS DONE AT THE HAGUE.

BY ONE WHO WAS THERE

In the September Forum I give a summary retrospect of the distinctive achievements of the Conference at the Hague. I begin by quoting Mr. Seth Low's remark that the Conference formed the nearest approach yet known to the Parliament of Man, and I go on to point out that the Congress represented more of the world and its inhabitants than any similar assembly that has ever been gathered together for the work of international legislation. I add :-

That circumstance in itself is sufficient to give distinction to the Conference at the Hague, which, it is expected, will be the forerunner of a series of conferences, each of which will aim at being more and more universally representative. On the eve of the twentieth century the human race has begun to federate itself. That is the supreme significance of the assembly.

ONLY THREE WORLD-UNITS.

The second feature of it to which I call attention is a bit of a paradox :-

The constitution of the Congress attested in the most forcible fashion the equality of all independent sovereign states. The net result of its work has been to demonstrate more forcibly than ever the fact, that in the affairs of this world it is only the great Powers which count, and that among the great Powers only the greatest speak with decisive voice.

We find, at last, that there are practically only three units in this Parliament of the World. There is the Franco-Russian Alliance, with its appurtenances, including Montenegro, Bulgaria, and Persia. There is the Triple Alliance, with its appurtenances in Servia, Roumania, Turkey, and Greece; and third, there is the Anglo-American group, which, although not united in formal alliance, nevertheless constitutes an integer more homogeneous in race, religion, language, laws, and constitution than either of the other governing groups. Round the English-speaking group the free Western states are grouped; that is to say, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, Switzerland, and Portugal.

The destinies of the world are now controlled by three groups of Powers... The only capitals of this planet are London, Washington, St. Petersburg, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, and Rome. What these capitals decide will be done. It is a great triad, but it has never before been so conspicuously revealed before the eyes of the race, whose policy it controls.

THE NEW FACTOR.

The third feature on which I lay stress is the advent of the United States as a leading factor in international affairs. I remark upon the distinguished personnel of the American delegation, and particularly upon the fact that Mr. White and Mr. Holls were personæ gratæ at Berlin. It was, I recall, Mr. Holls who won from Germany a reluctant consent to the establishment of an International Tribunal of Arbitration. He also had the credit of introducing into international law the principle of special mediation, or the selection of "seconds" by Powers in danger of resorting to an international duel. He secured sanction for what may be regarded as an alliance for peace.

RUSSIA'S STRENGTH AND WEAKNESS.

The fourth feature of the Conference which I mention was its demonstration of the impossibility of agreement among the three groups as to the standstill or "stabiliza-tion" of existing armaments. That Russia should have faced this rebuff is a wonder to many, but I observe she has already garnered good results from this action :-

She stands before the world, and especially before the hungry millions of the European democracy, as the only great Power which is in revolt against the unending sacrifices which militarism exacts from its votaries.

I feel bound to add :-

Russia did not conduct her case at the Hague with much skill. There was a woful lack of solid preparation on the part of the Russian delegation, which, however, may be excused on the ground that its members, unused to parliamentary nethods, were little qualified to hold their own in debate. But, although the Russians did not impress anybody with their smartness or debating power, they succeeded in producing a very general impression as to their sincerity and honesty. There was indeed something almost heroic in the attitude of the Russian delegates. They were sent to defend a cause in which they personally had but little belief; and they had to do so in an arena, with the laws and usages of which they were totally unacquainted. They did their duty loyally and to the best of their ability. It was done by order of the Emperor . . . . There was something very fine in the childlike obedience that never allowed them to think of their ineptitude and inexperience as affording any reason why they should not do their best.

Parliamentarism may have many weak points, and it has certainly many disadvantages; but it carries with it one great benefit. It sharpens the wits of men; it accustoms them to express articulately and lucidly the ideas which they entertain; and it enables them to reply with rapidity and good temper to the onslaughts of their opponents. The Russians at the Conthe onslaughts of their opponents. ference were like fish out of water.

I further point out that the Conference has done the work of three Conferences rolled into one. And it has prepared work for three distinct conferences in the future : for the Revision of the Geneva Convention; for reconsideration of the declaration of Paris in respect of the capture of private property at sea, and as to the rights and privileges of neutrals in time of war.

THE SUPREME ACHIEVEMENT.

I then say :-

The chief task accomplished by the Conference, however, and that by which it will live in history, has been the establishment of a system of international arbitration. The fact that there is no statutory obligation or treaty undertaking to resort to this tribunal on all occasions, matters but little. When railways were invented many old fogies objected to travel by the cars. No laws were made compelling them to travel by rail; but the convenience of the system proved more potent than any statutory enactment. To-day every one uses the cars. So, in time to come, all nations will resort to the international tribunal, which it has been the glory of the Conference at the Hague to set up.

Of the international Commissions d'Enquête, I re-

It is possible we may find in these international Commissions d'Enquête rough and ready informal courts of arbitration, in constituting which we may use the Permanent Bureau at the Hague, and which can be brought into operation without any stipulation that we must accept their judgment as final. For the old formula, "Always arbitrate before you fight," is now substituted the new formula, "Always investigate before you fight;" and in nine cases out of ten you will never fight at all.

I conclude with the anticipation that-the historian of the future will probably take the meeting of the Conference at the Hague as marking the beginning of a new era of international union, and the visible beginning of the great work of the federation of mankind.

THE great-grand-daughters of the Queen, according to the beautifully illustrated paper by "Ignota," which opens the Girl's Realm for October, now number thirty-two, of whom thirteen are princesses. Her eldest great-grand-daughter, Princess Feodora of Saxe-Meiningen, was also the first great-grand-daughter of the late Emperor William I., and her birth twenty years ago was an event in the royal annals both of England and Germany.

TH discu The artic notic

Mi Lib suffer schoo On t youn see o tion i obser Engl bisho Mi stead

had

Kens

The

Iuly

Prim

of tr heari the i achie by b to a "not from Chur entir than look

" I escap absol and o The of the mind Discip bisho the Ju her. THE

Re

Chur

Dises "the July news says, "as ( tablis move spirit impo lishm Dises meas

THE HUBBUB IN THE CHURCH.

By VARIOUS WRITERS.

THE magazines for October are ahum and aglow with discussions of the Primate's Opinion and its consequences. The Nineteenth Century has no fewer than three distinct articles on the "crisis." Mrs. Humphry Ward's is noticed elsewhere.

"THE ARCHBISHOP WRONG."

Mr. George W. E. Russell, writing on "Lambeth and 'Liberation,'" declares the Church of England to be suffering from two great evils: (1) the ascendency of schoolmasters and college dons, and (2) "Episcopolatry." On the first Mr. Russell remarks: "To have flogged the young seems to be an indispensable qualification for the see of Canterbury, but it has its drawbacks as a preparation for ruling the Church." On the second, Mr. Russell observes that "the whole Catholic revival in the Church of England has been effected by prolonged resistance to the bishops"; yet horror is expressed if we criticise bishops.

Mr. Russell announces that down to July 31st he had steadily refused to believe in "The Crisis," although he had noticed "the bogus agitation originated by Mr. Kensit, fomented by Sir Wm. Harcourt and the Times." The real crisis was created by the Primate's Opinion of July 31st. The writer declares that the conduct of the Primate "has the effect (I expressly said not the intent) of treachery": and that "from the beginning of the hearing to the end" the Archbishop was "wrong with the intense wrongness which only an honest man can achieve." His main criticism is that "the Archbishop by basing his opinion on an Act of Parliament has deprived it of all spiritual authority." He refuses to bow to a "brand new Papacy at Lambeth." He insists that "not in archbishops, nor bishops, nor priests isolated from the general body of the baptised, that the life of the Church resides." "The Church at large . . . is 'the entire Spirit-bearing body': and to no less an authority than that entire body can I as a Catholic Churchman look for the regulation of our English worship."

"THE ONLY WAY OF ESCAPE."

"Disestablishment," he reiterates, "is our only way of escape." He quotes what Bishop Moberley taught of the absolute necessity of "the full co-operation of the laity," and closes with these strong words:—

The principle may, I think, excellently serve for the guidance of the Church of England, when at length she makes up her mind to free herself from Acts of Uniformity and Church Discipline Bills and Archiepiscopal misrulings and State-made bishops; from the interference of outsiders, and the worship of the Jumping Cat, and the appeal to the Man in the Street; and all the degrading incidents in which Establishment has involved her.

THE PRIMATE AS PROMOTER OF DISESTABLISHMENT.

Rev. Dr. Cobb, assistant secretary to the English Church Union, writes on "The Church Crisis and Disestablishment," and holds with Mr. Russell that "there was no crisis in the Church of England before July 31st, in spite of all the scare headings in the newspapers." The Primate's judgment has raised, he says, the whole question of disestablishment. He writes "as one who neither desires nor fears but expects disestablishment." The whole trend of legislation, he argues, moves that way. The undogmatic and anti-dogmatic spirit of the times makes Establishment as a permanency impossible. He anticipates that as the Welsh Disestablishment Bill followed the precedent of the Irish Disestablishment Act, so the English Disestablishment measure will follow the precedent of the Welsh Bill.

Risks would have to be run: but "the influence of the Church would be increased a thousandfold."

WHO IS TO BLAME FOR THE CRISIS?

Mr. W. A. S. Benson discusses the Archbishop's judgment in the National Review. As the writer previously cited lay all the blame of the crisis on the Primates, this writer lays it mostly on the shoulders of Lord Halifax. "If any individual may be fairly singled out as responsible for the ecclesiastical confusions of the last two years that individual is Lord Halifax." He and his friends "have played the rôle of agents provocateurs to the Protestant prejudices of their fellow-countrymen." Mr. Benson suggests a "Concordat by which the existing practice should be permitted in certain churches on condition that Episcopal direction is secured for the future." On the prospect of Ritualists going over into the Disestablishment camp, he laments that "they would contribute to the policy of spoliation just that moral respectability which it has hitherto lacked." He adds: "When I consider the practical advantages and splendid opportunities of the National Church, I am distressed beyond words by the recklessness which on the doubtful chance of satisfying certain ceremonial preferences will cast aside so great a heritage."

THE IMPENDING RISK TO RELIGION.

"The Looker-on" in Blackwood is appalled by "a nearer danger than disestablishment" and a greater risk to religion, which threatens in "an apparently impending public wrangle over the mysteries of the sacrifice of the Mass." He shudders at the consequence in the newspapers, the headlines, the discussions in the street, which would treat of the miracle in up-to-date style. "What gain to scoffing and what pain to reverent spirits!" But he expects that it will be "forced on by Romanising intruders."

Mr. Austin Taylor writing in the Contemporary Review on the Ritualists and the electorate, finds in the false position Ritualists have assumed the real cause of the commotion. "In trying how much the cannon would bear before bursting, they have been blown away from the touchhole." He exclaims :-

Why blame the Primate? To have followed up his Consubstantiation theories by a declaration in favour of incense and processional lights would have been to precipitate Disestablishment within five years. The man who doubts this would doubt that the world moves.

WHAT ABOUT THE SCHOOLS?

Mr. Taylor offers as immediate objective to the Protestant laity "the passing of a Church Discipline Bill," and as further aim a more Frotestant use of State patronage in the appointment of Bishops. He scouts Autonomy as beside the mark. The nation must decide on the character of its Establishment. Disestablishment he would view with apprehension, and only as a last resource, as "preferable to the continued Establishment of what may become practically a Roman Catholic Church." He adds:—

If the Church of England were disestablished owing to the impossibility of further maintaining her upon a Protestant basis, the teaching of half the young in the country could no longer with safety be entrusted to her care. The same policy that would in such circumstances dictate Disestablishment would equally dictate the withdrawal of State support from the Anglican schools.

"WHAT was Shakespeare like?" is the title of a short study of the chief likenesses of the dramatist, which Mr. John Munro contributes with portruits to Cassell's for October.

much

part d on hods,

ough

ss or neral

deed

ates.

the Chev

was hink

why

has reat

n to ain;

r to

on-

the

has

re:

on-

the

and

and

ent

e is this

ays

ars.

the ory

to

ich

re-

ons

in

the ny

or ow

l.

of

a

he

to ns

of

d-

50

or

nt

0.

HUMOUR, ITS PLACE AND FUNCTION.

AN AMERICAN'S VIEWS.

It is a very pleasant and genial paper on "The Mission of Humour" which Mr. Samuel M. Crothers sends to the September Atlantic Monthly. He points out how we try to deal with the immense variety of fact presented by experience-how we group them as the province of art or science or philosophy. But, he goes on-

But when art and science and philosophy have done their best, there is a great deal of valuable material left over. There are facts that will not fit into any theory, but which keep popping up at us from the most unexpected places. Nobody can tell where they come from or why they are here; but here they are. Try as hard as we may for perfection, the net result of our labours is an amazing variety of imperfectnesses. We are surprised at our own versatility in being able to fail in so many different ways. Everything is under the reign of strict law; but many queer things happen, nevertheless. What are we to do with all the waifs and strays? What are we to do with all the sudden incongruities which mock at our wisdom and destroy the symmetry of our ideas? The solemnly logical intelligence ignores their existence. . . . More sensitive natures allow themselves to be worried by these incongruities which they cannot ignore. . . . Just here comes in the beneficent mission of humour. It takes these unassorted realities that are the despair of the sober intelligence, and it extracts from them pure joy. One may have learned to enjoy the sublime, the beautiful, the useful, the orderly, but he misses something if he has not also learned to enjoy the incongruous, the illusive, and the unexpected. Artistic sensibility finds its satisfaction only in the perfect. Humour is the frank enjoyment of the imperfect. Its objects are not so high—but there are more of them.

HOW TO ENJOY HUMOUR.

Like everything else, humour begins low down, in coarse and cruel fun: as the writer remarks with a dash

The coarse man, with an undeveloped sense of humour, laughs at others; it is a far finer thing for a person to be able to laugh at himself. When a man comes to appreciate his own blunders, he has found an inexhaustible supply of innocent enjoyment. The pleasure of humour is of a complex kind. There are some works of art that can be enjoyed by the man of one idea. To enjoy humour one must have at least two ideas. There must be two trains of thought going at full speed in opposite directions, so that there may be a collision. Such an accident does not happen in minds under economical management, that run only one train of thought a day.

Mr. Crothers finds it noteworthy that humour is one of the few mental processes that we can carry on only when we are awake: a "fact" which "noble creatures" who "laugh out in their sleep," like Browning's undeveloped Man, may be disposed to question. That humour involves a certain detachment of mind is a statement less open to cavil.

JOHN BUNYAN AS A HUMORIST.

Mr. Crothers finds one of the best examples of humour pervading a serious work in Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Pro-Greatheart's eulogy on the bravery of Mr.

Fearing leads to the remark :-

It is the mission of a kindly humour to take a person full of foibles and weaknesses and suddenly to reveal his unsuspected nobleness. And there is considerable room for this kind of treatment; for there are a great many lovable people whose virtues are, not chronic, but sporadic. These virtues grow up, one knows not how, without visible means of support in the general character, and in defiance of moral science; and yet it is a real pleasure to see them.

The writer distinguishes the humour which is a flavour from that which is an atmosphere. "As we naturally speak of the flavour of Charles Lamb, so we speak of the atmosphere of Cervantes or of Fielding." Luther's humour one of his most irresistible weapons :-

Luther's Table Talk penetrated circles which were well protected against his theological treatises. Men were conscious of a good humour even in his invective; for he usually gave them time to see the kindly twinkle in his eye before he knocked them down,

Akin to Luther's was Lincoln's humour. One good remark must not be forgotten: "Dean Swift's humour would have been irresistible if it had only been good

"THE SCOT IN FICTION."

THIS is the title of an entertaining study in the September number of the Atlantic Monthly. The writer, Jane Helen Findlater, protests vigorously against the conventional Scot of modern romance as a travesty of the reality. She warmly objects to the popular fancy that the Scots are a nation of misers. Even Rudyard Kipling declares "The Scots are near." She says:—

For one miser in Scotland there are twenty men whose frugality is infinitely noble; and it is well to remember the historic Southand's burden for many a century, and if her men and women spend charily now, it is from an instinct inherited through generations of half-starved ancestors whose heroic struggles never kept the wolf at any great distance from the door.

The old jests about election and predestination are wearing thin: you may, says the writer, travel from one end of Scotland to another and never hear predestination or election mentioned.

But the writer's criticisms are not all on one side: she finds real vices overlooked as well as real virtues. She says :-

Not content with making us too bad, the novelists also make us not bad enough, and some of them even make us far too good. If some of the national failings have too great prominence, many of the national vices are almost entirely ignored. There is little or nothing said of the drunkenness in Scotch villages and of the unchastity of our agricultural districts, or of the dirt that disgusts every stranger who visits Scotland for the first time. These outstanding blemishes of our nation find small space among the newer story-tellers. The cottages are so trim and clean, the women wear such spotless mutches, the husbands sit in the ingle-neuk reading the Bible, the ploughmen chastely court the outfield workers with honourable marriage full in view.

She complains that modern writers impute a tenderness to the Scot which is not there. She unveils another overlooked defect :-

Again, independence, which is always supposed to be at the root of the Scotch incivility, is a good thing, but it may be, and is, bought too dearly at the expense of the ordinary courtesies of I think that Miss Ferrier is the only Scotch novelist who has at all shown the boorishness of our nation . . . The modern writers are merciful in their depictions of Scotch manners among

The perennial interest which Scotsmen take all over the world in their national character, and which their intellectual influence forces on the attention of the general public, will doubtless invest this paper with even more than its intrinsic value.

THE Gouin method of learning French was described in the REVIEW OF REVIEWS for May, 1892. Mr. Howard Swan has been appointed to teach French on this method to the Evening Continuation Classes of the London School Board, for students and pupil teachers.

you lux mi hir

do

00 tru

tio

sec des ser obt was

diff

wo the of bisl joy. Arc it h

had

was

ser I rep pro tho the requ

Crov han and outs eno pass sher

the of e with bade ran tion

Lon 0 Lor

STORIES FROM THE MAGAZINES.

MR. MICHAEL MACDONAGH supplies a fund of anecdotes under the heading "At the Reporter's Table" to the October Cornhill. Some of them are rather hoary, it is true, but good stories have to wait long for superannuation. A few may be cited here:—

Not long ago a young reporter attended a Salvation Army meeting professionally. As he was walking up the hall a "lassie" stopped him and asked him the usual question, "Are you saved?" "Oh, no, I'm a reporter!" he replied in a spirit of intense self-abnegation. What right had he to any of the luxuriousness of religion?

THE NEMESIS OF A STOLEN SERMON.

Here is a warning to over-smart reporters from the miserable fate of one who was so sharp that he cut himself:—

The Morning News of Belfast had, some years ago, a slight difference with the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Armagh. His Grace was announced to preach one Sunday at the con-secration of a new church in the county of Armagh, and, desirous of conciliating him, the Morning News sent a special reporter to "do" the ceremonies, including a full report of the Archbishop's sermon. The reporter was, unhappily, late for the sermon. However, he thought there would be no difficulty in obtaining the manuscript from the Archbishop. But his Grace was not going to help out of a difficulty the representative of a newspaper which had offended him. He refused to give the manuscript. The reporter's position was desperate; he knew he would be disgraced at the office if he failed to supply a report of the sermon. As he passed through the hall, on his way out of the presbytery-after his unsuccessful interview with his Grace-he espied under a table the purple bag of the Archbishop. Unobserved, he pounced upon it, and, to his exceeding joy, found the desired manuscript. Next morning the Morning New came out with a graphic description of the ceremonies, and, what it prized much more, a four-column report of the Archbishop's sermon. But its joy was short-lived. Next day Archishop's serion. But its joy was short-lived. Next day it had to publish the humiliating announcement that his Grace had delivered no such sermon! In fact, the published address was the amateurish effort of a young ecclesiastical student in the College of the Archdiocese, which the Archbishop had placed in his bag to read in connection with the awarding of some prizes !

A GRIM JOKE AT THE SCAFFOLD.

In the following instance the joke becomes all too

In the days when executions were still public, a London reporter was commissioned to attend the hanging of a man in a provincial town. He had often seen an execution, and he thought he could describe this one very well without going to the trouble and expense of a journey to the provinces. All he required was the fact that the execution had actually come off, and he could easily arrange to obtain that. Well, an immense crowd gathered in front of the gaol that morning to see the hanging. But after the unfortunate wretch had been pinioned, and the cap drawn over his face, a shout was raised on the outskirts of the throng: "A reprieve! a reprieve!" and, sure enough, a little telegraph boy waving a buff envelope was passed over the heads of the people to the prison door. The sheriff directed the hangman to suspend operations and to remove the cap from the man's face. Imagine the feelings of the unhappy wretch thus brought back from the very threshold of eternity! The sheriff opened the telegram, read it, and then with a gesture of indignation crumpled it up in his hand and bade the hangman proceed with his awful task. The telegram ran: "High Sheriff, Blanktown Prison.—Wire whether execution was carried out. Reply prepaid.—Johnson, — Office, London."

"WHA'S THAT SPUTTIN'?"

Of an old Scottish reporter in attendance at one of Lord Rosebery's meetings, this incident is told :--

Lord Rosebery was very solemn as he approached his peroration; and the meeting, under the glamour of his eloquence, sat hushed in concentrated attention. All at once a drop of moisture detached itself from the glass roof and fell with a splash on the bald head of the old reporter. "Wha's that sputtin'?" he demanded in a loud and indignant Scottish accent. The audience burst into such a roar of laughter that it was some time before the noble lord could proceed. This story affords an illustration of the indifference to the most exalted flights of our political orators which familiarity often breeds in the old and seasoned reporter.

THE WASHTUB-FOUNT OF FASHION!

Lady Broome continues her entertaining "Colonial Memories" in Cornhill for September. She has much that is most interesting to tell of her story in Trinidad. She has a good word to say for the negroes' fondness for smart clothes—a word which the driest old Gradgrind of economics must appreciate. But for this passion for gorgeous apparel it would be extremely difficult for either negro or negress to work. Food and shelter so to speak "grow by the roadside," the climate makes bodily exertion most irksome. Why should he and she toil or spin except to get them clothes which would vie with Solomon's in all his glory? In the cathedral every negress had on a most expensive hat. Lady Broome goes on:—

I once asked a friend where and how these smart damsels obtained their patterns, for nothing could be more correct or upto-date than their skirts and their sleeves. "Oh, the washer-women set the fashions here, especially yours. It is very simple: when you send a blouse or a muslin or cotton dress to the wash—and these women wash beautifully—the laundress calls in her friends and neighbours, and they carefully study and copy that garment before you see it again; and the same thing happens with the gentlemen's tennis flannels, and other garments."

SMART SAYINGS OF CURRAN.

In Cornhill also—that periodical emporium of all manner of good stories—a number of anecdotes of Curran are given by Mr. R. Barry O'Brien. Three may be repeated here:—

As a cross-examiner, Indeed, Curran's skill was unrivalled. He was ingenious, witty, trenchant, raking a witness by a fire of raillery or overwhelming him by a series of perplexing questions. "My lord," cried one of his victims, "I cannot answer Mr. Curran, he is putting me in such a doldrum." "A doldrum!" exclaimed the judge; "what is a doldrum, Mr. Curran!" "Oh, my lord," replied Curran, "it is a common complaint with persons like the witness. It is a confusion of the head, arising from a corruption of the heart."

A stingy barrister went abroad for a holiday. Somebody told Curran that he had taken with him only one sovereign and one shirt. "Well," said Curran, "he'll change neither till he comes back."

Curran and a friend were walking together one day at Cheltenham. An Irish acquaintance who aped English manners was seen coming along lolling his tongue out in a remarkable fashion. "What on earth does he mean by that?" said the friend. "He's trying to catch the English accent," said Curran.

A PRESIDENTIAL SURPRISE.

Mr. H. J. Holmes in the October Royal describes a few of the feats of facial mimicry performed by Mr. Amann, "a man of many faces." Photographs are shown of his successful impersonations of Mr. Gladstone, Napoleon, Mr. Rhodes, Bismarck, the Kaiser, and—crowning triumph—the Queen. While he was engaged at Hammerstein's Olympia, New York, Mr. McKinley was elected President. On the day when the result was known the following incident occurred at Hammerstein's:—

A wild burst of cheering almost shattered the roof; men stood up on their seats and, almost mad with excitement, threw

the finds well

cious

gave good nour

good

Sep-

riter,

the

f the

that pling

fru-storic

poor

omen

ough

never

are

one

ation

she

She

make good.

many

of the

that time.

the the

t the

der-

other

at the

, and ies of who odern

mong

over their neral

more ribed

ward

ndon

their hats in the air and yelled vociferously. Ladies waved their handkerchiefs and clapped their hands with the utmost

What caused all this commotion?

A well-known figure was seen making his way up one of the "McKinley! McKinley!" was the cry. Every possible means of expressing enthusiastic loyalty was indulged in. McKinley in Hammerstein's on the first day of his election as President of the United States of America! The audience was determined on expressing their approval of the kindly act.

Amidst the greatest demonstration ever witnessed within the walls of Hammerstein's the figure of the popular President marched up the house. Instead of sitting down, however, he proceeded towards the stage. The audience saw at once his intention. He wished to say a few words on the auspicious occasion. "Speech! Speech!" came in encouraging and vociferous accents from all parts of the house. The band played

"Hail, Columbia!"

The new President smilingly faced the audience. Then some-thing happened. The well-known features of Mr. McKinley melted before the eyes of his expectant but astonished supporters, until they saw that it was Mr. Amann, and not the President, who stood before them. A good-humoured roar of laughter, mingled with applause, concluded the incident.

The Government Waste-paper Basket.

THE Waste-paper Basket is a theme that deserves a poem. What hopes of literary fame, what outbreathings of tender affection, lie buried within its wicker walls. needed not the intricacies of the Dreyfus case to invest this indispensable receptacle with tragic pathos. It is the veritable Gehenna of disappointed, misjudged, superfluous literature. That is the editor's waste-"Her Majesty's Waste-paper Basket" as Mr. Philip Astor portrays it in Harmsworth's for September. He tells us that up till 1852 the paper ddbris of the Government offices went as perquisites to office-keepers, with such strange results as the discovery of a confidential document in a child's drum, or of a document of intimate family importance wrapped round a pound of butter. Since 1852 special arrangements have been made for the disposal of the office refuse under control of the Stationery Office. In 1885 premises were secured in Earl Street, Westminster, and a staff of sorters obtained, which together form the waste paper department. The writer thus describes the material it has to deal with :-

Hither come 3,500 tons every year, the average day's receipts varying from ten to twenty tons. How vast is this amount will be realised from the fact that if a single week's waste paper from the Government offices was thrown into Trafalgar Square, it would almost bury the Nelson column. The contents of the waste-paper basket for one year would outweigh forty-three eighty-one ton guns. . . . Vast as the present quantity is, it is increasing at the rate of eighty tons a year.

The escapade of the charwoman with the bordereau gives additional interest to the following paragraph:-

Confidential documents receive careful and effectual treatment. They are taken by the officials to the cutting-machine, where they are thoroughly sliced up. When papers of an especially secret character are dealt with, the middle section of each pile is taken out and placed in a separate receptacle from the rest. The cut fragments are then placed in sealed sacks, and are conveyed in charge of an officer to a paper-mill, the locality of which is kept secret, and are there reduced to pulp under his

The used ribbon from Morse telegraphic instruments pours in at the rate of fifteen hundredweight a week.

THE CASE FOR AGUINALDO.

A FILIPINO signing himself "Semper Vigilans," and writing from Paris, puts "Aguinaldo's Case against the United States" in the September number of the North American Review. The editor vouches that the writer is "an authorised personal representative" of the Filipino

PERFIDIOUS ALBION ONCE MORE.

The secret of the situation, as the writer describes it, will be news to most British readers :-

Perfidious Albion is the prime mover in this dastardly business she at one side of the lever, America at the other, and the fulcrum in the Philippines. England has set her heart on the Anglo-American alliance. She is using America as a cat's-paw. What she cannot obtain by force, she intends to secure by stratagem. Unknown to the great majority of the American people, she has taken the American government into her confidence, and shown it "the glorious possibilities of the East." The temptation has proved too strong. Now, in this, England is playing a double game, on the principle of "heads I win, tails you lose." If America should win, all is well; England has her ally safely installed in the East, ready at her beck and call to oppose, hand in hand with her, the other Powers in the dismemberment of the Orient. If America loses, she will be all the more solicitous to join in the Anglo-American alliance.

THE JAPANESE PRECEDENT.

The writer will not deny that there are savages in the Philippines, but insists that the Filipinos are "not an uneducated people," or unfit for self-government, and thus reveals their national ambition :-

It is the fittest and the best of our race who have survived the vile oppression of the Spanish Government, on the one hand, and of their priests on the other; and, had it not been for their tyrannous "sovereignty" and their execrable colonial methods, we would have been, ere this time, a power in the East, as our neighbours, the Japanese, have become by their industry and their modern educational methods.

THE FATAL AMERICAN MISTAKE.

The writer reviews the war of liberation up to Admiral Dewey's victory. Then he says :-

We hailed you as the long-prayed-for Messiah. Joy abounded in every heart, and all went well, with Admiral George Dewey as our guide and friend, until the arrival of General Merritt. Either on his own responsibility, or by orders from the Govern-ment at Washington, this general substituted his policy for that of Admiral Dewey, commencing by ignoring all promises that had been made and ending by ignoring the Philippine people, their personality and rights, and treating them as a common enemy.

Never has a greater mistake been made in the entire history of the nations. Here you had a people who placed themselves at your feet, who welcomed you as their saviour, who wished you to govern them and protect them. In combination with the genius of our countrymen and their local knowledge, you would have transformed the Philippine Islands from a land of despotism, of vicious governmental methods and priestcraft, into an enlightened republic, with America as its guide—a happy and contented people—and that in the short space of a few months, without the sacrifice of a single American life. The means were there, and it only required the magic of a master-hand to guide them, as your ships were guided into Manila Bay.

The practical application lies here :-

Therefore, we Filipinos say: "Recall General Otis, give the Peace Commission a free hand, try rather methods of fair dealing, make our countrymen believe that you are sincere, and be sincere and just in your dealings with them. Suspend the order for these rabble volunteers, the scum of your country.

of K deces reign Art histo Ke over a steep

Lo

footpa anoth Exc why t bound are bu needco The Metro free o

By 1 55 feet from tl reachin covered It will

IN I describ Eastbo is the v Her w portrai Gladste blume ! name, from th tracted paintin teaches She be all her

Inner 7

and the

KEW BRIDGE.

LOVERS of the picturesque will regret the disappearance of Kew Bridge. It dates back to 1789, and its predecessor, a brick and timber bridge, was built in the reign of George II. In the October number of the Art Journal, Mr. Edward C. Clifford gives a brief history of the bridge. He writes:—

Kew Bridge, as it stands, is only 400 feet long, and passes over a central arch 22 feet high, so its gradients are necessarily steep; and its width of twenty-four feet, reduced by a narrow footpath on either side, allows room but for one vehicle to pass

Except its steepness and narrowness there seems no reason why the bridge should go. The beautiful white stone of which it is built is good and sound, and hard as ever, and as firmly bound together as when first fitted. The bottoms of the piers are but a little chipped, the structure itself seems never to have needed repair.

The present bridge was bought by the Corporation and the Metropolitan Board of Works in 1872, and subsequently made free of tolls. The new bridge is to be built of granite; to be

THE OCEAN STEAMSHIP OF 1933.

IT is a breath-taking forecast which Mr. Joseph R. Oldham contributes to Cassier's for September under the heading "Untrammelled Shipbuilding and Marine Engineering Development."

From the rate of progress which has marked the last third of a century, he calculates what the next third of a century will bring about. He says:—

In a third of a century after the New York was launched [in 1865], the tonnage of the largest screw steamer,—omitting the Great Eastern,—had increased five-fold, the Lucania reaching 12,952 tons. If the capacity of the largest ocean steamers were to increase in like ratio during the next thirty-three years, the largest steamer would then be of 65,000 gross register tons. The corresponding dimensions,—if it be possible that my idea of length to breadth and breadth to depth will prevail in those days,—would be, length, 1,100 feet; breadth, extreme, at upper deck, 120 feet; depth, 75 feet.

Twenty-five years ago the Engineer of London published an article which declared an ocean speed of twenty-five

By permission of ]

and

the orth

r is oino

it,

ness

the

the aw. by ican

her

st."

and vin, and and in will can

the an the nd, heir our ral ded

ritt.

ern-

hat

hat

ole,

non

of

at

you

the

sm,

en-

hs,

ere

ide

the

ng,

for

KEW BRIDGE: FROM A DRAWING BY EDWARD C. CLIFFORD.

[The " Art Yournal."

55 feet wide, and have longer approaches, starting at one end from the drinking-fountain, opposite Kew Bridge Station and reaching at the other almost to the church, whose copper-covered cupola shows so vividly green against a storm cloud. It will stand stiff and formal on the old scene.

Edna Lyall at Home.

IN the Young Woman for October, Leily Bingen describes Edna Lyall as she found her at her home in Eastbourne. She lives there with her married sister, who is the wife of the Rev. H. G. Jameson, vicar of St. Peter's. Her work-room is at the top of the house. Among the portraits in the room are those of Michael Davitt, Mr. Gladstone, and the Tsaritsa. She adopted her nom-deplume "Edna Lyall" by making a name out of her real name, which is Ada Ellen Bayly. She is now suffering from the after-effects of an attack of malarial fever contracted in Italy. She is amusing herself with water-colour painting. She writes her novels with a typewriter, and teaches a class of shop-assistants every Sunday afternoon. She began novel writing as a child, and devoted nearly all her spare time to it. Her father was a barrister of the Inner Temple. Of her novels she likes "Doreen" best, and then "Knight Errant."

miles an hour an impossibility. That impossibility is now accomplished fact. So the writer goes on to say:—

Before a third of the next century expires, another increase of at least 50 per cent. in ocean speed may safely be prophesied. How this is to be accomplished it would be too hazardous to attempt to surmise; but I may point out how I think it will not be done, and that is by carrying and handling five thousand tons of bunker coals in a hull drawing nearly fifty feet of water. The model of the ocean mail steamer of the next century will probably be that of a very much enlarged destroyer of great breadth and length and small draught of water forward.

Lighter and stronger materials will compose the structure, which may be moved by multiple propellers, possibly working in a tunnel, so that a number of wheels could be worked by separate shafts, actuated by rotary motors, as the sizes of screw shafts and engines even now under construction are perilously large; or the motive power may be produced by compressed air or gas. Then, the form of least resistance probably being discovered, the hull, broad and light in comparison with the augmented dimensions, will rise on top of the waves rather than pass through them. The rolling and pitching may be more severe than at present, but with improved cabins and a shortened voyage, the difference may not be noticed. The construction of a steamer of sixty-five thousand tons will probably not trouble the constructors of the future nearly as much as did the building of the Great Eastern those of the past.

AN ARTIST'S PARADISE.

THE frontispiece of the October Art Journal represents one of the charming etchings by Mr. Percy Robertson. In a note to accompany the frontispiece M. W. writes:—

The beautiful little Surrey village of Shere lies about midway between Dorking and Guildford to the southward, and under the shelter of that long ridge of the North Downs, which runs almost directly from one town to the other. Surrey has always been a favourite county with artists—Mrs, Allingham and the late Birket Foster, among others, have discovered the material for some of their best pictures within its borders—and perhaps none of its picturesque little villages has found more favour in their eyes than Shere. Nothing is wanting here to complete the happiness of the landscape-painter, whether he may happen to prefer rugged, natural scenery, untouched by the hand of man, or the richer and more cultivated pastoral country.

SHERE: FROM AN ETCHING BY PERCY ROBERTSON, A.R.E.
(From the Art Journal for October.)

Shere itself, with its quaint old houses and its placid stream, offers many pictures of singular charm, while the bolder scenery of Hindhead and Leith Hill may be found within comparatively easy range, and the neighbouring villages—Wotton, once the residence of the author of Evelya's famous d'ary, Gomshall and Albury—are all of them notable for the beauty of their situation and surroundings.

Mr. Pobertson, which appea ed in these pages lait November.

The artist has been equally happy in his rendering of "Shere," seen from the adjacent meadows, on a calm, sunny afternoon of late autumn, one of those afternoons of Indian summer which bring back recollections of June, even in mid-October.

Everything is drawn with that sympathy which comes of combined love and knowledge. The tree branches, rapidly becoming bare, are delicately traced against the warm, tender sky, their feathery indefinite forms contrasting with the sharplines of the church tower and the dark roofs and square chimneys of the more distant houses of the village. The recession of the field, from the foreground to the bushes in the middle-distance, is ably suggested. The various figures too—the old man tempted out by the mild sunshine, the country boy who idly dabbles with his stick in the stream, the little girl in sun-bonnet and printfrock who watches him, the children going home by the field-path—all help to add to the completeness and charm of this sympathetic and admirable picture of English rural life.

THE TSARITSA.

MR. ARTHUK MEE in the Young Woman writes an article entitled "Empress of a Hundred Millions: the Life Story of the Czarina." It is illustrated by photographs of the Tsar and Tsaritsa and the baby. None of the portraits do her justice. Some of the views of the Russian palaces and scenes are very good. The first nurse of the Empress was an English lady, Mrs. Orchard, and her first governess, Miss Jackson, was also English. She grew up to be the closest companion of her widowed father, but he also died while she was still young, and she left her home to live with her sister, the Grand Duchess Serve.

Mr. Mee gives a romantic account of the courtship of the Emperor, asserting that the Emperor's father opposed the union with all the emphasis he could command. Mr. Mee says the fact that Princess Alix was a Lutheran was almost a fatal objection to their marriage. Kaiser Wilhelm also opposed the match. Mr. Mee asserts that one reason why the present Emperor was sent on a tour round the world was in the hope that in the constant change of scene he would forget his love, and come back to do as he was told. Mr. Mee says, "So modestly has she lived amid the splendours of the Russian Court that the world knows little about her, save that she is a womanly woman who lives in a secluded mansion and nurses her own children." Her palaces and her jewels are nothing to the happy mother in Peterhof Park. Tall, slight, with hazel eyes and fair hair, she spends her day playing with her children and studying the condition of the Russian poor. The Empress is head of the body charged with the arrangements for poor-law relief, and has read all the best works on the English poor-law. Only three of the thousands of their wedding presents are in the Empress's private rooms: first, a gift of tapestry from the French people; secondly, a Japanese ivory sea-eagle; and a threefold Japanese screen of grey and greenish white silk, representing the sea in a storm and the foam of the breakers. The Tsaritsa's bedroom at Peterhof is hung with blue satin brocade. There is not a picture in it. She speaks five languages. Riding, painting, rowing, sketching, swimming and tennis are her favourite recreations. The following story is new to me. Mr. Mee says:

Freed from the fear of the censor, she indulges with her penand pencil in a way which makes even Russian Ministers tremble, drawing them in caricature which would mean death or Siberia to any other artist. She has drawn the Tsar himself—a solemn, bearded, but bald infant in long clothes, tied in an armchair and surrounded by a host of Grand Dukes and Grand Duchesses armed with feeding-bottles, all insisting on feedinghim in a different way. No wonder the Tsar is screaming at the top of his voice! MR publis "A | numb with been like w table. histor Count and p the di preser provin

The sensil place.

At their lande across flakes but we tried a the gathe cohidder.

Ditch balan £333-a bala there a acres a amount or in which living As a n

Mr

Thi
the co been 1899.'
Wh Protect dream mind, bounty
it is to under

Who State is upon regoing dishons for Bri in such butter.

or de becon

THE END OF "THE FARMER'S YEAR."

ere,"

n of hich

s of oidly

nder

harp

neys

ince,

pted

with rintield-

this

an

the oto-

e of

the first

ard,

ish.

wed

she

ess

ship

her om-

age. Mee

was hat

rget

Mee

s of her.

ded.

and

hof

nds

the

d of law

lish

ing

gift

ese

rey

rm

om

e is ng, her

ne.

pen

ble,

or —a rm-

and

ing

the:

MR. RIDER HACGARD'S diary for 1898, which he has published in in-ta'ments in Longman's under the title of "A Farmer's Year," comes to a close in the October number. The reader will feel a genuine regret on parting with this genial companion of so many months. It has been delightful reading. It does for the farm something like what Oliver Wendell Holmes did for the breakfast table. It will form a vivid and valuable picture for future historians of present day agricultural life in the Eastern Counties. The last instalment is full of varied wisdom and picturesqueness. The project of a Queen's nurse for the district leads the writer to wish that the charities at present distributed in doles of coal could be applied to providing competent nurses for the rural population.

MR. RIDER HAGGARD IN THE STONEYARD.

The writer was on a visit to the workhouse, and sensibly resolved to put himself for once in the vagrant's place. He says:—

At Heckingham there is a yard where tramps, in payment of their lodging, are set to break granite to be used in road repairs. To-day I had a try at this granite breaking, and a poor hand I made of it. I hit hard and I hit softly, I hit with the grain and across it, I tried the large and the small hammer. As a result flakes of sharp stone flew up and struck me smartly in the face, but very little granite did I succeed in breaking. My companion tried also, and after him the master, who said that he understood the game, but neither of them did any better. I have come to the conclusion that even in breaking stones there must be a hidden at.

A NOVELIST-FARMER'S BALANCE-SHEET.

Mr. Haggard is good enough to give the annual accounts of his two farms (Ditchingham and Bedingham). Ditchingham, with a gross income of £3,088, shows a balance available for rent, interest and living expenses of £333. Bedingham, with a gross income of £1,028, shows a balance of £89; or a joint profit of £422. But—there must be deducted from this sum of £423 rent on say 250 acres at £1 an acre, and interest on £2,000 capital at 4 per cent, amounting to £80, plus management expenses—let us say £20, or in all £350. This leaves a total of £72 154. 4d., upon which the farmer would be supposed to exist, that being the living profit left after the satisfaction of outgoings and charges. As a matter of fact, however, he would not be able to exist on it.

THE LAST RESORT OF BRITISH AGRICULTURE.

This retrospect suggests the reflection that "taking the country through, the farming outlook has seldom been more gloomy than it will be at the beginning of 1899." He goes on:—

What then is the farmer to do and where is he to turn for aid? Protection, at any rate upon wheat and meat, is at present but a dream, and he will be wise if he dismisses the hope of it from his mind. A bounty on corn might help, but will there ever be a bounty until some great war has taught the people how necessary it is that a certain proportion of our acreage should be kept under corn? I doubt it.

What remains then? I can see but two things: help from the State in the shape of the equalisation of the taxes and rating upon real and personal property, and the passing of a thoroughgoing and comprehensive Act inflicting severe penalties upon dishonest traders who, amongst other frauls, sell foreign meat for B:itish, and colour the fat of animals and other substances in such a way that the public buy them believing them to be butter.

THE CLOSING DOXOLOGY.

"The Farmer's Year," however, does not end in gloom or despair, but with a devout prayer which may yet become a Watch Night collect:—

Now, above every time and season, in this midnight moment while the world beneath us leaps to the pathway of another year, to Him who, with an equal hand, makes the Star, the Child, and the Corn to grow, and, their use fulfilled, calls back the energy of life He lent them; to the Lord of birth and death; of spring, of summer, and of harvest, let us make the offering of a thankful spirit for all that we have been spared of ill and all that we have won of good, and rise up in quietness and confidence to meet the fortune of the days to be.

A fitter ending it would be hard to find.

LORD PAUNCEFOTE IN WASHINGTON.

MISS ELIZABETH BANKS'S paper in Cassell's on the British Embassy in Washington will be read with especial interest at this moment, and with peculiar satisfaction by all friends of the Anglo-American good-fellowship.

" THE EMBASSY."

They will say, "This is just how it should be," when they learn that the British Embassy stands a near next in rank to the President's Court. The writer says:—

All the other embassies and legations in Washington are properly designated by their nationality. . . . Not so with the representative of Great Britain and the magnificent house on Connecticut Avenue, which he makes his private and official residence. The house is called "the Embassy," and the Ambassador himself has always been popularly spoken of as "Sir Iulian."

Next to receiving a special invitation to the White House, no invitations are so highly prized as those which come from the British Embassy. Ever since Sir Julian and Lady Pauncefote, with their four daughters, went to live in Washington about ten years ago, the British Embassy has been, socially, the most important of all the embassies and legations in Washington. This has been due, in a great measure, to the personal popularity of every member of the Ambassador's family. He himself is the typical, hearty, likeable Englishman of the sort that is always popular with Americans, while Lady Pauncefote and her four daughters won their way to the heart of Washington at once because of their freely expressed admiration for people and things American and especially the city of Washington itself, which they consider the most beautiful modern city they have visited. It is understood that during the year Lady Pauncefote dispenses hospitality to a larger number of people than any other hostess in Washington, with the exception, of course, of the President's wife.

The Misses Pauncefote, it appears, have maintained the best traditions of English out-of-door life. Their long walks fired the emulation of a number of American girls, who formed a Pedestrian Club, which, however, collapsed with the first long tramp. The Ambassador's daughters were among the very first in Washington to make cycling a fashionable sport for girls. Lord Pauncefote rides the tricycle, and is said to be infecting President McKinley with a desire to do likewise.

A FAIR ANCESTRAL LEGEND.

Miss Banks adds a legend which forms fitting ancestral background to the modern Knight Paladin of Peace:—

There is a very interesting old story connected with one of the Ambassador's ancestors and the namesake of his daughter Sibyl, which Washington people are very fond of repeating. During one of the Crusades the ancestor, Sir Grimbald Pauncefote, was taken prisoner by Saladin, who refused to release him unless his young bride, Sibyl Lingoyne Pauncefote, sent to him her beautiful white hand as a present. The lady, hearing of the condition on which her husband would be released, cut off her hand and sent it. A long time afterwards, so it is said, the truth of this story was proven, for when the skeletons of the knight and his lady were exhumed, the bones of only one hand were to be found; and even now in one of the old charches of Gloucestershire there are to be seen metallic figures of Sir Grimbald and his wife with one of her hands cut off.

THE LATE ROBERT INGERSOLL.

THE North American Review for September republishes for its opening article a paper by the late Robert G. Ingersoll entitled "The Agnostic's Side." This is followed by a study of Ingersoll's influence, contributed by his old personal friend and controversial foe, Rev. H. M. Field, D.D.

HIS GENEROSITY.

The writer found Ingersoll's personality to be not as that of other Americans. In physique and gait he might have been taken for an Englishman. He says:—

In all the years that I have known Ingersoll, I never saw him in a hurry. The crowd might rush by, but he never quickened his pace, but walked slowly as if in deep thought. When I met him in Broadway he was always ready to stop under an awning, or by a friendly door, and discuss the questions of the day.

or by a friendly door, and discuss the questions of the day.

The two gods that Americans worship are time and money.

Ingersoll cared for neither. Money had no attractions for him

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

except for the use he could make of it. I am told by one who knew of his affairs perhaps even better than Ingersoll himself, that his income from his practice at the B11 and his lectures was often not less than a hundred thousand dollars a year, yet it was soon scattered. He could not deny himself the pleasure of giving it away. The tales of his generosity had gone far and wide, and every morning there was a pile of letters on his desk from poor clerks who were starving in garrets, and young women who could not find any means of support. To such appeals he responded so bountifully that they came faster and faster. His friends warned him against the impositions that were practised upon him, and told him that he ought to have a bureau of inquiry, but he answered that he had rather be cheated a dozen times than leave one poor girl to suffer and perhaps die!

So friendly were the reverend writer and the deceased agnostic that in the public controversy between them Dr. Field would privately confess to Ingersoll the weak points in his own argument.

HIS ORATORY.

Of his oratorical power, Dr. Field says :-

Though Robert Ingersoll was a captivating talker, he was far more than that; he was one of the greatest orators that our country ever produced. It was not by the fireside, but on the platform, facing thousands of men, that he showed all his power. I once asked Mr. Godkin, the editor of the Evening Post, if he had ever heard Ingersoll? He said, "But once." It was in the old Academy of Music, and the pressure was so great that the police had to make a passage to the front of the platform. The hour to begin was eight o'clock. Ingersoll rose on the minute, and spoke till eleven, and not a man moved! For three hours he held that vast audience in the hollow of his hand! No wonder that the eager multitude were swept away by him as the forest is swept by the wind. He was born to be an orator

LORD KELVIN ON "DESIGN."

Ingersoll, says Dr. Field, leaves no successor :--

One after another the advocates of atheism find the ground sinking under their feet:

"The captains and the kings depart,"

while in their place come the great men of science like Newton, and Faraday and Kelvin, the last of whom has assured me over and over again that all the philosophy and all the science of the world cannot shake the simple argument from design, that is so simply and so admirably set forth in Paley's "Natural Theology," Against such authority no glittering theories can make any impression. They will have their little day and then fade away in the distance, and be seen no more, while the truth of Christianity will abide for ever.

ITALIAN CAPTAINS OF AGRICULTURE.

IN agriculture as in manufactures the cry arises for trained "captains of industry." Given the right leader, the led will go every day to school under his leadership, and the technical instructions of the rank and file will not be a thing of County Council or School Board alone. This was the idea which, according to C. and L. Tod-Mercer, writing in Longman's, fired the mind of a model Italian landlord.

THE AIM OF THE COLLEGE.

His aim was to form a college for young Italians who were, or were to become, landowners, where they might receive the highest training in everything, economic and moral, connected with the management and development of their estates. It is pleasant to learn—

The idea has taken shape, and in 1896 the Government handed over the magnificent old Benedictine monastery of San Pietro at Perugia, with all its lands, for the establishment of the new institution. There, under the fostering care and through the untiring zeal of Count F——, it is rapidly becoming one of the first agricultural colleges of Europe, and has already attracted attention and admiration in Germany and Russia from the comprehensiveness and efficiency of its scheme of instruction. The care and interest taken in the welfare and progress of the students individually by the Count is quite paternal, and, if a great leaven of all that is noble, wise and helpful is not gradually spread by means of this college, it will not be his fault. It bids fair to become international.

Great attention is paid on this estate to the housing of the workpeople. The Count builds model cottages and lets them at a rental of 4½ per cent. on the outlay. He shares the opinion of his countryman, Professor Nitti, that "in manufacture as in agriculture wherever energy is given out the well-fed labourer proves superior to the underfed," and he visits the women and tries to get them to improve their cooking. He is also full of care for their health in improving their water supply; he insists on cleanliness both in their dwellings and in their stables, and provides for them a municipalised chemist shop. One instance very characteristic of his methods came to our notice as we studied the oil-making department. The olives are crushed at San Venanzio by steam power; men work night and day in gangs which are fed during the six weeks' severe work by their master, and every day each man is weighed to see that he gains in weight; if not, he is put to other work. They nearly always do gain, and then the Count is satisfied that the rations given are sufficient.

IN unde Finn Finl depr says a Sta prov of h senti of p that sudd ship humi right hand when and i dislo idea

unrip

and v

Bu

Sprei

disch

serve

rewar of ha his p Jäger which 1785 Russi Cathe Finla "Rep separa which of this "It is antage dhe S suring tuppor that t "they dent o to Sw them, of disg and in

The taken develo Russia becam 1808-9 Spreng Finlan

provin

THE FINNISH COUP D'ÉTAT.

the wer.

f he

the

the

The

ute.

ours No

the und ton.

over

s so

any way

n of

for

der,

hip.

will

one.

rod-

odel

who ight

and nent

nded

ietro

new

f the acted

com-

f the

, if a

ually

bids

f the

them

inion

as in ourer

n and ill of nsists

, and

tance

ay in their gains lways

en are

A HISTORICAL SKETCH.

IN Tilskueren for September, Herr Ivar Berendsen, under the above heading, contributes some pages of Finnish history to make clear the grounds on which Finland bases the rights of which she has recently been deprived by Russia. It is in the first place necessary, says Herr Berendsen, to satisfy ourselves that Finland is a State, before we talk of coups d'état. Were she but a province of Russia the justice of this sudden deprivation of her liberties would be a mere matter of opinion and sentiment, and the nation most innocent of abuse of power might cast the first stone. But, to prove that Finland is no mere dependant-waking up all suddenly from a long happy dream of tranquil ownership and proud independence to the grim and humiliating reality—but, in very truth, a free State whose rights had been rudely wrested from her by a stronger hand, Herr Berendsen takes us back to the year 1780, when she was still a happy subject of the Swedish king, and the Finnish Separatists were a small handful whose disloyalty and discontent could only evoke disgust. The idea of Finnish independence was entirely new and unripe, and found favour only with the military nobility, and with but few even of this class.

THE FIRST SEPARATISTS.

But in those days was one Finnish-born Göran Magnus Sprengtporten, who at his own request had obtained his discharge from the Swedish army, in which he had served with much glory. He considered his valour ill-rewarded, and accused Gustav III. of ingratitude and of having forgotten his promises. Settling down on his property in Finland, he joined Major Johan Anders Jägerhorn's little political society, the "Valhalla Order," which included a small group of Separatists. In 1785 he went to Holland, and in 1786, through the Russian Ambassador at the Hague, he laid before Catherine II. a detailed plan for the separation of Finland from Sweden, the country to be known as the "Republic of the United Provinces of Finland." The separation was to be brought about by a Revolution, which, however, never took place. Across the envelope of this document Catherine wrote with her own hand, "It is easy to see that Finland's independence is not antagonistic to the interests of Russia." The next time dhe Separation question was brought forward was in 1788 suring Russia's war with Sweden, this time by Jägerhorn, tupported by Sprengtporten. The Finns were promised that the Russian Government should guarantee that "they should themselves decide their destinies, indepen-dent of all save God." Nevertheless, they remained loyal to Sweden. The plan obtained few supporters among them, and none whatever outside the nobility. Clamours of disgust for the traitors reached the king's ears instead, and in the war of 1808-9 the Finns had an opportunity of proving their loyalty.

THE RUSSIAN PLAN OF CAMPAIGN.

These Separatist proposals are, therefore, not to be taken as signs of Finland's later political trend and development. It was Sprengtporten's relations with Russia—into whose service he finally entered—which became of deep significance, and the happenings of 1808-9 are not to be understood without them. It was Sprengtporten who composed the first proclamation to Finland, three days before the beginning of the war.

It was dated from Frederikshamn, and called upon the Diet to assemble at Abo to consider, in accordance with the customs of the Swedish Diet, all matters appertaining to the country's welfare. Sprengtporten formed the Russian plan of campaign and took part in the war. When in March he returned to St. Petersburg, the wind was blowing from another quarter.

THE TSAR'S PROCLAMATION AND PROMISE.

On the 16th all Europe was notified that Finland was now considered "a conquered province," and when on the 8th of May Sveaborg fell into the hands of the Russians, Finland was ordered to take the oath of allegiance. The war, however, was not the military walk-over the Russians had expected. With undaunted courage, no little strength and skill, great fanaticism and boldness, the small Finnish forces advanced against the enemy. With long odds against them, they yet succeeded in driving their conquerors from large portions of the country. For this reason the oath of allegiance was only taken in the besieged districts and with feelings of furious indignation, while many fled to escape it. Ministers protested against the disloyalty required of them; the Finnish officers refused to be sent home; rebellions began; and Sprengtporten-strongly supported from now by Speranski, who had the Tsar's ear at this period of his reign, unwearyingly protested that only the keeping and confirmation of the country's old constitution could possibly restore peace and make conquest certain. On June 5th accordingly the Tsar issued the first signed proclamation: "Finland," he says, "cost what it will, shall belong to Russia, but the country's old constitution and privileges shall faithfully be kept in power."

From this first proclamation, step by step, Herr Berendsen follows the history of Finland up to the present denouement. He endeavours only, he says, to make clear the fact that the Finnish question is an international question, and that the championship of Finland is not a mere unwarrantable interference in the inner affairs of Russia.

Gossip about Mr. Chamberlain.

MR. ARTHUR MEE, writing in the Young Man upon the "Life Story of Mr. Chamberlain," has not very much that is new to say; but some of the gossip which he collected may be interesting just now when Mr. Chamberlain is so much to the front. The Colonial Secretary was born at 3, Grove Hill Terrace, Camberwell, on July 8th, 1836. He went to school at 122, Camberwell Grove. His dame was Miss Pace. With her he only remained for one year, and left Miss Pace's school to attend a private school in Canonbury Square, kept by the Rev. Arthur Johnson, after his parents had removed to Islington. From thence he went to the London University School, where he remained till he was sixteen. At eighteen he went into the shoe business, where he remained for two years. Then he went to Birmingham, and began to make screws. He was a teacher in the Sunday-school with four of his brothers in the Unitarian Church of the Messiah. He taught in the night-school, took part in penny reading entertainments, he was president of the Mutual Improvement Society, and a prominent figure in a local debating society at Edgbaston. At that time his political views leaned towards Toryism, and in 1858 he is reported as defending the aristocracy against Mr. Bright's attacks. At thirty he was an outand-out republican, and the rest of the story is too familiar to need repetition.

THE FOREIGN FRIENDS OF FINLAND.

ADVENTURES OF THE DEPUTATION TO THE TSAR.

HERR IVAR BERENDSEN'S painstaking examination in Tilskueren of Finland's rights and wrongs is really a kind of preface to the rather amusing description Dr. C. M., Norman-Hansen gives in the same magazine of the adventures of the international deputation to the Tsar. Dr. Norman-Hansen, who together with Herr Berendsen had obtained the Danish signatures to the International Address, was selected as the delegate for Denmark; Nordenskiöld, as a Finn by birth, being chosen by Sweden as peculiarly fitted to champion the cause of the land of his birth. It was decided that the different delegates—representing England, France, Holland, Belgium, the Scandinavian countries, Austria, Hungary, Switzerland and Italy—should all meet at St. Petersburg on the 26th of June, each with his country's address.

"UNWORTHY OF CONSIDERATION."

Dr. Norman-Hansen went via Stockholm, and, as the train neared the Swedish capital, the morning papers were handed in. Dr. Norman-Hansen had just opened the paper, when he saw his fellow-traveller crush his in his hands impatiently and toss it out of the window. Then he pointed to a telegram in Dr. Norman-Hansen's copy. The Tsar had deigned at last to read the address of the Finns and had written across it with his own hand:

"Unworthy of consideration!"

After that it seemed the journey must be vain—the Danish address especially, since it simply besought the Tsar to receive and consider the address of the Finnish people; and yet, on the other hand, perhaps the time could not have been better chosen. In blank uncertainty, Dr. Norman-Hansen pursued his way. At Helsingfors he was met by Nordenskiöld, and during the hour the steamer lay at the quay they went ashore. They questioned influential men who knew their purpose; was it worth while to continue the journey? Yes, was the answer. "Might it not hurt Finland?" "Nothing can hurt Finland!"

" MIXED GOODS."

They arrived at St. Petersburg on Sunday, June 25th, the day of the meeting, waiting anxiously for the others. Suppose the delegates from the bigger countries did not turn up! Obviously, a demonstration from the Scandinavian countries alone was out of the question. At last, on Monday afternoon, suspense gave way to relief, and Dr. Norman-Hansen rushed off to wire to his friend, Ivar Berendsen: "Mixed goods arrived, Steel, herring, wine, macaroni, cheese, butter." That stood for the six delegates who had turned up. Nordenskiöld for Sweden, Professor W. C. Brögger for Norway, Senator L. Trarieux (with laurels fresh from his fight for Dreyfus) for France, Professor E. Brusa for Italy, Professor van der Vlugt for Holland, Dr. Norman-Hansen for Denmark. Without this little telegraphic code, they soon found out they would have been cut off from communication with their friends while at St. Petersburg. The delegates from England, Germany and Hungary did not arrive, but their respective addresses came to hand. At the Hotel de l'Europe, St. Petersburg, they were all laid in an elegant casket, and it was now the mission of the deputation to seek audience of the Tsar in order to present them.

FROM PILLAR TO POST.

They have since been much chaffed for this naiveté in believing that they, unofficial foreigners, would be received. But the very fact that their mission was unofficial, and their address a direct plea to His

Imperial Majesty, and under no circumstances to be regarded as a piece of official diplomacy, inspired them with hope. The Tsar had received like addresses before in consequence of his Manifesto, and Baron Fredericks had at once given his promise to lay the matter before His Majesty, and endeavour to obtain audience for then. Probably, however, Baron Fredericks, unprepared for their visit, gave his promise in an unguarded moment. repented at once, and, as soon as their backs were turned, conferred with other Ministers. Then these laid their plans. They would toss these meddlers from pillar to post till finally they wearied and returned to their respective homes with long noses. A messenger was despatched to the hotel with Baron Fredericks's compliments and regrets. He could do nothing. if they approached the Minister for Home Affairs, Goremykin, well known in Russia as Pobyedonostseff's most trusted man. "More slippery than an eel, more courteous than a Japanese," he is described by the delgate for Holland. The energetic, fiery Trarieux wis selected to fence with this prince of diplomats, and finally he permitted the address to be taken from its casket and laid before him. Professor Brögger fancies he saw a slightly startled expression flit over the immovable face of the Minister as some of the most famous signatures were pointed out; but the polite "Très joli, superbe!" which now and again fell from his lips referred only to the artistic get-up of the address. His Excellency regretted he could do nothing. He would advise the deputation to approach His Majesty's adjutant at Peterhof.

FAILURE OF THE MISSION.

By now all St. Petersburg had heard of the European deputation and the address, and the authorities honoured them with the attentions of three police spies, for whose mystification the delegates conversed on the subject of the letter Nordenskiöld had received from Andrée, and on which their mission to Russia was based. Next morning they went to Peterhof. By the same train went Pobyedonostseff and the Minister for War, Kuropatkin. In vain the delegates sought the Tsar's adjutant. They returned to St. Petersburg as they had left it. At the hotel they found a card to Trarieux from Goremykin, inviting them all to his villa on Sunday morning, as he had a communication for them. The communication was the suavely-given message that the Tsar had refused to give them audience. The Times correspondent would have wired the result of their mission, but his telegram was suppressed; Dr. Norman-Hansen's innocent com-mercial telegram, "Cargaison disqualified," got through, and next day all the world had learned the fate of the International Address to the Tsar.

ONE of the unrecorded incidents of the Peace Conference at the Hague was the despatch by various enterprising firms to each member of the Conference of souvenirs of the assembly. Some of these souvenirs were merely ornamental, but the most useful and perhaps the most appreciated was due to the enterprise of Messrs. Mabie, Todd and Bard, who sent a silver-mounted Swan fountain pen to each member of the Conference with a request that they would use them for signing the Final Acte. Some famous treaties have been signed by jewelled pens, or by quills made out of eagles' plumes, jewelled pens, or by quills made out of eagles' plumes, but the Final Acte at the Hague was probably the first that was signed by fountain pens. Many of the delegates, however, did not reserve their pen solely for that use, but having tried them immediately after receiving them, found them so satisfactory that they used them for their regular correspondence.

of new new the with pro-

acc

hab

exh

lar

can tha

VO

gre

abl

tio

othe thabi

Th

the a mucl Pas questi indeb to Ar words nay, a living even s langua which itself, with 1 certain accepte express Ame

the En is there languag and ev dying better expressi it does Certain

THE AMERICAN LANGUAGE.

By WILLIAM ARCHER.

In the Pall Mall Magazine Mr. William Archer writes a very interesting and sensible article upon the American language. He says truly enough that not all the serious causes of dissension have begotten half the bad blood that has been engendered by trumpery questions of vocabulary, grammar and pronunciation. He therefore, greatly daring, ventures to discuss the burning question of the American language in the hope that he may be able to introduce an element of peace and mutual toleration. So far from objecting to bold innovation in language, he strongly approves of it. In the nature of things the Americans being face to face with the newer conditions of life, must be more fertile in producing new words.

FASHIONS IN PRONUNCIATION.

Mr. Archer thinks that America has, as a matter of fact, enormously enriched the language, not only with new words, but since the American mind is, on the whole, quicker and wittier than the English, with apt and luminous colloquial metaphors. He protests rightly against the absurdity of expecting absolute uniformity in pronunciation. Such national habits in the pronunciation of given letters, or the accentuation of particular words, is purely a matter of habit, and to consider either habit wrong is merely to exhibit that childishness or provincialism of mind which is moved to laughter by whatever is unfamiliar. To our ears the American habit of pronouncing "u" as "oo" is old-fashioned; but it is neither vulgar nor provincial to pronounce Admiral Dewey's name as "Dooey," as all the Americans do, instead of "Dyooey," as all the English do. Fashions; and it is quite possible, fifty years hence, the Americans and English may have exchanged their habit of pronouncing many such words. There is no consistent or rational principle in the pronunciation of the word "theatre," for instance, and to make a merit of one practice, and to find in the other a subject for con-

WHAT WE OWE TO AMERICA.

temptuous criticism, is simply childish.

The following observations which he makes concerning the adoption of new words are very sensible and very much to the point:

Passing now from questions of pronunciation and grammar to questions of vocabulary, I can only express my sense of the deep indebtedness of the English language, both literary and colloquial, to America, for the old words she has kept alive and the new words and phrases she has invented. It is a sheer pedantry—nay, a misconception of the laws which govern language as a living organism—to despise pithy and apt colloquialisms, and even slang. In order to remain healthy and vigorous, a literary language must be rooted in the soil of a copious vernacular, from which it can extract and assimilate, by a chemistry peculiar to itself, whatever nourishment it requires. It must keep in touch with life in the broadest acceptation of the word; and life at certain levels, obeying a psychological law which must simply be accepted as one of the conditions of the problem, will always express itself in dialect, provincialism, slang.

America doubles and trebles the number of points at which America doubles and trebles the number of points at which the English language comes in touch with nature and life, and is therefore a great source of strength and vitality. The literary language, to be sure, rejects a great deal more than it absorbs; and even in the vernacular words and expressions are always dying out and being replaced by others which are somehow better adapted to the changing conditions. But though an expression has not, in the long run, proved itself fitted to survive, it does not follow that it has not done good service in its time. Certain it is that the common speech of the Anglo-Saxon race throughout the world is exceedingly supple, well nourished, and rich in forcible and graphic idioms; and a great part of this wealth it owes to America. Let the purists who sneer at "Americanisms" think for one moment how much poorer the English language would be to-day if North America had become a French or Spanish instead of an English continent.

I am far from advocating a breaking down of the barrier between literary and vernacular speech. It should be a porous, a permeable bulwark, allowing of free filtration; but it should be none the less distinct and clearly recognised.

WORDS-GOOD AND BAD.

He says three-quarters of the English language would crumble away before a purist analysis. The Americans invented "scientist," a good word which Mr. Archer thinks should live, while "transpire," in the sense of "happen," is a bad word which ought to perish. He does not admire the use of the word "bully;" but he mentions that the most popular slang excression of the day is to "rubberneck," or mo e concisely to "rubber." Its primary meaning is to "crane the neck in curiosity, to pry round the corner," as it were. But it has numerous and surprising extensions of meaning. Mr. Archer's conclusion of the whole matter is very comforting:—

The idea that the English language is degenerating in America is an absolutely groundless illusion. Take them all round, the newspapers of the leading American cities, in their editorial columns at any rate, are at least as well written as the newspapers of London; and in magazines and books the average level of literary accomplishment is certainly very high. There are bad and vulgar writers on both sides of the Atlantic; but until the beams are removed from our own eyes, we may safely trust the Americans to attend to the motes in theirs.

BIG SKULLS AND WEIGHTY BRAINS.

PROFESSOR ARTHUR THOMSON continues his instructive discourse on the Treatment and Utilisation of Anthropological Data in the October number of Knowledge. Dealing with the form of skulls and brain capacity, he says :—

The average weight of man's brain is about fifty ounces, that of woman about forty-five ounces. This difference between the sexes is less marked in savage than in civilised races, and is apparently explained by the fact that in the higher races more attention is paid to the education of the male than the female, and, consequently, the brain is stimulated to increased growth.

It is hardly necessary to point out that quantity is no criterion of quality, and though the brains of many distinguished men have weighed much above the average (that of Cuvier weighed sixty-four ounces), there are abundant examples of equally weighty brains the possessors of which were not characterised by wits above the common herd.

But apart from the mere size of the cranium we have to consider its shape. If a number of skulls be taken and placed on the floor so that we can look down upon them, we will at once realise that they display a great diversity of form, provided always that we are dealing with mixed groups; some are long and narrow, whilst others are broad and rounded.

For scientific purposes these differences in shape are recorded by the use of what is termed the cephalic index. In practice the cephalic index is obtained by the following formula:—

Breadth × 100 = Cephalic Ind.x.

The results are grouped as follows:—Skulls with a propertionate width of eighty or over are termed Brachycephalic. This group includes, among others, some Mongolians, Burmese, American Indians, and Andamanese. Skulls of which the index lies between seventy-five and eighty are Mesaticephalic, comprise Europeans, Ancient Egyptians, Chinese, Japanese, Polynesians, Bushmen, etc. Whilst skulls with a proportionate width below seventy-five are Dolichocephalic, and are more or less typical of Veddahs, Eskimo, Australians, African Negroes, Kaffirs, Zulus, etc.

control of the contro

he first

egates,

se, but

them,

o be

them

efore ericks

refor .

then.

d for meni,

their lar to their enger

ricks s But ffairs,

tseff s

more

del -

was finally et and saw a le face

atures

only to tion to ropean noured

whose ject of e, and

Next

n went

They

At the

mykin,

, as he ication refused

would legram

t com-

2/118

STATUES, MODERN AND "ANCIENT.

HOW THEY ARE MADE TO-DAY.

THE modern statue is often made, it appears, not by the artist who is credited with its creation. He only designs the clay or plaster model. The real work of sculpture is performed by other hands. Such is the testimony of Helen Zimmern in her instructive sketch of "The Genesis of a Statue" in the October Leisure Hour. She says:—

So mechanical is the making of a statue, that many a modern sculptor never puts hand to his marble himself, or only bestows upon it the very last touches. And on account of the skill of the Carrarese, the saving in the cost of transport, eminent sculptors of all lands send their clay or plaster models to Carrara to have them there vivified into marble . . . I saw such a sculptor's sketch, but seven inches high, being turned into a statue three feet in height

Some of the "workmen" are better artists than those whose works they copy; their pay runs from four to twenty francs a day, according to merit.

THE MANUFACTURE OF THE ANTIQUE.

The most curious, if not the most edifying, part of Miss Zimmern's paper is her account of the output of artificial antiquities. She says:—

The dealers are, of course, well versed in the tastes of their customers, and it is amusing to hear them sum up the different nations. Thus they tell me that English and Americans prefer to buy imitations of the antique, which means that the marble is polished and coloured so as to represent the antique marble of any age. Quite a large section of the works is devoted to the polished and coloured so as to represent the antique marble of any age. Quite a large section of the works is devoted to the manufacture of antiquities. First the statue is made complete, then broken, sometimes buried for a while, and finally coloured. The workman mixes a soft sandstone with water, and with this he smooths the statue. Afterwards he rubs it down with pumicestone, and then with a substance called English stone, a very hard material that does not scratch the marble, but closes its pores. The treatment gives that polish to the marble which imparts to it the look that comes from age. This done, the whole is coloured to suit the length of time which it is supposed to have existed. The colouring process was not fully revealed to me, as it is a trade secret.

THE "AGING" PROCESS.

I know that the substance consists of tobacco, coffee and two or three other ingredients, which are all boiled together. With a brush this liquid is painted over the whole surface. After it has been on some ten or fifteen minutes, the statue is washed, and it has the appearance of being some thousands of years old. If a greater age be desired, the colouring substance is left on longer. I believe every minute is calculated to represent a century of life. This colour does not wear away with time, but sinks into the stone—indeed, time only renders it more mellow. Statues thus "doctored" are shipped to every part of the globe. A foreman told me that many English purchasers prefer this tint for the reason that London is always full of fog and smoke, and white marble gets speedily dirty and smoke-choked in its atmosphere. On this antique imitation dirt has no effect, for it can be washed off with a sponge, when it is as good as new. True, white marble can also be cleaned, but it requires a practised hand to do the work, and the right materials, which the ordinary household would not have to hand. Further, if the marble is stained, nothing can be done for it, and we all know that London fog contains greasy ingredients, so that, marble being porous, a few moments suffice to make a stain which will never go away.

"WORK and Play in Crutchland" is the title of an illustrated sketch in the Quiver by D. L. Woolmer, of the National Industrial Home for Crippled Boys in Kensington.

THE RIVAL AUTO-MOTORS.

"THE Progress of Automobilism in France" is the title of a paper by the Marquis de Chasseloup-Laubat in the North American Review for September.

A SOMERSAULT EXTRAORDINARY.

Describing several races or trials of speed, he mentions in his narrative of a test-run in January, 1897, this extraordinary episode:—

It was on one of these down-grades that Charron, who was running a Panhard petroleum carriage, and who wanted to catch up with us at any cost, was upset at a turn. Charron and his machinist were thrown out, though they were not hurt at all, and the vehicle turned a complete somersault, and landed on its wheels,—as was demonstrated in an undoubted way by the traces of gravel on the upper part of the carriage. It sustained no serious injury, except the destruction of the steering bar, which Charron repaired with a bit of wood. It returned to Fréjus without a stoppage of the motor.

The technical situation to-day is thus summed up by the writer:—

In the existing status of the science, each system, presenting different advantages and disadvantages, seems intended for a different line of application.

STEAM.

The steam carriage requires about 11 kilogrammes of its total weight for supplies for the horse-power hour: it needs a mechanic as fireman, independently of the conductor: its maintenance is quite complicated and difficult; but it is relatively inexpensive, furnishes a steady power, can start up readily with a heavy draft and takes hills easily. It seems designed, therefore, for heavy traffic, and for running across broken country and on roads carefully studied and of determined lengths.

ELECTRIC.

The electric carriage is of simple construction, and runs with relative ease. Better than steam, it is adapted to rapid movement at starting and on up-grades. It works without noise or vibration. But the 20 or 30 kilogrammes of storage-battery weight actually necessary to make the horse-power hour, and the length of time required to re-charge the storage-batteries, necesarily limits its sphere of action. It is, par excellence, the urban vehicle, especially for passenger traffic, rather than for freight.

OIL

The petroleum carriage, which requires only 0'750 kilogrammes of supplies for the horse-power hour, is hardy, relatively simple and readily run. But its vibrations, though much diminished in the new equipoise motors, are still quite perceptible. The combustion of the oil produces a disagreeable odour, if carburisation is not thoroughly regulated. The danger of fire from the presence of the fuel, which must needs be carried, is always to be feared from the slightest imprudence. The motors hitherto built are not elastic, and, save in racing carriages, are a little feeble in starting and on an up-grade. It is a good carriage for service in both city and country combined. For long runs, it is actually the only one available.

Ladies and Automobiles.

THOSE ladies who have had the opportunity of driving motor vehicles can speak of "motoring" as a fascinating pastime. Apart, however, from the purely pleasure point of view, the introduction of the horseless vehicle for haulage purposes may affect the agricultural and horticultural industries of our country. As there is much foundation work preparatory to women becoming practical motorists, the formation of a Ladies Automobile Club will be discussed at a meeting to be held on October 20th, at 8 P.M., at 108, Cromwell Road, S.W., the town residence of the Viscountess Harberton, and ladies and gentlemen desirous of attending same can obtain tickets of invitation on writing to Miss N. G. Bacon, Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, W.C.

ma
offi des whi
ing
the fina
an
Mr. test
Sta put actu fact exai

som

vers

wh

tak

rec

reg

ele

The and unan seven mach future In mach These

there

receiv

ten n result

The points It sir make of me The rather, parts:

rather parts: two—counte which office machir both dia certai keyboa the bal keys.

self; for advance of the reset for complete is absolute.

Whe the im

VOTING BY MACHINERY.

THERE is something strange about the slowness with which practical people like the English-speaking folk take up with mechanical devices for facilitating the record of votes. We use automatic appliances for registering the gas we burn, the water, and even the electricity we consume, but the simple expedient of auto-matically registering votes only gradually conquers official and popular consent. Last year Mr. W. H. Howe described in the Fortnightly the revolution in voting which the machine he described would effect. His most ingenious invention promises to do almost everything for the voter except make up his mind, and to declare the final result almost as soon as the last vote was cast, with an infallibility which no Protestant could challenge. But Mr. Howe's machine, although subject to many private tests, is politically no more than a hope. The United States, however, with characteristic energy, have already put the project of automatic registry to the ordeal of actual elections, and the results appear to be most satisfactory. In the September Forum Mr. Frank Keiper, examiner of voting-machines, U.S. Patent Office, offers some striking facts under the heading "Voting-Machines versus the Paper Ballot."

HOW IT WORKS IN THE UNITED STATES.

This Government official reports as follows :-

At the election held in the city of Rochester on November 8th, 1898, voting-machines were used instead of the paper ballot. The election progressed smoothly; the polls closed at 5 P.M.; and the complete returns for the whole city, which were unanimously accepted as conclusive, were announced thirty-seven minutes later. The city of Rochester now owns its own machines, and intends to hold all its elections with them in the future.

In 1896, a similar election was held in Hornellsville, where machines were first successfully used in presidential elections. These machines are owned by the town, and have been used there satisfactorily in five elections since. The returns were received in Rochester, in the election of last November, within ten minutes after the polls had closed in Hornellsville. The results in Jamestown, Fredonia, and Waverley have also been most satisfactory.

THE MACHINE.

The primary attraction of the machine is, the writer points out, its exclusion of error in voting and in counting. It simply will not let the voter or the returning officer make a mistake. Mr. Keiper thus describes the amalgam of mechanics and politics:—

The voting-machine is, primarily, a counting-machine, or, rather, a combination of counting-machines. It consists of three parts: (1) the keyboard, with one key for each candidate, and two—a "yes" and a "no" key—for each question; (2) the counters—one for each key; and (3) the interlocking mechanism, which limits the number of keys that can be operated in any one office group—the candidates of all parties for one office. The machine is operated by a small gate or lever which swings in both directions. It is unlocked by the movement of the gate, in a certain direction, before the voter indicates his ballot on the keyboard; while a movement in the opposite direction casts the ballot indicated, and at the same time resets and locks the keys.

When a ballot is cast it is counted at once by the voter himself; for the total vote on the counter for each candidate is advanced one step by the act. The voting is done in the privacy of the booth; and when the keys of the machine have been reset for the next voter, the identity of the preceding ballot is completely destroyed. Consequently, the secrecy of the ballot is absolutely assured.

AUTOMATIC DECLARATION.

Where the machine appeals perhaps most strongly to the imagination is in the instantaneous nature of its declaration. The moment the poll is known, the result in that booth is known. The writer says:—

When the judges declare the polls closed the gate is locked fast in its outward position; and by this means all the push-keys are locked, so that there can be no tampering with the machine or any further voting. The machine is now turned around; and in full view of the crowd, two cameras are focussed on the keyboard where the counters are exposed; flash-light photographs are taken; and the judges call off the totals to the clerks, who make a record of them. Messenger boys convey the results in haste to the telegraph office. Within fifteen minutes every precinct in the city has reported; and in less than an hour the newspapers show complete returns for city and county.

The returns, the writer reports, have never been disputed, and the cost of elections has been much reduced. In the city of Rochester the saving is put at over £1,000 an election. Each voting-machine costs £100, and as the city had apparently some seventy-three machines, they would all be paid for in seven elections.

DISCOVERY OF CAPTAIN COOK'S FIRST LOG.

Professor Morris announces in Cornhill for October "a new discovery" which fills in part of a blank of four years in the life of Captain Cook. This discovery is none other than that of Cook's first log in the Royal Navy. Only lately, in the window of a curio shop in Bourke Street, Melbourne, "side by side with a letter from Emma, Lady Hamilton, an autograph log by Captain Cook was set out for sale." The writer thus describes it:—

It is a relic unmistakably over a century old. The paper is white foolscap, not pressed, trimmed to a page of twelve-and-a-half inches by seven.

The two watermarks leave no doubt that the book was originally issued from official Government stores in the reign of one of the Georges. . . . The book has been awash, and the stain of sea-water has outlined all the middle pages like a map; but the ink, though browned and sometimes very faint, remains everywhere legible and in places remarkably clear. The cover is of parchment boards, and the parchment has been worn into the familiar mellow brown which takes more than a century to acquire. There are 174 pages, and three blank leaves have been cut out, so that the book was originally bound up in forty-five sheets.

out, so that the book was originally bound up in forty-five sheets. On the title-page of the volume is written: "LOG BOOK On Board his Majesty's Ship Eagle, Kept by Jam' Cook, Master's Mate, Commencing the 27th June 1755; And Ending the 31th of December 1756." There is, however, a manifest erasure at the name and rank. "Jam' Cook, Master's Mate," is written over something else that was written there before and has not been quite completely scratched out. . . . After the comparison of the handwriting we returned again to the title-page, and though not absolutely certain, we came to the conclusion that the erased words were "Jam' Cook, able seaman." The conclusion was that Cook began to keep this Log as an able seaman, and when he put it away, holding the rank of master's mate, he added the date at which the Log ends, scratched out his original writing, and altered it himself.

Mr. Morris quotes Sir Walter Besant to the effect that between May, 1755, and May, 1759, there is a blank of four years which no one has attempted to fill up. Eighteen months of this period are now brought to light. They were spent chiefly in the Channel, the *Lagte* generally lying in some part of Plymouth ready to slip out and capture French merchantmen. They saw Cook's promotion from able seaman to boatswain and on to master's mate. Mr. Morris concludes:—

We may fairly claim that the discovery of this Log has diminished the gap in Cook's life, and has shown a glowing picture, laid in, perhaps, with sketchy hand, but with sure touch and living colour, of the daily life on board those British ships of war that broke their foes and "drove them on the seas" at the very opening of the Seven Years' War.

the t in

ions

was catch l his all, on its races d no

p by nting for a total hanic nce is nsive, draft heavy

s with moveise or attery and the necesurbanght.

ammes simple hed in comisation m the s to be o built eble in vice in ctually

riving nating point de for hortimuch actical ab will oth, at idence lemen invita-House,

. . . . . .

THE REVIEWS REVIEWED.

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

THREE articles of high importance distinguish the October number, which bear, respectively, on Foreign Policy, Temperance Reform, and Theology. Mr. Garrett's on "The Inevitable in South Africa," and Lady Henry Somerset's manifesto on practical Temperance Legislation, have received separate notice. Mr. Zangwill's "Zionism," Sir Robert Stout's "New Zealand," Mr. Nundy's "National Church for India," and Mr. A. Taylor's "Ritualists and the Electorate," which belong to a different order, have also been separately dealt with.

THE NEW EVANGELICALISM.

The theological paper is by Dr. P. T. Forsyth, and treats of the Cross as the final seat of authority. It is too purely theological to admit of full notice here, but all who wish to know whither the New Evangelicalism is tending would do well to read and study it. He presses for the conversion of the word and perhaps the idea of "Evangelical," and insists that not the Bible, but the Gospel, and the Gospel alone, is the religion of Protestants. He lays stress on two points:—

I. Grace to-day must be a gospel not so much of the supernatural as of the superhuman; it needs to be preached as transcending human love even more than natural law.

II. And as it is thus much more than sympathy, so it must be a gospel not in the first place of freedom, but of authority.

He leads up to this conclusion :-

There is but one authority which corresponds to all the conditions I have named, that is ethical, social, historic, personal, living and present. It is revealed, absolutely given, and for ever miraculous to human thought as the divine forgiveness always must be. It is the grace of God to us sinners in the Cross of Christ that is the final moral authority, as being the supreme nature and act of the supreme moral Being. And it is for ever a wonder to human thought except in so far as it has made in man its own thought. It is not irrational, it is rational; but it is not in reason to realise its own deep nature and content till it is redeemed. It provides a new standard and ideal which it guarantees as the final reality and therefore the final authority.

It is only a deep and expiatory view of Atonement that invests Christ with this final moral claim, or the Cross with its ultimate authority.

AN IMPERIAL VOLUNTEER FORCE?

"Miles," writing on Military Volunteers and Regulars, passes in review a great number of topics bearing on our land-forces. He urges that the Militia Bill when reintroduced should prescribe compulsory ballot for the unit-area which did not supply its proportion of voluntary enlistment, and not on the larger area of the county. The offer of the London Scottish leads to the remark that while regulars would be most valuable at the front, "ve should like to see legislation which would provine for the occasional volunteering for active service for the term of a campaign." The writer makes a somewhat vague suggestion which seems to point to the Empire, and not the Kingdom, being the area within which volunteers should undertake to serve. He says:—

If we are right as to that particular tendency of Englishmen to wish, when the time comes, to be actually at the front, a great statesman ought to be able to utilise this desire in creating a vast possible reserve for real emergency not for service at home only, but for Imperial needs. The possibility of such employment would give an immense stimulus not only to volunteer recruiting, but to the zeal with which the volunteers would prepare themselves to be fit for it.

SOI Hi

wh

uni

not

the

the

Mu

me

the 300

pet

the

con

no i stin

we

Par

the

gen cur

" m

Ros

" re

to pri

Im

nati

and

for wal

ad

arg

the

squ

keep chos

incl

him

pres

pern

and thou

V

I

1

THE PROGRESS OF PLANT-DOCTORING.

Mr. J. B. Carruthers heads his paper, "Wanted, plant-doctors." He claims that no branch of science has advanced more in recent times than plant pathology and therapeutics. He gives these samples of the value of the practice of plant medicine:—

The prevention and cure of the Phylloxera on the vines of the Continent by means of spraying with the Bordeaux mixture rescued a whole industry in France from destruction. The surgical treatment of canker in trees has saved countless numbers of valuable trees; and various diseases of field crops, from dodder in clover to finger and toe in turnips, have been to a large extent stamped out. In a recent report of the United States Department of Agriculture the loss by plant diseases in that country is estimated at $\mathscr{L}\pi\0.000,000 annually, and in the same report it is stated that the curative means employed in the case of a disease of peach-trees—"peach-leaf curl"—have secured a gain to peach-growers, in California only, of $\mathscr{L}\times 100,000. In America they recognise the need and advantages of such work, and every state has its workers in plant diseases paid out of public funds, the whole being directed and controlled by a National Department of Vegetable Physiology and Pathology. Germany has its scientific labourers in this field by the score.

TWO HUMANE APPEALS.

Miss Edith M. Shaw describes "The Workhouse from the Inside" from the standpoint of a workhouse officer. She makes more intelligible the hardening effect on character which workhouse employment is said to entail. And she urges, "Look to the comfort of your officers," and preserve them from being degraded either in themselves or in the eyes of the inmates. Mr. Thomas Holmes recites from his experience in connection with the police court mission certain instances of "Obscure Causes of Crime." It is a beautiful paper, teaching charity in the best sense, not merely by the pathetic personal examples adduced, but by the loving spirit in which the whole its written.

Windsor.

THERE is a great deal of matter in the October Windsor. Natural science is well represented, Mr. W. G. Bell contributes sketches of meteor showers, with special bearing on the shower expected in November. A New Zealand Vesuvius is the title of Mr. G. R. Falconer's story of the geological spasms which have recently affected that Colony. Mr. Alex. Meek sketches his experiences off the North-East coast "trawling for scientific purposes," under the Northumberland Sea Fisheries Committee. Statistics and specimens are collected to show how our local waters are faring from year to year. Other interests are appealed to in Mr. E. T. Slater's account of Dollis Hill—London's new pleasure-ground—and its memories of Mr. Gladstone; as also in Mr. Flinton's attractive sketch of camping out in British Columbia, and Mr. Lorimer's origin and history of the America Cup. I have referred elsewhere to my paper on the Cape to Cairo Railway.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

THE October number is dignified by Mr. Swinburne's sonnet "After the Verdict" at Rennes, and by Mrs. Humphry Ward's wonderful confession of faith, both of which are noticed elsewhere. There are two other papers of an ecclesiastical turn, which with Mr. Usher Wilson's "Voice from Cape Colony," and Miss O'Connor-Eccles's unmasking of Vienna hospital scandals, claim separate notice.

WHAT PAYMENT OF MEMBERS MIGHT LEAD TO

Sir Algernon West enumerates the varied services of the Great Unpaid,—commissioners of taxes, justices of the peace, visiting justices; trustees of the British Museum, National and Portrait Galleries; Royal commissioners; parish, urban district, and county councillors; members of educational boards; city councillors; and the Volunteers, numbering with the Yeomanry nearly 300,000 men. The writer eulogises at length the labours of the London County Council, and hopes for the perpetuation in this country of government of the people by the people for the people; but he goes on:—

The consideration of such a vast volume of work, involving considerable expenditure on the workers, should, when the question of payment of Members of Parliament next comes up for discussion, not be lost sight of; for if members are to be paid no logical reason could be adduced for not equally paying those who certainly are in many cases drawn from a poorer class of the community. Even in these days, when the very word Economy stinks in the nostrils of our legislators, we should pause before we entered into a course of general payment to Members of Parliament out of the consolidated fund, which in itself would entail a large expenditure and be so destructive of what is best in the history of our country.

"LIBERAL IMPERIALISM."

Dr. Guinness Rogers chats on the political situation generally under the head of Liberalism and its cross currents. He laments that the Party has since 1886 "made too much of programme." He thinks Lord Rosebery's cry at the City Liberal Club "As in 1886," a "recall from a dreary 'ploughing of the sands' in obedience to a programme, to a broader Liberalism of guiding principles and loftier ideals." He defines Liberal Imperialism thus:—

It is as careful not to infringe the rights of other nations as it is jealous to safeguard those of its native land, and respects their national honour because it is sensitive as to its own. It abhors the spirit of the bully and the arts of the intriguer. It regards the tricks of diplomacy as below the dignity of a great nation, and treats land-grabbing as a form of national sin. Its motto for the nation, as for the individual, is, "Do justly, love mercy, walk humbly with God."

WHAT HODGE WANTS.

Mrs. Stephen Batson, discussing Dr. Jessop's plea for a diversion of charitable surplus from town to country, argues that it is not charity that the country-folk want; they have plenty of it, plus the irritating supervision of squire and parson:—

We are ready to acknowledge that something must be done to keep the labourer at home; why not give him the thing that he wants, and the thing which we could so easily give him if we chose?.. Let him have his playground, his free library, including books other than didactic, and his club-room. Let him have a large increase of educational privileges, not provided as now in the form of elementary night-schools, established and presided over by the parson and terminable at his will, but permanent institutions on a county basis, which he will recognise and profit by as soon as they are permanent. Let him have all these, and let him know that he is the actual owner of them, though they may be vested in his parish council as the acting trustees. And, above all, let him have the power both of renting and of buying land in his own parish, and, if possible, near his own door. The land hunger cannot be stayed by any cheaper food.

TIBETAN MYSTICISM.

Rev. Graham Sandberg, who confesses to being enamoured of Tibetan studies, gives many extracts from the memoirs and poems of a Tibetan mystic, the most Reverend Milaraspa. Of his philosophy the writer says:—

Were we to quote here these enunciations, they would be found to contain no real recondite wisdom, nor even any scheme of metaphysics and morality which could be dignified with the title of an ethical system. They are mostly mere pretentious phrases which have little consistency, and the profundity is only apparent, and will not bear analysis. There is nothing ennobling to the individual, or calculated to make the world the better; or, even in the Buddhist sense, less steeped in misery, in the doctrines of sublime vacuity and indifference to all earthly claims, with which Buddhism, whether Indian or Tibetan, occupies itself. It is essentially the religion of phraseological forms and onomatopoetical positions. Even the universal philanthropy preached becomes degenerate when it would condescend to practical individual exercise.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. Alexander Sutherland seeks to dissipate the fear of over education, the one remedy for which is more education. Major C. C. Townsend foretells a great demand for electricity in India. Power in the form of coal is scarce, except in North Bengal; but just where power is most needed—in Southern and Central India—Nature has provided some of the grandest waterfalls which can be utilised for electrical development. Mr. J. A. Gibson repeats his "cry of the consumptives"—for compulsory notification of phthisis, special doctors, and special sanatoria.

THE AUSTRALASIAN REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

DELIGHT over the vast majorities which voted for federation in July, and deep interest in the progress of the Australian cricketers over here, are the chief impressions left of the August number. Mr. C. B. Fry explains "How we lost the second test match," and Mr. A. C. Maclaren describes the third test match with the Australian Eleven in England. These papers, from leading members of the English team, with their generous appreciation of Australian prowess, should have an excellent effect upon our Colonial kinsmen. A more academic theme is broached by the Rev. Dr. Waddell in his paper on the influence of climate on character in New Zealand. He pronounced the temperatures of that colony as one of the most favourable for the development of character. The difference between its warmest and its coldest months is only seventeen degrees—"almost the smallest range found in any part of the world." He grants that the changes of climate are very sudden: but argues that this variability will tend to make character more eager, inventive and resourceful. The absence of extreme heat such as occasionally parches Australia encourages the cultivation of home-life. The writer argues that a climate of continuously brilliant sunshine produces a character voluptuous, easy-going, and pessimistic, and he points to Australia for examples. New Zealand has sufficient interruption of her sunshine to be kept optimistic. The same cause should, the writer thinks, help to produce a great school of landscape-art. He fears that the very advantages of her soil and climate may make New Zealand unspiritual and unmindful of the divine. Perhaps the encompassing ocean-"the murmurs and scents of the infinite sea "-the writer suggests. -supply the element of mystery.

VII

ting a home

ployunteer would olant-

has

and

of the

of the

The

mbers

from to a nited

ses in n the n the cured

. In

work, out of

by a logy.

from ficer.

on ntail.

ers.

hem-lmes

es of

the ples

vhole

ober

Mr.

with

A

ner's

ected

nces

purom-

how ther

nt of

its ton's

bia,

Cup.

e to

e.

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

THE Dreyfus case claims a great share of the October number. It seems to have infected certain of the writers with something of the Gallic virulence of invective. Thus the editor in his chronique elects to call the most objectionable of Dreyfus' foes "cannibals," and declares that "France evidently teems with cannibals of all kinds." M. Judet is "the patriotic cannibal" "The Catholic cannibal" is represented by La Croix; "military cannibalism" by the Petit Caporal; M. Rochefort is "a splendid specimen of Parisian cannibalism." Mr. Conybeare's and Sir Godfrey Lushington's contributions are noticed elsewhere, as also Mr. Arnold White's "Cult of Infirmity," Mr. J. MacGregor's "Compulsory Arbitration at Work" in New Zealand, and Mr. H. Henson's "Archbishop's Judgment."

THE SHILLING DUTY ON CORN.

Mr. Ernest Williams, author of "Made in Germany, records his pleasure at the serenity with which Mr. Chaplin's kite-or proposal to reimpose the shilling duty on cornhas sailed through the air of public life. He regards it as an augury of public acquiescence. The suggested duty would not make England less of a Free Trade country than she was before 1869, when the tax was abolished. He is confident that the duty on wheat and flour would not fall on the consumer of bread. He considers it much more likely that the foreigner would pay it. He would, however, exempt Colonial corn from the tax, and so go without about a quarter of a million sterling. But levied on imports from the rest of the world, it would bring in over 21 millions sterling. He argues the necessity of the duty in view of the increasing demand for expenditure on social reforms, such as old-age pensions. Direct taxation, he urges, must be diminished, not increased. Here is a way of getting money which will cost the British citizen nothing!

THE ANGLO-AMERICAN OPPORTUNITY.

Mr. Maurice Low, reviewing the month in America, declares:

England to-day has the best opportunity she has ever had of arriving at such a cordial understanding with the United States that from this time on the two countries will act in unison in whatever is of material interest to both, and will practically be allies where an alliance would be valuable. . . . It is simply a question whether it will "pay" England to make some concession to the United States, so as to feel sure that in the United States England has a warm and strong friend. . . . If the United States is not an ally of England, then most assuredly she will be of Russia. It is a very simple proposition.

At the same time he warns us that if the "charge" of a British alliance were found to be imperilling Mr. McKinley's re-election, he would probably emit a message to Congress far less friendly than Mr. Cleveland's famous threat of war about Venezuela.

"THE ONLY VITAL SCHOOL IN EUROPE."

This, Mr. W. A. S. Benson says, is the creation of William Morris in Arts and Crafts:—

That he found the arts of decoration practically dead in England, that he left them the one vital style of modern days, recognized through Europe as the only school of design which was not an empty echo of passed systems; his own work constituting the central current of the nascent style; this is one aspect of his work. . . . His unique achievement, for which, indeed, there is no parallel in the history of the graphic arts, consists of the great series of designs for surface decoration, painted, woven or printed.

Of later development the writer says :-

English designers are doing their part; they are recognized in Europe as the exponents of the only vital modern style, a style still immature, and in the nature of things not reaching immediate perfection all round; but in the main logical, consistent, and progressive.

REFORM WANTED IN CRICKET.

The Hon. Alf. Lyttleton, M.P., sees a danger of cricket becoming dull and inconclusive unless there be reform. This is his problem:—

The institution of boundaries, the great increase in the number of matches, and, above all, the perfection of the pitches, have together operated in favour of the batsman, while the bowler has received not one compensating advantage.

It has been proposed to increase the wickets in breadth or in height. But, in the opinion of the writer, "by far the best way of meeting the present discontents is to reduce the size of the bat." An inch or inch and a half might be sufficient. He points out further that "with a narrower, you might have a deeper bat, for the weight of wood taken from the side might be transferred to the back. But he would welcome any change which would diminish "the curse of undue scoring."

ANGLO-RUSSIAN GOODWILL.

In his chronique the editor records with satisfaction the interchange of cordiality between Russian and English naval officers at Odessa. He notes "a better outlook in Anglo-Russian relations than at any time since the formation of the Dual Alliance," and adds:—

If that unholy combination collapsed, as it may do under stress of circumstances, there would be nothing to prevent a rapprochement between Russia and Great Britain . . . Private letters from St. Petersburg report an excellent disposition on the part of the Government. If the Peace Conference cranks in this country would only hold their tongues, Lord Salisbury might be able to do business with Russia.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

THE Century for October is a good number, and contains, in addition to the character sketch of Mr. John Morley, which I notice elsewhere, several articles of considerable interest.

Rear-Admiral Sampson, who had been asked to give a few words on Admiral Dewey, lays on the paint with generous thickness, as the following paragraph shows:—

The names of three great admirals will stand out conspicuously in modern history, each of whom rendered transcendent service to his country: Nelson, the real victor of Napoleon and establisher of European peace; Farragu, the far-reaching effect of whose services in the Civil War has yet to be recognised by the general public; and Dewey, whose attack was as bold as that of Farragut at Mobile Bay (and I can use no higher praise), as successful as Washington's Trenton victory, and whose diplomacy and tact, after his destruction of the Spanish squadron, make a shining page which will not be the least in his glorious record.

Perfectly courageous, of thoroughly balanced judgment, and quick of decision, he [Dewey] has the qualities which carry one to fame if opportunity be given. The man and the hour fortunately came together, and the country is richer in another brilliant page of history and another heroic figure.

Not content with this, Admiral Sampson compares his brother officer to Washington! It is to be hoped that Admiral Dewey has more sense of humour than his generous colleague.

Lieutenant E. W. Eberle, United States of America, writes on a kindred subject, the famous voyage of the Oregon, on which he was at that time stationed. The article is excellently illustrated. Mr. F. C. Penfield, late United States Consul-General in Egypt, writes on "Fascinating Cairo" attractively and at considerable length. Mr. P. L. Ford has an article on "Franklin as Politician and Diplomatist," and throws much interesting light on Franklin's attitude before and during the war.

T. Fox

T

inter

seve valu one, in t tion It two disin deny acqu

a rev

triun

that out A h ever adv

Who

know style of he ques shall to the I, in the gate year me to mee I shall than decicou If t proluniv therand intr pro-In t

C

Chu litur from com sacr sam to t

chu

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

THE Fortnightly for October is hardly up to average interest, and, except "Diplomaticus's "raid on Mr. Chamberlain, contains no article of striking topical interest.

THE ENGLISH DREYFUS CASE.

This was the Popish Plot of 1678, and Mr. H. C. Foxcroft justifies the parallel by declaring that, in political and judicial development, France belongs, if not to the seventeenth, at least to the eighteenth century. The value of the parallel, he says, is not merely an academic one, for it shows that such episodes are not, as is assumed in the French case, indicative of national demoralisation:—

It would ill become an Englishman, with the experience of two centuries at his back, to forget in the just resentment of a disinterested indignation the lesson of English vicissitudes, or to deny that an act of national "possession," an interval of craven acquiescence in diabolical suggestions, may be followed by a recrudescence of national vigour, an outburst of patriotic energy, a revolution beneficent in its tendency, and an era of national triumph.

HISTORY IN ADVERTISEMENTS.

Mr. Andrew Reid, writing under the above title, declares that a very tolerable English history might be compiled out of the advertisement columns of newspapers alone. A history of manners and morals certainly might, whatever we may say about a political history. Here is an advertisement from the Daily Post of 1728:—

A T Mr. Stokes Amphitheatre in Islington Road, this present Monday, being the 7 of October, will be a complete Boxing Match by the two following Championesses: Whereas I, Ann Field, of Stoke Newington, as driver, well known for my abilities in boxing in my own defence wherever it happened in my way, having been affronted by Mrs. Stokes, styled the European Championess, do fairly invite her to a trial of her best skill in Boxing for 10 pounds, fair rise and fall; and question not but to give her such proofs of my judgement that shall oblige her to acknowledge me Championess of the Stage, to the entire satisfaction of all my friends.

I, Elizabeth Stokes, of the City of London, have not fought in this way since I fought the famous boxing-woman of Billingsgate 29 minutes, and gained a complete victory, (which is six years ago); but as the famous Stoke Newington ass-woman dares me to fight her for the 10 pounds, I do assure her I will not fail meeting her for the said sum, and doubt not that the blows which I shall present her with will be more difficult for her to digest than any she ever gave her asses.

THE RITUALIST SQUABBLE.

Canon MacColl, writing on "The Lambeth Decision," declares that the Archbishops have chosen the one course which will make submission unnecessarily hard. If they had appealed to expediency or to conscience it is probable that their judgment would have commanded universal submission. Instead of this they involved themselves in an argument which is entirely historical and legal, and therefore worth nothing more than its intrinsic value. This intrinsic value Canon MacColl proceeds to depreciate in the light of history and logic. In regard to the use of incense, Canon MacColl says:—

The liturgical use of incense is a matter which every national church has a right to decide and regulate for itself without any peril to its catholicity; and the question before us is whether the Church of England has, in matter of fact, forbidden the liturgical use of incense. But equally untenable is the argument from the opposite side, that incense may be given up without compunction because it is not essential to the validity of the sacrament. The Puritans urged the disuse of the surplice on the same ground, and with just as good reason. All that is essential to the validity of the sacrament is bread and wine duly consecrated—a ceremony which could be discharged in three minutes.

A FACTITIOUS CRISIS.

"An Oxford Tutor," writing on "The True Meaning of the Crisis in the Church," questions the existence of the crisis at all:—

To me the whole discussion seems to a great extent factitious, the creation of the newspapers, themselves roused by the sudden sally of Sir William Harcourt into the field of ecclesiastical controversy, a sally in which he displayed his great polemical gifts, but no real comprehension of the state of religion and theology in England.

MUNICIPAL TRADING.

Mr. Walter Bond writes against the craze for municipalisation, which he thinks is in general both unprofitable and unjust. He says:—

The operations of a municipality should properly be restricted to such work as cannot by any reasonable use of language be said to benefit any one section of a community more than any other; in other words, a municipality should only perform works of general public necessity. This formula would bring within the sphere of municipal operations all that directly relates to public buildings, public health (drainage, water, sanitary, and building regulations), public security (police, street lighting, and fire protection), public amenities (roads, pavements, park, and open spaces). Every municipal undertaking should be essential to the general welfare.

THE AGED POOR PROBLEM.

Mr. Geoffrey Drage, M.P., writes on the above topic, and does not seem to see much hope in Old Age Pensions, which he considers have failed signally both in Germany and Denmark. The effect in England would be disastrous:—

It has never yet been admitted in England that all persons over a certain age have a right to relief; the State has so far undertaken only to relieve destitution. Financially, it would involve an enormous burden of at least between 17 and 20 millions sterling a year for England and Wales. It is hard to say where the funds would be found, but it is obvious that there would be no finality about the scheme. It would be the beginning of a system of political corruption, panem et circenses, such as contributed largely to the downfall of the Roman Empire. From a Poor Law point of view there is nothing to show that the Poor Law expenses would be diminished.

Tinkering at the present Poor Law seems to be Mr. Drage's only remedy.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Messrs. Louis Becke and Walter Jeffery, writing on "The Sea Story of Australia," point out that the first half century of Australian history was primarily a story of the sea. In the value of its trade Sydney exceeds that of any British port, London, Liverpool and Hull excepted. Mr. H. G. Parsons contributes an article on "Australian Federation from the Inside," which is mainly interesting as showing the entire predominance of material and commercial interests in the politics of the Australian colonies. Miss Frances H. Low writes on "Mrs. Gaskell's Short Stories," Mr. Joseph Jacobs pelates an interesting "Romance of Scholarship," and there is an article by the late Charles Yriarte on Eugène Piot, the famous French connoisseur and collector.

THE difficulties and achievements of Flashlight Photography are feelingly described by Mr. F. M. Holmes in Cassell's. One of the points to be watched is that by the dedenness and brilliance of the "flashlight" the crowd or congregation are not so startled or diverted as to appear quite other than they usually are.

F

cricket reform. number towler

g imme-

nsistent,

by far is to a half with a weight to the would better e since under event a Private on the nks in lisbury action

John es of vive a with ervice and effect ed by old as raise), whose anish in his , and y one hour other that his rica, the The

his

late on able n as ting

THE FORUM.

THE September bill of fare offers plenty of strong meat, with scant regard for the taste of the frivolous reader. Separate notice is required for Dr. Wilson's account of the Trade Intelligence Department at the Philadelphia Museum, for Mr. Denby's reassuring words on cotton-spinning at Shanghai, for Mr. Keiper's report on voting-machines versus the paper ballot, for Mr. Lala's picture of the people of the Philippines, and for what I have to report of the Conference at the Hague.

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL UP TO DATE.

President R. E. Jones, of Hobart College, examines Washington's Farewell Address in the light of its original occasion and of its modern applications. It is a clever argument against the use made of the Address by anti-Imperialists. He lays stress on Washington's allowing the need of "temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies," and on his declaring the United States "an infant Empire." He grants that Washington's principles rule out a fixed alliance with England, which kinship makes superfluous. But Washington's chief dread was of his country being involved in the European Balance of Power. This balance of power is still maintained; and would inveigle the United States if the Europeanization of South America or of the Philippines were permitted. Therefore, argues the writer,—

If Europe really covets South America (her own testimony must be admitted); if our occupation of the Philippines would halt the system of European equivalence (the witness of Europe's fears and Germany's deeds applies); then there can be little doubt that Washington's Farewell Address indirectly favours our retention of the Philippines.

NO DANGER OF A WHEAT FAMINE YET.

Mr. B. W. Snow discusses the wheat-scare set agoing by Sir William Crookes a year back, under the title "Agricultural Progress and the Wheat Problem." He finds that most writers on the subject tacitly assume that the average rate of acre yield of wheat is nearly stationary. They base all their estimates on acreage. They entirely overlook the possibility of increasing the returns from a given acreage by scientific methods. He quotes statistics to show that the producing capacity of United States wheat-land increased '5 bushel per acre in 1885-9 upon the rate for 1880-4, 1'3 bushels in the next five years, and 1'4 in 1895-8. He concludes:—

The increase in acre yields, in this country, has only begun. Practically, all that has been accomplished during the period under review may be attributed to improvements in implements for preparing the soil and planting the seed. Wheat is grown, year after year, without rotation—except in a few cases—on a third or more of our wheat acreage; not one acre in fifty is directly fertilised for the crop; and only a minimum amount of attention is given to seed-wheat and to betterment of seed-stock. If, in the face of what cannot be considered less than careless and inefficient agricultural practice, we have increased the wheat capacity of our land by 3'2 bushels per acre in so short a time, what may we not expect, in the way of enlarged acre yields, before we experience the hardships of a true wheat famine?

PRESENT-DAY RUSSIAN STORY-TELLERS.

"The Younger Russian Writers" are passed agreeably under review by M. A. Cahan. Their speciality is the short story. He pronounces them all realists. "Lifelikeness clothed in the simplest forms of expression, and artistic sincerity reflecting the self-criticisms and the melancholy moods of the Russian people . . . are still the sine qua non." He offers an explanation of this realism. "Silenced by the censor, the reformer is forced to call upon the novel to convey his message... Sermonising is just what the censor will not allow; so the novelist must try to make his pictures talk, to let life expose its own wounds." For Russian criticism demands that "a work of art must also be a work of education." Hence "Korolenko is popular for his views on the social question: Chekhoff, in spite of his having none." The latter is "universally recognised as the greatest master of the Russian short story, and the most powerful living writer in his country after Tolstoy." M. Cahan reports that the four or five Russian magazines give much space to this artistic study of character and human motive. The best established of them—The Messenger of Europe—has, he says, only a circulation according to its own figures of from 7,000 to 8,000.

NINETEENTH CENTURY PHILOSOPHY.

Professor Eucken, of Jena, gives a characteristically German account of the progress of philosophy in the nineteenth century. He divides its course into three periods—the first of high idealism, the second of positivism, and the third a counter movement, a return to the problems of idealism; philosophy made lucid and put in touch with fact by the scientific development of the midcentury; the sciences unified by constructive thought:—

The element of realism is embraced within the new idealism; and it appears as if the century, at its close, were concerned in harmonising the divergent views evolved during its earlier decades. Thesis and antithesis are to be followed by synthesis: idealism and realism are to be reconciled.

Sociology and economics have claimed their philosophic due; but nineteenth century philosophy has done scant justice to the soul and the personality of man

The eighteenth century secured the emancipation of the individual; the nineteenth has insured the rights of society at large; and it devolves upon the twentieth to harmonise these differences. To this end, however, there must be effected a radical change in our ideas of life.

OTHER PAPERS.

A thoughtful paper by Max P. E. Groszmann on the teacher and his duties urges as its chief point that it is "through the conception of human progress as an educational process that a new unification of spiritual efforts can be effected," and that the teacher must bring about the new community of spiritual interests, foreshadowed in the old time when priests were philosophers, poets, scientists, physicians and teachers. "Teaching is essentially a spiritual thing," Mr. Thomas R. Dodd, secretary of the South African League, puts forward afresh the claims of the Outlanders. Sir Wm. W. Bates gives a graphic summary of the heroic struggle of the British Government with Indian famines. He especially eulogises Lord Elgin's victory over the quadruple alliance of famine, plague, war and earthquake. "A friend of General Henderson" delivers "a word" to that gentleman, whom he regards as certain to be "the next Speaker of the House of Representatives."

IN Cassell's for October Professor Atkinson, who has undoubtedly performed remarkable feats in bone-setting, gravely assured his interviewer, Mr. Frank Banfield, that he "could give back to His Imperial Majesty" the German Kaiser "the full use of his left arm." The gift of practically another hand to the Kaiser suggests an increase in the output of the Imperial energy enough to make one tremble for the peace of Europe.

prev stat Ing man for situ

Cu

roci

T

Belo emig Scot bank in the frox itself the i back

was in a favo take depa Ti tools incli date, man brair Ridi tions

B

of st puts Stat depr that Ame lega Cour subj

H

inter

in the mics the 2 sistil most an ortions inher tende grow civili

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

THE September number supplies plenty of excellent reading, but scarcely reaches the highwater mark left by previous issues. Separate mention is required for the statement of Aguinaldo's case, for Dr. Field's sketch of Ingersoll, for "a vindication of the Boers," and for a marquis's account of automobilism in France, as well as for Mr. Little's reply to Russian versions of the Chinese situation.

HOW THE "SHAMROCK" GREW.

The Hon. Charles Russell, writing on the "America" Cu, race, recounts the genesis of the idea of the Sham-

To win back the Cup and to win it for Ireland has been, indeed, a dream of Sir Thomas Lipton's for many years. Belonging to one of the multitude of Ulster families who have emigrated, not to America like President McKinley's, but to Scotland, he found himself, in early manhood, a dweller on the banks of the Clyde. . . . Yachting was, as a matter of course, in the air; and the fact that "The Cup" had gone to America from Cowes in 1351, and had stayed there, somehow impressed its. If upon his imagination, even as a boy, and suggested vaguely the id-a that he himself might, perhaps, one day try to bring it back.

The id:a was mooted ten years ago, when Sir Thomas was crossing the Atlantic with Mr. Fife, the designer of the Shamrock, and subsequently revived and decided upon in a railway ride to Rome.

FRENCH VIEW OF AMERICAN UNIVERSITIES.

Mr. Edouard Rod gives his impressions, mostly very favourable, of American universities. He was greatly taken with the combination of practical and theoretical departments. He says:

But he is painfully surprised by the teetotal exclusion of stimulants from university clubs.

OTHER PAPERS.

Mr. Francis B. Loomis, U.S. Minister to Venezuela, puts in a good word for the foreign service of the United States; claims that their Consuls have been unduly depreciated; and urges in favour of short terms of office that in long residence abroad Consuls cease to be American in spirit. Mr. J. S. Auerbach discusses the legal aspects of Trusts and rejoices that the Supreme Court of the United States in limiting State laws on the subject is "the refuge for persecuted capital and persecuted ability."

How differently the tendencies of modern life may be interpreted! While people in Great Britain are rejoicing in the recession of the principle of laisses faire from economics and politics, here is Mr. Charles Kendall Adams, in the Atlantic Monthly for September, declaring the "irresistible tendency toward individualism" to be "the most marked characteristic of all modern history." As an outcome of this individualism he glorifies the combinations of capital. "The essential principle of the Trust is inherent in human liberty." Among other "irresistible tendencies of the time" he mentions that towards the growth of great empires, and that of the advance of civilisation on barbarism.

THE ENGINEERING MAGALINE.

GERMANY A PUPIL OF ENGLAND.

Herr Rudolph Haack, continuing his sketch of German shipbuilding, offers as the principal explanation of its extremely rapid development, (1) British example, and (2) Technical instruction at home. He says:—

First of all, it must be cordially admitted that the British ship-building has served from first to last as a splendid model, which the Germans have not hesitated to use on the greatest scale. Many German naval and mechanical enginers held positions in the largest British yards, thus adding to their knowledge; others made frequent trips across the Channel to study the equipment and organisation of British workshops. Much of the heavy handling-machinery and many of the machine tools were bought in Britain. It is a pleasant duty to admit that, without Britain as a teacher, no such rapid success could have been attained.

GLASGOW AND OTHER CITIES' WATER SUPPLY.

Giving to the thirsty to drink, one of the most elementary of human duties, has in these latter days become one of the most splendid privileges of civic enterprise, as is made evident in Mr. Benjamin Taylor's account of the water supply of the City of Glasgow. The far-famed tapping of Loch Katrine in 1859 only supplies some 40,000,000 gallons per day, whereas the present needs of Glasgow amount to 53,000,000 gallons per day. Mr. Taylor describes the extensive extension works which will bring the daily supply up to 110,000,000 gallons. The original works with city piping cost £2,500,000. The following figures are of peculiar interest to every one:—

According to figures compiled by the city chamberlain, Dublin has the cheapest water in the United Kingdom, the cost working out at 0.857 of a penny per gallon per annum. Glasgow comes next, however, at 0.963d. Then comes Duadee, 1.077d.; Edinburgh, 1.340d.; Newcastle, 1.860d.; Leeds, 1.875d.; Birmingham, 2.453d.; Manchester, 2.476d.; B.adford, 2.770d.; Liverpool, 3.062d.... In Glasgow a £15 householder obtains for 71d. per annum a continuous, never-failing, unrestricted stream of the purest water in the world delivered right into his kitchen, wash-house, and bathroom. It is calculated that 380 gallons of pure water are delivered to the citizens of Glasgow for every penny paid.

AN ELECTRIC MINE.

Mr. Thomas Tonge describes electricity in the mines at Cripple Creek, Colorado, and remarks:—

Cripple Creek is perhaps the only gold-mining district in the world where a miner can go to his work in an electric street-car, descend the mine in an electric hoist, keep his mine dry by an electric pump, do his work by an electric light, run drills operated by electric air-compressors (possibly, in time, to be superseded by direct electric drills), and fire his shots by electricity from a switchboard remote from the point of explosion.

QTHER ARTICLES.

Metallography will be a new word to most readers. M. Albert Sauvert describes it as the science of metals with special reference to their structure. Chemical analysis reveals the composition of mals; but their structure as well as their chemical composition affects their physical properties. The microscope must come into play to reveal the structure, and has a great rôle to support in metallurgy. The micropholographs showing the structures of alloys as compared with the pure metal, and with greater or less degrees of alloy, are very striking. Mr. P. J. Darlington criticises adversely Mr. Halsey's premium system of remunerating labour, and declares he can find no feature in it in which it is better than piece-pay. The Hon. John Barrett advocates and possibly Japan, as allies for the "open door" in China.

the ty at hese d a ism.

g is nust

own

vork ence

ues-

tter

the

riter

that

e to The

be-

own

ally

the

hree

itiv-

the

it in nid-

:--

sm :

rned

rlier

esis:

orts
out
wed
ets,
sen-

the is a tish uloe of of an.

r of

has ng, hat the

t of

an

XUM

The London Quarterly.

THE London Quarterly Review has become much more interesting since its articles are signed. The current number has quite a store of good things. Mr. Henry J. Piggott, writing on the present Pope and the future conclave, holds that the policy of Leo XIII, will be maintained, no matter who his successor may be. That policy is described as one of conciliation towards existing governments, of arbiter on all the questions that distract public opinion, and recovery of the temporal power. His successor is, the writer says, generally expected to be either Cardinal Girolamo Maria Gotti, General of the Carmelite Order, or Cardinal Domenico Svampa, Archbishop of Bologna. The President of the French Wesleyan Conference, M. Prunier, vigorously disputes the assumption that Protestantism is something alien to the French genius. John Calvin, Theodore Beza, William Farel, the founders of the reformation in French Switzerland, were all Frenchmen. In 1561 there were no fewer than 2,150 Protestant churches. Mr. C. S. Horne, writing on the Cromwell tercentenary, holds that hostile criticism has retreated from Oliver's dealings with the King and with Parliament, and now takes its stand on his treatment of Ireland. Mr. Horne anticipates its rout from this last recition and holdly eaches to vindicate the from this last position, and boldly seeks to vindicate the wisdom, justice, and saintliness of Cromwell at Drogheda. It is a romance of philanthropy which Mr. Hugh Strong narrates in his sketch of Richard Cadbury, Christian capitalist and Socialist. Miss Anne E. Keeling supplies an entertaining and sympathetic paper on American humour, the range of which is given in her concise remark, "Artemus Ward is dead and Mark Twain reigns in his stead." Mr. J. A. Barnes sketches the Evolution of a reference Bible with special allusion to the late Dr. Moulton's labours on the references in the Revised New Testament.

Feilden's Magazine.

THE second number of Feilden's Magazine reports the unqualified success of the first. The editor explains in answer to numerous criticisms that by his motto "militantly British," he indicates his intention not to disparage the achievements of other nations, but to hurry up the backward British to the pace and place of their foremost rivals. In the order for tramway engines given by the Glasgow corporation to an American firm, the editor sees abundant reason for this policy of whip and spur. To send engines to Glasgow is as bad as sending coals to Newcastle or cutlery to Sheffield. Among other suggestions, he urges the formation of a translation department under the control of the Board of Trade to guarantee to British manufacturers correct translations of their trade catalogues. At present charges are high and the result uncertain. He also commends for British imitation the trade index of the National Association of Manufacturers of the United States, which enables the foreign buyer of almost any kind of goods to get into direct communication with the American maker. The first contributed article is by Sir W. C. Roberts-Austen, President of the Iron and Steel Institute, of whom an admirable portrait is given. His subject is the whom an admirable portrait is given. It is subject is the highly technical one of "the nature of the fracture of armour plates." Most of the papers are of similar technical interest. Mr. Ludwig Grote, President of the German Trades Club in London, describes "a revolu-tionizing innovation in the glass industry," which is none other than the substitution of a certain kind of bellows or bottle-glass blowing machine for the lungs and mouth of the old human bottle-blower. It more than doubles working capacity and reduces labour, and so saves more than 50 per cent. of cost of production. Tom Mann contributes his experience as a working engineer of English and American methods. He reports that he found a large proportion of the most responsible positions in American engine and machine tool-shops held by Englishmen or Scotsmen. He confirms what Mr. Orcutt has said in another trade journal of the greater exchange of ideas between employers and em-ployed in America than in England. Mr. Mann says he saw more friendly consultation between master and man during sixteen weeks in American workshops than he had seen during sixteen years in British workshops. American employers greatly gain by accepting suggestions from intelligent workmen. The story of the building of the Great Central Railway has also a wider than professional interest. The general get-up is excellent.

The Royal.

THE Royal for October improves on its previous record, offering more of serious value and less of merely sensational interest. Mr. Harold J. Shepstone describes the prize mushroom of all mushroom-towns, Skaguay, "the gateway to Klondike." He recounts this "record in town building" and has the good fortune—rare in such narratives—to present photographs of the various stages of rapid growth. From one wooden store and a few tents on July 26th, 1897, Skaguay leaped into being a large town, well laid out with muni-cipal institutions—in six weeks' time! "Women Toilers of the Deep" is the title given to Mr. B. C. de Wolf's sketch of the Dutch oyster-women at Goes. Their work of gathering oysters, when they perforce wear dual garments, is declared to contribute to a splendid physical development, combining strength and beauty. A commendable and successful endeavour to make natural history of the commonest domestic sort popular and entertaining is supplied by Mr. James Scott, who writes with much-magnified pictures on "Some Interesting Insects." He treats in this way cockroach, blackbeetle, spider, house-fly, earwig, and clothes'-moth. "Novel Harvest Thanksgivings," sketched by Mr. G. A. Wade, reveal some strange developments of ecclesiastical ingenuity. Mr. H. J. Holmes' sketch of "Ludwig Amann"—the "man with many faces"—yields an extract for a previous page.

Round-About.

THE Post-Bag of the W.R.C. for October contains the following remarks from A 178 and B 173:—

My wife and I wish to write you a letter, and would be glad if you could publish it in your October Round-About. We write because we think it will encourage others, and also be the best compliment we can pay to the value of the W.R.C. A 178 and B 173 were our numbers, and after corresponding with a view to matrimony for a few weeks, we arranged a meeting. A 178 travelled five hundred miles to see B 173, and was so pleased with her, and she with him, that after three days together, they parted an engaged pair, and A 178 travelled five hundred miles home a happy man. We were married the end of last June, and are very happy, one having secured a loving, virtuous, Christian woman, and the other an upright, kind and good man.

The Conductor, on receipt of stamped, addressed, foolscap envelope, will forward specimen number of Round-About from Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, W.C.

Fra the the cau mo exc

exc

vie of M. sec has ing foll of the ma

onl

was cor oth cat mo whi adv tha dos cor ext a v

trat

ass

viol

obj

cou

inte of con Con

cou

mad

F

Que Ler on t In the hav civil disn

grou

THE REVUE DES DEUX MONDES.

IN view of the recent events of historical interest, both in France and abroad, many of which will undoubtedly occupy the pens of the staff of the leading French review in say the year 1950, it is somewhat surprising to find how cautious M. Brunetière is in his two September numbers, most of which is made up of the regular type of very excellent but rather humdrum articles.

THE ANTI-DREYFUS VIEW.

To the above verdict, however, there is one conspicuous exception in the shape of a thoughtful presentation of the views entertained by those still convinced of the guilt of Dreyfus. But even that is discreetly stowed away in M. Charmes's admirable fortnightly summary in the second September number. The anti-Dreyfus point of view has now for some time practically failed to obtain a hearing in England, and it may therefore be worth while to follow M. Charmes in his singularly dispassionate analysis of the famous affaire.

In the first place, M. Charmes admits that the courtmartial of 1894 was entirely illegal, and that revision was fully justified, but he claims that the Rennes trial was not only fairly conducted, but that every possible opportunity was given to Dreyfus and his friends to make good their contentions. Two secret dossiers-one diplomatic and the other military-were produced, and were fully communicated to the defence. M. Charmes evidently attaches paramount importance to these dossiers, the authenticity of which was never for a moment questioned by the able advocates who had charge of the defence. He urges that only those who have thoroughly examined these dossiers have any right to form an opinion as to the correctness of the Rennes verdict. As to the finding of extenuating circumstances, M. Charmes explains that it is a very common accompaniment of verdicts in France, and, though perfectly well known to be illogical, is yet found in practice to give a useful flexibility to the administration of the rigid French code. Finally, M. Charmes assures us that France has no cause for uneasiness in the violent animosity of which she has recently been the object. In France alone, he says, would Dreyfus have been given the justice of a second trial. In every other country the difficulty would have been disposed of summarily and without publicity.

THE PARLIAMENT OF PEACE.

M. Arthur Desjardins, the well-known authority on international law, gives a lucid and well-written account of the proceedings of the Peace Conference; and in conclusion he resolutely maintains the view that the Conference was very far from being a failure, though of course it did not bring about an immediate and readymade Utopia.

CHINESE RAILWAYS.

France is waking up to the importance of the Chinese Question from the commercial point of view, and M. Leroy-Beaulieu contributes a fairly well-informed article on the crucial subject of railways in the Middle Kingdom. In 1905 or 1906, if there has been no internal convulsion, the greater number of the lines for which concessions have been obtained will have been built, and China will have been thrown open to the full impact of Western civilisation. Will she, he asks, be thereby saved from dismemberment? He is inclined to think that for some time at least China will remain a sort of Tom Tiddler's ground, where the various European Powers will pursue commercial objects rather than annexation. M. Leroy-Beaulieu gives an interesting comparison of the relative miles of railroad allotted to each great Power. Great Britain comes first with about 3,000 miles, Russia next with rather over 2,000, then Germany with 1,200, while France and Belgium have 1,000 and 400 respectively. More portentous in its way is the appearance of the United States as a factor in Far Eastern politics, though our cousins have as yet only got quite a short line to build.

FRANCE IN THE LEVANT.

In his paper on the prospects which confront France in the Levant, M. Lamy lays great stress on the importance of religious influences. He considers that there has been a great Roman Catholic victory in the Levant, and that the political fruits of it will fall into the lap of France. Indeed, he goes so far as to think that Catholicism is even making an impression on the Turks themselves. Protestantism, to whose missionary efforts he pays a warm tribute, he considers not suited to the genius of Oriental races, who, he declares, are naturally fond of pomps and ceremonies. M. Lamy does not attempt to explain how the irreconcilable hostility of Catholic and Greek Orthodox is to be dealt with—indeed, he seems to imagine that France and Russia will hand in hand convert Islam to Christianity.

CUBA'S FUTURE.

In an article entitled "Cuba's Future," M. Benoist gives some curious figures as to the staple trade of the Pearl of the Antilles. In good years the island produces 28,000 tons of tobacco. In 1889, 300,000,000 cigars, worth £2,680,000, were made in Cuba, and it is rather significant that no fewer than 50,000,000 of these fragrant weeds were evidently too good to part with, for they were consumed in the island. The fall in consequence of the rebellion and the American war was extraordinary. In 1889 the export of cigars to America numbered 250,000,000, whereas in 1897 it had fallen to 34,000,000. The effect of the American conquest has been to destroy the cigar factories on the island, and already a gigantic Tobacco Trust is mooted. The raw material is now exported to America and manufactured there.

Cornhill.

THE October number is eminently readable. Most of its contents indeed belong to the category of "light literature." Mr. Barry O'Brien's paper on Curran, Lady Broome's "Colonial Memories," and Michael MacDonagh's "Reporter's Table," are full of amusing stories, and are freely quoted elsewhere. But an interesting addition is made to our naval history by Professor Morris's discovery of Captain Cook's first Log in the Royal Navy-which also claims separate notice,-and naturalists will be drawn with zest to C. Parkinson's observations "amid the islets of the Sargasso Sea,"—the region of the Atlantic between Bermuda and the Azores. In his conferences on books and men Urbanus Sylvan avows himself impressed by seaside camps for London street-arabs, and remarks: "To see an officer walking acrosscountry surrounded by some half-dozen boys with proud and interested faces gives one an idea of the right sort of education for these lads. It must be education by men, and not by books, and the men should be soldiers, not scholars. . . . But how excellent a thing it would be if our unemployed Guardsmen had half a dozen Hooligan youths told off to each of them, with whom they might walk in St. James's Park and talk of many things!"

d of

ungs nore

and

tion.

king

orts

sible

nops

what

the

em-

says

and

han

ops.

gesding

han

ord,

senibes

uay,

cord

rare

the den

uay

uni-

lers

olfs

ork

garical

omural

and ites

ing

etle, ovel

ide,

en-

ra

the glad rite

best

and

v to 178 sed

hey

iles

ed,

of .C.

THE NOUVELLE REVUE.

THE September numbers of the Nouvelle Revue contain an exceptional amount of interesting matter. We have noticed elsewhere M. Martin's instructive and thoughtful analysis of the population question in France.

GREATER GERMANY.

It is undoubtedly significant of a notable change in French public opinion that the place of honour in the first September number should be given to M. Rouvier's article on Greater, i.e. Colonial, Germany. The French writer recalls the fact that on a memorable occasion the Red Prince pronounced the phrase: - "We have just conquered on the field of battle; it is now a question of fighting and of conquering on the industrial field." An united Germany was in 1870 admirably adapted to carry out this programme. Even now, in spite of emigration, there are 16 millions more Germans in Germany than there are French in France, and for every French baby born two German babies make their appearance. Nowhere has industrial Germany shown her intelligence more remarkably than in the creation of a merchant navy. In 1871 there were 147 steamships in the German merchant service, but there are now 1,200, and Hamburg has become the ninth port of the world. M. Rouvier admits, however, that as a colonizing Power Germany has not been successful, but he makes the most of the singular fact that, though German emigrants are very unwilling to settle in the colonies of their own flag, they nevertheless have poured in hundreds of thousands-it might almost be said in millions-into the United States, the South American Republics, Turkey, Syria, and even Russia. Of these countries the United States is by far the favourite, 96 per cent. going there. As to the German colonies proper, M. Rouvier states, what is not very well known, that in the seventeenth century Germany had already established herself in Africa in the guise of a commercial company on the Guinea Coast, but in 1713 the company was wound up, and the eyes of the Hohenzollerns were turned away from Africa till 1884, when the colony of the Cameroons was founded. None of the German colonies are really healthy for the residence of whites. Thus in 1897 the mortality among the Europeans in the Cameroons was colonists is in most cases absurdly great.

THE GERMANS IN ITALY.

There is another German article in the second September number, which is written from a much less pro-German point of view. Indeed, the writer, who signs himself "Sens," declares that the present alliance between Germany and Italy is quite unnatural. The whole genius of the Italian people is anti-Teutonic. The present relations between the two countries are attributed in this article to the influence of Italian Jews, who, though not numerous, are active, intelligent, and wealthy. They own a great many of the Italian Liberal newspapers, notably the Tribuna and the Piccolo.

THE FRENCH LITERARY MAN.

M. Mauclair draws a melancholy picture of the material and moral conditions of the modern French literary man. Unless he has genius which lifts him into the position of a Zola or a Daudet, it is with difficulty that he will draw a bare subsistence from the writing of books, and M. Mauclair evidently considers journalism out of the question for an honourable man. The only really profitable branch of literary work in Paris is writing for the stage; and here M. Mauclair laments that it is the worst work which is generally the best paid, a lively and immoral farce bringing more grist to the mill than half a dozen witty and sparkling comedies.

A MARVEL FOR THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

M. Meunier describes at some length a marvel which will no doubt attract the keenest interest at the Exhibition next year. This is nothing less than an astronomical lens of absolutely astounding dimensions and magnifying power, which is expected to increase largely our knowledge of the mysteries of the firmament. It weighs 20,000 kilogrammes, and it is a yard and a half in diameter, and hundreds of people will be able to see what it reveals simultaneously, the picture being thrown on a screen.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Among other articles may be mentioned one on the utilisation of the French colonies in Africa by M. d'Attanoux; a technical and historical account of the annual French army manœuvres since the Franco-German War; an apologetic paper on the terrible tragedy of the Voulet-Chanoine mission in the Soudan; and the conclusion of M. Muteau's careful inquiry into the question of secondary education.

THE REVUE DE PARIS.

THE two political articles, if indeed they can be called so, in the first number of the Revue de Paris are a diary kept in Dahomey by a French officer named Daniel Mossé, who formed part of General Dodds's expedition, and a really interesting account by M. Rabout of the way in which Russia has colonised and fertilised that portion of her territory which is to be found between the North Cape and the White Sea—in other words, Russian Lapland.

FRENCH DAHOMEY.

The interesting point about the Dahomey expedition is that it shows how General Dodds organised and carried through a really difficult task. He may be styled the Kitchener of France, and at one time there seemed a chance that he would succeed General Boulanger as a national hero. This aroused so much alarm in official circles that everything was done to minimise his work.

RUSSIAN LAPLAND.

Those who wish to form some idea of the stability and power of the Russian character would do well to read M. Rabout's account of Russian Lapland. From the days of the great Catherine, the successive rulers of Russia have realised the enormous importance of this outlet on the sea. However, the difficulties seemed really insurmountable; and it appears that the attention of Russia to the practical value of what had become simply a poverty-stricken fishing village was first drawn during the present century by England, for during the Crimean War it was thought worth while to bombard the coast. Still, it was left to the late Emperor, Alexander III., to carry out the fine, but then somewhat shadowy, schemes of the Empress Catherine. The Imperial Government began by colonising the coast and developing the fishing industry. To every family who came and settled in the district all sorts of privileges were accorded, such as exemption from taxes, and gifts of fishing nets and all other accessories of their industry. The Government also opened bakeries, and an insurance society was started offering favourable terms to the widows of sailors and fishermen. Fishing schools were also opened, the Government further giving large subventions in order that the natives should be able to buy boats of and pap Ch dis

M

and tele

vai

ha

Ha

the 186

Ro

fou

and

sta

alt

lite

cru

of :

COL

fin

tur

Br

in red

aft

per boi

the

the

Jaj

plis

int

Ea

lan pol

in :

wit

wh

wh

per

it :

Th

pos

ser

abo

the

on and fishing tackle. Six lighthouses were erected, and telegraphic communication was opened up between the various fishing villages. Last, but not least, a large harbour was built, being known by the name of Catherine Harbour, close to Drahole Fiord.

LETTERS OF GEORGES SAND,

The great feature of the second September number of the Revue de Paris is a collection of letters written in 1861 and 1862 by Georges Sand to a youth, Francis Laur, in whom she took a great interest, and also to Edouard Rodriguez, an old friend of hers. In these letters is to be found the theory of how young men should be started in life as formulated by the most remarkable female thinker and writer produced by France this century. Notwithstanding her own extraordinary success in literature, and although she considered that her young friend had marked literary gifts, she declares that it is all-important for a young man to regard literature as a stick but not as a crutch. She also lays stress on the importance to a youth of some older man friend to guide him with his practical counsel.

A FRENCH VIEW OF ENGLISH FINANCE.

M. Viallate, in criticising the tendencies of British finance during the present century, is most impressed by the great fluctuations in our military and naval expenditure. He points out that, although in 1814 Great Britain had an army of 345,000 men and 145,000 sailors, in 1828, after twelve years of peace, the army had been reduced to 116,000 men. After the Crimean War, and after the Franco-German War, were the two great periods when our warlike expenditure rose by leaps and bounds. Strange to say, M. Viallate is also struck by the amount which we spend on education, or rather by the rapid increase in the amount since 1870.

PARLIAMENTARISM IN JAPAN.

The astonishing spectacle presented by a country like Japan, which has gaily run through, in a few years, a series of political reforms which took centuries to accomplish in the staid old countries of Europe, lends special interest to a paper by a writer, who signs himself "Far East," on the working of Parliamentary institutions in the land of the chrysanthemum. The Japanese constitutional politician is an entirely new creation; indeed, an exotic in a country which for twenty centuries had been satisfied with an absolute monarchy. This French writer shows what a mockery Parliamentarism may be in a country which is not ready for it. He declares that if one penetrates below the shell of Parliamentary institutions, it soon becomes evident that Japan is really ruled by the Daimyo or clans, of which there are or were 250. They are organisations somewhat on a feudal model, possessing enormous domains, and having armies in their service. Although this system has been technically abolished, the power of the clans survives, thanks to the fact that the civil and military hierarchy still rests on the qualification of birth.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Other articles deal with Damiens's attempt on the life of Louis XV.; a somewhat dreary account of the old age and death of Louis XVIII.; and yet another historical paper on Mlle. de Lange, whose sex, like that of the Chevalier D'Eon, seems to have been a matter of dispute.

GLASGOW is the subject of Mr. W. J. Gordon's local sketch in the October Leisure Hour.

THE ITALIAN REVIEWS.

OUIDA sends to the Nuova Antologia (September 16th) a counterblast to an article by Professor Sergi, noticed in the September REVIEW, in which he accused the Latin nations of "immobility," and held up to them as models England and the United States. Ouida, in her well-known incisive style, denies that Italy would be benefited by copying her non-Latin neighbours; on the contrary, already "she is losing her finest instincts and her most noble characteristics by an exaggerated and servile imitation of other nations." Ouida admits that the exercise of civil and political rights-from which United Italy is wholly debarred-affords the best education that a nation can enjoy, yet at the same time she declines to allow that there is anything either to envy or to imitate in the present condition of either England or America. G. Ferrero writes with commendable moderation of the social crisis in France, indicating with remarkable discrimination the various causes that have contributed to the agitation that has culminated in the affaire Dreyfus. France, he declares, is suffering from a vast national malady of which the principal symptoms are Protectionism, Nationalism, Malthusianism, Clericalism, and Militarism. The wellknown Senator, F. Nobili-Vitelleschi, sums up the Transvaal question fairly accurately, and in a spirit entirely sympathetic to England.

To the Rassegna Nazionale C. P. Gabba contributes a long and noteworthy article on the civil marriage problem in Italy. It would appear that, in spite of civil marriage having been made compulsory, several thousand marriages are annually celebrated before the priest only. Legally the children are illegitimate, and the official marriage records are of course rendered inaccurate. To remedy this evil, severe punitive measures have been proposed more than once by the Chamber of Deputies, but hitherto the Senate has not seen its way to accepting them. The truth is, public opinion sides with the law-breakers, and so the authorities are helpless.

The anniversary of September 20th has prompted the Civiltà Cattolica (Sept. 16th) to write an article on "Papal Intransigence" in its own most intransigent style, treating as heretics and traitors all who would welcome some modus vivendi between Church and State, and reasserting once more the inalienable sovereign rights of the Pope. Another article (Sept. 5th) on "Contemporary Anti-Christianity" is written in an equally aggressive mood, and will certainly do nothing to throw oil on the troubled waters of Italian politics.

The Rivista Politica e Letteraria is publishing a series of well-informed articles on contemporary English fiction by O. Malagodi. The September instalment is mainly devoted to appreciations of Hardy and Meredith.

In the Rivista Italiana di Sociologia E. Tarnowski points out that during the six centuries from the tenth to the fifteenth inclusive, no less than one hundred and ten Russian rulers suffered violent deaths, while, even in the present century, two out of six have been murdered.

We have received the quarterly issue of the Spicilegium Benedictinum, a Latin publication due to the zeal and the learning of the English Benedictine nuns in Rome. It continues the reprint of historical documents bearing on the Benedictine order, the present issue having as frontispiece a portrait of Blessed Euphemia Justiniana, a distinguished abbess of the fifteenth century.

mill

hich

tion

nical

ying

OW-

ighs f in see

own

on

by

t of ico-

edy

the

ion

led

ary

niel

on,

ion

rth

ian

is

ed

the

a

a ial

ity

ell

nd.

ve

he ars

at

as

for

to

or,

he

nd

ho

es

fts

ce

he

re

n-

ts

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

THE October issue is below the record set by recent numbers. Forty-seven out of one hundred and twenty pages are devoted to a single article, and that article "to be continued"; and the subject is the painful one of the State regulation of vice. The writer, who is anonymous, sets out to prove that legislation of this kind is unnecessary, that it promotes rather than prevents the evils it professes to avert, and that its end could be attained by innocuous and salutary measures. Well-intentioned as the paper evidently is, it leaves behind it the impression that the physical perils of vice are by no means so awful as they are generally portrayed. The worst kind of illicit disease is declared to be infrequent, rarely fatal, mostly mild and easily curable; while even those who follow shame as a calling are said to have as good or better health and prospect of life than ordinary women.

An impassioned appeal to Liberals on overcrowding and land reform is entitled "On Which Side Art Thou?" Its temperature may be gathered from these paragraphs :-

In view of such facts one can only come to the conclusion that the Newcastle programme was from first to last a fraudulent prospectus, that the Liberal "leaders" are conscious hypocrites and have deliberately betrayed and are now deliberately betraying the democracy, or one must write them down as the most hopeless set of blundering incompetents that ever held office. We have a right to demand that, should the leaders of the

We have a right to demand that, should the leaders of the party prove traitors to humanity, those of the rank and file who are pledged to the taxation of land values shall at once take steps to issue a straightforward and thoroughgoing manifesto to the electors, calling upon them to force the question to an issue at the next General Election. Where are the "Liberal Forwards" on this question?

Mr. George Pringle sketches the history and government of Guernsey under its classic name of "Sarnia Felix." It appears that Guernsey too has its Outlander problem, which the original electors are not too ready to consider. Mr. T. M. Hopkins pleads for the abolition of corporal punishment in school, and asks why a penalty applied with misgiving to criminals of extreme ferocity should still be thought suitable for boys. "Vox Clamantis" describes "the motives of Agnosticism" as these: "to do right because it is right; to follow truth because it is truth": but concludes with a longing after God and immortality, to which uncertainty adds pathos. The first article is a wistful appeal to France to vindicate the world's love for her by doing justice in the Dreyfus case.

HARMSWORTH'S.

THE September number is an excellent threepence-halfpenny worth. It contains much striking information, conveyed in a pleasing way. "Gardening for Millionaires" is the title of a paper by Mr. Bernard Owen, in which he tells of the prices paid for single orchid plants. They have been sold for £50, £100, £150, £160, £350, £500, and even £1000 apiece. The most beautiful illustration is that of an orchid flower which formed part of the Queen's Jubilee bouquet, and came from a plant valued at one thousand guineas. Mr. W. J. Wintle sheds a great deal of light on the mysterious region of underground London. Besides the burrows of metropolitan district and electric railways, there are "beneath the surging traffic of the great thoroughfares ... other streets—well paved and drained, and lighted with gas—which run for miles, but only echo the footfalls of a privileged few." In these "run vast pipes, the mains of the gas and water companies, the hydraulic power supply, and troughs containing the wires of the Electric Lighting Company and the telegraph wires of the General Post Office. Overhead run the pneumatic tubes through which the written telegrams are blown from the district offices to St. Martin's-le-Grand." Then there are the sewers, or underground rivers, with their "spates" and dry seasons and waterfalls. Bucklersbury there is a Roman structure which, with the underground Roman bath in Strand Lane, shares the distinction of being the oldest building in London. "Freak Philanthropy" is the heading which Mr. Arthur Birnage gives to his enumeration of remarkable charitable gifts: half-sovereigns imbedded in toast, a jersey that would fit a whole crew, a "philanthropic leg," or artificial limb, a truck of coals, a mangle, an elephant's tusk (the gift of King Menelik to the Bible Society), a donkey and cart, a milk case containing a live baby, hands and arms of a mummy, a Punch and Judy show, and an offertory of eggs. The growth of the steamship in number and tonnage is illustrated diagrammatically and fancifully by Mr. J. Horner. The papers on "Felling Chimneys" and "The Queen's Waste-paper Basket " require separate mention.

READING FOR THE WINTER SEASON.

WITH the return of autumn the thoughts of many of our readers, especially those living in country districts, begin to turn towards a suitable supply of literature which may help to while away the long evenings during the coming winter months. These we would remind of the existence of our Circulating Library, which for the past four years has done good work, being greatly appreciated in the villages, as also in towns where no free library has as yet been established.

Last year the popularity of the boxes was considerably increased by the addition to all boxes in Series I. of a few of the best recent and new novels. As these boxes contained many standard books which had been selected with great care in the first instance, so as to comprise all branches of literature; it was only necessary to make the above mentioned additions in order to bring them up to date and secure their continued success. This was effectually proved last season by the increased output of boxes as well as by letters received from subscribers testifying to the appreciation of the books.

The boxes contain some fifty volumes, which are sent to any individual, group of persons or institution subscribing to the library. A case of books is charged for quarterly or half-yearly, as may suit the convenience of the centre. By this system it is possible for any institution or number of persons to obtain a constantly changing supply of literature at a very small cost. For 30s. a quarter about two hundred books per annum are supplied. Everything is done to simplify the task of the local centre. All the books are numbered, and plainly marked on the cover with a label identical with the colour of the box to which it belongs. Catalogues of the books are sent with each box, while a card for entering the names and addresses of the members of the circles is also supplied.

Any one desiring further particulars should write to the Librarian, REVIEW OF REVIEWS CIRCULATING LIBRARY, Temple House, Temple Avenue, London, E.C.

APART from the political papers which have received separate mention, Blackwood's for October is chiefly notable for a semi-satiric sketch of London characteristics and a mocking critique of Messrs. Guy Boothby, Charles Sheldon, and Silas Hocking, under the title of "Fashion in Fiction."

THE BOOK OF THE MONTH.

TWELVE YEARS IN CHAINS IN THE SOUDAN.*

AST month has not been favourable for the rublisher, and the next promises to be even worse. Inter Prisoner of the Khalifa," in which the writer describes his experience of fourteen years as a captive in the Soudan.

THE KHALIFA

REDIVIVUS.

reason for referring to this book, if only because the Khalifa,

instead of having been disposed of by the merciless slaughter after Omdurman,

once more looms

menacing upon the horizon of the Soudan. It is with a certain grim sardonic

scorn that we read

the telegrams from

Cairo this last month. Only twelve populace, Lord Rosebery and Sir William

Harcourt leading themselves hoarse in praise of Lord

Kitchener. The resources of welcome

which are at the nation for the rewarding of its greatest conquerors

were strained to the utmost in order to reward the soldier who had smashed

the Khalifa. In the intoxication of that one military triumph

nothing was too extravagant or too exaggerated to do or

say. When mode-minded persons protested against the fool frenzy of the hour, they were told that Lord Kitchener

had achieved an im-

and sober-rate command

ago our

on, roared

of months

them

There is another

arma silent leges, and it is not only the laws that are silent, but books cease to be bought or read. The shadow of the threatened war lies heavy over publishers of the London. There will be a run upon books and maps relating to South Africa, but, as Baroness von Suttner pointed out in "Lay Down Your Arms, one of the first consequences of an outbreak of war is to paralyse the book trade.

On looking over the books that have been published last month, there are some, notably those relating to the position of women in evolution and their economic position, which demand much more careful and serious thought than any one is likely to bestow upon the question of women when the streets are reverberating with the savage clamour of the sons of Belial who, swollen with insolence and gin, are howling in favour of war. Among the publications of the month, however, there is one book which possesses a certain topical interest, inasmuch as its brings forcibly to mind one of the painful pages in our history, and it brings clearly into relief

what may be regarded as the fundamental aboriginal devilry of human nature. I refer to Mr. Charles Neufeldt's book, "A

NEUFELDT IN CHA:NS. (From " A Prisoner of the Khalifa.")

mense service for civilisation in blotting out for ever the hideous rule of the Khalifa. This was the reply that was constantly made to the mild protests that were urged against the extraordinary and brutal concomitants of our Soudanese warfare. The massacre of the wounded, the desecration of the grave, the ghoul-like mutilation and * "A Prisoner of the Khalifa. Twelve Years' Captivity at Omdurman." By Charles Neufeldt. (Chapman and Hall.) 125, 6d.

es of natic own hen heir

nder with ares don. Mr. able ast. opic gle, the ase my, ggs. age . J.

The on. of of cts, ure

ing

of

the reree blv fa xes ted all he ras of ers ent ıbfor

10

of ung a ed. re. he

to th nd he

Y,

ed ly CS

es n

plunder of the decaying remains of the dead Mahdi, were all justified on the ground that only by recourse to the methods of savages could savages be conquered, and, however objectionable such horrors might be, the end justified the means. In reply to al! expostulations we were triumphantly pointed to the fait accompli. Mahdist risings could not be crushed with rose-water, and thanks to the ruthless and resolute severity of Lord Kitchener we were told that the Khalifa-that nightmare of the Soudan-had been for ever banished from the world.

A NEW SOUDAN EXPEDITION.

And now we find that this is all a delusion and a snare. Despite all the ghoul-like atrocities justified on the ground of expediency in order to destroy the hold of the Khalifa upon his followers in the Soudan, we are told that he has once more become a menace to the security of Egypt. Our lately triumphant general is reported to be busily engaged in considering the question of another campaign against the foe whom we were led to believe had fallen never to rise again. So far from this being the case, the Khalifa is said to be rallying his forces with astonishing success, and there is no knowing how soon we may hear of another Soudan expedition, in which the intrinsic value of the glories of Omdurman may be subjected to a very severe test. It is a sorry and ominous fact that at the very moment when we are preparing an army to crush the independence of the South African Republic at one end of Africa, our defeated but undismayed enemy the Khalifa should be compelling our military authorities at the other end of Africa to prepare measures which may even involve us in a long, exhausting and inglorious campaign.

The Khalifa, therefore, it is evident, is once more to the front, and hence Mr. Neufeldt's book about him may be regarded as in some sort a book of the month. It is not, however, a volume which calls for a long notice. Its author makes no pretension to literary skill. He has a plain, horrible story to tell, and he tells it in a straightforward fashion, only halting by the way in order to rebut the accusations which have been so freely brought against him during his long incarceration in the heart

Charles Neufeldt, to judge from his portrait, is a very distinguished-looking, vigorous man. His native vitality must be immense, otherwise he never would have survived the hardships through which he has passed. Indeed it is probable that the permanent value of his book chiefly lies in the evidence which it supplies as to the capacity of the human being to survive torture and disease and every conceivable hardship to which he can be exposed.

WHY HE WENT INTO THE SOUDAN.

On April 1st, 1889, Charles Neufeldt, then a German merchant in Upper Egypt, who had accompanied the relief column that arrived too late to rescue General Gordon, heard that there were large quantities of gum accumulated at Kordofan which, if transported to the Egyptian frontier, might be sold at a great profit. The brother of a former governor of Kordofan, who was the owner of about fifty tons of this gum, entered into a contract with Neufeldt to send a caravan into Kordofan to see that the gum was brought down to Wady Halfa. It was a risky operation, for the road to Kordofan was threatened by the Dervishes, although a loyal sheikh, Sheikh Saleh, who was of the Kabbabish tribe and holding his own against the Mahdists, was keeping open the caravan routes in the Western Soudan. A large caravan was going to Sheikh Saleh with arms and other valuables.

HOW HE WAS CAPTURED.

Neufeldt proposed to travel independently with a small caravan of his own, but the guide whom he had engaged being a double-dyed traitor, who was in the pay of both sides, insisted upon his joining the larger caravan, which was carrying rifles to Sheikh Saleh. The guide then misled them in the desert, and conducted them into the hands of the Dervishes, by whom they were seized. The contents of the caravan were looted, and all its members executed with the exception of Charles Neufeldt, who was reported to be a great Pacha, and was therefore preserved alive in order to be sent to the Khalifa at Khartoum. Neufeldt is much exercised concerning the treason by which he and the caravan intended for Sheikh Saleh were sacrificed, especially as the story was widely current that he had been the traitor himself. This charge he rebuts with vehemence, and, so far as the reader can see, with success.

THIRST IN THE DESERT.

The only interesting thing that he records in describing the fate of that unfortunate caravan was his description of the effect of thirst upon himself and his companions. The treacherous guide who led them into the hands of their enemies had undertaken that they should be handed over thirsty, and thirsty they were. For three days they toiled through the desert under the African sun, without a drop of water to cool their parched lips. Neufeld

It can be better imagined than described what Gabou's (the traitor's) promise to hand us over "thirsty" meant; it meant precisely what actually did occur—the madness of thirst approaching, the lips glued together, the tongue swollen and sore in vain attempts to excite the salivary glands, the muscles of the throat contracted, and the palate feeling like a piece of sandstone, the nostrils choked with fine sand, and the eyes reddening and starting, with the eyelids seeming to crack at every movement.

When the caravan, suffering thus horribly from want of water, fell into the ambush, the Dervishes retired, leaving two camels loaded with filled waterskins. Instantly the thirsty travellers made a mad rush for the water. In the struggle that raged round the waterskins there was no thought beyond that of the imperious necessity of gaining a mouthful of the coveted liquid. While they were struggling frantically for the water, the Dervishes returned, surrounded the maddened crowd, and captured the whole of them, without almost any resistance. Neufeldt was taken first to Dongola, to Wadi Nejoumi, who afterwards sent him on to Omdurman, where he remained a prisoner until the arrival of General Kitchener with the avenging force. The rest of the book is taken up with an account of his experiences in captivity. Incidentally he tells us something about the Khalifa and the people among whom we are establishing the Gordon College. Neufeldt thinks that the Khalifa has enormous quantities of treasure buried in secure hiding-places in the Soudan. He thinks that the Khalifa's hoards amount to "All good gold and silver, jewellery and coins have disappeared from the Soudan during the last fifteen years." That may be true, but it does not follow that they have all found their way into the Khalifa's hoards. Neufeldt is not in the position nor has he the gift to give us anything like the same account of the Khalifa and of the state of things in the Soudan that was supplied by Slatin Pasha, whom he met once or twice during his captivity.

THE PLEASURE OF WITNESSING PAIN.

The interest of the book does not lie so much in its account of the Soudan as in its description of the hideous us W hi

and pris

inte

dis

wa

the

do

not str

ins

by rea

atr

to po

me

mo

tot

fly

tha

M

ab

sp

ha

alt

fel

hi

to

in

as

0 of

A

th

w

in tic

de

gl

de

aı in th he aı

ha

and horrible sufferings inflicted upon the unfortunate prisoners in the Soudan. There is a certain gruesome interest in the spectacle of suffering. It is this which leads crowds to see the bull-fights which are at present It is this which constitutes no disgracing Boulogne. small portion of the horrible fascination of war, and it was undoubtedly the element which contributed most to the popularity of the gladiatorial games and martyrdoms of the Coliseum. All philosophical observers have noted the intense craving of the human creature for strong excitements and fierce stimulants. instinct which leads many to tone up their nervous system by perpetual whets of alchohol leads the more or less jaded reader to seek stimulation in the story of horrible atrocities and blood-curdling stories of man's inhumanity to man. Mr. Neufeldt's book will probably be more popular upon that ground than upon any other. It is a melancholy picture which he gives, and one which tends to humiliate and abase the pride of man. There is much more justification for the old doctrine of original sin and total depravity in Mr. Neufeldt's book than in the highflying claims of the worshippers of humanity. It is true that no story of brutality and cruelty to be found in Mr. Neufeldt's pages can increase the humiliation and abasement which we are justified in feeling at the spectacle presented by many of our nominally Christian and apparently civilised barbarians in broadcloth who have been shrieking for war with the Boers; but although the lesson is the same, Mr. Neufeldt deals with a different phase of the same sad problem.

nall

ged

oth

ich

hen

the

The

ers

vas

rearson

leh

ent

he

an

ng

of

he eir

ver

ley

out

eld

the

re-

ain

oat

the

nd

int

ed,

n-

for

he

he

ed

he

ed

ost

to

n.

tal

ok

ty.

nd

on

IIS

he

to ns

en

at

s.

re

of

is

ts

THE JOY OF TORTURE.

The fiendish delight which man takes in torturing his fellow-man when he has him at his mercy and can amuse himself by inflicting pain, is brought out in very clear relief in Mr. Neufeldt's book. This delight in inflicting torture is by no means confined to one sex. The women in the Soudan took the same savage joy in inflicting pain as characterised the men. When Mr. Neufeldt reached Omdurman he had a rough experience of the tender mercies His feet were fettered and a ring with of the Dervishes. a long heavy chain attached fastened round his neck. All through the night he was left chained, to be inspected by the curious crowd which swarmed from all parts of the city. The war-trumpets brayed loud and long the whole night through, and a woman danced up and down in front of him singing. In rude rhyme she was summoning the faithful to attend to witness his execution. She sang of the agonies which he would suffer in death, and then let her Oriental imagination loose in gloating over his torments in hell. The first thing next morning his hands were crossed at the wrist, palms downward, and bound together with a rope made of palm fibre. When the ropes had, with a bit of wood used as a tourniquet, been drawn well into the flesh, water was poured over them. The agony as the ropes swelled They bit into the flesh, and the was excruciating. agony beendured caused the perspiration to pour from his body. After some time the swollen skin gave way, and the horrible tension was relieved as the ropes sank into the flesh. He was then led forth to be the sport of the rabble. He was brought into the open square, bareheaded, as he believed, to be decapitated. He knelt down and bent his head in the midst of curious thousands who had attended to see him die.

THE CAT AND THE MOUSE.

As a cat plays with a mouse, so the crowd played with him. "Dervishes rushed at me prodding with spears and swords, and while this was going on, two men, one on each side of me, with the mouths of their war-trumpet placed against my ears, blew their The pain produced by the bellowing loudest blasts." of the war-trumpet in the drum of the ear was intense. Neufeldt tried to fling himself upon the spears of the Dervishes in order to escape from his pain, but one of the men guarding him, holding the chain attached to the ring round his neck, pulled him back each time, much to the delight of the people. All this went on for a long time; until at last, his head almost splitting with the result of the bellowing of the trumpet in his ears, the agony caused by the ropes binding his wrists, the torture of scores of small, irritating, stinging flies attacking the raw flesh of his hands, and the sun beating down on his bare head, he was about to faint. A message came from the Khalifa to the effect that he was to be beheaded. He returned a defiant answer, and then the Khalifa sent word that he had changed his mind, and he must be crucified. An hour later he was carried on an ass, heavily chained, to the place of crucifixion. Instead of a cross, he found a gallows. He was then placed under the noose, and waited wearily for death, the sun burning his brains the while. He was still defiant as ever when to his immense astonishment a horseman rode through the crowd and declared that the Khalifa in his great mercy had pardoned him.

TWELVE YEARS IN CHAINS.

At first he did not believe it; but it was true. As for the mercy of the pardon, Neufeldt's views differed somewhat from those of the Khalifa, for from the place of execution he was flung into a prison, in which for four years he suffered horrors some of which he cannot even describe in English print. He remained four years in prison, and was twelve years in chains. The chains were riveted to his ankles, and he still wore the ringed chain round his neck. The weight of the chains, which he wore night and day, was twenty to thirty pounds. At first their heavy weight and the way in which they were riveted round his legs caused the skin to chafe, and large ulcers formed in which the anklets buried themselves, rendering it almost impossible for his gaoler to cut them off. After nine months the rings and chains were removed from his neck, but the chains on his legs he wore continuously, with the exception of thirteen days of the whole twelve

THE PRISON IN OMDURMAN.

His introduction to the prison was sufficiently grim. He was assigned a place at the wall furthest from the door between two men in chains who were dying of smallpox. There were about thirty other prisoners in the cell, which was only thirty feet each way, with very few apertures for ventilation. He swooned in the overpowering stench, and lay senseless without any one taking any notice of him, until the prisoners came in for the night. He says there—appeared to be an endless stream of prisoners coming through the door, and no sooner was the door closed, when a terrific din and uproar ensued. Mingled with the clanking of chains, the groans of the sick, the moans of the dying, and their half-uttered prayers to Allah to relieve them of their sufferings, were the most fearful imprecations and curses as the prisoners fought and struggled for a place near the walls or the pillar against which they could rest their backs. No sleep was to be had; this had to be snatched during the day.

Many of the prisoners were the old soldiers of the Egyptian army, who had been taken prisoners on the fall of Khartoum, and were left to rot in prison till they died one by one. There were no sanitary arrangements whatever, nor were any rations supplied to the prisoners, who had to be fed entirely by their friends and relatives. If they could get one meal a day, they considered themselves lucky. Thirty guardians, each with a rhinoceroshide whip, kept order in this modern Inferno.

A SOUDANESE INFERNO.

It has been found impossible, even in the most guarded and disguised language, to insert here a real word-picture of a night in the Saier. The scenes of bestiality and filthiness, the means employed for bringing the most powerful man to his knees with a single blow, the nameless crimes committed night after night, and year after year, may not be recorded in print. At times, and sometimes for weeks in succession, from 250 to 280 prisoners were driven into that small room: we were packed in; there was scarcely room to move our arms; "jibbehs" swarmed with insects and parasites which in themselves made sleep an impossibility and life a misery. As the heat grew more oppressive, and the atmosphere—always vile with the everpresent stench of the place-grew closer with the perspiring bodies, and with other causes, all semblance of human beings was lost. Filth was thrown from one side of the room to the other by anyone who could move his hand for the purpose of doing so, and as soon as this disgusting element was introduced, the mass, in its efforts to avoid being struck with it, swayed from side to side, fought, bit and struggled as far as their packed in condition would allow of, and kicked with their bars and chains the shins of those next them, until the scene became one that only a Dante might describe. Any prisoner who went down on such a night never got up again alive; his cries would not be heard above the pandemonium of clanking chains and bars, imprecations and cursings; and for any one to attempt to bend down to assist, if he did hear, only meant his going under also. In the morning, when we were allowed to stream out, five or six bodies would be found on the ground with the life crushed and trampled out of them.

Occasionally, when the uproar was greater than usual, the guards would open the door, and, standing in the doorway, lash at the heads of the prisoners with their hide whips. Always when this occurred death claimed its five or six victims, crushed and trampled to death. I wish I might say that I had drawn upon my imagination for what is given above; I can but assure you that it gives but the very faintest idea of what really occurred.

THE HAUNTING HORROR OF INSANITY.

It is amazing that Neufeldt survived. But in addition to this, sometimes fifty or sixty men would be all chained together, and occasionally the weight of his chains was increased to 40 lbs. His great dread was insanity. The intense mental strain caused him violent headaches, and periods of forgetfulness and a loss of memory. "But," he says, "during the worst nights in prison, when hell itself might be defied to match such a scene, when madness and death stalked hand in hand among the struggling mass, and when, jammed in tight with a number of the more fanatical prisoners, I fought and struggled, bit and kicked, as they did, for bare life, the thought of having friends in adversity, suffering almost as much as I did, kept that slender thread from snapping."

The scenes which took place when thirty or forty living skeletons, all chained together, would scramble and fight for a fragment of food must have been ghastly in the extreme. Those who fell in the struggle were flogged to make them stand up, and Neufeldt says those who got the food seemed almost glad of the open wounds caused by the blows of the whip, so that they might "caress the wounds with their hands, and lick the blood from their fingers." The flogging was very severe. Neufeldt himself was condemned on one occasion to receive 500 lashes. Only 60 or 70 were inflicted, as he became unconscious, and lay for dead. Sometimes 1,000 lashes were inflicted, and after the first hundred the clothes of the victim were cut to shreds and saturated with blood. On one occasion a prisoner who was flogged was sent to Neufeldt to be looked after. The fleshy part of his back was cut into ribbons, and the hip-bones were exposed. For six or eight weeks he was constantly employed bathing the man's wounds with a diluted solution of carbolic acid.

A GRIM INCIDENT.

The sufferings of the captives in the prisons at Khartoum, horrible as they were in their normal state. were horribly aggravated to an almost incredible extent. Mr. Neufeldt describes one ghastly scene in which he was instrumental in saving the life of Fauzi, one of Gordon's favourite officers who was flung into prison. When the chains were riveted to his ankles he swooned and was taken into the prison and left sitting with his back in the angle of the wall to come round. The floor of the prison was reeking with sewage, but even this pestilent spongy mass was too great a luxury to be enjoyed for more than an hour or two by the first mass of prisoners who were turned in. When the second batch entered there was not lying room, and four big Soudanese sat themselves down on the prostrate body of Fauzi. When in an hour or two the third batch was driven in there was only standing room, and Gordon's unfortunate friend was in imminent danger of being trampled to death. He was heavily chained, and although he had by this time recovered from his swoon he was utterly unable to rise. Neufeldt fought his way through the crowd in the darkness until he reached the side of Fauzi. But before he did so a general free fight was raging everywhere, and the keepers, attracted by the clamour, laid about the heads of the crowd with their rhinoceros whips. Even this was not enough, but about midnight the doors of the cell were flung open, and thirty additional captives were thrown into the place. There was not even standing room for them, and in order to compel the reeking mass of captives to make room for the new-comers the gaolers lit bundles of straw and dried grass, and flung them in blazing handfuls on to the heads of their prisoners. At the same time they laid about them vigorously with their whips. Neufeldt says that Fauzi, seeing the fire falling on the heads of the prisoners, thought that he had really gone to hell, and came to the conclusion that this place was worse than any hell he had ever thought of, and so there must be some mistake. Similar scenes, it is to be feared, are more or less common in these regions. Man's inhumanity to man is nowhere more callously illustrated than when one man whom we term a gaoler has absolute power over the life and liberty of another man whom we call a prisoner. It is doubtful whether at Morocco at the present day scenes of equal horror to those of Omdurman are not of frequent occurrence.

LIBERTY LIMITED.

It is not to be wondered at that Neufeldt fell ill with fever, but his vitality seemed proof against mandles and all hardships, and after a time the severity of his imprisonment was relaxed in order to enable him to decorate the Mahdi's tomb, which was constructed from a model that he had made in prison from his recollection of the tombs of the Khalifas at Cairo. He also had a certain measure of liberty when he was employed in manufacturing saltpetre, with which to replenish the powder-magazine of the Khalifa.

A CURRENCY TROUBLE IN THE SOUDAN.

One of the most interesting things that befell Neufeldt in his captivity was when he was consulted as to the ex

el

sh

m

de

to

m

T

th

m ra

th si

T

sh

ac

aı

ui

THE FLAG OF KHALIFA SHERIF.

(From " A Prisoner of the Khalifa,")

Line 1: In the name of God, the most Compassionate and Merciful.

, 2: Thou Living, Thou Existing and most glorious Source of Generosity.

3: There is no God but God. Mohammad is the Messenger of God.

, 4: Mohammad El Mahdi is the Khalifa of the Messenger of God.

great currency question, which seems to have plagued the Khalifa almost as much as the politicians of the United States. The Khalifa, with a shrewd eye to the main chance, appears to have hoarded every piece of the valuable metal that he could lay his hands upon, and his example was followed by others, who consigned all their specie to secret hoards under the earth and elsewhere, with the result that the country soon ran short of circulating medium. The Khalifa had a mint from which he turned out a constant supply of dollars, but he soon ran short of silver. He then appears to have adopted the ideas of Mr. Bryan and other silver men in the United States, although with a difference. The Bryanites are all for coining dollars and giving them a fictitious value by the authority of the Govern-They imagine that although the natural trade ratio between silver and gold is about twenty-five or thirty to one, the Government only needs to take the silver and pass it through the mint in order to make silver valuable as currency at the rate of sixteen to one. The Khalifa did not deal with gold and silver, but being short of silver he substituted copper. He began by adulterating his silver with a small quantity of copper, and finding that the debased coins circulated fairly well he kept on increasing the quantity of copper until at last the Khalifa's dollar was almost entirely copper, with a slight silvering on the surface which rubbed off in a few days. Finally he came to token dollars without any silver in them at all, maintaining that as long as his name and superscription was stamped upon the coin it was good enough and ought to content his loyal subjects. If any one refused to take his token currency at its face value he was punished by the lopping off of a hand and a foot, a drastic method of keeping up the value of a token currency which is happily beyond the reach of the silver men of the United States. Nevertheless, not even this method of forcing the circulation prevented the laws of trade asserting themselves. His depreciated dollars sank in value until you could buy sixty or seventy of them for a genuine silver dollar. The Khalifa then used to buy up his currency at the rate of sixty to one, recoin them, and issue the new coins through the mint at the par value, forcing them into circulation by the usual method of hand-lopping. It is also interesting to note that the depreciation of gold was achieved much more successfully than the appreciation of copper as a circulating medium. In the Soudan you could not get more than a dollar for a sovereign, the reason being that the possession of gold of any kind was in itself a kind of confession of treason or of communication with the outside world, hence the depreciation of gold until its face value actually sank below that of silver. Neufeldt's achievements as coiner were restricted to the smashing of the Khalifa's best machine, a labour in which he always seems to have taken delight.

othes clood. nt to back osed. loyed on of s at tate. tent. h he e of ison. oned his or of ilent nore who here iemn an only s in was time rise. ness d so the ls of

not

the

and raw n to laid says

the

and han

be

are

inited

lute

we

at

of vith

and

on-

the

hat

nbs

ure

alt-

of

ldt

he

THE CHARACTER OF THE KHALIFA.

Neufeldt does not in the least conceal his intense animosity to the Khalifa, refusing to tell even interesting anecdotes about him because they tend to his credit; but he frankly admits that, notwithstanding all the outpourings of indignation over the atrocities of the Khalifa's Government, it was probably neither better nor worse than the Egyptian Government which preceded it. He says: "Opinions may be said to be equally divided as to whether oppression was any greater in the worst days of the reign of Abdullahi than it had been under the old Government." Of the character of the Khalifa, Neufeldt gives us various hints, which on the whole do not produce an altogether unfavourable impression. That he was a despot goes without saying, but no one could have been other than a despot in his position. He seems to have been a man of considerable shrewdness and indubitable courage. Neufeldt says that when he succeeded the Mahdi he found himself in a position which nothing but a powerful military despotism could enable him to maintain. Threatened with attack from all points of the compass, he had also internal dissensions to combat, and met them unflinchingly. Perhaps if his atrocities were placed side by side with those committed in the revolutions of other countries, his list would not be found to be the longest. One of the stories Neufeldt tells of him afford a slight insight into the man's complex character :-

On my arrival at Omdurman, I was taken to the gallows in chains to be hanged. I turned to the Emirs and shouted, "Has your Mahdi no other way of exhibiting his power but by hanging a bound man before all his soldiers? Take off my chains, and I will fight you, or else get on with your work!" Abdullahi was told this while I was being played with, and said, "A man who will talk like that when he is going to be hanged is a man! Heis a big man; I will not hang him. A man who is not afraid of me is not to be hanged; I will keep him." This was said to the Muslimanieh and others. Abdullahi had not made up his mind whether I was a merchant, spy, medicine man, or general. Then again, he kept me alive in order to prove that he was more powerful than my Malek (the Emperor of Germany). I am told that he very often said to people, "You have heard of Abdalla Nefell. He is not afraid of me. His Malek has millions of soldiers like him, but he dare not bring his armies to release him; he is afraid to meet my ansar."

The Khalifa was punctilious in observing at least the form of the law, and never executed any one without a trial. His dealings with Neufeldt were on the whole characterised by a certain measure of intelligence and, occasionally, humanity.

THE KHALIFA AS MATCHMAKER.

When Neufeldt divorced his Abyssinian slave wife the Khalifa insisted upon his marrying again, for, as a matchmaker, the Khalifa appears to have been without an equal. As soon as he succeeded the Mahdi he compelled every woman without a husband, and every girl of marriageable age, to be married at once. He appears to have compelled all the Catholic nuns and monks to marry, and some of them to more than one partner. His zeal for matrimony knew no bounds. When the Khalifa assented to Neufeldt divorcing his Abyssinian wife he told him that he would select another wife for him, which he did, although Neufeldt managed to avoid the bride destined for him by the Khalifa. He appealed to be allowed to remain in single blessedness, but the Khalifa replied that his heart was heavy at the loss of his child, and no man might be happy without children, and he wished him to be happy, and he also wished him to have all the comforts of life, which did not exist where woman was not.

HIS HOLD UPON THE PEOPLE.

When the final battle was fought the Khalifa appears to have been confident of victory, for everything that Neufeldt says seems to show that from the Khalifa downwards there was a very sincere belief in the reality of divine protection. The Khalifa was a man given to visions, to frequent prayer, and also to continual consultations with fortune-tellers and those diviners and soothsayers who flourished in Khartoum as they flourished at the court of King Pharaoh. He seems to have honestly believed that his men were destined to defeat the Sirdar, and afterwards begin the conquest of the world, and bitter must have been his feelings when he fled from the stricken field mounted on an ass and heard his flying followers yelling "Where, oh Abdullahi, where is the victory you promised?" He very narrowly escaped capture by the Sirdar and his officers, who were at one time within twelve hundred yards of the defeated sovereign. He, however, contrived to escape, and Neufeldt maintains that in all probability he will give a good deal more trouble. Large numbers of the natives, he says, are loyal to the Khalifa, and it will require but a little mistake to make the inhabitants flock to his banner. It is evident that the destruction of the Mahdi's tomb and the slaughter of the dervishes have produced no permanent effect upon the minds of the Soudanese.

A PLEA FOR MASSACRE.

Neufeldt maintains that the Sirdar is much to be blamed for pandering to an ignorant public opinion at home by refraining from massacring every Dervish that fell into his hands. Neufeldt maintains that not only was it a grave error to give quarter, but that it was a positive injustice to the black troops. "Every man in the black battalions was entitled to a life in retaliation for the murder of a father, the rape of a mother or sister, the mutilation of a brother cr son, and his own bondage. To prevent these soldiers from exercising their rights was doing injustice and running a risk, when it is remembered how they had slaved for this day of retaliation. Every one of them had more right to take a life than any judge in a civilised country has to sentence to death a man who has personally done him no wrong. The result of extending to a horde of murderers the advantages of civilised warfare will cost England the loss of many a gallant life yet." As for the killing of the wounded, Neufeldt maintains that it should be undertaken systematically and on principle. The Dervishes, he says, are tough. No Dervishes that are not fatally wounded remain upon the field. As their wounds are mortal it is the kindest thing to put them out of pain at once. Besides, they do not wish to be cured. Their one longing is to have an opportunity of knifing the doctors or those who go to help them. From this it is evident that Neufeldt spoke truly when speaking of another phase of his experiences. He says, "Where all led for years a life of falsehood, in which deception of self had a no less part than that of others, suspicious of everyone around us, trusting no one, what wonder that deceit became second nature, and that truth, honour, and moralitythat is to say, morality as preached in Europe-should have retired to vanishing point." Vanishing point, indeed, will be the comment of most readers of Mr. Neufeldt's book.

HOW GORDON DIED.

One of the most interesting parts of Neufeldt's narrative is that in which he puts together what he has been able to learn concerning Gordon and his tragic end. He gives an altogether different account of Gordon's death accep pract to Ne fell fig

the or or eig
The

Khale Gordo sendin few m long-t wearie no mo contin guard was h serge advan comin was n woun before lay de Quick stairs, back Dervi steps in his almos breas kicki Orph the o

> H cava with He we spea the dead was will. regr shou alon had a s " G No The peo > > hear

whi

illus

Nal

Gord

dragg

dying

breat

raise

death from that of any previous chronicler. The officially accepted story is that. Gordon was speared on the stairs, practically without making any resistance. According to Neufeldt's story the very reverse is the truth. Gordon fell fighting with a sword in one hand and a revolver in the other, and he was not overpowered until seventeen or eighteen of his assailants had gone down before him. The following is Neufeldt's story of the last scene:—

Each day at dawn, when he retired to rest, he bolted his door from the inside, and placed his faithful body:servant, Khaleel Agha Orphali, on guard outside it. On the fatal night, Gordon had as usual kept his vigil on the roof of the palace, sending and receiving telegraphic messages from the lines every few minutes, and as dawn crept into the skies, thinking that the long-threatened attack was not yet to be delivered, he lay down wearied out. The little firing heard a few minutes later attracted no more attention than the usual firing which had been going on continuously night and day for months, but when the palace guards were heard firing it was known that something serious was happening. By the time Gordon had slipped into his old serge or dark tweed suit and taken his sword and revolver, the advanced dervishes were already surrounding the palace. coming the guards, a rush was made up the stairs, and Gordon was met leaving his room. A small spear was thrown which wounded him, but very slightly, on the left shoulder. Almost before the dervishes knew what was happening, three of them lay dead and one wounded at Gordon's feet-the remainder fled. Quickly reloading his revolver, Gordon made for the head of the stairs, and again drove the reassembling Dervishes off. Darting back to reload, he received a stab in his left shoulder-blade from a Dervish concealed behind the corridor door, and on reaching the steps the third time he received a pistol shot and spear wound in his right breast, and then, great soldier as he was, he rose almost above himself. With his life blood pouring from his breast-not his back remember-he fought his way step by step, kicking from his path the wounded and dead Dervishes, for Orphali too had not been idle, and as he was passing through the doorway leading into the courtyard another concealed Dervish almost severed his right leg with a single blow. Then Gordon fell. The steps he had fought his way—not been dragged-down were encumbered with the bodies of dead and dying Dervishes. No Dervish spear pierced the live and quivering flesh of a prostrate but still conscious Gordon, for he breathed his last as he turned to face his last assailant, half raised his sword to strike, and fell dead with his face to heaven.

THE REVERENCE INSPIRED BY GORDON.

He confirms this narrative by the story of Gordon's cavass, who, on the day in question, fought side by side with Gordon, at whose door he always slept at night. He said, "We fought the dervishes down the stairs till we reached the last one, when a native of Katimeh speared the pasha in the right hip; but I shot him, and the pasha fell down on the mat at the door, and he was dead." Neufeldt maintains that the killing of Gordon Neufeldt maintains that the killing of Gordon was not done by the Mahdi's orders, but against his will. All that Neufeldt says on this subject increases the regret which we feel that Lord Cromer and Lord Granville should have vetoed Gordon's project of riding on his camel alone into the Mahdi's camp. The Mahdi is said to have had the highest opinion of Gordon, and is the author of a saying which is current in the Soudan till to-day: "Gordon was not a Christian. He was a true Moslem. No Christian could have been so good and just as he was." The opinion appears to have been universal among the people of the Soudan. "For," says Neufeldt, "during my twelve years of intercourse with all shades of people I never heard a single word against Gordon." Of the devotion which Gordon inspired, Neufeldt gives a very interesting illustration in an account of the action of his friend Nahoum Abbajee. Nahoum went to Cairo to petition the Queen to ask the Government to restore part of the fortune accumulated by him in the Soudan, which he had invested in Gordon bonds, which were sent down with the steamer with Stewart and Power which fell into the hands of the Dervishes.

"On being asked what his personal impression of Gordon was, he said that his thoughtfulness for every one, his goodness, justice, and innumerable virtues, would take years to relate; and then when he was told that his claim could only be sustained on his proving that Gordon was to blame for the loss of Stewart's party, ill as he was he rose from his couch, tore up the petition, and with his hand raised, prayed Heaven that if the bit of bread to save him from starvation should be purchased with money obtained by laying a fault on Gordon, it might choke him. One had to witness the scene really to appreciate it. Ruined, broken down in health, too old to make a new start in life, his eyes lost their dulness and glistened as he breathed his prayer, and fell back on his couch exhausted with the effort. Nahoum, I am afraid, will have joined Gordon by the time this appears in print.

THE CHARACTER OF THE MAHDI.

It was a thousand pities that Gordon never had an opportunity of meeting the Mahdi personally, for his favourite officer Fauzi knew the Mahdi in the days before the insurrection began. Years afterwards, when Fauzi was captured and taken before the Mahdi, he was asked:—

"Why is it that you, a good Muslim, have never written to me when every one else has done so, expressing their loyalty? Have you forgotten the days at Abba and the instruction I gave you? If you have, I have not;" and kissing him, the Mahdi told him to "go in peace." The Mahdi was very wroth at the death of Gordon, for he really admired and respected him, and he had given strict orders that he was not to be harmed in any way.

Neufeldt had a very good opinion of the Mahdi, and a very poor opinion of the Catholic missionaries. He comments constantly upon their apostasy. Their conversion to Islam may have been compulsory, but they would have gained more converts to their creed had they preferred death to circumcision. Neufeldt is very strong on the point that no missionary should be admitted to the Soudan for some time to come.

THE CHARACTER OF MR. NEUFELDT.

From which it will be seen that Mr. Neufeldt has opinions of his own upon most questions, and is not afraid to express them. The book is illustrated with a carefully drawn plan of the scene of Gordon's death, and with many persons who are mentioned in the book. Neufeldt seems to have been much abused for having assisted the Khalifa by manufacturing gunpowder. His answer is that the Khalifa made him work in extracting saltpetre, but he took care to make it of such poor quality as to be useless for the manufacture of gunpowder, and that the only effect of his labours was not to add to the store of explosives in the possession of the Khalifa, but to spoil a large quantity of the powder with which his bad saltpetre had to be mixed. He also takes great credit to himself for having spoiled a great quantity of valuable machinery with which he was entrusted. In fact, when he was in a position of trust, he did everything he could in order to injure his captors. Altogether it is not a very pleasant story. No one could be in the position in which Neufeldt was, deprived of all human civil rights, at the absolute mercy of his gaolers, without living in a world of inverted morality which, although it cannot be helped, produces the same bad effect upon the moral nature that the privations and hardships of the dungeon produce upon the physical pears

that

own-

ty of n to

con-

and shed

estly

rdar

and

the ying

the cap-

time

ign.

ains

nore

are take dent

hter

pon

be

at

hat

was tive

ack

the

the ige.

was

red

ery

dge

nan

of of

y a

ed,

m-

are led

is ce.

ng

se

at

of

ess

nd

ne

ld

ıt,

r.

d.

SOME NOTABLE BOOKS OF THE MONTH.

MR. ANTHONY HOPE'S KING.

MR. ANTHONY HOPE is still faithful to the minor German States for the scene of his stories. The King of "The King's Mirror" (Methuen, 6s.) is a German prince who is, unfortunitely for himself, possessed of the paralysing gift of keen self-analysis. In many respects King Augustin clings to the mediaeval conception of a monarch and his duties, but the critical spirit of the nineteenth century has also taken a strong hold of his mind. The two tendencies are constantly at war with each other. Hence this autobiography, in which is recorded the opinions of Augustin the Man on Augustin the King. His private inclinations and his public duties are continually clashing, with results which are not conducive to the happy life. It is with a regretful sense of resignation that he recognises the iron hand of tradition which compels him to subordinate his private desires to what are considered the interests of the kingdom. All his friends and relations see in him a man to be shaped and used, from old Hammerfeldt, the Chancellor, to Wetter, the Liberal deputy. "It is not much fun being King," was his childish conclusion, and it was also his opinion when he had grown up to man's estate.

This was the way in which he framed his indictment against the life which destiny had bestowed upon him:-

A feeling came over me that it was a fair, fine world, where life need not be a struggle, where a man need not live alone, where he would not be striving always after what he could never achieve, waging always a war in which he should never conquer, staking all his joys against most uncertain shadowy prizes, which walked by myself through the night, "There's no pleasure in my life." That protest summed up my wrongs. There was no pleasure in my life. There was everything else, but not that, the protest summed up my wrongs. not pure unmixed, simple pleasure. Had I no right to some? I was very tired of trying to fill my place, of subordinating myself to my position, of being always Augustin the King. I was weary of my own ideal. I felt that I ought to be allowed to escape from it sometimes, to be, as it were, incognite in soul as well as in body, so that what I thought and did should not be reckoned as the work of the King's mind or the act of the King's

This ideal was only too grim a reality. It compelled him to crush his boy's love for the Countess von Sempach who, although his senior by ten years, understood the man behind the King. It also compelled him to marry his cousin whom he could not love. She was a beautiful young girl, but the marriage had been arranged when she was a child, and this fact banished all thoughts of love from the mind of a man of Augustin's temperament. He must marry, just as occasionally he was compelled to review his troops.

The King was obliged to sacrifice all companionship to this determination to be independent and under the power of nobody in any respect. He was utterly alone, alone to be weak, alone to be strong, alone to determine to do his work with his own life, and alone to hope that he would not make too wretched the life of another. "The King's Mirror" is an exceedingly clever character study and shows a deeper insight into human nature than any of Mr. Hope's previous works. There is also sufficient by-play in the story to relieve the pervading sense of self-analysis, but Mr. Hope can hardly think that his latest work will be as popular as, say, "The Prisoner of Zenda." It appeals to an entirely different class of readers. As the story closes when King Augustin is but twenty-five, he has as yet only committed a small portion of his autobiography to paper. We wonder whether Mr. Hope will induce his Majesty to continue his self-imposed task?

A PICTURE OF EAST END LIFE.

"To London Town" (Methuen, 6s.) is the third novel Mr. Arthur Morrison has devoted to the description of East End life. Nor is it probable that this will complete the series, for in a prefatory note he intimates that he does not pretend that his three books taken together give "a complete picture of life in the eastern parts of London." As a work of fiction "To London Town" has very small claim to consideration. What attention it deserves is not on account of the creative gifts of the author, but is due to the accuracy of his record of the incidents of life in the East End of London. It is not the characters, but the stage on which they play that is of interest.

The tale is of the simplest. Mrs. May and her son and daughter, a cripple, set up a small shop in Harbour Lane near the docks. They had previously lived in Epping Forest, on the edge of the great sea of houses which year by year advanced towards the outskirts of the forest. Johnny, a boy in his teens, finds employment as apprentice in the works of Maidment and Hurst, engineers. The little shop flourishes, business is good, and all goes well until the appearance on the scene of a Mr. Butson, an idler and a loafer, who boasts of his great relations, who, however, are a fiction of his imagination. He appeals to the sympathies of Mrs. May, whose husband had been killed in an accident ten years before. Mr. Butson, seeing the possibility of securing an easy and comfortable life, induces the widow to marry him. He does not allow his wife to cherish any delusion as to his real nature and disposition after the marriage day. Her punishment comes swift footed. Butson drinks and abuses his wife and stepdaughter till Johnny knocks him down and threatens to brain him with a poker. The improvement is not of long continuance, and Johnny, who is a strong young fellow with a supreme contempt for his stepfather, again interferes, fights a pitched battle with the drunken Butson, and carries him home in an unrecognisable state, so disfigured is he by cuts and bruises. Johnny solaces himself with taunting the wretched creature, when he is recovering from his wounds. The manner of his conversation may be judged by the following specimen :-

"When are you going to clear out?" he would say. "You'd rather be kept than work, but you don't like being thrashed, do you? Thrashed by a boy, eh? You'll enjoy work a great deal better than the life I'll lead you here, I can tell you. I'll make you glad to drown yourself, mean funk as you are, before I've done with you! Don't be too careful with that eye; the sooner it's well, the sooner I'll bring it up again !"

This does not rid the family of the presence of the man. The Gordian knot, however, is suddenly unravelled by the appearance on the scene of Mr. Butson's first wife, who is still alive, and the precipitate disappearance of Mr. Butson over the wall of the backyard. This is Mr. Morrison's tale. There are minor episodes, of course, but of these he is somewhat sparing. Mr. Morrison has, no doubt, an eye for externals, but he does not see much beyond.

SIR Wind leaf to Sir G upper Walte every pictur and c nent i the t Walte Besat metro such old da

> Life punis outsic capita seque factur the te of cri thief-He crimin stealin to rob coin: dared so pro many what never safe fr were hung lifting would him i hung o

Sir into h had in of his vividi pillor dealt freque passa Wit was no dead o But fr flints, consta to the ехеста come : whole heard, stage ! stream and he bleedi

LONDON A HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

H.

when et only

paper. lajesty novel tion of l com-

imates taken astern

ondon

What

reative

of his ondon.

y play er son arbour

lived t sea

s the teens,

ks of rishes,

rance

r, who fiction

ies of cident

lity of vidow

h any er the ooted. er till

with lance.

reme

hts a s him

he by nting

n his idged

You'd

ed, do

t deal

make

e I've sooner

man.

y the utson

ison's

these oubt,

....

nd.

SIR WALTER BESANT'S "Orange Girl" (Chatto and Windus, 6s.) is not merely a charmingly told story, it is a leaf torn from the book of the life of a great metropolis. Sir George Trevelyan has described the corruption of the upper and ruling classes one hundred years ago. Sir Walter Besant completes the picture. He shows us the everyday life of the middle and lower classes. The two pictures do not clash, they blend in a harmony of excess and crime. If the dice-box and the wine-cup are prominent in the biography of the one, the debtors' prison and the thieves' kitchen are equally conspicuous in Sir Walter's sketch of London life. In fact, Sir Walter Besant conducts us through most of the prisons of the metropolis, and the scenes he points out to us are not such as to make us look back with pride upon the good old days of our forefathers.

THE THIEF-TAKER AND THIEF-MAKER.

Life in those days was regarded very lightly. Offences punished with death were so numerous that few persons outside the law knew when they might incur the capital penalty. Informers were rewarded, and in consequence not only tracked down criminals, but manufactured them for gain. The thief-taker was not only the terror of criminals, he was the abettor and instigator of crime. One of Sir Walter's villains is Merridew, the thief-catcher. His methods are thus described:—

He instructed the young in the various branches of the criminal's horrid trade; he led them on from pocket-picking to stealing from stalls and bulkheads: to shoplifting; to burglary; to robbery in the street; to forgery; to coining and issuing false coin; to highway robbery, and at times to murder. No one dared to cross him or to refuse his orders. If anyone should be so presumptuous, he speedily repented in Newgate under a capital charge followed by a capital sentence. There are so many ways of getting hanged, and so few outside the law know what offences may be capital and what are not, that there was safe from such a charge. Children of fourteen on his information were hung as well as grown men: little girls of fourteen were hung on his information as well as grown women: for shop-lifting, for lifting linen from the hedge—why, this devil incarnate would instigate a child to commit a capital offence and then give him in charge for the reward, careless whether the child was hung or not.

POPULAR JUSTICE.

Sir Walter Besant does not introduce Tyburn gallows into his story, except as the inevitable fate which destiny had in store as the final scene in the life of the majority of his characters. He describes, however, with a horrible vividness the terrible scenes which were enacted in the pillory when the law handed the offender over to be dealt with by the populace. How cruel a punishment it frequently proved to be is well described in the following passage:—

With a roar as of a hungry wild beast the mob began. There was no formal or courteous commencement with rotten eggs and dead cats. These things, it is true, were flung, and with effect. But from the very beginning they were accompanied by sharp flints, stones and brickbats. The mob broke through the line of constables and filled up the open space; they pushed the women to the front: I think they were mad: they shrieked and yelled execrations: the air was thick with missiles; where did they come from? There was neither pause nor cessation. For the whole time the storm went on: the under-sheriff wanted, I have heard, to take down the men; but no one would venture on the stage to release them. Meanwhile with both of them the yellow streams of broken eggs had given way to blood. Their faces and heads were covered every inch—every half-inch—with open bleeding wounds: their eyes were closed, their heads held down as much as they could: if they groaned; if they shrieked; if they prayed for mercy; if they prayed for the mercy of Heaven since from man there was none; no one could hear in the Babel of voices from the mob.

THE THIEVES' KITCHEN.

Another realistic picture of life in criminal London is the scene in the parlour of the "Black Jack," a thieves' kitchen where the rogues of the metropolis congregated till their time was up:—

There were boys among them: boys, who had none of the innocence of childhood; their faces betrayed a life of hunting and being hunted: they were always on the prowl for prey or were running away and hiding. They had all been whipped, held under the pump, thrown into ponds, clapped in prison. They were all doomed to be hanged. In their habits of drink as in their crimes, they were grown up. In truth there were no faces in the whole room which looked more hopeless than those of the boys. The women, of whom there were nearly as many as there were men, were either bedizened in tawdry finery or in rags: some wearing no more than a frock stiffened by the accumulations of years, black leather stays, and a kerchief for the neck with another for the head: their hair hung about their shoulders loose; and undressed: it was not unbecoming in the young, but in the older women it became what is called rats' tails. With most of the men, their dress was simple and scanty. Shirts were scarce: stockings without holes in them were rare: buttons had mostly vanished.

NEWGATE PRISON.

From the "Black Jack" to Newgate was an easy step, but one difficult to retrace. The Common Side was little better than an Inferno established in the centre of London. Will Halliday, the person whose adventures form the connecting link between these varied scenes, was a prisoner in this portion of the prison for two hours, but that short period sufficed for a lifetime. Describing his experiences, he says:—

The yard was filled to overflowing with a company of the vilest, the filthiest, and the most shameless that it is possible to imagine. They were pickpockets, footpads, shoplifters, robbers of every kind; they were in rags; they were unwashed and unshaven; some of them were drunk; some of them were emaciated by insufficient food—a penny loaf a day was doled out to those who had no money and no friends: that was actually all that the poor wretches had to keep body and soul together: the place was crowded not only with the prisoners, but with their friends and relations of both sexes: the noise, the cursings, the ribald laugh; the drunken song; the fighting and quarrelling can never be imagined. And in the narrow space of the yard, which is like the bottom of a deep well, there is no air moving, so that the stench is enough, at first, to make a horse sick. I can liken it to nothing but a sty too narrow for the swine that crowded it; so full of unclean beasts was it, so full of noise and pushing and quarrelling: so full of passions, jealousies, and suspicious ungoverned, was it.

I have confined myself to a few glimpses of London life at the end of last century as depicted by Sir Walter Besant. The story adds to their human interest and picturesqueness, and few will read the "Orange Girl" without carrying away with them a very vivid and realistic idea of life in the good old days when law and equity were anything but synonymous terms.

AN interesting feature of the Architectural Review for the past five months has been the special supplement of illustrations of Architecture and Crafts at the Royal Academy. Another excellent feature is the series of photogravures drawn by F. L. Emanuel and entitled "Disappearing London."

THACKERAY THE MAN.

THE two large volumes which Mr. Lewis Melville has devoted to his "Life of Thackeray" (Hutchinson, 34s.) display a great amount of zeal and industry. From Thackeray's books, his letters, the recollection of friends, and the judgments of admirers and critics, he has constructed a mosaic character sketch of the author of "Vanity Fair" which when looked at as a whole gives a pleasing picture of Thackeray the man. Various sides of his character and his relation to art and letters are dealt with in separate chapters, but the book itself is of interest in as far as it enables the general reader to judge what manner of man the great novelist was. Mr. Melville traces Thackeray's career through all its stages as an amateur writer of parodies, as proprietor, editor, and contributor to the luckless National Standard, as part owner and Paris correspondent to the short-lived Constitutional and Public Ledger, as an artist, a writer of magazine articles, a contributor to Punch, and finally as the great novelist, the popular lecturer and magazine editor.

NOT A STRONG MAN.

It is as "a big, fierce, weeping man, but not a strong one," in Carlyle's phrase, that we see him in Mr. Melville's volumes. Thackeray lived in the world, but was not of it; he was a spectator as well as an actor, but more of a spectator than an actor. Says Mr. Melville:—

He loved his home, and his friends, and books, drawings, and music; he enjoyed a good dinner, and sometimes a jovial party. Yet he went through the world a spectator-a dignified Dobbin in the larger Vanity Fair-a melancholy, lonely man, a sad and splendid, a weary King Ecclesiast. He found sadness in bumour, and a tear on the eyelid of every jest.

Thackeray was also in a large measure a spectator of his own life. "I often think to myself," he once said, "what a humbug you are, and I wonder people don't find you out!" This gift of detachment of mind was not, to judge from Mr. Melville's life, an assistance, but rather the contrary. He had none of that joyous confidence in his own powers which has made life pleasant for many men who have had a harder struggle with life than Thackeray ever had to face and not a tenth of his genius.

HOW HE WROTE HIS NOVELS.

This lack of definiteness is the great characteristic of Thackeray's career. He was not "a strong man" in the Carlylean sense of the word. He did not laboriously hew out his characters from the granite, but allowed them to mould themselves. Mr. Melville says :-

He was not a laborious writer, as a rule, though he laboured hard before producing both "Esmond" and "The Virginians." He would read a book to obtain a paragraph, or visit a place for the sake of a description, or even inspect the complaint books of the Reform and Athenæum Clubs in order to impart local colour to his club snobs; but, with the exception of Esmond, he never drew up a plot, and he wrote from number to number, careless of what might follow. Indeed, he admitted that when he began a novel he rarely knew how many people would figure in it; and he told Mr. Jr. ffieson that his plan was to create mentally two or three of his chief characters, and then to write right away from time to time, with intervals of to write right away from time to time, with intervals of repose between the times of industry, and go onward from chapter to chapter, with only a general notion of the course he would be taking a few chapters later. "I don't control my characters," he said; "I am in their hands, and they take me where they please." "I have been surprised at the observations made by some of my characters," he wrote in a "Round-About Paper." "It seems as if an occult power was moving the new. moving the pen. The personage does or says something, and I ask, 'How the dickens did he come to think of that?'"

Thus, when a friend remonstrated with him for having made Esmond marry his mother-in-law, he only replied, "I didn't make him do it; they did it themselves.

Of his method of writing his biographer says :-

He had his stated hours for writing. He would take a quiet table at the Athenæum Club and cover a few of those little slips of paper upon which he wrote his stories, and later in the day he would go the Garrick Club and devote some more time to his work. But he was easily tempted to go for a walk, or to join in an interesting conversation, and to put his sheets away until another time.

HIS NERVOUSNESS.

The following anecdote, related by Mrs. Kemble, of Thackeray's nervousness before he began to lecture, is most characteristic of the man :-

"I found him standing like a forlorn, disconsolate g'ant in the middle of the room, gazing about him. 'Oh, Lord!' he exclaimed, as he shook hands with me, 'I am sick at my stomach with fright.' I spoke some words of encouragement to him, and was going away, but he held my hand like a scared child, crying, 'Oh, don't leave me!' 'But,' said I, 'Thackeray, you mustn't stand here. Your audience are beginning to come in, and I drew him from the middle of his chairs and benches, which were beginning to be occupied, into the retiring-room adjoining the lecture-room, my own readings having made me perfectly familiar with both. Here he began pacing up and down, literally wringing his hands in nervous distress. 'Now,' said I, 'what shall I do? Shall I stay with you till you begin, or shall I go and leave you alone to collect yourself?' 'Oh,' he said, 'if I could only get at that confounded thing (his MS.) to have a last look at it?' 'Where is it?' said I. 'Oh, in the next room on the reading-desk.' 'Well,' said I, 'if you don't like to go in and get it, I'll fetch it for you.' And, remembering well the position of my reading-dable, which had been close to the door of the of my reading-table, which had been close to the door of the retiring-room, I darted in, hoping to snatch the MS. without attracting the attention of the audience, with which the room was already nearly full. I had been used to deliver my reading sea'ed at a very low table, but my friend Thackeray gave his lecture standing, and had a reading desk placed on the platform adapted to his own very tall stature, so that when I came to get his MS. it was almost above my head. Though rather disconcerted, I was determined not to go back without it, and so made a half-jump and a clutch at the book, when every leaf of it came fluttering separately down about me. I hardly know what I did, but I think I must have gone nearly on all-fours in my agony to gather up the scattered leaves, and, retreating with them, held them out in dismay to poor Thackeray, crying, 'Oh, look, look, what a dreadful thing I have done!' 'My dear soul,' he said, 'you couldn't have done better for me. I have just a quarter of an hour to wait here, and it will take me about that to page this again, and it's the best thing in the world that could have happened."

HIS LOVE FOR CHILDREN.

The great novelist was a great lover of children. His devotion to his own was the incentive that made him write and lecture when he would gladly have done neither. The greatest sight in London, he was wont to declare, was to see the charity children sing in St. Paul's. He never could see a boy, he told Dickens, without wanting to give him a sovereign. Tall man though he was, standing over six feet high, he was not too big to take an interest in childish games. He would sit amongst children inquiring tenderly after their dolls, and make out a genealogical tree so that each doll had its own story. The following charming anecdote is told by Miss Henrietta Corkran, who knew him when she was a child of seven :-

One late afternoon, after having told us delightful stories, Mr. Thackeray remarked that he must leave at once, he was so terribly hungry. We coaxed him to remain, and told him we really could give him a good dinner.

rhin saw seco in he ark

with

with look rubb valu his 1

T any his ( ing W was many little easil blott saw

becar

A Pr Par Gerar How, Melvi Moult

Besant Chant, Crocke For a

De Br

Mülle

Holme Hope, Hope, Adve Lefroy

Meade Morris Munro Neish, Platts,

Riette. Taylou

Morton Nesbitt Rapkin

286 p Turriff, 46 pp at ? " " made didn't quiet slips e day ne to or to away

e, of re, is in the

1' he mach , and rying, ustn' and I were ng the miliar vring-

hall o and could look n the n and sition of the ithout n was 'ed at ding, to his it was was -jump tering but I gather m out hat a you of an e this have him ither. , was never give ding erest ldren ut a

His tory. Miss as a ories, as so m we

"There is nothing, my dears, you can give me," he answered, with a funny little sigh, "for I could only eat a chop from a rhinoceros and a slice from an elephant."

"Yes, I tan," exclaimed my three-year old sister; and we saw her disappear into a big cupboard. She emerged a few seconds after with a look of triumph on her fat little face, holding in her hands a wooden rhinoceros and elephant from her Noah's ark; and putting the two animals on a plate, she handed them with great gravity to Mr. Thackeray. Never can I forget the look of delight on the great man's face; how he laughed and rubbed his hands with glee; and then, taking the child up in his arms, kissed her, "Ah, little rogue, you already know the value of a kiss." Then he asked for a knife and fork, smacked his lips, and pretended to devour the elephant and rhinoceros.

HIS THOUGHTFULNESS.

Thackeray had a tender heart for any one in trouble of any sort. He was full of thoughtfulness and dispensed his charities with a charming delicacy. The two following anecdotes illustrate this trait of his character :-

We are told how he discovered some old acquaintance who was in very reduced circumstances. Thackeray mounted the many steps leading to the desolate chamber, administered some little rebuke on the thoughtlessness of not laying by some of his easily gained gold of youth or manhood, and slipping into a blotting-book a hundred-pound note, hurried away. "I never saw him do it," said poor old P——. "I was very angry because he said I had been a reckless old goose—and then a hundred-pounds falls out of my writing book. God bless him!

One day he was found in his Paris hotel writing on the lid of a pill-box "One to be taken occasionally." He was asked what he was doing. "Well," he explained, "there is an old person here who says she is very ill and in distress, and I strongly suspect that this is the sort of medicine she wants. Dr. Thackeray intends to leave it with her himself." In the box the pills had been replaced by Napoleons.

HIS CREED.

Thackeray did not take much account of the externals of religion. His creed was a simple one, thoroughly in keeping with the whole of his life and thoughts. Mr.

"Let us turn God's to-day to its best use," he said; and while monks were singing their litanies, while nuns were telling their beads, while clergymen were lecturing on the infallibility of the Bible, and the crowds flocked to hear them, he was in some quiet spot doing some kind action, or talking at the sick bed of an auni, or sitting in sympathising silence with some broken-hearted man who had lost his son.

He did not trouble about the future. To-day occupied his thoughts, and he left to-morrow to take care of itself. About my future state," he said, "I don't know-I leave it in the disposal of the awful Father; but for to-day I thank God I can love you, and that you and others beside are thinking of me with a tender regard."

BOOKS RECEIVED.

BIOGRAPHY, ETC.

| A Preacher's Life, an Autobiography and an Album. Joseph            |      |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------|------|
| Parker, D.D. med. 8vo. 427 pp (Hodder and Stoughton)                | 6/0  |
| Gerard, Frances. The Romance of Ludwig II. of Bavaria. 54 Illustra- |      |
| tions. med. 8vo. 302 pp (Hutchinson)                                |      |
| How, F. D. Bishop John Selwyn. med. 8vo. 268 pp (Isbister)          | 7/0  |
| Melville, Lewis. The Life of William Makepeace Thackeray. 2 Vols.   |      |
| illustrated. med. 8vo. 329 pp. and 341 pp (Hutchinson)              | 32/0 |
| Moulton, W. Fiddian. William F. Moulton. med. 8vo. 235 pp           |      |
| [chictor)                                                           | - 14 |

ECCAVE BELLEG LETTERS ETC

|                | iiio, bebeeb bellikeo, bio.                                                 |    |
|----------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------|----|
| De Brath, S. a | nd F. Beatty. Over-Pressure. I. cr. 8vo. 236 pp(Geo. Philip and Son) 3/ |    |
| Mall- M        | (Geo, Philip and Son) 3/                                                    | /6 |
| Muller, Max.   | Auld Lang Syne, Second Series. med. 8vo. 271 pp (Longmans) 10/              | 6  |
|                | FICTION.                                                                    |    |

| Besant, Sir Walter. The Orange Girl. cr. 8vo. 444 pp           |     |
|----------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| (Chatto and Windus)                                            | 6/0 |
| Chant, Mrs. Ormiston. Selcutt's Manager. cr. 8vo(Richards)     | 6/0 |
| Crockett, S. R. Kit Kennedy. cr. 8vo. 384 pp(J. Clarke)        | 6/0 |
| For a God Dishonoured. cr. 8vo. 357 pp(John Long)              | 6/0 |
| Fowler, Edith Henrietta, A Corner of the West. cr. 8vo. 356 pp |     |
| (Hutchinson)                                                   | 6/0 |
| Holmes, Arthur H. Quinford. cr. 8vo. 287 pp(Unicorn Press)     | 6/0 |
| Hope, Anthony. The King's Mirror. cr. 8vo. 311 pp (Methuen)    | 6/0 |
| Hope, A. R. Ready Made Romance—Reminiscences of Youthful       |     |
| Adventure. cr. 8vo. 358 pp(A. and C. Black)                    | 5/0 |

| Lefroy, Ella Napier. The Man's Cause. cr. 8vo. 343 pp                                                                                     | nol 6/2 |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------|
| Meade, L. T. The Desire of Men (An Impossibility). cr. &                                                                                  | vo.     |
| 314 pp                                                                                                                                    | ng) 6/o |
| Morrison, Arthur. To London Town. cr. 8vo. 312 pp (Methuc                                                                                 | en) 6/o |
| Munro, Neil. Gilian the Dreamer. l. cr. 8vo. 400 pp(IsbistNeish, R. The Brown Girls and Other Sketches, cr. 8vo. 174 pp.(Arrowsmi | er) 6/o |
| Platte W Cartes The Tuttlebury Troubles or the Arrowsmi                                                                                   | th) 1/0 |

| I little, V | v. Carter. | The Tuttlebe | ary rroubie | s. cr.  | (Digby, Long)           | 10  |
|-------------|------------|--------------|-------------|---------|-------------------------|-----|
| Riette.     | The Roma   | nce of Nun's | Hollow, c   | r. 8vo. |                         |     |
|             |            |              |             |         | (Digby, Long)247 pp | 3/6 |
| kayloui,    | virguna.   | Stories Hom  | wagner. C   | r. ovu. | 247 pp                  |     |

(Digby, Long) 3/6

MISCELLANEOUS.

| Morton, Honnor.      | From a Nurse's Note-Book. cr. 8vo. 153 pp(Scientific Press, Limited)                      |     |
|----------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| Nesbitt, Rev. J. J.  | (Scientific Press, Limited) The Westminster Reciter. cr. 8vo. 405 pp (Bowden)                 | 5/0 |
| Rapkin, G. Genesi    | (Bowden) s in Harmony with Itself and Science. cr. 8vo(Christian Commonwealth Publishing Co.) | 3/6 |
| Turriff, G. G. Glen. | The Zither Banjo and how to Study it. cap. 8vo                                                | 1/0 |

HISTORICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL.

| indicate into obcording inchibi                                           |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Glass, Henry Alex. The Barebones Parliament. 1653. med. 8vo.              |
| Heilprin, Angelo. Alaska and the Klondike. cr. 8vo. illustrated           |
| and maps, 314 pp (Pearson) 7/6                                            |
| and maps. 314 pp                                                          |
| 2 Vols. med. 8vo. Vol. I. 416 pp. Vol. II. 451 pp(J. Nisbet) net 24/0     |
| Meakin, Budgett. The Moorish Empire. demy 8vo. illustrated.               |
| 576 pp(Sonnenschein) 15/0                                                 |
| Thomas, Margaret. Two Years in Palestine and Syria. 16 illustrations      |
| in colours. demy 8vo. 343 pp(Nimmo) net 12/6                              |
| Vivian, Herbert. Tunisia. I. cr. 8vo. illustrated. 341 pp. (Pearson) 15/0 |
|                                                                           |

NEW EDITIONS.

| De Brémont, Anna Comtesse. The Gentleman Digger; a Study of Johannesburg Life. cr. 8vo. 301 pp                     | 3/6 |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| Lodge, Thomas, Translation of Seneca on Benefits, cap. 8vo. 328 pp.                                                | 3/0 |
| (Dent) net                                                                                                         | 1/6 |
| Otway, Thomas. Venice Preserved; or, a Plot Discovered. (Temple                                                    |     |
| Dramatists Series.) cap. 8vo. 137 pp                                                                               | 1/0 |
| cr. 8vo. 417 pp(Macmillan)Walton, Izaak. The Compleat Angler. cap. 8vo. 248 pp(Dent) net                       | 5/0 |
| Whiteing, Richard. The Island, or an Adventure of a Person of Ouality—(new and enlarged edition.) cr. 8vo. 288 pp. |     |
| (Grant Richards)                                                                                                   | 6/0 |

| REFERENCE BOOKS.                                                                                                                                              |     |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| Banning, Capt. S. N. Organisation and Equipment made easy.cr. 8vo. 128 pp                                                                                 | 4/6 |
| Burdett's Hospitals and Charities, 1899. cr. 8vo. 952 pp                                                                                                      | 5/0 |
| De Gruyther, Capt. C. M. Tactics for Beginners. cr. 8vo. 287 pp. (Gale and Polden, Aldershot) London Statistics. Vol. VIII. 1837-38. (London County Council.) | 6/0 |
|                                                                                                                                                               | 5/0 |
| Illustrated. 108 pp                                                                                                                                           |     |
| 240 pp (Russell and Co.)Shadwell, Capt. L. J. Key to Military Sketching made Easy and                                                                     | 2/6 |
| Military. Maps explained. Illustrated. 89 pp. cr. 4to                                                                                                         | 4/0 |

DEL ICIONS

| RELIGIOUS.                                                                 |      |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------|------|
| Grubb, E., M.A. Social Aspects of the Quaker Faith. cr. 8vo.               |      |
| 252 pp (Headley Bros.)                                                     | 3/6  |
| Emmerich, Sister. The Dolorous Passion. cr. 3vo. 352 pp. (Burns and Oates) | 31   |
| (Burns and Oates)                                                          | 2/6  |
| Zion's Works. Vol. IV. New Light on the Bible. Med. 8vo. 311 pp.           | 31 4 |
| (Macqueen)                                                                 | 5/c  |

LEARNING LANGUAGES BY LETTER-WRITING.

THIS month witnesses the opening of a school in France which has been established by M. Edmond Demolins, and which is virtually the outcome of years of thought and observation of methods old and new. In England, twenty years or more ago, Haysman's International Colleges were started with the idea of facilitating the education of children in foreign tongues, as doubtless many of our city readers may remember. One school was, if my memory serves me rightly, near London—one in Boulogne and one in Germany or Switzerland-and the lads were transferred from one to the other. But, after some years, experience showed that there was something lacking. English boys sent over to the French school were in France certainly, but so were a large number of other English boys. They naturally foregathered, and it became a matter of schoolboy honour to speak only their own much-loved tongue.

M. Demolins has improved upon the scheme. The school itself is near Verneuil, in the department of Eure, but the majority of the intending scholars are sent as a preparation to England and Germany. The boys, however, are not sent to one English school, but to many; three in one school is the largest number permitted. The ages of the lads are from nine to thirteen, as language is more easily acquired then. Our schools being mostly in the country this plan suits, but for Germany arrangements are different, as the schools are in towns. So a school near lakes and the Black Forest has been chosen, and the boys attend daily, boarding in different families, so that the environment may be as German as possible. After a year or more abroad the lads return to France to finish their education. This is directly the opposite of the method most usual with us. We send our boys and girls to finish abroad, and thus the experiment to be carried on at the "École des Roches" will be watched with much interest. It is amusing to notice that there is telephonic communication with Paris, so that during specified hours the parents there and the children at school can have a little talk. Will the talk be pocket money and parcels on the one side and galoshes and wraps on the other, I wonder? Imagine a boy being called from cricket or football to be questioned as to his socks being damp. For the school is to be an objectlesson, and as here games, manual training, etc., are to be an essential part of the school life; the aim of M. Demolins being to amalgamate that which is good in the French system with that which is good in the English.

LETTERS.

Dear Mr. Stead,—I am very anxious to speak modern European languages, and I have often thought that it would be a very good and time-saving system if Englishmen working every day in London and getting a lunch interval of an hour or more in the middle of the day could arrange to lunch with foreigners working in the same locality and wishing to supplement their incomes in a small way by teaching their language. Of course various difficulties suggest themselves at once—the risk of getting hold of uncongenial companions and the unpleasantness of getting rid of them, difficulties in arranging times and places to suit both purties, etc.—Yours truly,

It seems to me that one difficulty in such paid-for lessons is, that ordinary luncheon houses would object to give their customers so much time. But the thought is good, and if any foreign gentleman Westminster way will respond to Mr. H., I will gladly forward his name to him; and if people in London—English, French, or German—would like to try the plan on the mutual help system—that is, a German and an Englishman for example, arranging to lunch together when possible—English being the speech one day, German the other—I will gladly introduce such.

Az

Supp

Orig

Etch

The

Edw

On t

The

The

Som

44 Q1

Elec

Turi

Vari

Sir 1

Don

Japa Som

Som

Scul

Hol

Aly

Hov

Sign

Iron

Hoy

The

Ern

Dear Mr. Stead,—It is now a year since you introduced me to my French correspondent, and I think this plan is the best possible way for a boy who has left school to develop his French, instead of dropping it altogether as is generally done. Again, the mistakes of your correspondent serve as a sort of an encouragement when you are dismayed at your own. My correspondent's mistakes are ludicrous at times, as doubtless mine are also. When I was unwell last month he wrote to say he was very afflicted to hear of my illness, and hoped I should soon be established.—Yours faithfully,

SCHOOL JOURNEYS.

Social development is a plant of very slow growth, and the germ idea takes often many tens of years in growing before it bears fruit. Travel has always been recognised as of great educational value, but it is costly. Lately, in England, our secondary schoolmasters have often organised holiday tours for their scholars, either to neighbouring countries, or as caravan trips in our own island. One such journey was planned to follow the course taken by the hero in Conan Doyle's story "Micah Clarke," and the remembrance of the happy faces of the caravan lads over their washing-up and potato-peeling work one Sunday when they encamped for the day lingers in my mind. But Switzerland and Germany have long ago arranged such journeys for those who need them as much as their richer neighbours; and now France points out the fact that where the destinies of the country depend upon the intellectual and moral worth of the electoral body, and where four-fifths at least pass through the primary school only, it is wise to educate and strengthen the minds of those in whose hands so much power lies. In several towns, therefore, schemes for educational school excursions are in full swing; and M. André, of Reims, has published an account of the origin and operations of the holiday committee of his town. One feature is especially interesting: the children of the primary schools themselves contribute one penny a year each, and theirs is the right to decide by vote which two or four of them should go with the holiday caravan. A very interesting account of these school journeys is published in this month's Practical Teacher.

NOTICES

A French lady wishes to correspond with a German lady. Two Englishmen desire to correspond with Parisians. An Englishman of twenty-seven wishes to correspond with a Frenchman addicted to photography.

Letters are sometimes received with address but wanting a name. It is difficult to communicate with the writers, and, if we seem neglectful, will our readers please remember that some such accident, as well as the difficulty of finding suitable correspondents, may be the cause. For adults the fee is one shilling.

Schoolmasters are earnestly reminded that the lists this month should be full ones. Schools being in full swing, introductions are the more easily made.

There are some Danes still wanting correspondents. A Parisian family would like to exchange for six months a daughter fifteen years old for an English girl or boy. References given by means of our collaborators. Herr Hartmann hopes that many boys will be ready to correspond with German boys. A 2½d, stamp must accompany each application.

TO STARTIN THE MAGAZINES. TELL

Architectural Review .- Effingham House, Arundel Street. rs. Sept.

ing

ech

ich.

e to best

nch,

agent's

hen

d to ours

and

ing

sed

ely,

ten

to wn

the

cah

the

ing

lay iny

ho

OW

the

of ass

nd

ich

for

nd

the

his

en

ich

an.

is

ly.

nd

ut

he

se

fi-

he

its ıll

irl

S.

to

st

Supplement :- "Old Houses in the Strand," by F. L. Emanuel.

Architecture and Crafts at the Royal Academy; Illustrations. Original Wood-Engraving. Illustrated. C. J. Holmes.

Art Journal .- H. VIRTUE. 18. 6d. Oct.

Etching:—"Shere," by Percy Robertson.
The Movements of Fish. Illustrated. E. F. T. Bennett. Edward Stott and His Work. Illustrated. A. C. R. Carter. On the Domestic Fowl in Art. Illustrated. H. W. B. Kew Bridge. Illustrated.

The Decorations of the National Liberal Club. Illustrated. A. L. Baldry.

The Royal Academy in the Present Century. Continued. Illustrated. G. D. Leslie and F. A. Eaton. Some Rare Old Pewter, Illustrated. R. Davis Benn.

Art Journal Jubilee Series.-H. VIRTUE. 18. 6d. Part 9.

"Quiet Pets." Etching after Sir L. Alma Tadema; "A Corner of the Villa," after Sir E. J. Poynter.

The Works of Sir L. Alma Tadema. Illustrated.

Sir L. Alma Tadema's Home and Studio. Illustrated. Miss Helen Zimmern. Elections at the Royal Academy.

Turner and the Royal Academy. Illustrated, J. E. Hodgson and F. A. Eaton.

Varnishing Day and Private View Day at the Royal Academy. Illustrated.

Sir E. J. Poynter. Illustrated.

The Collection of George McCulloch. Illustrated. Claude Phillips.

Domestic Glass-Making in London, Illustrated, Gleeson White.

Japan and Its Art Wares. Illustrated. M. B. Huish. Some Elizabethan State Salt-Cellars. Illustrated. G. R. Redgrave.

Artist. - Constable. 18. Sept.

Some Etchings by Heinrich Vogeler. Illustrated. W. L. C. Sculpture in London and Paris. Illustrated, D. M. Image. Holiday Work with a "Frena." Illustrated. Clive Holland. Some Frescoes by Cesare Formilli. Illustrated.

Alyn Williams, Miniature-Painter. Illustrated. T. R. Reeve. The National Competition. Illustrated.

Cap'ain.-Oct.

How Phil May won Success. Illustrated. The Editor.

Cassell's Magazine. - Oct.

A Chat with Mr. W. Goscombe John, Sculptor. Illustrated. Arthur Fish.

Signboards by Eminent Hands. Illustrated. Arthur Sieveking. Cassier's Magazine .- S:pt.

Iron in Ornament, Illustrated, Chester B. Albree.

Chambers's Journal.-Oct.

Antique Goblets and Drinking Vessels,

Chautauguan,-Sept.

How an American Stained Glass Window is made. Illustrated. Charles Rollinson Lamb.

The Modern Poster. Illustrated. Ned Arden Flood.

Critic. -S. pt.

Ernest Haskell. Illustrated. Roger Riordan.

Dome.-UNICORN PRESS. 28. Sept.

Vandyck; the Master of Style. Illustrated. C. J. Holmes.

Good Words.-Oct.

Artists and Models. J. Deane Hilton.

Journal of the Ex-Libris Society. -A. AND C. BLACK. 28. September.

The Homes of the Humes. Illustrated, W. Bolton, Urn Bookplates, W. H. K. Wright, Lady's Realm .- Oct.

Carolus Duran; a Painter of Fair Ladies. Illustrated. Frederic Lees.

Leisure Hour.-Oct.

The Genesis of a Statue. Miss Helen Zimmern,

Magazine of Art.-Cassell. 18. 4d. Oct.

"The Prodigal Son;" Coloured Plate, after a Chinese Artist, Two Studies by Lord Leighton; Illustrations. Lord Leighton's House. Illustrated. Mrs. Russell Barrington.

Albert Robida, Illustrator, Engraver, etc. Illustrated. Bible Pictures by a Chinese Artist. Illustrated. C. E. Benham.

Eugène Müntz's " Life of Leonardo da Vinci." Illustrated. Clement Millard.

Reply to Clement Millard. Eugène Müntz.

Recent Acquisitions (Marlborough Gems) at the British Museum, Illustrated. W. Roberts, Acquisitions at South Kensington, the National Gallery, and the National Portrait Gallery. Illustrated. The Vandyck Tercentenary; Art throughout the Ages. Illustrated. Octave Maus.

The National Art Competition. Illustrated. A. Vallance. Royal Barum Ware. Illustrated.

National Review .- Oct.

William Morris and the Arts and Crafts. W. A. S. Benson.

Nineteenth Century .- Oct.

Thirteenth Century Persian Lustre Pottery. H. Wallis.

Pall Mall Magazine, -Oct.

Suppressed Plates by Charles Keene and F. Sandys. Illustrated. George Somes Layard.

African Big Game in the Sixteenth Century. Illustrated. W. A. Baillie-Grohman.

Pearson's Magazine .- Oct.

The Art of the Age. Continued. Illustrated.

Strand Magazine,-Oct.

A Peep into Purch. Illustrated. Continued. John Holt Schooling.

Mrs. Delaney's Flower-Work. Illustrated.

Studio. - 5, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN. 18. Sept.

The Work of Cecilia Beaux. Illustrated. Mrs. Arthur Bell. William de Morgan and His Pottery. Illustrated. W. Shaw Sparrow.

Modern German Lithography. Continued. Illustrated. H. W. Singer.

Leaves from the Sketch Book of E. Borough Johnson; Illus-

The National Competition. Illustrated. Esther Wood.

Supplements: — Etching after Francis Jourdain; Lithographs by Hans Thoma and Ernst Eitner; Landscape after Eugen

LIST OF THE LEADING CONTENTS OF CURRENT PERIODICALS.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN.

American Catholic Quarterly Review.—Burns and Oates.

4 dols, per ann. July.

Pope Formosus and Reco dination. Rev. H. Daxis.
The Caritalist and His Point of Vi.w. Rev. W. J. Kerby.
What the Popular V.ctory in Ireland Means, John J. O'Shea.
Vittoria Colonna. Anne Stuart Bailsy.
Review of the Pauline Chronology. Rev. A. J. Mans.
The Encyclical, "Consecration to the Sacred Heart;" Text.
The Encyclical, "The Year of Jubilse;" Text.
Lawful Liberty and Reasonable Savice. M. D. Petre.
The Last Ten Years of the Temporal Power. Donat Sampson.
Wiseman's Mind as revealed in "Fabiola." Rev. Alban Goodfer,
Some Words and Their Uses. Rev. F. King.
Bartolomé de Las Casas; the First Priest of America. Bryan J. Clinch.

American Journal of Sociology.-Luzac. 35 cents. Sept. The Social Aspect of New York Police Courts. Mary Roberts Smith.
A Sociological View of Sove-eignty. John R. Commons.
Factory Legislation for Women in Canada. Annie Marion MacLean.
Social and Ethical Interpretations of Mental Development. W. Caldwell.
Influence of the Puberal Development upon the Moral Character of Children of Both Sexes. Dr. Antonio Marro.
Prolegomena to Social Psychology. Continued. Charles A. Ellwood.
The Control of Trusts. J. D. Forrest.
The Psychology of Modesty and Clothing. William I. Thomas.

Anglo-American Magazine .- Bream's Buildings, Chancery Lane. is, Sept.

The Anglo-American Common Heritage. Kather ine Frances Jackson.
Russia and the Russians. George Donaldson.
British Colum is and the Northwest. Hon. David Glass.
When the Admiral comes Home; the Return of Admir. Dewey. George Dudley.
A Young American's Life in Spain. Concluded. Franklin C. Bevan.
Japan: the Awakening of an Island Empire. Roscoe Williams Grant.

Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science.—P. S. King. z dol. Sept.

Taxation of Quasi-Public Co-porations in the State of Ohio and the Franchise Tax. Frederick C. Howe. Securities as the Means of Payment. Charles A. Conant Economic Aspects of British Agriculture. John Franklin Crowell.

Antiquary.—Elliot Stock. 6d. October.

Birds in Homer. Rev. W. C. Green.
The Burial-Place of King Alfred. Illustrated. Warwick H. Draper.
Windham's Tour through France and Italy. A.D. 2763-70. Continued.
The Royal Archaeological Institute at Ipswich. Rev. J. Charles Cox.
Holy Wells of Ireland; Their Legends and Superstitions. R. C. Hope.

Architectural Review.—Effingham Hour, Arundel Street. is. Sept.

Attainable Ideals. Illustrated, James A. Morris.

Some Half-Timber Houses in Worcestershire. Illustrated. H. Tanner, Jr. and H. Inigo Triggs.

The Tripoli Megaliths. Illustrated. H. S. Cowper.

Pewter. Illustrated. H. J. L. J. Massé.

Salisbury Cathedral. Illustrated. Bulkeley Creswell.

Argosy.-Macmillan. 15. October.

Of Magic Rings. D. Sampsen, Ragatz and the Baths of Plaffers. Illustrated. Chas. W. Wood. Fateful Days.

Atlantic Monthly,-GAY AND BIRD. 18. September.

Tresistible Tendencis. C. K. Adams.
The Scot of Fiction. Miss Helen Jans Findlater.
The Genesis of the Gang. Jacob A. Riis.
The Book Review, Past and Present. J. S. Funison.
Criticism and the Man. John Burroughs.
The Mission of Humour. Samuel M. Crothers.
John Murray Forbes. Edward Waldo Emerson.
The Germans and the Americans. Hugo Minstelberg.
The Autobiography of a Revolutiorist, Continued. P. Kropotkin. October.

Recent Changes in Secondary Education in the United States. Charles W. Ellot.

Ellot.

The United States and Rome, H. D. Sedgwick, Jr.

Language as Interpreter of Life. Benjamin Ide Wheeler.

The Novels of George Meredith. Paul Elmer More.

Letting in the Light in New York City. Jacob A. Ris.

Through Old-Rose Glasses. Mary Tracy Earle.

The Road to England. Thomas Wentworth Higginson.

The Flaw in American Democracy. J. N. Larned. The Plaw in Allic Island Personal Annual Color Annual Color Island Color Annual Col

Author. - HORACE Cox. 6d. September. Is Literature a Precarious Profession? Sir Walter Besant.

Badminton Magazine.-Longmans. 15. Oct. On a Bits: in the Bosch. Illustrated. Susan, Countess of Malmesbury. Gesse: an Appreciation and a Memory. Illustrated. W. H. Hudson. Wolfe and Washington as Sportsmen. A. G. Bradley. The Australian Eleven of 1899. W. J. Ford. Shooting in the Sunderbunds. Illustrated. Lady Westmacott.

Bankers' Magazine.-WATERLOW AND SONS. 18. 6d. Oct. Politics in Lombard Street. Sir Thomas Jackson. With Portrait, Insurance Policies as Cover for Loans.

Blackwood's Magazine. -BLACKWOOD, 25, 6d, Oct.

London.

The Congested Dist icts Board of Ireland; Three Days in the Granuaile.

Stephen Gwynn.

Fashion in Fic. ion. The Looker-on. The Navil Manœuvres of 1899.

Board of Trade Journal, -EYRE AND SPOTTISWOODE, 6d. Sept. Trade and Industry of Madagascar.

Immigration Regulations for Cuba and the Philippines.

Bookman.-Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. S.pt. Aurora Borealis Academica; Aberdeen University Appreciations. Prof. David Masson. The Real Mrs. Oliphant. One Who Knew Her.

Bookman .- (America). Dodd, Mead and Co., New York. 25 cents. Sept.

Robert G. Ingersoll. Harry Thurston P.ck.
The Systematic Epigram. Frank Moore Colby.
New York in Fiction. Illustrated. A. B. Mcurice.
The Essay and Some Essayists. Continued. Hamilton W. Mabie.
The First Books of Rob.rt and Elizabeth Barrett Browning. Illustrated.
Luther S. Livingston.

Butterfly.—434, STRAND. 6d. Sept. Shakespeare and "The Mikado," Illustrated. Robert Bell.

Canadian Magazine. -- ONTARIO PUBLISHING Co., TORONTO.

Place-Names of Canada; Selki k. George Johnson.
Jordans; Where William Penn is buried. Illustrated. H. C. Shelley.
Joseph Martin. John R. Robinson.
Nova Scotia's Problems. Jas. A. Tucker.

Cape Illustrated Magazine.—44 Shortmarket, Cape Town. 6d. August.

Valkenberg Asylum. Illustrated. H. Rose-Mackenzie.

Captain.-George Newnes. 6d. October. An Eton Boy's Day. Illustrated. C. Leigh Pemberton.
The Law as a Profession. J. Harper Scaile.
Stamp Portraiture. Illustrated. H. M. Gocch.
Notable Locomotives. Illustrated. J. A. Kay.

Cassell's Magazine.—Cassell. 6d. Oct. Cassell's Magazine,—Assell. od. Oct.

The British Embassy. Illustrated. Miss Elizabeth L. Banks.
Flashlight Photography. Illustrated. F. M. Holmes.
Delhi: the City of the Great Mogul. Illustrated. John Foster Fraser.
Broken Bones: a Chat with Prof. Atkinson. Illustrated. Frank Banfield.
London Night by Night; Late Suppers and Early Breakfasts. Illustrated.
B. Fletcher Robinson.
What was Shakesnapar Like. Illustrated. Lohn Micros. B. Fletcher Robinson.
What was Shakespeare Like? Illustrated. John Munro.

Cassier's Magazine. -33, Bedford Street, Strand. 18. Sept. Charles S magazine, —33, DEDFORD STREAT, STRAND. 18. Sept. American Locomotives in Great Britain. Illustrated, Charles H. Jones, Industrial Organisation. Charles R. Flint. Untrammelled Shipbuilding and Marine Engineering Development. Illustrated, Joseph R. Oldham.

Some Ressons for the Excellence of American Machinery. Henry B. Biosee.

Dundations for Heavy Buildings. Prof. William H. Burr.
The Automobile Situation. Illustrated. Hiram Percy Maxim.
The Utilisation of Waste. John Birkinbrice.

In Fasc Some F John M John M Frankli Lei Al xand Admira

A Pion Sailing

. ( Bambos The Ma Louis A Oil. J The At C The G: The Te

> Bulg ari Chure The Re Literary R form The Ch

C The Inc

Militia, Zionism

Practica Amenz New Ze A Natio The Wo Wanted Obscure The Cre Curran. Colonia An Am Our Per At the

Confere The " I The A Sto
The Ro
The De Moham Bri

The Str

Roman

Captain

Am'd tl

Madam What n Poets at Goethe

The Ca Bayreu

onsols

The Ti Municip Bank R New Te

Century Magazine,-MACMILLAN. 18, 4d. Oct. S.mpson.

Century Magazine.—MacMillan, 18, 4d. Oct.

In Fascinating Cairo. Illustrated. Frederic C. Penfield.
Some Famous Man of Our Time; Von Bunsen's Recollections of His Friends.
John Bigelow.
The Streets of Peking. Illustrated. Eliza Ruhamah Scidmore.
John Morley. With Portrait. A Member of Parliament.
Franklin as Politician and Diplomatist. Illustrated. Concluded. Paul Leiceater Ford.
Al xander's Death. Illustrated. Benjamin Ide Wheeler.
The Oregon's Great Voyage. Illustrated. St. Edw. W. Eberle.
Admiral Dewey as a National Hero. Illustrated. Rear-Admiral W. T.
S. mason. A Pioneer Boyhood : Recollections of the West in the Forties. James Burton Pond.

Sailing Alone around the World. Captain Joshua Slocum. Chambers's Journal. —47, Paternoster Row. 8d. Oct.

Bamborough, Sara Wilson. The Muruts. Ine Muruts.
Louis Napoleon at Boulogn:, 1840.
B:lleek. Mary Georges.
Oil. Jullan Crosk:y.
Tomb-Opening. G. L. Apperson.
The Atlantic Passage To-Day.

Chautauquan.—Kegan Paul., ros. rod. per annum. Sept.
The Growth of Shakespeare's Fame. Continued. Eugene Parsons.
The Tea Industry is the South. Jane A. Stewart.
Some Fruits of the Reformation. Continued. Arthur W. Kennedy.
Bulg dian Cities. Illustrated. Celia R. Lodd.

Church Missionary Intelligencer.—Ghurch Missionary Society.

6d. Sept.

Methods of Training Missionare. Rev. T. W. Druty.
The Rec.n. Outbreak in North-West Fuh-Kien.
Licrary Wo k. Rev. H. U. Weitbrecht.
Oc.
Reform in China; Visws of a Chinese Viceroy. Rev. W. Banister.
The Temne Mission after the Revolt. Rev. E. H. Elwin.
The Church in Tinnevelly.

The Church in Tinnevelly.

Contemporary Review.—Isbister and Co. 28. 6d. Oct.

The Inevitable in South Africa. F. Edmund Garrett.

The Ritualists and the Electorate.
Militia, Volunteers, and Regulars.

Zionism. I. Zangwill.

Practical Tenperance Legislation.

Lady Henry Somerset.

Amang Old Acquaintances. Phil Robinson.

New Zealand. Si Robert Stout.

A National Church for India. Alfred Nundy.

The Workhouse from the Inside. Edith M. Shaw.

Wanted, Plant-Doctors. J. B. Carruthers.

Obscure Causes of Crime. Thomas Holmes.

The Cross as the Final Seat of Authority. Dr. P. T. Forsyth.

Compilli Magazina.—Switty. Elenge Ann Co. 15. Oct.

Cornhill Magazine. - Smith, Elder and Co. 18. Oct. COPANHI MAGAZINE.—SMITH, ELDER AND CO. 18, CUrran. R. Barry O'Brisn.
Colonial Memories. Con'inuel. Lady Broome.
An Ambassador to the Sultan, 1621-3. Stanley Lane Poole.
Our Pet Herons. Mrs. Archivald Little.
At the Reporter's Table. Michael MacDonagh.
Captain Cook's First Log in the Royal Navy. Professor Morris, Am'd the Islets of the Sargasso Sea. C. Parkinson.
Conferences on Books and Man. Continued. Urbanus Sylvan.

Cosmopolitan .- International News Co. 6d. Sept. The "America's" Cup. Illustrated. John R. Spears.
Inner Organisation of the French Spy System. Spint-Just.
The Art-Gallery of the Great Lakes. Illustrated. Charles Warren Stoddard. The Roof-Gardens of New York. Illustrated. Vance Thompson.
The Deligh ful Art of Cooking. Illustrated. Anna Leach.
Mohammed: Omar; the Bilding of an Empire. Illustrated. John Brisben Walker.

Brisben Walker.
The Study of Fiction. Brander Matthews.
The Art of Buying Food for a Family. Mary Graham.
Romance and Tragedy of Kentucky Feuds. J. Stoddard Johnston.

Critic.—G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS. 18. Sept.
Madame Aulnoy in Spain, 1673. With Portrait. Archer M. Huntingdon.
What makes a Book Sell? Ellen Burns Sherman.
Posts and Essayists as Prophets of a New Era. Newell Dwight Hillis, Dial .- 315, WABASH AVENUE, CHICAGO. 10 cents. Sept. 1. Goethe in Strassburg. James Taft Hatfield.

Dome.-Unicorn Press. 18. Sept. Aldinoid delail

The Cat. Israfel.
Some Examples of Plainsong. Rev. S. Gregory Ould.
Bayreuth; Notes on Wagner. A. Symons.

Reonomic Journal.-MACMILLAN. 58. Sept. Consols in a Great War. Sir R. Giffen.
The Theory of Taxation with Reference to Nationality, Residence, and Property. Prof. J. Westlake.
Municipal Trad ng and Profits. R. Donald.
Municipal Finance. F. W. Hirst.
Bank Reserves. G. H. Pownall.
New Tendencies in German Economics. Prof. A. Oncken.

Educational Review .- 11, LUDGATE HILL. 4d. Sept. How to study a Poem. H. Courthope Bowen.
Permanence in the Cure of the Feeble-Minded. Mary Denby.
Common Sense in Education and Teaching. W. K. Hill.
National Education in Sicily. Concluded. Irene Vespri.

Educational Review. (AMERICA).—J. M. DENT. 1s. 8d. Sept.
An Educational Policy for Our New Possessions. William T. Harris.
Educational Situation in Chicago. Joseph W. Errant.
Women in the Publ c Schools. James C. Boykim.
English in Regents' Schools. Arthur L. Goodrich.
The Teaching of Germany. Christian User.
Educational Progress of the Year. Nicholas Murray Butler.

Engineering Magazine. -222, STRAND. 18. Sept.
England, America and Germany as Allies for the Open Door. Hon, John Barrett.

Economy in the Use of Superheated Steam. R. S. Hale.

The Development of German Ship-Building. Illustrated. Rudoiph Haack.

Systems for the Remuneration of Labour. P. J. Darlington.

The Water Supply of the City of Glasgow. Illustrated. Benj. Taylor.

Electricity in the Mines at Crippl's Creek. Illustrated. Thomas Tonge.

American Locomotives on British Railways. Charles Rous-Marten.

Mechanical Uses of the Science of Metallography. Illustrated. Albert

Engineering Times .- 2, GREAT SMITH STREET, WESTMINSTER. 6d. The Separation of Coal from Dross, Illustrated, Cecil Walton,
The History and Development of Motor Cars. Illustrated. W. Fletcher.
Ice-Breakers. H. F. Swan,
Means of attaining Safety in Electrical Distribution. Illustrated, W. L.
R. Firmer. R. Emmet.

K. Emmet.

Sept.

The Attempt to boycott the Paris Exhibition. Ben. H. Morgan.

The Education and Training of an Engineer. W. J. Lineham.

The History and Development of Motor Curs. Illustrated. W. Fletcher.

Comparative Advantages of Electricity, Steam and Compressed Air for Mining Purposes. W. E. Garforth.

The Modern Steam Plant. Ivor. M. Aanson.

Englishwoman .- 8, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Sept.

Englishwoman.—8, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Sept. Staging it to the Lick Observatory. Illustrated. Reginald Bailey. Mediaeval Witchcraft in England and Scotland. Illustrated. Maud Venables Vernon.

Domestic Science Teachers. F. M. Steele Tunisian Types and Scores. Illustrated. B. Colt de Wolf. The Twenty-First Anniversary of Leo XIII.'s Pontificate. Illustrated. Irene Langbridge. The Homes of Danish Sovereigns. Illustrated. Jeanette Halford. Ensiedeln; "Our Lady of Herm ts." Illustrated. Mrs. J. E. Whitby. Maria and Geraldine Jewsbury. Illustrated. Halboro Denham. El Escorial and Cordova. Illustrated. K. L. Montgomery.

A Woman's Poultry Farm. Illustrated. W. M. Elkington.
At the Luanga Mission. Harold Bindloss.
The Queen of Portugal and Her Family. Illustrated. Carl Siewers.
A Primitive Congolese Tribe. Illustrated. B. Colt de Wolf.
Women Dairy Teachers and Dairy Farmers. Illustrated.
Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley. Illustrated. Halboro Denham. Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley. Illustrated. Halboro Denham, Rügen. Illustrated. E. L. Hough.
Ancient Tokens of Noble Ladies. Illustrated. Helen Gordon.

Etude. -T. PRESSER, PHILADELPHIA. 15 cents. Sept. Students Musical Clubs. R. Braine. L. C. Elsen.
Acoust cs as Part of a Musical Education. L. C. Elsen.
Music for Piano:—Mizurka, b. A. Pieczonka; Song without Words, by Louis Gregh: Roccoo, by F. Neumann, &c.

Expositor.-Hodder and Stoughton. 18. Oct. The Lord's Supper; St. Mark or St. Paul? Prof. Allan Menz's.
Some Points in Pauline History and Chronology. Vernon Bartiet.
Sanctifica: Jon. Rev. John Watson.
The Marriage Supper of the Lamb. Rev. J. Monro Gibson.
Spiritual Diagnosts. Prof. Henry Drummonsl.
Note on the Date of the First Epistle of Peter. Rev. F. Warburton Levis.

Expository Times. -SIMPKIN MARSHALL. 6d. Oct. Alexander Balmain Bruce. Rev. W. M. Clow.
The Fools of the Bible. Prof W. P. Paterson.
The Spirit of God in the Old Testament. Prof. A. B. Davidson.

Feilden's Magazine.—Temple Chambers, 28, Sept. The Nature of the Fracture of Armour Plates. Illustrated, Sir William The Nature of the Fracture of Armour Places. Amountables, Su Whiteham Roberts-Austen.

Roberts-Austen.

The Construction and Equipment of an Up-to-Date Engineering Works.

Illustrated. T. Scott King.

Piston and Ram Pumps. Illustrated. Philip R. Björling.

Acetylene Generators. Illustrated. Pintin B. Lewes.

Machine Tools. Continued. Illustrated. Ewart C. Amos.

A Revolutionising Innovation in the Glass Industry. Illustrated. Ludwig

Grote.

Engineering in Britain and America. Tom Mann.

The Building of a Great Railway. Continued. Illustrated.

Fireside.—7, PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 6d. Oct. Blotting-Paper. G. L. Apperson.
The Future of London. Illustrated. H. Somerset Bullock.
Great Wits and Some of Their Wit. Rev. John Isabel.

nuaile.

Prof

ept.

cents. trated

7.

N.

field. rated.

pt. es. Illusry B.

Folk-Lore.—David Nutt, 270, Strand. 38. Sept.
The Powers of Evil in the Outer Heb ides. Miss A. Goodrich-Freer.
The Tar Baby Story. Miss Werner.
Japanese Myth. W. G. Aston.

Fortnightly Review .- Chapman and Hall. 25. 6d. Oct. The Rennes Verdict and the Dreyfus Case. An English Officer. The Attainder of Lord Stafford, 1698; the Dreyfus Scandal of English History, Miss H. C. Foxcroft. The Attainder of Lord Stafford, 1678; the Dreyfus Scanda History, Miss H. C. Foxcroft.

History, Miss H. C. Foxcroft.

The Problem of the Aged Poor. Geoffrey Drage.

Eugène Piot; a Precursor. Charles Yriarte.

Australian Federation—From the Inside. Harold G. Parsons.

The Sea Story of Australia. Louis Becke and Walter Jeffery.

Mrs. Gaskell's Short Tales. Miss Frances H. Low.

The Lambeth Decision. Canon Malcolm MacColl.

The True Meaning of the "Crisis in the Church." An Oxford Municipal Trading. Walter Bond.

The Paris Market-Women. Albert D. Vandam.

A Romance in Scholarship. Joseph Jacobs.

Mr. Chamberlain's Mistakes. Diplomaticus.

Mr. Chamberlain's Mistakes. An Oxford Tuter.

Forum.-GAY AND BIRD. 18. 6d. Sept.

Forum.—GAY AND BIRD. 18. 6d. Sept.

The Conference at the Hague. William T. Stead.
Washington's Farewell Address and Its Applications. R. E. Jones.
The People of the Philippines. Ramon Reyes Lala.
Progress of Philosophy in the Nineteenth Century. Prof. R. Euken.
Criminal Legislation by Proxy. Frank Moss.
Cotton-Spinning at Shanghai. Charles Denby.
A Word to the Next Speaker of the House of Representatives. A Friend of Gen. Henderson.
The Teacher and His Duties. Maximilian P. E. Groszmann.
Indian Famines. Sir William H. Rattigan.
The Problem of an American Mar ne. Capt. William W. Bates.
Voting-Machines prezses the Paper Ballot in the United States.
Agricultural Progress and the Wheat Problem. B. W. Snow.
Recent Events in the Transvaal. Thomas R. Dodd.
Philadelphia Commercial Museum. Dr. W. P. Wilson.
The Younger Russian Writers. A. Cahan.

Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly. -141, FIFTH AVENUE, New YORK. 10 cents. Oct.

Finances of Our Wars. Illustrated. Hon, Lyman J. Gage.
College Athletics. Illustrated. Walter Camp.
Edgar Allan Poe's College Days at Charlottesville. Illustrated. Jennie Bard Dugdale, European Fire-Fighters, Illustrated, Fritz Morris, Liquefied Air, and Its Uses, George H. Johnson,
Women as Farmers, W. R. Draper,

Genealogical Magazine.-Elliot Stock. 18. October. Story of the Surname of Beatson. Continued. The Arms of Jamaica. Leslie Alexander. Counts of Rome. Arms of Stuart, or Stewart, Earls of Lennox. Concluded. Herbert H. Fowler.

An Old Scottish Manuscript. Continued. Charles S. Romanes.

Concerning the Making of Gentleman.

Royal Descent of Charles Ormsby Blake-de-Burgh.

Gentleman's Magazine.-Chatto and Windus. 18. October.

The Coming Star Shower. J. Ellard Gore.
The Lost Rivers of London. C. W. Heckethorn.
Gleek; a Forgotten Old Game. J. S. McTear.
The Celtic Race. T. H. B. Graham.
The Poetry of the Maoris. Reginald Hodder.
English Military Lawyers. J. E. R. Stephens.
About Gipsies. A, J. Gordon.

Geographical Journal.—Edward Stanford. 28. Sept. Explorations in Patagonia. With Map. Dr. Francisco P. Moreno. Road Making and Surveying in British East Africa. With Map. Capt. G.

Road-Making and Gureying in Section 1. E. Smith. In Kiang Gorges: or Notes of a Tour in "No Man's Land," Manchuria. With Map. Robert T. Turley.

The Cambridge Anthropological Expedition to Torres Straits and Sarawak.

Geological Magazine.-Dulau. 18. 6d. Sept. Geological Magazine.—DULAU. 7s. 6d. Sept.
The Discovery of Miolanis and of Glossotherium (Neomylodon) in Patagonia. Illustrated. Dr. Francesco P. Moreno.
Contributions to Fossil Crustacea. Illustrated. Prof. T. Rupert Jones, and Dr. H. Woodward.
A Nearly Complete Skeleton of Dinornis Maximus. Illustrated. Chas. W. Andrews.
The Silurian and Ordovician Rocks near Balbriggan, Co. Dublin. Illustrated. C. I. Gardiner.
Pliocene and Post-Piiocene Shells from Egypt. Illustrated. R. Bullen Newton.
The Islands and Coral Reefs of Fiji. Prof. Alexander Agassiz.

Girl's Own Paper.—56, PATERNOSTER ROW. 6d. October.

Mrs. Ewing and Her Books. Rev. F. W. Newland.

The Romanicism of Beethoven. Illustrated. Eleonore D'Esterre-Keeling.

Rosa Nouchette Carey. With Portrait. Helen C. Black.

The Pleasures of Bee-Keeping. F. W. L. Sladen.

Practical Aids to the Culture of Lilies. Continued. Charles Peters

Girl's Realm.-Hutchinson. 6d. October. The Great-Granddaughters of the Queen. Illustrated. Ignota. The Girlhood of Miss Cha-lotte M. Yonge. Illustrated. Sybil. The Dances of Nations. Illustrated. Florence Bright. King's College, Kensington Square. Illustrated. Mrs. Stepney Rawson. Girls at Golf. Illustrated. Christina G. Whyte. The Gentle Art of Conversation. Miss Alice Corkran. Mountaincering for Girls. Illustrated. Miss E. M. Symonds.

Good Words.-ISBISTER. 6d. Oct.

Real Worcester China. Illustrated. P. F. Slater. Christchurch Salmon. Illustrated, F. G. Affalo. Mongolian Silhouettes. Illustrated. Evan Aspray. James Shaw; a Hill-Country Schoolmaster. Illustrated. Prof. William Worcester Cathedral, Illustrated, Concluded, Canon Teignmouth-Shore.

Great Thoughts .- 28, HUTTON STREET, FLEET STREET. 6d. Oct. Joseph Joubert; a Notable French Thinker. With Portrait. The Editor. Lawlessness in the Church by Samuel Smith; Interview. With Portrait. R. Blathwayt.

Emerson as a Prose-Writer, With Portrait, W. J. Dawson.
What Missions have done for China by Dr. John Dudgeon; Interview.
With Portrait, E. St. John Hart.
The New Siberia by Harry de Windt; Interview. With Portrait, R. Blathwayt.

Harmsworth Magazine.-HARMSWORTH. 3td. Sept. Orchids; Gardening for Millionaires. Illustrated. Berahrd Owen. London Underground. Illustrated. W. J. Wintle. Felling Chimneys. Illustrated. Robert Mulready. Freak Philanthropy. Illustrated. Arthur Birnag.: The Conquest of the Sea. With Diagrams. J. Horner. Het Majesty's Waste Paper Bask:t. Illustrated. Philip Astor. Fair Sportswomen. Illustrated. Ignota.

Harvard Graduates' Magazine. -- 6, Beacon St, Boston. 75 cents. Sept.

The Effects of Athletic Training. Illustrated. Our National Dangers. C. J. Bonaparte, '71. Illustrated. E. A. Darling.

Homiletic Review .- 44, FLEET STREET. 18. 3d. Sept. w should the Preacher study Church History as an Aid to the Pulpit? John Fletcher Hurst. Present Theological Tendencies. Dr. J. H. W. Stuckenburg. The Insufficiency of Physical Law. Charles B. Waring.

Humanitarian .- DUCKWORTH AND Co. 6d. Oct.

Humanitarian.—Duckworff and C Anthropology, 1863–1899. E. W. Brabrook. The London Water Supply. Milo Roy Maltbie. The Problem of Feminism. Prof. Mantegazza. The Future of Physical Culture. Eugene Sandow. The Women Characters of Robert Browning. Kat The Revival of Bellef in Witchcraft. Amiel. The Riss of Bacteriology. David Somerville. The Woman's Century. Lady Viblet B-auchamp. Clairvoyance and Criminals. Fizzgerald Molloy. A Day at a Welsh Slate Quarry. D. R. Mann. Some Women Mystics. I. Hooper. Katherine T. Esse.

Index Library.—172, Edmund Street, Birmingham 21s. per annum. Sept.

Prerogative Court of Canterbury Wills. Wiltshire Inquisitiones Post Mortem. Lincolnshire Wills. Leicestershire Wills and Administrations.

International, -A. T. H. BROWER, CHICAGO. 10 cents. Sept Saybrook-by-th>-Sea. Illustrated. Dr. R. Warren Conant.
Holger Danske, Hamlet, and the Castle of Elsinore. Illustrated. Mitchell Bronk. Venezuela. Illustra ed. Tommasso Caivano.

Irish Ecclesiastical Record.—24, Nassau Street, Dublin. 18, Sept. Possession in Moral Theology and Anglo-American Law. Rev. T. Slator. The Manna. Rev. Jerome Pollard-Urquhart. Socialism, and the T.tle of Production. Rev. Thomas Wilson. The Birthplace of St. Patrick. Rev. Edward O'Brin. The New Legislation on the Index. Rev. T. Hurley. The Masonic Persecution in Mexico. Rev. Philip Burton.

Irish Monthly.—M. H. Gill and Son, 6, Connell Street, Dublin. 6d. Sept. Thomas Chatterton; the Palace of Art. Judge Carton. More about the Robin. M. R.

Oct. Gerald Griffin; the Palace of Art. Judge Carton.

Irish Rosary .- 47, LITTLE BRITAIN. 3d. Sept. With Portrait. Blessed Raymund of Capua. With Perfect Pominic O'Daly. Illustrated.

Oct. Joseph Haydn; a Catholic Composer of the Eighteenth Century.

Jou The A Marke The G Tree-I Manua Agrica The W Agricu

A New Corun The E Season Petrog A Pec Descri ea Jo The T Peopl. The T

Canad Labou

Sea Pe The C The B

Sir Mi Two M The K Ben B Some Lad How a The A

The C The Q Wome The M Bucki D-, C

Hemp Hunti How !

Glasge Thurs Veget L Some The J The P Dr. R

Lippi Where Enter Bronz The N

A Far An It

Journal of the Board of Agriculture.-LAUGHTON. 15. Sept. Journal of the Board of Agriculture.—
The Ash and Its Cultivation. J. Nisbet.
Marketing of Eggs. Edward Brown.
The Gape-Worm. Illustrated. F. V. Theobald.
Tree-Root Rot.
Manufacture of Cheddar Cheese.
Agricultural Returns of Great Britain,
The Wood Leopard Moth. Illustrated.
Agricultural Education in France.

wson

William -Shore

Oct. Editor.

ortrait.

erview.

it. R.

cents,

ulpit?

num.

t

tche

IS.

tor.

LIN

Journal of Geology.-Luzac. 50 cents. August. A New Analcite Rock from Lake Superior. A. P. Colman.
Corundiferous Nephelin:-Synen'te from Eastern Ontario. A. P. Colman.
The Effect of Sea Barriers upon Ultimate Dr.:image. J. F. Newsom.
Senson and Time Elements in Sand-Plain Formation. Myron L. Fuller.
Petrographical Province of Essex Country, Mass. Henry S. Washington.
A Peculiar Devonian Deposit in Northeastern Illinois. Stuart Well:r.
Descriptions of New Speries of Diplodus Teeth from the Devonian of Northeastern Illinois. C. R. Eastman.

Journal of Political Economy .- P. S. King. 75 cents. Sept. The Theory of the Lisure Class. John Cummings.

People's Banks in Italy. G. François.
The Transportation of Mail; a Valuation of Data. George G. Tunell.
Canadian Railways and the Bonding Question. Simon J. McLean.
Labour as a Measure of Exchange Value. W. M. Coleman.

Journal of the Royal United Service Institution.— J. J. Keliher and Co. 2s. Sept. Sea Power in the Growth of the Roman Empire and the Lessons taught to Great Britain. William W. Marshall.
The Yankee Soldier. Poultney Bigelow.
The Turco-Persic-Indian Commercial Route between Europe and Asia.
Col. Mark Bell.

Juridical Review .- Stevens and Haynes. 38. 6d. July. The Beginnings of Parliament in Scotland. C. R. A. Howden. The Marches. George Law.

Krowledge.-326, High Holborn. 6d. Oct. Cranial Form. illustrated. Arthur Thomson.
Sir Michael Foster's Presidential Address to the British Association.
Two Months on the Guadalquiver. Continued. Harry F. Witherby.
The Karkinokosm, or World of Crustacea. Continued. Illustrated. Rev.
Thomas R. R. Stebbing.
Ben Nevis and Its Observatory. Continued. Illustrated. William S.

Bruce.
Some Suspected Variable Stars. Continued. J. E. Gore.

Ladies' Home Journal, -Curtis, Philadel ohia. 10 cents. Oct. How a Theatre is managed. Illustrated. Franklin Fyles.
The American Girl. Illustrated. Rudyard Kipling.
The Aneciotal Side of Admiral Dewey. Illustrated.
The Last Years of Washington's Life. Illustrated. William Perrine.

Lady's Realm .- HUTCHINSON. 18. October. The Queen of Sixony, Illustrated, Mrs. Stepney Rawson.
The Queen's Cottage Homes. Illustrated, Mrs. Stepney Rawson.
The Queen's Cottage Homes. Illustrated, Marion Leeliz,
Women in Public Affairs. Illustrated, R. Y. P.
The Marriage Knot. With Diagrams. Harold Macfarlane, Buckinghamshire Lace. Illustrated, M. E. B. Burrowes,
Dr. Creighton, Bishop of London. Illustrated, Sarah A. Tooley.

Land Magazins .- 14), STRAND. 18. Sept. Land Magazins,—14), Strand. 1s. Se
The Catle Indistry of Socilard. Rev. John Gillespie, Hemp-Culture. R. Hedger Wallace.
The Earl of Yar'orough's Woods. W. R. Fisher, Hunting and Agriculture. W. M. Elkington,
Notes on the Ordnance Survey. T. E. Coleman.
How Rural Paupe s arg. made. X.
Tenant Right, Values and Legislation. A. W. Crampton.

Lelsura Haur.—56, Paternoster Row. 6d. Oct. Glasgow. Illustrated. W. J. Gordon. Thursday Island and the Peurl Fisheries. Illustrated. Vegetable Galls. Illustrated. Edward Connold.

Library Association Record, -Horace Marshall, 18. Sept. Some of the Institutions of Manchester and Salford. Charles W. Sutton. The John Rylands Me norial Library, Manchester. The Private Library and the Individual Collector. Earl of Crawford. Dr. Richard Garnett. Local Literature in Public Libraries. Richard W. Mould

Lippincott's Monthly Magazine.-Lippincott, Philadelphia. 18.

Where Stockton wrote His Stories. Theodore F. Wolfs, Entertaining English Royalty. Ignota. Effect of Equal Suffrage in Colorado. Virginia G. Ellard. Bronze Button Heroes; a Study of the Grand Army of the Republic. George Morgan.

The National Export Exposition at Philadelphia. Dr. W. P. Wilson.
The Question of Yachts. Charles Ledyard Norton.

Longman's Magazine,-Longmans. 6d. Oct. A Farmer's Year. Concluded. H. Rider Haggard. An Italian Landlord. C. and L. Tod-Mercer.

Lute.-PATEY AND WILLIS. 21. Sept. Mdme. Hanka Schjelderup. With Portrait. Anthem:-" Bring unto the Lord, O Ye Mighty," by Dr. F. Tozer.

Macmillan's Magazine. - MACMILLAN. 18. Oct. The Country Parson of 1730-1839. T. E. Kebbel.
The Nearest Village to the North Pole. A. M. Brice.
In the Days of the Red Terror.
The Sentim intalists. Garnett Smith.

Madras Review.—Thomson, Minerva Press, Broadway, Madras. 2 Rupess. August.

Citizenship, K. Sund raraman Aiyar.
The Plague in the Mysore State.
The Cambridge Mathematical Tripos and Senior Wranglers, Cantab.
Philosophy of Indian History, S. Venkatanarasimka Rao.
The Childhood and Education of Sir Chama Rajendra Wudaiyar. M. Shama Rao. Hindu Socie: y and Ancient Indian Thought, C. The Malabar Tenant's Improvements Legislation.

Medical Magazine .- 62, King William Street, E.C. 19. Sept. M. dical Education. Dr. A. J. H. Crespi. The Medical Schools.

Metaphysical Magazine.—Gay and Bird. is. August. The Psychology of Insects. Dr. R. W. Shufeldt. The Hindoo Point of View. Frank Burr Marsh. The Tree of Knowledge—of Good and Evil. Floyd B, Wilson. Present Idealism. Stanton Ki.kham Davis. Is there a Church Revolution? E. L. C. Ward. A Technical Analysis of Thought and the Thought Faculties. Continued.

Paul Avensl.
Paul Avensl.
Swami Abhayananda.
Choice, and Its Relation to the Mystery of Evil. Frank Ellsworth Porter.

Missionary Review of the World .- 44. FLEET St. 18. 3d. Sept. Samuel Fisk Green, Medical Missionary. With Portrait.
Prison Reform in Japan. Illustrat.d. Rev. W. Curtis.
A Roman Catholic Vize of Missions in Chira. Robert E. Speer, Jan Hus: the Preacher of Prague. With Portrait. Rev. George H. Giddens.

Music.-186, WARDOUR STREET. 2d. Sept. Schubert's Song Cycles. Continued. Frank Merry. The History of the Violincello. Continued. E. van Der Straeten.

Music.-1402, Auditorium Tower, Chicago. 25 cents. August. Voice and Voice Failure. Dr. F. S. Muckey. Concerning Accidentals. Carl Faelten. Music Study in Public Schools. Helen M. Place.

Musical Herald .- J. Curwen. 2d. Oct. Chopin. Henry Davey. Song in Both Notations:—"The Wind," by H. E. Nichol.

Musical Opinion. - 150, HOLBORN. 2d. Sept. Subjectivity in Mode n Music. C. F. Kenyon.
Harmony in the Ancient Eastern World. Continued. Dr. H. Hiles.
Gustav Merkel's Org n Works. J. Matthews.
The Pastims of Musicians. O. A. Mansfield, Isouard, Hérold, and Halévy. E. J. Breakspeare.

Musical Times.-Novello. 4d. Oct. Alberto Rundeggur. With Portrait. A Church Burral-Organ at Trottiscliffe. Illustrated. F. G. Edwards. Prof. H. W. Packer on English Executive Musicians; Interview. Critics I have Known. Jos. Bennett.
Part-Song:—" To-Night," by Percy Pitt.
Anthem:—" How Lovely are Thy Habitations," by C. Salaman.

National Review .- EDWARD ARNOLD. 28. 6d. Oct. Mational Review.—EDWARD ARNOLD. 28. 6d.
The Verdict at Rennes. Sir Godfrey Lushington.
Sword and Cassock. F. C. Conybeare.
Old-Age Pensions; Mr. Chaplin's Kite. Ernest E. Williams.
Cricket Reform. Hon. Alfred Lyttelton.
The Cult of Infirmity. Arnold White.
Amr.can Affairs. A. Maurics Low.
Tarpon-Fishing. W. H. Grenfell.
Compulsory Arbitation at Work. J. MacGregor.
The Arobbishop's Judgment. Rev. H. Hensley Henson.

Natural Science.-Young J. Pentland, Edinburgh. 13. Sept. The Original Rock of the South African Di mond. Prof. T. G. Bonney.
The Scope of Natural Selection. J. Lionel Taylor.
Suggestions upon the Origin of the Australian Flora. Spencer Moore.

New England Magazine. - 5. PARK SQUARE, BOSTON. 25 cents. Sept. Ezekiel Rogers; the First Minister of Rowley, Mass. Illustrated. J. L. Excited Rogers, the Ewell.

The Body Politic of Mankind. Raymond L. Bridgman.

Quebec. Illustrated. George Stewart.

Bishop Berkeley in New England. Illustrated. Charles Rayson Thurston. The Massachusetts Slave Trade. Lilian Brandt. Congregationalism in America. Morton Dexter. Lilian Brandt.

New Ireland Review, -BURNS AND OATES, .6d. Sept. A Question of Eggs. Miss Mary Cost.llo.
The Human Hornhill. Illustrated. Mrs. E. M. Lynch.
Rathfurnham. Canon Carr.
Irish Folk-Lore. Henry Morris.
Raligious Songs of Connacht. Continued. Douglas Hyde.

New World.—GAY AND BIRD. 38. Sept.

Gre.k Religion. George Santayana.

Popular Education and Public Morality. Charles W. Wendte.

Jesus Foreknowledge of His Sufferings and Death. Otto Pfleiderer.

Necessity and Limitations of Anthropomorphism. George A. Coe.

The Gnesis of Faith. Albert Gehring.

The Scientific and Christin View of Illness. James T. Bixby.

Substitution a Strage in Theological Thought. H. T. Colestock.

Progressive Judaism and Liberal Christianity. Clifton Harby Levy.

Unitarians and the Beginnings of English Liberalism. Edward Porritt.

Tae Ethics of the Bhagabad-Gita. Bipen Ch. Pal. New World .- GAY AND BIRD, 3s. Sept.

Nineteenth Century .- Sampson Low, ps. 6d. Oct. The Situation in South Africa; a Voice from Capa Colony. Rev. C. Usher Wilson.

Wilson.
Libe-alism and Its Cross-cur-ents. Dr. J. Günness Rogers.
The Great Unpail. Sir Alge-non West.
The Fear of Over-Education. Al xand r Sutherland.
Electricity in Indi. Major C. C. Townsend.
Town and Country Labourers. (r) Mrs. Stephen Batson. (a) Hon. Percy Wyndham.
The Vi nna Homital; Where the Plague brok: out. Miss C. O'Conor-Eccles.

North Class. Levys from a Diegr. Here Emily Landers.

Eccles,
North Clare; Leaves from a Diory. Hon. Emily Lawless.
Mila aspa; a Tibetan Poet and Mystic. Rev. Graham Sandberg.
Powder and Paint. Miss Ida Taylor.
T. e Cry of the Consumptives. Jan. a Arthur Gibson.
A Conscience Clause for the Lairy. Mrs. Humphry Ward.
The Church Crisis and Disestablishment. Dr. Cobb.
Lambeth and "Liberation." George W. E. Russell.

Nonconformist Musical Journa! .- 3), PATERNOSTER Row. 2d.

Anthem: "Brightly Gl:ams Our Banner," by J. Lyon. Music at the Primitive Methodis: Church, Gainsborough.

North American Review .- WM. HEINEMANN. 28. 6d. Sept. The Agnostic's Side. Robart G. Ingersoll.
Ing rsoll's Influence. Rev. Henry M. Field.
Ex Orients Lux: a Rejoinder. Archibald Little.
The Foreign Service of the United States. Francis B. Loomis.
Vindication of the Boers. A Diplomat.
Legal Aspect of Trusts. Joseph S. Auerbach.
Progress of Automobilism in France. Marquis de Chasseloup-Leaster. Marquis de Chasseloup-Laubat, American Universities. Edouard Rod.
The "America" Cup Race. Charles Russell.
Aguinaldo's Case aguinst the United States. A Filipino.

Open Court.-KEGAN PAUL. 61. Sept. A Basis for Reform. C. C. Bonnsy.
The Christ of St. Paul. Dr. Moncurs D. Conway.
Can Soldiers be Christians? Martin Luther.
StauroLitry, or The History of Cross-Worship. Illustrated. Dr. Paul

King Baulah; the Egyptian Version of the Story of King John and the Abbot of Canterbury. Prof. Charles C. Torrey. Is Religion a Feeling of Dependence? Dr. Paul Carus. Playful Instruction and Genius. Dr. Paul Carus.

Organist and Choirmaster .- 9, Berners Street. 3d. Sept. Seaside Music. Devonia.

Magnific t and Nunc Dimittis. Dr. C. Vincent.

Outing .- International News Co. 25 cents, Sept. Sport with Sharp-tail Grouse. Illustrated. Dr. H. A. Scott.
A Bear Hunt in New Brunswick. Frank H. Risteen.
Ten Days' Outing in Indian Territory. Illustrated. E, H, Hudson.
Trolling. Illustrated. H. C. Daniels.
The Golf Clubs of Long Island. Charles Turner.

Overland Monthly, -SAN FRANCISCO. 10 cents. Sept. Folsom, State Prison of California. Illustrated. P. B. Elderkin. Greater California and the Trade of the Orient. Illustrated. N. P.

A Summer Trip to Mount Adams. Illustrated. Louisa O'Huenty Nash. Campaigning in the Philippines. Continued. Illustrated. Pandia Ralli, Pall Mall Magazine,-18, Charing Cross Road. 18. Oct. Sydney; a Capital of Greaty Britain. Illustrated. Charles Short.

The American Language. William Archer.
Some Literary Landmarks of Paris. Illustrated. Frederic Lees.
The Peace Society, and What It has accomplished. W. Evans Darby.

Parents' Review .- KEGAN PAUL. 6d. Sept. P.N.E.U. Principles as illustrated by Teaching. Miss R. A. Pennethorne, From Seven to Seventeen. Science and Religion. Mrs. Dowson The Connection between Geology and Scenery. Continued. Rev. H. H. Moore, Savonarola. Hilda Spearman

Pearson's Magazine,—C. A. Pearson. 6d. Oct.

Cloud Seas. Illustrated. T. C. Porter.

Farming Pheasants. Illustrated. J. T. Newman.

Tobogganis down a Volcano. Illustrated. G. Cunyngham Cunningham,

B.ku; the Petroleum City. Illustrated. Perces Perhole.

"Sappers of the Queen." Illustrated. Marcus Tindal.

Telegraphing from the Clouds. Illustrated. Rev. J. M. Bacon.

Seeing by Wi. e. Illustrated. Cleveland Moffett.

Physical Review.-MACMILLAN. 38. Sept. A New Respiration Calciumeter and Experiments on the Conservatism of Energy in the Human Body. W. O. Atwater and E. B. Rosa.
A Mathod for the Study of Phosphorescent Sulphides. Fred. E. Kester.
The Photometric Study of Mixtures of Acetyline and Hydrogen burned in Air. Leon W. Hartman. A Photographi: Study of Electrolytic Cells, Rolla R. Ramsay.

Positivist Review .- WILLIAM REEVES. 3d. Oct. Justice—English and French. Frederic Harrison. Inter Arma. Edward Spencer Beesly. Altruim. J. H. Brilges. Imperial Rule in India. S. H. Swinny.

Practical Teacher. -33, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Oct. Professor Michael Foster.
With the Belgiun and Swiss Teachers. Illustrated.
The School Journey in France.

Psychological Review .- MACMILLAN. 38. Sept. A Plea for Soul-Substance. W. P. Montague.
The R. action-Time of the Eye. Raymond Dodge.
A Study in the Dynamics of Personal Religion. G. A. Coe.

Public Health, -12), SHAFTZSBURY AVENUE. 18. Sept. Influence of the Elementary Schools in Scarlet Fever. J. Niven
On Infantil's Mortality. D. L. Thomas.
Outbreak of Typhoid Fever at Kildwick. F. E. Atkinson.
The Census of 1301. John T. Wilson.
The Coming Census. J. Spottiswoode Cameron.
The Disposal of Savage in Rural Districts. H. Stott.
Typhus Fever in Edinburgh in 1838. Sir Henry Littlejohn. Puritan .- JAMES BOWDEN. 6d. Oct.

The Modern Stage. The Modern Stage.

Personal Reminiscences, Dr. J. Guinness Rogers,
Free Church Union in Scotland. Alexander Gammie.

Trusts. A. J. Wilson.

Emanu d'Church, Cambridge, and Dr. P. T. Forsyth. Arthur Porritt.
The Sunday School Chronicle. Illustrated. A. St. John Adcock.

Bibls Christian College, Shebbear. Illustrated. Rev. H. W. Horwill.

William Penn's Country. E. Clarke. Arthur Porritt.

Quiver .- CASSELL. 6d. Oct. Work and Play in Cruichland. Illustrated. D. L. Woolmer. Dr. John Brown: the Author of "Rab and his Friesids." Illustrated. Prof. W. G. Bla kie.

Some Remarkable "Church" Trees. Illustrated. A. Palfrey Hollingdale.

Railway Magazine .- 7), TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 6d. Sept. John Crabtree, Manage , Great Northern and Great Eastern Joint Railway ; Interview. Illustrated. ough Scotland by the Caledonian Railway. Illustrated. Brunel ough Scot

Through Belgium by Rail. Illustrated. Victor L. Whitechurch. Crewe; the Result of Railway Enterprise. Illustrated. Gilbert J. Stoker. North Pennbrokeshire and Fishguard Railway. Illustrated. W. M. J. W.lliams.

The Forth and Tay Ferries—Past and Present. Illustrated. R. Cochrane. Chester: the Cheshire Lines' Historic Racing Rendezvous. Illustrated. Chester; the Cheshire Lin W. Hartley Bracewell.

Review of Reviews.—(AMERICA'.—13, ASTOR PLACE, NEW YORK. 25 cents. Sept.

Elihu Root; the New Secretary of War. With Portrait. Henry Macfarland. Mactariand.

The Half Year of War with Aguinaldo. With Map. John Barrett.

Why the Trusts cannot control Prices. George E. Roberts.

How to eliminate "Trusts" from the Presidential Campaign. Henry How to eliminate MacKarland. MacKarland. The Hagus Conference and Its Outcome. Illustrated, W. T. Stead. Colonel Ingersoil. Illustrated, William Hayes Ward. The Public Library Movement in Massachusetts. Illustrated. Sylvester Baxter Value of the New England Farm. Hezekiah Butterworth.

The Cuban Educational Association of the United States. Gilbert K.

Royal Magazine.-C. A. PEARSON. 3d. Oct. The Art of the Camera. Illustrated. Roderick Grey, Ludwig Amann; a Man of Many Faces. Illustrated. H. J. Holmes. Mrs. Ormiston Chant; Interview. Illustrated. Mrs. Ormiston Chant; Interview. Illustrated.
Some Interesting Insects. Illustrated. James Scott.
Marvels of Sleight of Hand. Illustrated. Hector Grainger.
Women Tollers of the Deep. Illustrated. Bradford Colt De Wolf.
Shaguay, Yukan District: a Record in Town Building. Illustrated.
Harold J. Shepstone.
No:el Harvest Thanksgiving. Illustrated. George A. Wade.

The

Sup Kin Eve Son

On A T

Brai Van

The G. H

A St A H The

Bish

The The

Allg Exile Dr. 1

Mode Cons Artill

Saint Nicholas .- MACMILLAN. 18. October.

The Southern Cross. Illustrated. Mary Proctor. Admiral George Dewey. Illustrated. Tudor Jenks.

Saint Peter's .- 37, ESSEX STREET, STRAND. 6d. October. A Coat of Arms for Mod-rn Italy. Illustrated. Montgomery Carmichael. The Beethoven Family in Bonn. Illustrated. Elsonore D'Esterre-Kseling. The Congressional L brary. Illustrated. Elsonore D'Esterre-Kseling. In the Greek Islands. Illustrated. W. H. D. Rouss.

School Board Gazette. - Bemrose and Sons. 18. Sept.

Supply of Teachers.
The Science and Art Directory.
Kindergarten Training for Elementary Teachers.
Evening Continuation Schools.
Board of Education Act, 1899; Text.
Elementary Education (Defective and Epileptic Children) Act, 1899; Text.

gham.

ism of ter

ned in ated.

ale

Coint

unel

ker.

ted.

K.

enry

nry

ster

School Music Review .- Novello. 14d. Oct. Songs in Both Notations: - "Sweet the Angelus is ringing," by H. Smart; "Agincourt," by W. A. Wrigley.

School World,-MACMILLAN. 6d. Sept. On the Teaching of Proportion for use in Geometry. M. J. M. Hill.

A Teacher's Library of English History. A. Johnson Evans and C. S Fearenside.

Science Gossip .- 110, STRAND. 6d. Oct. A Heronry in Asia Minor. Illustrated. J. Bliss.
Radiography. Illustrated. James Quick.
A History of Chalk. Edward A. Martin.
Butterflies of the Palacarciic Region. Illustrated. Henry Charles Lang.

Scots Magazine.-Houlston. 6d. Sept.

Balmerino of the '45. D. Murray Rose. Lucian's "True History." W. B. Wallace. Braid Scots and German. Kenneth Mathieson. British Carrisons and Scottish Officials in 175). Adam Smail.

Scottish Geographical Magazine.—Edward Stanford. 15, 6d. Sept.

Vancouver Island. Al.xander Begg.
From London to Karachi in a Week. With Map. Francis H. Skrins.
Brist Notes on the Glacial Phenomena of Colombia. Illustrated. R. Blake

Scribner's Magazine.—Sampson Low. 18. Oct. The Water-Front of New York. Illustrated. Jess Lynch Williams, Autobiographical Stetch of Mrs. John Drew. Illustrated. Williams, Telephotography. Illustrated. Dwight L. Elmendorf. The Letters of Robert Louis Stevenson. Continued. Sidney Colvin. The Vaudeville Theatre. Illustrated. Edwin Milton Royle.

Strad .- 186, FLEET STREET. 2d. Oct. The Literature of the Violincello, Continued. E, van Der Straeten, G. Hart, Violin-Maker. Illustrated. Rev. W. Meredith-Morris Antonius Stradivarius. Continued. H. Pethe ick. Beethoven's Trios, Continued. J. Matthews.

Strand Magazine.-George Newnes. 6d. Oct. "Biggest on Record." Illustrated. Continued. George Dollar.
The Day of the Canker-Worm. Illustrated. Grant Allen.
The Romance of Niagara B.idges. Illustrated. Orrin E. Dunlap.

Sunday at Home .- 55, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Oct. A Sunday in Apia. Illustrated. Rev. R. Wardlaw Thompson.
A Hindu "De Imita ione." Rev. S. G. Green.
The Handwriting of Bishop William Beveridge. Illustrated. Rev. A. B.

Sunday Magazine,—Isbister. 6d. October. Bishop John Selvyn. With Portrait. William Scabrooke. Weights and Measures—Biblical and Modern. Mrs. Chisholm. Our National Collection of Prayer-Books. Illustrated. L Leonard W. Lillingston.

Temple Bar.-Macmillan. is. October. My Father as I Remember Him. D. O'Connell.
Mrs. Oliphant; a Sketch from Memory. H. O. Sturgis.
Reminiscences of Old Hastings.
Old College Customs at Oxford. H. W. Matthews.

Temple Magazine.-Horace Marshall. 6d. Oct. The Countess of Aberdeen's Recollections of Canada; Interview. Illustrated.

The Waxen Effigies at Westminster Abbay. Illustrated. James Drysdale.

Religious Leaders in Parliament. Illustrated. Alfred Kinnear. English Girls and American Girls. Illustrated. Helen Mary Lawrence. Benares; the Holy City of the Hindus. Illustrated. John Foster Fraser. Philanthropy in Birmingham. Illustrated. J. A. Hammerton.

Theogophical Review, -25, Charing Cross. 18. Sept.

Hermes the Thrice-Greatest. G. R. S. Mead. The Proofs of Theosophy. A. Fullerton. The Hidden Church on Russinn Soil. A Russian, Love and Law. Dr. A. A. Wells. The Bases of Education. Annie Besant. Ancient Peru. C. W. Leadbeater.

Travel.-Horace Marshall. 31. Sept. Our World's Cycling Commission, Illustrated, Continued, John Foster Fraser and others, Scenas in Cyprus. Illustrated. Margaret Thomas.
To Whitby and Thereabouts. Illustrated. Chas H. G inling.
Notes of a Tour in Russia. Illustrated. Rev. A. Francis.
Saráswati. John Ayscough.
Dr. Sven Hedin of Stockholm. Illustrated.

Werner's Magazine .- 43. East 1)TH STREET, New York. 25 cents. Sept. The Expressional R. lation of Poetry to Painting. Florence P. Holden. The Reading of Sh.k.sp.are. Minnie Swayze. Is there a Vocal Science? Louis Arthur Russell.

Wesleyan Methodist Magazine. 2, Castle Street, City Road. 6d. S.pt.
The City of Winchester. Illustrated, John Telford.
The Wesleys and the Nobility. Continued. Illustrated. G. Mackenzis Cobban.

Westminster Review .- F. WARNE. 25. 6d. Oct. Westminster Review.—F. Warne. 2s. 6d. Oct The Dreyfins Case and the Future of France. On Which (Political) Sid: Art Thou? The Record of the Session. John Herlihy. The Contagirus Diseases Acts (Women). A Mote on Massinger. Arthur Lang nead Casserley. Samia Felix. G. Pringle. Corporal Punishment in Schools. T. M. Hopkins. The Motives of Agnosticism. Vox Clamantis. Fallacies of the Inoculators. Continued. Dr. E. Haughton.

Wide World Magazine, —Geo. Newnes, 6d. October.

In the Khalifa's Clutches; or My Twelve Years' Captivity in Chains. Illustrated. Charles Neufold.

The Juggernath Festival in Bengal. Illustrated. Rev. T. R. Edwards. The Terrible Adventure of Emil Habl. Illustrated. L. H. Eisennann. What a Breton "Pardon" is Like. Illustrated. Kathleen Schlesinger. Among the Hairy Ainus of Yezo. Illustrated. Archivald Gowan Campbell.

How a "Portage" is worked. Illustrated. Edward J. Stillman. One Thousand Miles on Mule-Back. Illustrated. Continued. Mabel Penniman.

Some Stanley Relics, and Why They are prized. Illustrated. J. Reed.

Some Stanley Relics, and Why They are prized. Illustrated. J. Reed. Wade.

Windsor Magazine, -WARD, LOCK AND Co. 6d. Oct. Windsor Magazine.—Ward, Lock AND CO. 6d. Oct.
The America Cup: Its O igin and History, Illustrated. G. F. Lorimer,
The Cape to Cairo Railway. Illustrated. Concluded. W. T. Stead.
A Talk with "Lucas Malet." Illustrated. Miss Mary Angela Dickens.
Trawling for Scientific Purposes. Illustrated. Alexander Meek.
The Great Meteor Shower of 1839. Illustrated. Walter George Bell.
Camping-Out in British Columbia. Illustrated. W. J. Kerslake Flinton.
A New Zealand Vesuvius. Illustrated. G. R. Falconer.

Woman at Home.-Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. Oct. ! Sir Alfred Milner. Illustrated. A Parliamentary Hand.
Concerning Miss Ellen Thomeycoft Fowler. Illustrated. Horace Annesley

Young Man,-HORACE MARSHALL. 3d. Oct. From Camberwell Grove to the Cabinet; the Life Story of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, Illustrated. Arthur Mes. Invisible Suns and Their Significance. Frank Ballard.

Young Woman,-Horace Marshall, 3d. Oct. Empress of a Hundred Millions; the Life-Story of the Czarina. Illustrated.
Arthur Mes.
Edna Lyall at Home. Illustrated. Leily Bingen. A Workhouse Matron at Work.

THE GERMAN MAGAZINES.

Aligemeine Konservative Monatsschrift.—E. Ungleich, Leipzig.

z. Mk. Sept.

Exiles and Frontier Policy. C. Freiherr von Ungern-Sternberg.

The Superhuman in the History of Mankind. Prof. F. Heman.

Dr. Paul Majunke. Dr. Ri.ks.

Alte und Neue Welt .- BENZIGER, EINSIEDELN. 30 Pf. Sept. Modern Rome. Illustrated. Dr. G. A. Müller. Consumption. Dr. Guilbert. Artillery. Illustrated. M. Roda-Roda. The New German Civil Code. C. Burla.

Daheim,-Poststrasse 9, Leipzig. 2 Mks pei qr. Sept. 2 Willy Birrenkoven. With Portrait. Sedan. Illustrated. Prof. E. Heyck.

The Zoological Gardens at Berlin. Illustrated. T. H. Pantenius. Luther. Prof. Max Lehmann. Two Centu: ies of the Württemberg Waldensians. A. Markt.

S.pt. 23.

Luther. Continued. Prof. M. Lehmann.

Lützow's "Wilde Verwegene Jagd." Illustrated. B. von Bergen.

Deutscher Hausschatz.-F. Puster, Regensburg. 40 Pf. Heft 17. Spain. Illustrated. Cont Hunting in Algeria. E. V Luxembu g. Illustrated. Illustrated. Continued. O. Hirt.

Deutsche Revue.—Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart.
6 Mks. per qr. Sept.

On the Egyptian Soudan. Slatin Pasha.
Count von Greppi; Rome, 1841-2.
W. W. Verestchagin. Eugen Zabl.
The Physiology of Baldoning and Alpine Sport. O. Langendo:ff.
Sainte Beuve in Private Life. Dr. C.banès.
Prince Ha. Field in Paris, Jan.-Mar. 1813. Conclud.:d. W. Oncken.
England and Germany. Sir W. H. Rattigan.

Deutsche Rundschau.—Gebrüder Partei., Berlin. 6 Mks. per quarter. Sept.

Käthchen Schönkopf. Ernst Elster.
Conrad Fe'dinand Meyer. Continued. Adolf Frey.
Aerial Navigation. Dr. B. Dessau.
Rudyard Kıpling. M. von Brandt.
Greece under the Romans. Concluded.
Greece under the Romans. Concluded.
F. Friedlaender.
Sir Alfred Milner's "England in Egypt." W.
The Youth of Leopold R.nke. Gerold Mayer von Knonan.
Countess Reden. Reinhold Steig.
Wilhelm Raabe. Willy Pastor. The Transvaal.

Gartenlaubs .- ERNST KEIL'S NACHE., LEIPZIG. 30 Pf. Heft 9.

Prince Bismarck and F. L. Jahn. Carl Euler.
Monte Pincio, Rome. Illustrated. Dr. A. Zacher.
The Dottmund-Ems Canal. Illustrated. E. Meinhard.
The Goethe Celebration. Illustrated. Johannes Prociss.
The International Women's Congress in London. Illustrated. Dr. F.

Muller.
The Art of Flying at the End of the Century. Illustrated. W. Werdrow. Gesellschaft.-J. C. C. BRUNS, MINDEN. 75 Pf. Sept. 1.

Russia and Finland; a Passion Play in the North. Anselm Heine, Haeckel. Continued. R. Steiner. Catholicism and Modern Literature. Concluded. E. Gystrow.

Sept. 15. Haeckel. Concluded. John Henry Mackay and Modern Ly:ic Poetry. Max Messer.

Kunstgewerbeblatt.-E. A. Seemann, Leipzig. 1 Mk. Sept. Jean Carriès. Illustrated. Dr. E. W. Braun.

Neue Deutsche Rundschau.—S. Fischer, Berlin. 1 Mk. 50 Pf. Sept.

Self-Assertion and Self-Sacrifice. Ellen Key. The Present Economic Crisis. R. Calwer. The Present Economic Crisis. R. Calwer. Goethe and the Philistines. M. Schwann. Portrait-Painting. Max Osborn.

Nord und Sud .- Schlesische Verlags-Anstalt, Breslau. 2 Mks.

Adolf Pichler. With Portrait. Bernhard Münz Charlotte Stieglitz. H. Jac.bson. Europe, 18,28-9; the Better Man. Optimist. Freewill. Frank. The Orkhon Inscriptions, P. Köbke.

Stimmen aus Maria-Laach.—Herder, Freiburg, Baden. 10 Mks. 80 Pf. per annum. Sept.

The Marx Theory of Modern Society and Its Development in the Light of Bernstein's Criticisms. Concluded. H. Pesch.
The Sense of Sight in Eyeless Animals. C. Wasmann.
The Most Ancient Maps of the World. Concluded. J. Schwarz.
Modern Hinduism under the Influence of Christi in Ideas. Concluded.

A. Hegglin.
The Paliotto in the Church of St. Ambrogio at Milan. Illustrated. J. Braun.
Marc Antonio Cesti. (17th Century). T. Schmid. Ueber Land und Meer .- Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart.

The Philippine Islands. Illustrated. G. Hoff.
The Vinna City Railway. Illustrated. Dr. M. Weinberg.
The Treatment of the Theodor of Bayaria, Illustrated. G. Freiherr von Ompteda.

Karl Theodor of Bayaria, Illustrated.

Ver Sacrum.-E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPZIG. 15 Mks. per ann. Heft 7. Two Years of the Austrian Secession. Illustrated. Ludwig Hevesi. Graphic Arts. Illustrated. Gustav Gugitz.

Vom Fels zum Meer.—Union-Deutsche-Verlagsgesellschapt, Stuttgart. 75 Pf. Heft 26. Faust in Old Pictures. Illustrated. Dr. Alexander Tille.

Spitzbergen. Illustrated. W. Dreesen.
The Rhine Country. Continued. Illustrated. Rhenanus.
Clocks, etc. Illustrated. A. F. Heft z.

Society in Madrid. Hans Parlow,

Villa Catena. Illustrated. Richard Voss. . Chinese Embroidery. Illustrated. The Württemberg Waldensians. Illustrated. A. Roessger.

Die Zeit .- GÜNTHERGASSE 1, VIENNA IX./3. 50 Pf. Sept 2. The Dynastic Question in the History of Servia. A. Petrowitsch. F. Hanspaul and Materialism. Dr. H. Gomperz. Vandyck. F. Knopff.

The Canal Crisis in Germany.

Alfred Sisley. Julius Levin.

Poems by Hermann Rollett.

Sept. 16. The Transvaal. A. Charpentier. Japanese Poetry. H. Ubeil.

Sept. 23. Constitutional Guarantees, Dr. F. W. Foe.ster.

The Moral Regeneration of France. Dr. 1 Japanese Poetry. Continued. H. Ubell. Wagner and His Public. Dr. M. Graf. Zeitschrift für Bildende Kunst.—E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPZIG. 26 Mks. per annum. Sept.

The Rembrandt Exhibition in London. Illustrated. A. Bredius.
The Sleeping Amor by Michelangelo. Illustrated. C. von Fabriczy.
Corrado Ricci's Biography of Correggio. Illustrated. G. Gronau.

Zeitschrift für Bücherfreunde.—Velhagen und Klasing, Leitzig.
2 Mks. August—Sept.

F

R

Th Fre Ra Cas Ita

Fra

Bu

Phy

Lithography. Illustrated. Emanuel Kann.
Kleist and "Die Familie Schroffenstein." Continued. Prof. E. Wolff.
Modern German Posters. Illustrated. K. Mertens.
Papers for Goethe's Hundredth Birthday: Bibliography. H. Oswald.
The Austrian "Kronprinzenwerk." Illustrated. T. Goebel.

THE FRENCH MAGAZINES.

Annales des Sciences Politiques.—108, Boulevard Saint-Germain, Paris. 3 frs. 50 c. Sept.

The Britann's Empire. Émils Boutmy.
The Canal f. om the Elbe to the Rhine. Henri Schuhler.
The Commercial Relations of France with Switzerland, 1832-38. A. Education in the Department of the Seine. G. Salaun.

Association Catholique. -3, Rue de L'Abbave, Paris. 2 frs. S.pt. 15.

Karl Marx and His Doctrine. G. de Pascal.
The Christian Social Movement. Continued. Marquis de la Tour-du-Pin Chambly.
New Forms of Usury. Hanri Savatier.

Bibliothèque Universelle, —18, King William Street, Strand. 20s. per annum. Sept. Sept.

Tsar Nicholas II. and Finland. Edmond Rossier.

Women's Life in America. Mme. Mary Bigot.

Charles Monard and the Franco-Swizz Conflict of 1838. Concluded. Numa Droz.

Numa Droz.
Central Africa. Auguste Glardon,
The English Submarine Cables. Concluded. Pierre Martel, Capri. Concluded. Adolphe Ribaux.

Correspondant.-14, Rue de L'Abbaye, Paris. 2 frs. 50 c. Sept. 10. Bossuet at Meaux. H. Druon. The Evolution of the Socialist Syndicate in France. Continued. L. de Belgian Catholics and the Electoral Question. Continued. M. Vanlaer. The Renaissance of the French Nationality in Acadia. C. Derouet. The Religion of Tennyson. P. Ragey.

Sept. 25.
The Rights of England in the Transvaal; Letter to the Queen. A. Desjardins.

The Drayfus Affair. Ch. Descotay.

Mrs. Gladstone. M. Dronsart.

Bossuet at Meaux. Continued. H. Druon.

The Portuguese Possessions in South Africa. With Map. J. Darcy.

Humanité Nouvelle.—15, Rue des Saints-Pères, Paris.

I fr. 25 c. Sept. 10.

The Middle Ages and Emanc pation. L. Garreau.
Individualism. Concluded. M. Doubinsky.
Napoleon I. and False Coinnge. Concluded. L. de Royaumont.
Finland and Russip. Illustrated. Léon Denis
The Socialist Secession.

Journal des Economistes.—14, Rue Richelieu, Paris. 3 frs. 50 c. Sept. 15.

The Civil War between Capital and Labour. G. de Molinari. Darwinism and the Social Question. Gabriel Ambon.

Ménestrel .- 2 bis, Rue VIVIENNE, PARIS. 30 c. Sept. 3, 10, 17. Some Unpublished Letters of Celebrated Musicians. Arthur Pougin.

Sept. 24.

Jean Jacques Rousseau as a Musici in. With Portrait. Arthur Pougin.

Mercure de France.—15, Rue de l'Echaudé-Saint-Germain Paris. 2 frs. Sept.

Thomas Carlyle and Friedrich Nietzsche. Georges Oudinot. Ernest Chausson. Pierre de Bréville.

Light

uded.

traun.

GART.

١.

t 7.

FT,

ZIG.

er,

50 C.

7.

Monde Moderne. -- 5, Rue St. Benoît, Paris. 1 fr. 60 c. Sept. Monate Mouerne, —5, ROR ST. DENOIT, FARIS. I B. OC. Sept. Assis. I llustrated. Gerspach.

Musical and Instrumental Ethnography. Illustrated. Constant Larchet.

Women under Islam. Illustrated. Charles Lallemand.

The Nervous System. Dr. E. Monin.

Rangoon. Illustrated. Ch. Jambon.

Early Etchers. Illustrated. L. Dimier.

The Art of Rearing Rabbits. Illustrated. Paul Mégnin.

Nouvelle Revue,—18, King William Street, Strand. 30s. per half-year. Sept 1.

Sept 15.

Greater Germany. G. Rouvier.

The Material and Moral Condition of the Literary Man. C. Mauclair.

A Study of Secondary Education. A. Muteau.

A Gigantic Lens: a Paris Exhibition Marvel. S. Meunier.

Van Dyck. V. de Swarte.

Van Dyck, V. de Swarte.
The Gern asn in Italy. Sens.
The French Army Manœuvres. A. G. Clartan.
French Society from the 16th to the 17th Centuries. V. Du Bled
The Repopulation of France. F. Martin.
The Great African Colonial Concessions. J. B. D'Attanoux.

Nouvelle Revue Internationale.—23, Boulevard Poissonière, Paris. 2 frs. 50 c. Sept. 1.

PARIS. 26 P.S. 50 C. Sept. 1.

The R.nnes Trial. Maris L. de Rute.
Review of European Politics. Comte E. de Kératry.
Industrial Socialism. Pierre Denis.
Letter to M. Bourgeois on International Peace. L. Vauthier
French Colonisation. Marius Ary Leblond.

The Rennes Trial. Marie L. de Rute.
The Literary and Artistic Movement in Finland. A. Canivet.
The Reform of University Education. J. de Réville.

Réforme Sociale. -54, Rue de Seine, Paris. 1 fr. Sept. 16. Freedom of Education. Paul Lerolle.
The Law of Succession in France and the Population. A. de Cilleuls.
F. Le Play and Normandy Traditions. H. Dubreuil.

Revue de l'Art Ancien et Moderne. -28, Rue du Mont-Thabor, Paris. 7 frs. 50 c. S.pt.

The Fine Arts at the International Exposition of 1900. Illustrated. Paul

A Polychrome Statue by Ernest Barrias, Illustrated. Max Collignon.
The "Sposalizio" of Perugino in the Caen Museum. Illustrated. F. The "Sposalizio" of Perugino in the Casa.

Engerand.
Georges Bizet. Illustrated. H. Imbert.
St. Anthony of Padua and Italian Art. Illustrated. P. Vitry.

Revue Blanche,-I, RUE LAFFITTE, PARIS. I fr. Sept. 1. Literature in China. Illustrated. Alexandre Ular.

Some Small European States. Paul Louis.
The German Nobility. Cerini.
Vittore Pisano. Charles Saunier.
The Dreyfus Affair and the Crisis in the Socialist Party in France. C.

Revue Bleue.-Fisher Unwin, Paternoster Square. 6d. Sept. 2. The Parliamentary Problem in France. A. Gervais. French Society during the Consulate. G. Stenger.

French Society during the Consume.

Sept. 7.

The Theatre in the Last Quarter of a Century, Concluded. L. Chevallier.

The Love of Animals. A. Martin.

Sept. 16.

Jean Robert Chouet. E. de Budé. Comtesse de Lamotte-Valois. L. de Soudak.

Voltaire and Italy. Paul Sirven. Marc de Mailliet. P. Bonnefon.

Revue des Deux Mondes,—13, King William Street, Strand, 30s. per half-year. Sept. 1.

The Hague Conference and International Arbitration. A. Desjardins.

The Hagus Conference and International Arbitration. A. Desj French Painters of the Century. J. Breton. Railways and the Opening-Up of China. P. Leroy-Beaulieu. Castelar; His Role under the Monarchy. E. Varagnac. Italian Unity in South-East Italy, G. Goyau. Sept. 15.

The Soc'alist Crisis and the End of a Theory. J. Bourdeau. France in the Levant; the Chances of the Future. E. Lamy. Charles Loyson. L. Séché. Burmah and the Shan States, Mme. I. Massicu. Cuba's Future, C. Benoist.

Revus Encyclopédique.-18, KING WILLIAM STREET, STRAND. 7s. per qr. Sept. 2. Physical Education. Illustrated.

Physical Education. Indistrated. Sept. 9.

Dramatic Criticism. Illustrated. Gustave Geff. oy. Politics in Italy, 1838. Illustrated. A. Ebray.

Sept. 16.

Art in Italy, 1895-9. Illustrated. Vitto.io Pica Dramatic Criticism. Continued. G. Geffroy.
Sept. 23.

The Soudan, the Basin of the Niger, and the Gold Coast. With Maps and Illustrations. G. Regelsperger.
Literary Evolution and its Social Tendencies. Camille Mauclair.

Revue Française .- , Rue DE LA VICTOIRE, PARIS. 2 frs. Sept. Celtic Reunion and the Cardiff Congress. L. O. Radiguet, Edouard Foa and His African Exploration. G. Vasco, Belgian Shipping. With Maps. Paul Barré. Fishing in Tunis. J. Servigny.

Revue Générale. - 16, RUE TREURENBERG, BRUSSELS. 12 frs. per The Social Condition of Germany in the Eighteenth Century. Concluded.

Britannic Imperialism. Ed. Vlietinck.
English Colonial Companies in the Nineteenth Century. G. Bastin.
The Question of a Catholic University for Ireland. A. Oates.

Revue pour les Jeunes Filles.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. r fr. 25 c. Sept 5.

The Roman Theatre at Orange. L. Barracand.
Marie Bashkirtseff. G. Maze-Sencier.
The Germany of Goethe. Continued. E. Tissot.
Fancy Dogs. G. Dechartres.
Holidays for Poor Children. Augusta Latouche. Sept. 20.

"Dejanire." Pierre Mille.
Tunbridge Wells. Lily Butler.
Wagner's Girls, Paul Souday.
The Centenary of Pius VI. Jane Misme.
Coins and Medal. Pierre Marcel.

Revue de Métaphysique et de Morale.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 3 frs. Sept. Science and Philosophy. Continusd. E. Le Roy. Memory. Concluded. E. Chartier. The Method of Physical Sciences. J. Wilbois.

Revue du Monde Catholique.—76, Rue des Saints-Pères, Paris. 2 frs. 50 c. Sept. 1.

The French Clergy Before and During 1783. Dom. F. Plaine.

A New Conception of the Plan of the Apocalyse. A. Chauffard.
Corruption of the Proconsuls of the French Republic, 1793-98. Bonnal de Ganges.

The Co-education of the Sexes in North America. Ch. A. Barnaud.
Freemasonry and Liberty. Fr. Veuillot.

Revue de Morale Sociale .- 16, RUE SOUFFLOT, PARIS. 3 frs. Sept. Traffic in Women. Percy W. Bunting.
The Women's Congress in Aberdeen. N. Roger.
Labour Legislation and the Protection of Women. Edith F
The Part of Women in the City of the Future. J. Lourbet. Edith F. Hogg.

Revue de Paris .- 18, King William Street, Strand. 60 frs. per annum. Sept 1.

The Attempted Regicide of Damiens. Duc de Choiseul, Opinion and Conversation. G. Tarde. In Dahomey. D. Masse. Russian and an Ice-Free Port. C. Rabot. Correspondence of George Sand. Part I.
Twenty-five Years of British Finance. A. Viallate.
The Last Days of Louis XVIII. Viscount de Reiset, Japanese Parliamentarism. Far East.

Revue Politique et Parlementaire .-- 5, Rue de Mézières, Paris.

Chinese Railways. A. A. Fauvel. Labour Bureaus. Fernand Pelloutier. The Warranty of Agricultural Products. H. Pascaud.

Revue des Revues .- 12, Avenue de L'Oréra, Paris. 1 fr. Sept s. Penal Colonisation. Illustrated. Jules Durand.
Literary Style. Paul Stapfer.
The Adolescence of Leconte de Lisle. Concluded. M. A. Leblond.

Stendhel and Balzac. Jean Mélia.
Liquid Air. G. Roux.
Marguerite of Lorraine on the Italian Throne. Concluded. P. d'Estrée.

Songs during the Siege of Paris. Julien Sermet, Sept. 15. American Millionaires. Continued. L. de Norvins American Millionaires. Continued. L. de Norvins.
Antoine Van Dyck and the Antwerp Exposition. E. Müntz.
Ruskin Hall, Oxford. Prof. C. Martin.
Sensible Women and Romantic Women. Illustrated. R. Deberdt.
The Italian Theatre. Illustrated. R. Sacchetti.
The Scientific Spirit. Dr. A. Forel.

Revue Scientifique. -FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 6d. Sept 2.

The Physical Life of Our Planet. A. Klossovsky. Binocular Illusions. A. Dissard.

Neurone and Cellular Memory. J. Renaut.
The Hybridation Congress at Chiswick.

Sept. 16. Modern Hygiene. P. Brouardel.
The French Association in 18 28-9. A. Loir.
The Finances of the French Association. E. Galante. Sept. 23. The Scientific Spirit. Michael Foster. Island Floras, J. Constantin.

Island Floras, J. Constantin.

Revue Socialiste. —78, Passage Choiseul, Paris. 1 fr. 50 c. Sept.
The Naturalisation of Algerian Jaws. Continued. Louis Durieu.
The Third Congress of German Syndicates. E. Milhand.
The Evolution of Association for Life. C. Fages.
The Crisis in the Socialist Party in France. G. Rouanet.

Semaine Littérairs. -4, Boulevard du Théâtre, Geneva. 15 C. Sept. 2.

Education in England, Henri Jacottet.

Université Catholique. -Burns and Oates. 20 frs. per aunum. Sept. 15.

The Catholic Church and Kindness to Animals. Abbé Delfour. Tertullian's "De Corona Militis" and the Church. F. Chanvillard. Eden. Concluded. F. de Curley. The Triple Alliance, Continued. Comte J. Grabinski.

THE ITALIAN MAGAZINES.

Civiltà Cattolica. VIA DI RIPETTA 246, ROME. 25 frs. per annum. Sept. 2;

Anti-Christianity of To-day,
Bonifac: VIII. and a Distinguished Dante Commentator,
The Italian Dialects in History.
The Kicks Bestowed upon Italy at the Higue Conference. Sept. 16.

Papal Intransigence. The Moral Science of Positivism.

Presentiments and Telepathy.

Flegrea.—Piazzetta Mondragone, Naples. 20 frs. per annum. Sept. 5

The Evolution of Italian Art in the N neteenth Century. N. T. Gallucci, Upsala and Stockholm. Ugo Ojetti.

Nuova Antologia.-VIA S. VITALE 7, ROME. 45 frs. per annum. Sept. 1.

Sept. 1.
The Eleventh Centenary of Paul the Deacon. Prof. F. Bertolini.
The Empress Elizabeth of Austria. Barbara Allason.
Henrik Sienkiewicz. Tristram Shandy.
Popular Credit in the Last Decade. E. Levi della Vida.
Sept. 16.
The Decadence of Latin Nations. Ouida.
Petrarch and Saint Augustine (Part I.). C. Segrè.
Italian Expansion in South America. E. Barone.
The Social Crisis in France. G. Ferrero.
The Transvaal Question. F. Nobili-Vitelleschi.

Rassegna Nazionale. - Via della Pace 2, Florence. 30 frs. per anna

The Proposed Emigration Act. N. Malnate.
The Battle of Custoza and the Reminiscences of General della Rocca, Ugo

The Exportation of Works of Art. T. L. Americanism. Mon. . . .

The Proposed Marriage Act. C. F. Gabba Christina of Swedan and Her Court. E. Masi.
Student Corporations in Germany. C.
Feminine Poetry and Luisa Anzoletti. E. di Bisogno,

Riforma Sociale. - PIAZZA SOLFERINO, TURIN. 12 frs. per ann. Sept. 15. Italian Commercial Policy. L. Fontana-Russo. The Great English Trading Companies. R. Dalla Volta. Italian Emigration to Switzerland. E. Sella.

Rivista Italiana di Sociologia,-VIA NAZIONALE 200, ROME. The Present and the Future of Nations. G. Sergi. Sociology and Its Scientific and Social Value. A. Loria. The Violent Deaths of Russian Rulers. E. Tarnowski.

Rivisita Politica e Letteraria. -3, VIA MARCO MINGHETTI, ROME. Sept.

The Problem of Italians Abroad. XXX.
French Colonial Power in North-West Af ica. T. Carletti.
Contemporary English Fiction. O. Malagodi.

Rivista di Scienze Biologiche. - 3. VIA CARLO ALBERTO, TURIN. Recent Discoveries concerning Malaria. B Grassi.
Do we see Objects Straight or Reversed? M. Calderoni.

Spicilegium Benedictinum, -ST. BENEDICT'S, ROME. 4 frs. per ann.

Blessed Euphemia Giustiniani.
The Block Monks in France.
Correspondence of D. B. Bacchini, O. S. B.

THE SPANISH AND PORTUGUESE MAGAZINES.

Cludad de Dios .- REAL MONASTERIO DEL ESCORIAL, MADRID. 20 pesetas per annum. Sept. 5.

The Holy Sepulchre. Juan Lazcano. Amber and Electricity. Justo Fernandez. Human Justice. Jeronimo Montes.

España Moderna.—Cuesta de Santo Domingo 16, Madrid.
40 pesetas per annum. Sept.

Alcala de Henares and the War of Independence. R. Amador de los Rios. American Poets and Poetry. G. Valencia Some Social and Educational Institutions of England and America. Symposium.

O Instituto. - UNIVERSITY OF COIMBRA. 9d. Sept.

New Principles of Criminal Science. A. Lino Netto. Studies in Grecian History. Dr. F. P. Garofalo. Wanted—An Authoritative Portuguese Dictionary.

Revista Contemporanea,—Calle de Pizarro 17, Madrid.
2 pesetas. August 30.
What are Women?—Bobadilla.
Light and Colours. Jorge Lechalas.
The Latin Rac... José Perez Guerrero. Paganism and Christinism. A. Lopez Pelaez.
The Jordan of America. V. Gav.
The Working Classes and Combination. M. G. Maestre.

THE DUTCH MAGAZINES.

Elsevier's Geillustreerd Maandschrift.—LUZAC AND Co., 46, GREAT RUSSELL STREET. 18. 8d. Sept.

Rodin, the Sculptor. Illustrated. J. de M. Wester.
A Stadholder Conference in 1646. Arnold Ising.
Pontoon-Making. Illustrated. J. Eysten.

De Gids.-Luzac AND Co. 3s. Sept.

State Care of Sick Prisoners. Dr. L. S. Meijer. The Effect of Recent Wars in India. K. Goethe, 1749-1899. Dr. Byvanck.

Vragen des Tijds .- Luzac and Co. 18. 6d. Sept. Parliament and the New Fortresses. L. M. A. von Schmid, The Thrift of Nations and the Reaction against It. M. W. F. Treub.

Woord en Beeld .- ERVEN F. BOHN, HAARLEM. 16s. per annum. September.

Scenes in and about Bloemendaal. Illustrated. A. G. van Hamel. Prof. A. G. van Hamel. Dr. Byvanck. Remains of Old Amsterdam. Illustrated. A. J. M. Brouwer Ancher.

THE SCANDINAVIAN MAGAZINES.

Kringsjaa.-Olaf Norli, Christiania. 2 kr. per quarter. August 31. Liquid Air and Its Future Uses. Goethe. With Portraits.

Sept. 15. Mareorama. Illustrated.

Goethe. Continued. Miracles. Dr. G. Armauer Hansen.

Ringeren.-The City Passage, Christiania. 2 kr. per qr. Sept. 2. William Keith Brooks. With Portrait. P. Engelbrethsen. Holberg and his Comedies. Nils Kjaer.

Sept. 16. Holger Drachmann. With Portrait. Carl Naerup. Social-Democrats. Harald Kristoffersen.

Tilskueren. - Ernst Bojesen, Copenhagen. 12 kr. per annum. Sept. The Rembrandt Exhibitions. Karl Madson. Features of the Greek Religion. A. B. Drachmann. The United States of Australia. Jul. Wulff. The Finnish Coup d'État. Ivar Berendsen. The International Address to the Tsar. C. M. Norman-Hansen.

HISTORY OF THE MONTH IN CARICATURE.

(OCTOBER.)

I.-SOUTH AFRICA.

THERE are at this time no cartoons which more fittingly and aptly show the progress of events than those by Mr. Carruthers Gould, of the Westminster Gazette. On the following two pages may be seen some cartoons from the collection soon to be published by Mr. Gould in book form.

Westminster Gazette.

THE SCOUT ON THE VELDT.

[London.

Westminster Gazette.]

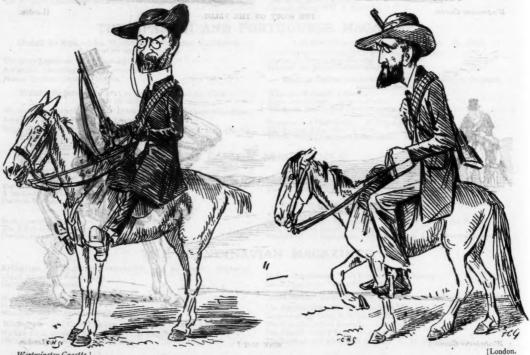

WHY NOT?

[London

It is reported that President Kruger is anxious to go to the front and fight. On the principle of "Let those who make the quarrels be the only ones to fight," why should not Mr. Chamberlain also take the field himself?

Westminster Gazette.] MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S GOLD CASKET. A suggestion for the design of the Gold Casket which it is proposed to present to Mr. Chamberlain at the Guildhall.

Westminster Gasette.

HUGII PRICE HUGHES.

A VOLUNTEER WHO MIGHT GO TO THE FRONT !- REV. MR. DILLON GOING TO THE FRONT. (Suggested by M. Johnston of Ballykilbeg.)

II .- FOREIGN OPINION.

Amsterdammer.]

How the Boer pictures the Englishman.

FROM DIFFERENT POINTS OF VIEW!

[Ameterdom

P. Pis.

How the Englishman thinks of the Boer.

THE GORILLA.

Silkonette.

TRIPPED UP!

Notwithstending John Bull's armanents he finds himself tripped up by little Krug.r. THE LAST PIECE.

Münchener Odinskarte.]

A GERMAN VIEW OF JOHN BULL'S ACTION.

World.]

FOR LOVE OF ENGLAND!

[New York.

III.-THE NATIVE DANGER. MR. CHAMBERLAIN, THEN AND NOW.

News of the World.] JOHN BULL: "For God's sake, Milner, keep him back if you can; we do not want that horror add d to the rest!"

"Am sorry, mister; but I must trouble you to take 'em all off!"

"They had asked for his trousers, and he had given them, and also his coat. He had nothing elso to give but his life."—President Kruger's speech

HIS SHOW: OR FACING THE MUSIC.

Some Mems. for Mr. Chamberlain. "This is your show." -General White to General French at Elands

IV.—MISCELLANEOUS.

[Montreal.

Daily Witness.]

THE VENEZUELAN ARBITRATION.

Both Satisfied!

MCKINLEY: "Suppose a tidal wave should strike us, Mark?"

BACK AGA'N !

The Plague returns to Europe, where it has not been known for a long time.

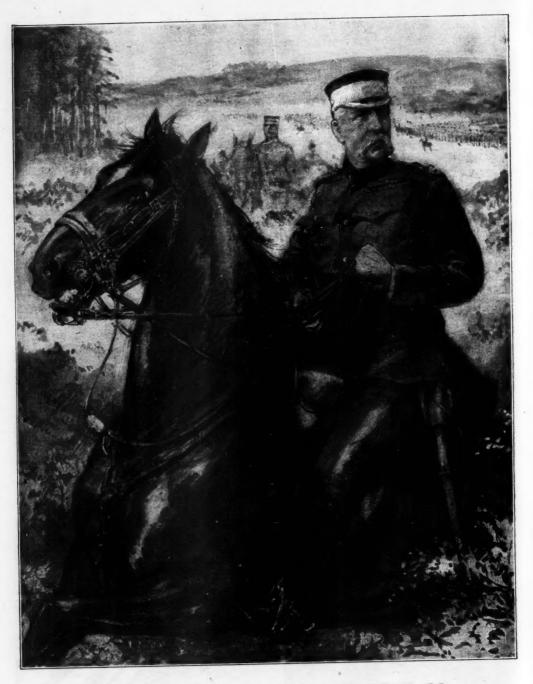

THE LION OF THE TRANSYAAL.

Britain has many hunters, but the chase will be arduous.

Kladderadatsch.]

v Vork.

.....

GENERAL SIR REDVERS BULLER, V.C., G.C.B., K.C.M.G., P.C.
In Supreme Command of all the Troops in South Africa.

434

bei pla ma of has ind trea rec self infl our Re cor afte

fore

dec acr unr vita Sou alm exc the hav spr the the one acc rev sch Na

Cer

of a

THE PROGRESS OF THE WORLD.

LONDON, Nov. 1, 1899.

Progress Whitherward? Progress' of the world! There has been no progress of the world visible this last month—a retrogression rather, and that at railroad speed. The only progress visible in this country has been of the Gadarene swine order, in which the herd, being possessed by devils, ran violently down a steep place into the sea and so were drowned. In this mad plunge a l inferos, every principle, the recognition of which marks a fresh stage of human progress, has been trampled under foot. The rights of an independent nationality; the scrupulous respect for treaty faith; the fulfilment of the pledged word; the recognition of arbitration; the right of colonists to self-government; the horror of the waste and crime of war-all these have for the moment ceased to influence the most articulate and influential portion of our countrymen. We are at war with the Dutch Republics of South Africa; and before this horrible consummation could be brought about one obstacle after another had to be laboriously surmounted, for in this case it has taken almost as much trouble to force on a war as it often takes to preserve the peace.

Our Sea-Power Challenged.

We are at war against a nightmare in South Africa, deceiving ourselves by the phrase "paramountcy of South Africa." And even before the first decisive battle has been waged, there comes to us across the narrow seas, close to our own doors, an unmistakable challenge, menacing a much more vital and indispensable paramountcy than that of South Africa-our sovereignty on the seas. It is almost incredible that even amidst the feverish excitement occasioned by the bloodshed in Africa, the fell significance of the German challenge should have passed unnoticed. No one can say that it was sprung upon us without warning. A fortnight ago the German Emperor, speaking at the launching of the new battleship at Hamburg, sounded the tocsin in one of those sonorous orations with which he is accustomed to disturb the tranquillity of the world: and while his grandiloquent sentences are still reverberating in our ears, we have the details of the scheme for doubling the strength of the German Navy in the next twenty years. The War Lord of Central Europe declared that he bitterly felt the want of a strong German fleet. If the increase in the navy which he demanded with urgent prayers and warning had not been stubbornly refused during the first eight years of his reign, in how different a manner should we now be able to promote our commerce and our interests over sea! But he declared he was not without hope that the Germans would brace themselves to the task, and instead of engaging in barren strife would joyfully make sacrifices demanded by their position among the nations -all of which is not a very hopeful look-out for those who dream of a halt in warlike expenditure. There is no mistaking the significance of this programme. It is a direct challenge addressed to Great Britain, intimating that Germany is going into training to snatch from us that sea-power upon the maintenance of which our Empire depends,

The Attitude of Germany.

Probably it is in anticipation of this challenge that Ministers are fidgeting so much about the Navy. They have got a new flying squadron ready, and there is talk at Portsmouth that all our available men-of-war are to be commissioned forthwith. This is obviously not in order that we can use them against the Boers. It must be intended as a hint to naval Powers which may see in our entanglement in South Africa an opportunity for attaining objects that they would not venture to try for if the Empire had been at peace. Already the German Colonial Party is crying out that we are mustering out our own war fleet for the purpose of wiping out the German colonies. "When once our Boers are finished with," says the Coloniale Zeitung, "only Germany and her colonies stand in the way of the great project of from Cape to Cairo, so let us say it frankly and candidly, we must sooner or later be prepared for a piece of English knavery." Therefore a demand is made by those who correspond to the members of our Navy League in Germany, that £,85,000,000 should be spent forthwith in increasing the German fleet until it is strong enough to cope, if need be, with England and the United States together. This may sound like midsummer madness, but the evidence which our present policy in South Africa affords of the readiness with which our own Ministers interpret paramountcy as equivalent to a right of dictation and mastery over all our neighbours, may naturally alarm naval Powers, for our paramountcy in South Africa is nothing compared with our paramountcy on the sea.

threatens

meditated

Now this announcement on the part of the German Government enables with Germany? us to test the value of the moral and political principles upon which Annexation.

The Queen when she prorogued Parliament, after referring to the military operations in South Africa, told the Lords and Commons, "I our Jingoes have acted in rushing into war in defence of our unthreatened paramountcy in South Africa. If it is right to pick a quarrel with a State which preponderance -or paramountcy in any region in which we consider we have vital interests. why should we not at once proceed to pick a quarrel with Germany in order to destroy her infant fleet before it becomes a menace to our naval pre-eminence? The popular argument which you hear every side is that the Boers were growing too strong, that they signs hostile to our ascendency, and therefore it was our right Photograph by Jaco!i.] [Metz. and duty to slip in before it was too late, and polish them off. Apply this argument nearer home, and it is obvious that the immediate response to the new German ship-building programme ought to be, on Jingo principles, the picking of a quarrel with Germany in order that we might pound her existing fleet to pieces before she was able to challenge our Imperial position.

THE KAISER AT THE RECENT MANŒUVRES.

trust that the Divine blessing may rest upon your efforts and those of my gallant army to restore peace and good government to that portion of my Empire and to vindicate the honour of this country," From this it is assumed both by friends and foes of the war policy that the South African Republic and the Free State are now regarded by Her Majesty's Ministers as belonging to the dominions of the Crown. This declaration is on a par with the proclamations issued by the Boer commandants, annexing Bechuanaland and the Diamond Fieldsthat is to say, it is without any iustification either in law or in fact. The Orange Free State is a sovereign international State. The South African Republic is a foreign State which, until war broke out, was in friendly treaty relations with Great Britain. Whatever may follow as the result of successful war, the outbreak of hostilities makes no difference in the international status of the contending fir na ca in da

P

CI

in

th

is

SII

th

Sp

in

WC of de Af

wh

ma

die as An by WO fan go but do pri and am him the the Powers, and although it is quite possible that the embattled might of the British Empire may be able to crush the brave peasants who are fighting for their independence in South Africa, it is premature, to say the least, to dispose of the skin of the bear before he is killed. Possibly Ministers may not have meant to suggest any such monstrosity as this, but the fact that this meaning has been read into the Queen's Speech with hearty approval by the advocates of the war is only another instance of the high-handed indifference to common-sense or international law with which they are prosecuting their designs.

The man in the street, according to

The Parrot Cry Mr. Chamberlain, knows that the object of the war is the assertion of Paramountcy. the paramountcy of Great Britain in South Africa. Paramountcy, according to the Under-Secretary for War, Mr. Wyndham, entails as its first duty the maintenance of peace among all the natives of South Africa. It would also seem to carry with it the right to interfere in the affairs of independent Republics with an authority which we dare not attempt to exercise in any British Colony. If this is denied, it would be interesting to know in what paramountcy consists. It is a phrase which may mean nothing more than the natural preponderance of strength which we possess in that part of the world. In that case there is no need to send an army of seventy thousand men from England in order to demonstrate what is as plain to everyone in South Africa as the sun in mid-heaven. On the other hand, it may be used to mean a right to dominate and dictate in the internal affairs of South African States, as George III. claimed to interfere in the North American Colonies. If so, it is likely to be followed by the same results. Our high-flyers of paramountcy would hardly venture to maintain that their newfangled doctrine gives them a right to interfere in the government of the German province of Damaraland or in the management of the possessions of Portugal; but if there is to be an exception to this wide-reaching doctrine of paramountcy, it is difficult to see on what principle it is to be applied to the Orange Free State and not to the possessions of Germany and Portugal.

How the Americans regard it.

The declaration that we are at war not for the franchise but for paramountcy has created, as might be expected, the very worst impression among our neighbours. Mr. Chamberlain plumes himself upon what he imagines to be the opinion of the United States; but commenting upon his speech, the Now York World says :-

Mr. Chamberlain's own admissions as to his policy constitute the most powerful indictment possible. Suppose that the United States were to go to war with Mexico and the Central American republics, and that the people of the United States, who had been thinking all along that the matter in dispute was the grievances of United States citizens living in those republics, were suddenly to find out that the real cause of the war was that our Secretary of State had been trying to compel those republics to admit the sovereignty or paramountcy of the United States over them. As Mr. Chamberlain's speech is the Government's official explanation of the war and its causes, the British conscience is now face to face with the naked moral problem.

Through Decadence to Doom.

Unfortunately, however naked the moral issue may be, the conscience of a great number of our countrymen contemplates it without a blush.

It is this element which, far more than anything else, reveals the extent of the decadence of our country. The phenomenon, although alarming and even horrifying, is not unfamiliar, at least to those who still keep up the old-time practice of reading their Bible. Jeshurun, having waxed fat, has kicked. We as a nation are acting exactly as the Chosen People acted in old time, when their apostacy brought down upon them the burning invectives and solemn warnings of the Hebrew seers. The pride of power, the insolence of wealth, the arrogance of the Pharisee, all combine to render the movement in favour of the present war irresistible—on the surface. Even the instinct of chivalry and the sense of the enormous disproportion between the British Empire and its tiny antagonists fail to appeal to our people. The passion for revenge and the haughty spirit which revolts at anything that thwarts its imperious will, drown all protests, and our people have rushed headlong into one of the wickedest and most criminal of piratical enterprises of our time, with an unctuous self-assurance that no State ever made a war in a holier cause. We may ransack the annals of recent history to find any parallel to this moral blindness of a great The plunge of the Second Empire to its doom at Sedan was not more remarkable an illustration of the madness which sometimes overtakes a For it is too true that individual nations, like individual men, sometimes go mad.

As if to emphasise the irony of the Life's Little Ironies situation, Lord Pauncefote, our Pleniat potentiary at the Hague Conference, last week repaired to the capital of Holland in order to sign, on behalf of Great Britain, the Arbitration Convention drawn up by the Peace Conference. He signed also that dealing with the Rules of War, but the Convention applying the

gued

the rica,

" I

the ssing

ipon

and gal-

re-

and

ern-

por-

Em-

indi-

nour

try."

t is h by foes

olicy outh

iblic

ree

now

by ty's

be-

the

the

his

s on

the ons

the nan-

xing

and

Dia-

ls—

say,

any

ion

or

'he

onal

eign

adly

ever

war,

ence

ding

Photograph by]

[V. Gribayedoff.

M. MARTENS READING THE DECISION OF THE VENEZUELAN ARBITRATION COMMISSION IN PARIS, provisions of the Geneva Convention to Naval Warfare he did not sign, probably because the sea lawyers at the Admiralty have not yet been able to satisfy themselves as to the bearing of one of its provisions upon the law of the land, and the Dutch Government objected to his signing it with a reserve. A Blue Book has been published giving a report of the proceedings of the Conference, and Professor Martens, who has been lecturing on the subject to his students at the University of St. Petersburg, announced that a work in four volumes on the Conference is shortly to be published. Martens added that he has "carefully studied all the International Conferences held in Europe during the last four hundred years, and found that none of them had equalled the one at the Hague, either as regarded external circumstances or material results." If the Arbitration Convention drawn up at the Hague did not prevent the outbreak of war in the Transvaal. that was solely due to the action of our own Government. Both Presidents of the Dutch Republics. together with Mr. Schreiner, the Prime Minister of the Cape, appealed to President McKinley to mediate in accordance with the provisions of the Hague Convention. Had he done so, and had any impartial person or State been permitted to intervene, the war would certainly have been avoided, for, as the House of Commons was told, to its dismay and indignation, the conflict is entirely due to the fact that Mr. Chamberlain and President Kruger failed to understand each other. A despatch, meant to be an acceptance, was misunderstood as a rejection. As I repeatedly pointed out during the discussion preceding the war, the Hague Conference had foreseen and provided for the very difficulty which has precipitated the armed conflict now desolating South Africa.

The Venezuela

In order that no excuse might be left to the nation which, in face of every protest, insisted in rushing into this fratricidal conflict, last month brought us the news of the Award which settled the long outstanding dispute between this country and Venezuela. Four years ago we were almost on the verge of war with the United States upon this question of the delimitation of the boundary between Venezuela and British Guiana. Thanks chiefly to the fact that the negotiations were in the hands, not of Mr. Chamberlain, with his maladroit car acity for penning despatches certain to be misunderstood, but in those of Lord Salisbury, the danger of war was averted, and the dispute was referred to the decision of a Court of Arbitration which met this year The Court was constituted of the higher judicial representatives of Great Britain and the United States, but it was presided over by a Russian Professor, M. Martens. case of both parties was stated in full before the tribunal, and after hearing everything that could be said on either side, the Court for the first time in the history of recent arbitrations came to a unanimous decision. They have now defined the frontier which will henceforth divide our colony and the Republic of Venezuela. The result was a great triumph for Professor Martens, who never ventured to hope that he would be able to secure unanimity. The fact that the representatives of three nations were unable to find any cause for difference in deciding a question which only four years ago threatened to fill the world with war, is a striking illustration of the absurdity of settling differences of opinion by arms instead of by arbitrators. If we had not turned a deaf ear to the piteous and repeated appeals of President Kruger, to refer our differences with him to a similar impartial tribunal, we should have escaped with ease and with honour from the bloody turmoil into which we have plunged South Africa.

The Significance of the Decision. The details of the Venezuelan Award are of trivial importance compared with the central fact of the unanimity of the tribunal. But an examination of the new frontier shows that in that part of the world, at least, we have not been guilty of endeavouring to remove our neighbour's landmark. The award is indeed a great vindication for the moderation and justice of our claims. We would have settled with Venezuela any time for the last fifty years on a much less favourable frontier to ourselves than that which has been awarded us as just by the unanimous verdict of an international tribunal. A narrow slip of swamp, known as Barima Point, has been transferred to Venezuela, and, in the interior, one British post of no importance will have to be evacuated. But all the gold-fields in the debatable land are declared to be ours by good title, and the much-abused Schomburgk line is now declared to be

MAP ILLUSTRATING THE VENEZUELAN AWARD.

wan

ouse tion.

Mr.

As sion forehas

outh

left very this ight ong and the

his

to not for substantially the true frontier between the two countries. We have lost nothing that would not have been dear at a five-pound note, and we have gained substantially everything that we ever contended was our Whatever may be said against other arbitrations, no one can deny that this arbitration has been speedy, definite and satisfactory.

Another Arbitration

This is not the only arbitration which has been decided last month. The other, however, was a comparatively trivial matter, relating to a money claim. In 1892 the Government of the Department of Antioquia in the Republic of Colombia, backed by the national government of Colombia, Swiss Government as arbitrator. After three years' deliberation, the Swiss Government has issued an award dismissing the claims against the English firm, and awarding them £40,000 compensation for breach of contract and loss. This is very satisfactory so far as it goes, but as the Republic of Colombia is at present in its normal state of revolution, there is some doubt as to when the money will be paid.

The Alaskan Boundary.

Lord Pauncefote took his seat for the first time in the House of Lords last month, and leaves this country today by the steamer Oceanic to take ther

and

Kle

follo

whi with

con

this

of t

Yuk

disp

nee

coll hav Cor

app wha gov mad the

and Pro

rece poi ac

Ger

ma we Cor Un

pro of

the

En

Ger

of

to wh

bui

stat

mo

up his duties at Washington. There he hopes to be able to bring all outstanding questions between SAMOAN :SLANDS.

entered into a contract with the English firm Punchard, McTaggart, Lowther and Co., to build one hundred and thirty miles of railway under the name of the Medellene Magdalena railway. The work of building the railway was begun, but a new department of the Government came into power which cancelled the contract, and confiscated the securities deposited with trustees under the contract. The National Government of Colombia refused to interfere, The contractors being denied all justice, finding themselves robbed both of contract, plant, surveys, works, securities, and property, appealed to the British Government for redress. The Colombian Government then brought counter-claims against the British firm, amounting to £,33,000. After long negotiations, the matter was referred in 1896 to the

this country and the United States to a satisfactory close before he retires on his laurels. His locum tenens succeeded last month in drawing a provisional boundary between Canadian and American territory on the borders of Alaska. There was so much friction between the Canadians and Americans, owing to the dispute as to the frontier which crosses the road to Klondyke, that it was imperatively necessary to arrive at some modus vivendi, even although it might be anything but satisfactory to either party. The Canadian Government has acquiesced in the arrangement made at Washington on the strict understanding that it will not prejudice their claims when the matter comes up for final settlement. The provisional line that is adopted without prejudice runs along the summit of the White and the Chilkoot passes, and thence to a point on the Chilkoot route about a mile and a half above the village of Klukwan where the Klehini River runs into Porcupine Creek. It thence follows the south bank of the Klehini, the bed of which remains in Canadian occupation, to a point within ten marine leagues of the Pacific. Klukwan continues to be under American jurisdiction. As this arrangement secures to the Americans the head of the Lynn Canal, including the ports of entry to the Yukon district in that region, it is of course very displeasing to the Canadians. Lord Pauncefote will need all his diplomatic skill to define the principles on which the question must be referred to arbitration.

XUM

The Samoan

ears'

an irm.

each far

at ome

the last

to-ake

to

een

It is somewhat unfortunate that at a moment when we are involved in a dispute in South Africa, which may at any moment bring us into sharp collision with Germany, the Samoan question should have come up for settlement. Last spring three Commissioners, English, American and German, were appointed to proceed to Samoa and report as to what arrangements should be made for the future government of that group of islands. They have now made their report, and are unanimous in condemning the existing system by which Germany, Great Britain and the United States have a joint control and Protectorate over the islands. The Commissioners recommend that one administrator should be appointed, chosen from some disinterested Power, with a council of delegates from England, America and Various other recommendations were made, which would not be difficult to carry out if we agree to appoint a single administrator with one Court and one law over the whole of the islands.

The Americans are

Unfortunately, there seems little prospect of an agreement in favour of this unifying administration, and the discussion has at once brought up the latent jealousy between the English-speaking Powers and the Germans

Swopping for Samoa.

establishing them-Gilbert Islands selves strongly at the coaling station of Pago-Pago. The Germans wish to retain the island of Upolu, in which Robert Louis Stevenson is buried. England, who has no naval station at all in the islands, does more trade with Samoa than the Americans and Germans put together, the figures in 1897 being :-

British £40,000 German ... United States 17,000

The English and Americans would probably be able to work together if the Samoan islanders were placed under an Anglo-American Protectorate; but in that case Germany would be left out in the cold. The Germans maintain that the Island of Upolu is of great importance to Germany, and cannot be given up without a quid pro quo somewhere else. The negotiations are still going on, and Germany will probably squeeze all the harder bargain because we are fast by the leg in South Africa. The suggestion that England should abandon her position in Samoa would be equally distasteful to the United States and to the Australian Colonies. It is difficult at present to see exactly what compensation could be awarded to Germany in any other part of the world; but an unconfirmed story is current that we have offered them the Gilbert Islands and one-half of the Solomon Islands in exchange for Samoa,

If Samoa threatens us with a differ-The Vanishing ence of opinion from Germany, Egypt is the standing source of difficulty with France. For the present France is making no sign, but if we met with serious reverses in South Africa we should not have long to wait before inconvenient questions were raised in the valley of the Nile. being so, it is satisfactory to hear that for the moment we are delivered from the prospect of another campaign in the Soudan. Lord

MAP SHOWING SITUATION IN THE BAHR-EL-GHAZAL.

0

Kitchener, at the head of an infantry division of two brigades, four squadrons of cavalry, six companies of the camel corps and two pieces of artillery and eight Maxims, started from Omdurman to disperse the Khalifa, who was said to have mustered 10,000 men in Kordofan. Lord Kitchener started on October 17th for the purpose of smashing his old enemy. But the Khalifa had learned prudence by experience, and instead of waiting to be smashed he has retired to Jebel Gedir, a mountainous region a hundred miles north-west of Fashoda, and Lord Kitchener has returned to Omdurman. The Khalifa is, therefore, still at large, a source of trouble in the future no doubt, but for the present he no longer menaces the safety of our outposts in the Soudan.

Meanwhile, the King of the Bel-Belgium gians, of all people in the world, is the Bahr-el-Ghazal, raising difficulties for us in Africa. In 1894, Great Britain gave the Congo State the lease of the Bahr-el-Ghazal, stating that we are satisfied that under the agreement this portion of the British sphere will be administered in full accordance with the requirements of civilisation and the acts of Berlin and of Brussels. No sooner, however, has the Bahr-el-Ghazal been leased to Belgium, on the understanding that it was to remain within the British sphere of influence, than the Congo authorities afforded Major Marchand every facility for invading that territory. A Belgian company, with a capital of £1,200,000, has sent out an expedition with a view of occupying the Bahr-el-Ghazal, in order to annex that province to the Congo State. The Belgians assert that the whole of the Bahr-el-Ghazal belongs to them, and when this is disputed they reply that no opposition will be made by England, who already has her hands quite full elsewhere. When Mr. Rhodes saw the King of the Belgians this spring in Brussels, he found him quite obdurate on the subject of the Bahr-el-Ghazal, and I believe it was upon this point

The Emperor of Russia, after spend-The Tsar ing a pleasant month with his wife and family in the seclusion of Hesse Germany. Darmstadt, is now preparing to return that the negotiations to take the Cape to Cairo telegraph line through the territory of the Congo

State broke down. Whatever the merits of this question may be, we shall have many another reminder in the course of the next few months that

"our hands are full elsewhere."

to Russia. His proposed visit to England was unfortunately abandoned owing to the fact that he could not be received by the Queen until November, and this would have involved too long an absence from the Empire over which he rules. On his way back to Petersburg he will call at Berlin, and there will be once more a conjunction of the two great potentates, the Kaiser and the Tsar. Such conjunctions have often boded ill for the peace of nations, but the influence of the Tsar has always been exercised in the interests of peace. A great number of ridiculous stories have been printed in the papers about the Emperor Nicholas II., but they are without foundation. The Tsar is in good health and good spirits, and returns refreshed after his holiday to take up the reins of government in Russia.

Spain.

Considerable interest has been ex-Count Muravieff cited in the past month by the movements of Count Muravieff, who has been making a holiday tour to Spain and Paris. The story was put about that he went to Spain for the purpose of promoting an arrangement by which Spain would allow France to rectify her frontier on the side of Morocco, and his visit to Paris has also had various high political and financial motives assigned in explanation. The most startling story is that Russia has obtained the cession of Ceuta from Spain! All this is gossip. There is at present no sign of any combination among Continental Powers, either against us or against each other. At the same time, no one knows what an hour may bring forth, and Count Muravieff is only acting with ordinary foresight in endeavouring to keep himself in close touch with the men who rule the destinies of the French Republic.

The Language Ordinance in

In Austria the internecine strife which rages between the Czechs and the Germans has broken out afresh, owing to the repeal of the language ordinance, by which the Emperor placed the Czech language on a footing of equality with German in the Czech provinces. The repeal of the ordinance was naturally resented with much bitterness by the Czechs, who regard it, not unnaturally, as a set-back to the realisation of their cherished ideal. The ordinance now repealed has been in force since 1897. As the immediate result of the new law there have been riots in Moravia, in which it required volleys not of blank cartridges to disperse the rioters. The Czech recruits on being called out for service in the army were ordered to answer "Hier" in German, and as they persisted in answering in Czech, the authorities find themselves

Th dis Sw 5.0 Th

T

in

ho

tr

no

SE

th tre

reli littl the No No the avo

involved in great difficulties. For the moment, however, the Germans are in the ascendant; the troops appear to be well in hand, and the Czechs are not likely to make any more disturbances than the sporadic riots which will do nothing but advertise their discontent.

The Norwegian Struggle Independence.

could

r, and from back

rill be ntates,

have

at the

sed in culous

t the

ation. , and p the n exy the

, who our to at he g an ce to d his al and most ession ere is Coneach at an only ig to rule strife zechs out f the laced

uality epeal

much

t un-

their

l has result ia, in es to being

ed to ed in elves

The difficulty of keeping rival races united in political union, which threatens to break up Austria, is experienced to a less extent in the troubles which exist between Sweden and Norway.

to establish Norwegian independence. It is a difficult problem how far it is possible to preserve the constitutional unity represented by the Monarchy with such demands for Norwegian independence. More hopeful is the second article in the Norwegian Radical programme-namely, the establishment of a Court of Arbitration and neutrality.

The Orleanist Revolutionists.

France, which for a few months monopolised the attention of the Continent with the Dreyfus case, has been singularly tranquil. Of

CAPTAIN VOULET.

CAPTAIN CHANOINE.

The leaders of a French Expeditionary Force in West Africa, who severed their connection with the Government, intending to set up a kingdom of their own. After shooting Colonel Klobb, who had been sent to take over the command of the Force, they were murdered by their native troops.

The Norwegians have now secured the adoption of a distinct Norwegian flag, despite the opposition of Sweden and the reluctance of the king. There are 5,000,000 Swedes and only 2,000,000 Norwegians. They belong to the same race, and are of the same religion. Their political institutions differ only a little more than those of Scotland and England, but the Norwegians are now agitating for a separate Norwegian Ministry for Foreign Affairs, and a separate Norwegian Consular system. Upon this programme the Norwegian Radicals are going to the country, avowing that they wish for those changes in order

Dreyfus nothing more is heard, and the examination of the monarchical conspirators, twelve of whom have been committed to take their trial before the Senate on November 8th or 10th, has excited nothing but ridicule. The Orleanist revolutionary movement seems to have been financed by three ladies, all foreigners—one a Scandinavian, another a Tewess and a third the quondam mistress of a Jew. The plot is so insignificant that people hardly waste time in laughing at it. Meantime President Loubet and his Ministers seem to be able to hold their own against all their enemies. At the beginning of last month, M. Millerand delivered a political speech at Limoges, in which he fore-shadowed the possibility of a renewed campaign against the religious orders. After denouncing a plebiscitary republic, the masked Empire and the avowed monarchy, M. Millerand declared that there was behind all these anti-republican conspiracies the everlasting enemy of the nation—clericalism. Religious orders are founding leagues which, under cover of Ave Maria, undertake the organisation of electoral campaigns. The Government, he said, would propose to render amenable to the law the unrelenting partisans who conceal under the mask of religion their political enterprises against republican institutions.

While the French Republican The Pope Government was sharpening its sword and English Catholies, to wage war against "the everlasting enemy clericalism," the Pope was re eiving a third deputation of English pilgrims, who had thronged to perform a solemn and public act of faith at the feet of the Pope. Leo naturally rejoiced at receiving a third Pilgrimage from the land which his Holiness described as formerly "the Island of Saints." He rejoiced to see in them "a noble example of sincere love for the Apostolic See, with that docility full and entire, without pre-conceived ideas and without criticism, which is due to him who is the Supreme Chief with the Divine Mandate of governing the Church." The "docility full and entire without pre-conceived ideas and without criticism" is a commodity not often exported from this isle, not even in the days when it was the Island of Saints. The Pope did not refer at all to the Ritualist crisis, and therein he was well advised. The strength of the Pope in relation to the Romanisers of the Establishment is-to vary Mr. Rhodes's watchword at Kimberley-to "sit tight" and say nothing. The silent force of gravitation is not increased by much speaking.

The Church Congress in London last month owed its chief significance to the absolute silence of the representatives of the national ecclesiastical apparatus for inculcating morality upon the great moral issue of the war in Africa. While the streets of London were thronged with black-coated ministers of the Prince of Peace, other streets and stations were crowded with soldiers in uniform with cries of vengeance on their lips. But the black coats had nothing to say to the red coats about their war of vengeance. They discussed other things, and waxed wildly enthusiastic or indignant, as the case might be, about such momentous matters as incense and candles. But the weightier matters of the law, justice, righteousness and peace did not seem to concern them. Meanwhile it is interesting to note that the Archbishop of York laid down the law that the Ritualists who chose to disobey their bishops on these matters of ritual are in an attitude of nonconformity pure and simple. That is a blow indeed. The ordinary Anglican clergyman, especially of the higher persuasion, would a thousand times rather be described as a Romanist, possibly even as an atheist, than as a Nonconformist. In the words of the Archbishop, however, Nonconformists they will be, if they cling to their beloved candles.

Wherein the Clergy have Failed. I am making no complaint of the Church clergy for not pronouncing upon the justice or injustice of the war. The charge against them is far more serious. It is that although they see all around them their flocks giving way to the passions of pride, vengeance, and other deadly sins in connection with the war, they permit this to pass without reproof or almost notice. Mr. Swinburne is not exactly a child of the Church; but his sonnet on the war, which was printed in the Times, echoed only too faithfully an unethical sentiment, the wide diffusion of which does a more grievous wrong to the Church of Christ than any number of Ritualistic eccentricities. The populace which can tolerate such an outburst as this on the eve of a war with a sister nation is not merely not Christian; it has fallen far below the moral standpoint of pagan chivalry:—

OCTOBER 11th, 1899.

Patience, long sick to death, is dead too long.
Have sloth and doubt and treason bidden us be What Cromwell's England was not, when the sea
To him bore witness given of Blake how strong
She stood, a commonweal that brooked no wrong

From foes less vile than men like wolves set free Whose war is waged where none may fight or flee—With women and with weanlings. Speech and song Lack utterance now for loathing. Scarce we hear Foul tongues that blackened God's dishonoured name

With prayers turned curses and with praise found shame

Defy the truth, whose witness now draws near
To scourge these dogs, agape with jaws afoam, Down out of life. Strike, England, and strike home.
ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE.

[This poem is not copyright.]

I am glad to know that this detestable outbreak from the Thersites of our bards has nowhere been more reprobated than by the officers of the Expeditionary Corps. In that respect the red coats have been better than the black.

6

Afr

felle

fam

Thi

inci

gre

Qu

bee

the pa

at

th

re

O

wl

sa

as sa

co

th

th

Give us back Ten Millions!

and stice,

ncern

t the

t the

these nonleed.

y of imes

even

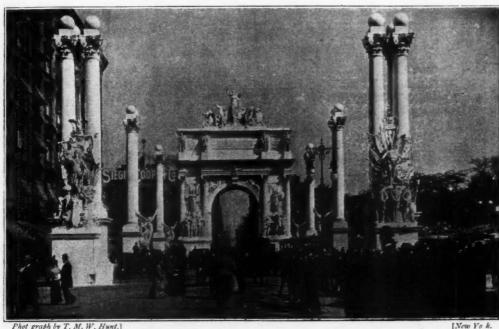

the nists oved the cing the n is all ions conpass ie is on only sion rch ies. as not the

Just at the time when Parliament has voted, by overwhelming majorities, to spend £,10,000,000 in carrying fire and sword through South Africa, the news comes that 15,000,000 of our fellow subjects in India are likely to perish by famine unless relief works are promptly provided. This is only one of the many instances, which increase and multiply as the months pass, of the great and clamant needs of the subjects of the Queen, within her own dominions, which have been neglected or inadequately provided for owing to the wasted millions. £,10,000,000 for slaughterhow much for the housing of the poor or for the famine-stricken millions of India? It is a good cry and effective.

Another cry meanwhile will be that we are squandering our wealth National Danger. broadcast in unnecessary war, while the more thoughtful of us are becoming more and more keenly alive to the fact that unless energetic measures are taken to provide technical education for our people, we shall be unable to face foreign competition. Captain Noble, in the

Phot graph by T. M. W. Hunt.]

THE DEWEY TRIUMPHAL ARCH IN NEW YORK, -TWENTY-FOURTH STREET AND FIFTH AVENUE.

the waste of millions over the absurd struggle for paramountcy in South Africa. At the by-election at Bow and Bromley, which took place in the month of October, the Tory candidate was returned by twice the majority of his predecessor. One thousand Liberals stayed away from the poll, while the Tory vote remained pretty much the When object-lessons increase and multiply as to the needs of the people, which cannot be satisfied owing to the waste of the £,10,000,000, we confidently expect to find the majority in Bow on the other side. For appealing to the democracy there is nothing like a simple cry such as this of course of a suggestive address last month, warned us that the Germans were beating us in many industrial departments. Their work was not merely cheaper, but of better quality than our own. Half a century ago Britain led the world in the excellence and cheapness of her manufactures. Now we are being distanced by Germany, while the still more formidable competition of the United States looms menacing every day on the horizon. Germany, which has just been celebrating the centennial of the foundation of technical education, has no intention of standing still. The Emperor has placed the technical high schools of Prussia on an equality with the universities, and

ne

ind

ak

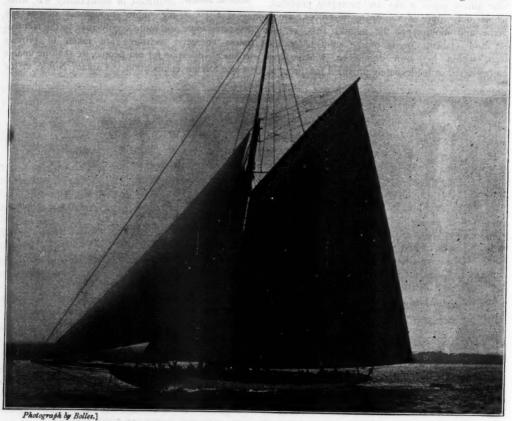

en

he

ats

authorised the technical university to confer the degree of Doctor-Engineer. It is these schools which, as the Kozlnische Zeitung says, have succeeded in raising German industry in almost all branches to the level of that of England, and in some cases, especially in regard to chemistry and electricity, in overtaking it.

their various idiosyncrasies. Hence he maintained that we must not forget to dwell on the Imperial factor, which places before every generation a noble and lofty ideal of citizenship. An uneducated democracy, a democracy without the sense of public perspective, constitutes a public danger. And the greater such

THE SUCCESSFUL CUP DEFENDER, "COLUMBIA."

Imperialism and Education. Last month Lord Reay delivered his address as Chairman of the London School Board. There are two passages which bring to mind the Imperialism is making itself felt in extent to which Imperialism is making itself felt in every department of national life. Lord Reay pointed out that we were more and more being brought into contact with alien races, and were under the temptation to assume our own superiority and assert it in an unmistakable manner. The great danger to all empires which are composed of a variety of races arises from a misunderstanding of an empire grows, the greater care is required that the virtues which are threatened by prosperity do not disappear. These virtues are needed for the retention, as much as for the acquisition, of empire. Moral progress is more essential to a nation than material progress. Moral courage is as indispensable as physical courage. Men and women strengthening the moral credit of a nation are even more entitled to be called empire-builders than those who open new markets. These are words in season indeed, excellently said; but alas! it is not the uneducated who need most that sage and sober warning as to the Emp

Ran

puni attra in C mon of th horr of ju direc perh but ! all i was with no l Maj the

Indihad new as to poli greamer wag

Indi

time thei the half Thi hav

redi

wor the the perils which have ever proved the ruin of Empires.

I am glad to see that the scandalous outrage upon a woman in The Rangoon Outrage. Rangoon by a number of British soldiers, who were screened from punishment by their comrades and their officers, has attracted the attention of Lord Curzon. An Order in Council from the Governor-General was issued last month, in which Lord Curzon, with the concurrence of the Commander-in-Chief, expresses his profound horror and repugnance at the abominable miscarriage of justice which took place at Rangoon. The soldiers directly concerned are dismissed the service, which is perhaps all that Lord Curzon found could be done, but if they had their deserts they would be one and all in a convict prison. The officers whose apathy was the prime cause of the offence are to be dealt with in due course. If they were declared to be no longer worthy of holding commissions in Her Majesty's army, it would raise the estimate in which the honour of women is held by the army both in India and in England. In this Lord Curzon has deserved well of the Empire.

An interesting Conference was held Co-partnership last month at Newcastle under the in Industry. auspices of Lord Grey for the purpose of promoting co-partnership in Industry. Mr. Livesey, if not the chief speaker, at least had the greatest space allotted to his speech in the newspaper reports. He gave a very interesting account as to the working of the system in the South Metropolitan Gas Works. Ten years ago, at the time of the great strike, Mr. Livesey proposed to give his workmen a bonus amounting to one per cent, on their wages for every penny that the price of gas was reduced per thousand below the standard price of 2s. 8d. per thousand feet. After trying this for some time, he found that half of his men drew their bonus, and spent it, so he proposed to increase the bonus to 11 per cent. on condition that at least half of it was invested in the stock of the Company. This had excellent results. At present the workmen have about £50,000 invested in the Company; half of the workmen shareholders average holdings of about £70, and the other half average £10. These workmen shareholders have two directors, who sit on the board and perform directorial duties without ceasing to be workmen on the gas works. Altogether Mr. Livesey's paper was very reassuring, and I am glad to see that the representatives of the Trades Unions who were present at the Conference seemed heartily to agree with the principle of co-partnership.

The Death Grant Allen.

The death of Mr. Grant Allen last month, after a long and painful illness, has removed one of the most genial, industrious, and many-sided of our latter-day English men of letters. Mr. Grant Allen was an old friend of mine, as he was indeed an old friend of almost everybody who had anything to do with journalism in the last twenty years in London. I never knew a man who had a readier pen or who could turn out at shorter notice quantities of good copy. first made his acquaintance when he was a reviewer and occasional contributor to the Pall Mall Gazette, and the acquaintance which then began continued down to the end. Upon most political questions Mr. Grant Allen's views were very advanced. He was a Socialist, although not of a very pronounced type; but on questions relating to the sexes his views were, to say the least, peculiar. In "The Woman Who Did," which was to be the first of a series of Hill-Top Novels, he scandalised a good many people; but that novel was milk and water compared with his esoteric doctrine. Personally, he was a gentle and lovable man, who was consumed by a great passion of sympathy for suffering, and especially for suffering women. His death creates a gap that will be felt in the literary and journalistic circles of London.

THE LATE GRANT ALLEN. (Photograph by the Stereoscopic Co., Limited.)

01010101010101010

tained

actor.

e and cracy,

ctive.

such

DIARY FOR OCTOBER.

EVENTS OF THE MONTH.

Oct. 1. The Spanish Ministerial Crisis ends:
General Pologicia's resignation is accepted by the Queen Regent, and General Azcarraga becomes Minister of War.
General Galliffet restores, by a decree signed by the President of the Republic, the power of the Minister of War to appoint officers of the Minister of War to appoint officers of the to nominate officers to be promoted in the Legin of Honour. to nominate officers to be promoted in the Legion of Honour.

The Railwaymen's Congress opens at Liverpool, A contingent of 800 men leave Pretoria for the Natal border.

Natal border. The Venezuela Arbitration Tribunal in Paris rises. Admiral Dewey leaves New York for Wash-

The state of siege at Belgrade is raised by Royal Ukase.

The Venezuela Arbitration Tribunal meets at the Quai d'Orsay, Paris, and delivers its award, which is unanimous, as to the boundary line British Guiana line between Venezuela

Captain Miles, Tasmanian Minister of Lands,

resigns his portfolio.

resigns his portfolio.

Admiral Dewey is presented at Washington with a sword awarded by Congress.

A trial begins at Berlin of three young men of the highest rank in the German aristocracy on the charge of making gambling their means of livelihood.

The eightieth birthday of Signor Crispi is celebrated in Rome and Palermo and other towns of Italy.

towns of Italy.

The mail train from the Transvaal for the Cape is stopped at Vereening, and the week's payment of gold, about half a million sterling, is returned to Pretoria.

The Colonial Treasurer of Queensland makes his financial statement for the year.

King Alexander opens the Skupshtina of Servia.

Servia.
The Congress of Orientalists opens at Rome.
In the Cape House of Assembly the Parliamentary Registration Bill passes.

M. Schneider agrees that the Government shall act as arbitrator in his dispute with his workmen at Le Creuzot, France.
The foundation stone of the St. Deniol's Library is laid at Hawarden.
Count Muraviff visits the Queen Regent of Spain at San Sebastian.
About once the Regent of Spain at San Sebastian.

6. About 200,000 persons are in receipt of famine relief in India. In the Tasmanian House of Assembly a motion of want of confidence in the Ministry is carried by one vote.

7. Two Royal Proclamations issued regarding the Arm J Reserve.

The Queen holds a Privy Council at Balmoral and summons Parliament to meet on the 17th inst. The foundation stone of the Parnell Monument is laid in Dublin.

M. Waldeck-Rousseau gives his award on the Creuzot strike; work to be resumed on the 9th inst.

The Queen of Holland visits the Emperor and Empress of Germany at Potsdam. Baron von Zedlitz, President of the Prussian

State Bank, resigns his position.
The tenth Congress of the German Social Democratic Party opens at Hanover.
The Saulanges Canal is formally opened; it connects the navigation of the St. Lawrence with Loke Savarior with Lake Superior.

In the Lower House of the Hungarian Diet the Minister of Finance presents the estimates for 1900. President Kruger celebrates his seventy-fifth birthday, n Ultimatum from the South African Republic reaches the Colonial Office. the Church Congress is opened in London by Dr. Creighton.

The Leicester Board of Guardians refuse to appoint a Vaccination (fficer.

Mr. Chamberlain, in the name of the British Government, telegraphs to Pretoria that it is impossible to discuss the Boer Ultimatum.

II. The time limit allowed by President Kruger for the removal of British troops from the Transvaal border expires.

M. Colony of the British troops from the control of the British troops from the president of the British troops from the British tro

1 ransvan order expires.

2. Mr. Schreiner, Premier of Cape Colony, appeals to the inhabitants of the Colony to save the Colony from being invol ed in war.

The Church Congress in London closes.
The German Socialist Congress holds its last stifting.

satting.
Anti-Taxation Riots occur in Barcelona.
A Railway Collision occurs near Cape Town.
Eight persons are killed and several injured.
The Lord Mayor calls a meeting at the Guildhall in support of the Govern

South Africa. The first race between the Shamrock and the Columbia for the America Cup is brought to a conclusion, the Columbia winning.

The Congress of Orientalists at Rome conclude

Photograph by [Harrod's, Lta.

MR. ALFRED J. NEWTON. The New Lord Mayor.

77. The repeal of the famous language-ordinances is officially gazetted in Vienna.
The second race between the Shamrock and the Columbia for the America Cup takes place; the Shamroch's topmast breaking, she has to retire

News arrives in Paris that Lieutenant Meynier is still alive, having recovered from

The Reichsrath reassembles in Vienna.
M. Jules Guérin, the defender of "Fort Chabrol," is brought before the Senatorial Commission.

A luncheon is given by M. Paul Deschanel in Paris in honour of Count Muravieff.

Arton, of "Panama" fame, is released from prison.

A Memorial Service for Colonel Klobb, killed in Africa is held in Paris

A Memorial Service for Colonel Klobb, killed in Africa, is held in Paris.

19. Great debate takes place on the Transvaal negotiations in the House of Commons. Mr. George Lansbury withdraws his candida-ture for the representation of Bow and Bromley in Parliament.

The final race takes place between the Sham-rock and the Columbia. The latter wins, and thus retains the cup.

21. The Ontario Cabinet is reconstructed. The three German aristocrats charged with the three Cerman anstocrats charged with cheating at cards are acquitted.

The Belgan officer accused of the murder and cruel treatment of natives of the Congo Free State is sentenced at Roma to ten years penal servitude.

The Pope receives 150 English and Irish militarium.

pilgrims.

24. Disorderly scenes take place in the Reichsrath in Vienna, in which the Czechs are the chief The last session of the present New Zealand

Parliament closes

Parliament closes.

5. Lord Kitchener orders the troops to return to Omdurman in consequence of the Khalifa's retirement from Jebel Gedir.

General de Galliffet decides to place on the Retired List such generals as are incapable of active service. They may be promoted to the Larging of Honour.

the Legion of Honour.

26. Dr. Graham discovers the malarial mosquito in the neighbourhood of Kingston, Jamaica.

The London and North-Western Railway

Company decide to try the form of coupling invented by Mr. E. J. Hill.

27. Sir H. S. Northcote, M.P., is appointed Governor of Bombay in succession to Lord

Governor of Bombay in succession to Lord Sandhurst.

The Royal Niger Company, at a general meeting of the company, receives an intimation from Lord Salisbury that its charter will terminate on 1st January, 1900.

Lord Rosebery is presented with the freedom of the City of Bath.

28. The Foreign Office issues a Blue-book on the Peace Conference at the Hague.

Lord Curzon meets with a cordial reception at Dalhi.

Delhi.
2). The Viceroy issues a scathing criticism of education in India.
30. The prosecution of Socialist Deputies for upsetting the voting urns in the Italian Parliament collapses, owing to the law regarding the summoning of the Italian Parliament.
31. The French Colonial Office receive news of the death of Administrator Bretonnet and two other officers in an affray with a company of other officers in an affray with a company of Senegalese in East Africa.

By-Election.

Conservative majority 2,115

The War in South Africa. Oct. 11. A state of war begins between Great Britain and the South African Republics.

Britain and the South African Republics.
The United States Consul undertakes the care of British in erests in Pretoria.
President Steyn issues a manifesto to the Burghers of the Orange Free State.
12. At Pretoria an official appeal is issued to the Afrikanders of South Africa to resist unjust British demands.
Mr. Scheelers in the Care Parliament appeals

Mr. Schreiner in the Cape Parliament appeals to the Colony, the Press and the Nation to use their efforts for the preservation of peace.

use their efforts for the preservation of peace. The Boers invade Natal.

Martial law is proclaimed in Natal.

An armoured train is captured by the Boers forty miles south of Mafeking.

Mr. Conyngham Greene leaves Pretoria.

Telegraphic communication interrupted with Rhodesia.

Sir Redvers Buller leaves London for the Cape.

Sir Redvers Buller leaves London for the Cape. Newcastle, in Natal, is occupied by the Boers.
 Mr. Conyngham Greene reaches Cape Town. Railway and telegraph cut at Norvalspont on the Bloemfontein line to Cape Colony; railway and wires interrupted south of Kimberley.
 The cruiser Thetia sails from Malta for Delagoa.

Bay.

:8. The Fr Lady Brush v

succe Rattle a Boers by t Gene The tre small A fore the ment Colonel at RI larg Gene conc Genera with Si- Ge siden a por > posts kille Mafek Lad A body Gen. of C Gener. a ve

Succes

Thi ty p. ise Al proc Stey is n The G Mili Genera

Boa mil disc nert on I Boers and Mou

men

Oct. 17. T Qu.

Lor Sell Messa of t First Lor his

The A Bill Carr the Cha the rogi

Specia Gov

28. The Free Staters eng ge British cavalry near Ladysmith.
Brush with Boe p trol near Glencoe.

Colonel Hore eng ges the Boers at Mafeking colone Hore engiges the Boers at Markking successfully.

 Battle at Talana, near Glencoe. Nine thousand Boers engaged. Their position is stormad by the Bri ish and four guns captured. General Symons is mortally wounded.
 21. The troops under Sir George White defeat a smiller body of burghers at Elandshagte. A force under Major-General French captures the Boers' position with guns, camp equipment, horses and waggons.

the Boers' position with guns, camp equip-ment, horses and waggors. Colonel Plumer's outposts encounter the enemy at Rhodes' Drift, near Tuli. A large column of the Boers move north. General Yule falls back from Dundee and conc.ntrates on Glence Junction. General White at Ladysmith is reinforced from

White at Ladysmith is removed from Pieterman'zburg.
23. General Yul: abandons Glencoe to join hands with Sir George White.
24. Sir George White repulses a Free State force between Ladysmith and Newcastle. President Steyn issues a proclamation annexing a portion of Cape Colony north of the Vaul Riet.

Successful sortie from Kimberley. Boar outposts driven back and Commandant Botha killed.

Mafeking bombarded.

with

Free years'

Irish

ch ef

aland

rn to difa's

the pable ed to quito

lway oling nted

Lord

nera!

dom

th. n at ı of ling

y 01

An

eat

are

he

he als to ers th S.

on

The British fo ces in Natal concentrate at Ladysmith. A body of the 18th Hussars captured.

The death of General Symons is notified by General Joubert and announced in the House of Commons.

General Yule's Column enters Ladysmith after a very hard march.

hi ty men of the missing 18th Hussars arrive at Ladysmith, the rest arrive at Pretoria as

p. isoners.

37. Sir Alfred Milner and Mr. Schreiner issue a proclamation to the effect that President Steyn's annexation of Bechuan land territory

Steyn's annexation of Beenman man vertices, is null and void.

The German corps is reorganised in the Transvaal. The proclamation calling out the Militia is published.

General White has a slight brush with the Boers at Lombards Kop.

A military balloon sent up from Ladysmith discovers Boers to be in force north and nerth-west of Ladysmith Boer guns mounted on Intint nyone.

on Intint myons.

Boers shell Ladysmith, British loss in killed and wounded is calculated to be between 80 and wonneed is calculated to be eleween so and roo. British forces advance: the 10th Mounted Battery, the 1st Gloucester Regi-ment and the 1st Battalion of the Irish Fusiliers are surrounded among the hills and obliged to surrender to the Boars after losing eavily. British force retires to can rements.

PARLIAMENTARY. House of Lords.

Oct. 17. The sixth Session of the 14th Parliament of the reign is opened by Commission, the Queen's Speech relating entirely to the c. 18is in South Africa. The Address; speeches by Lord Kimberley, Lord Salisbury, and Lord Salbarge.

Selborne. *

The Message from the Queen on the embodiment of the Militia.

Selborne. *

The Message from the Queen on the embodiment of the Militia.

First reading Second Session (Explana ion) Bill.

Lord Pannesfote formerly Sir Julian) takes his seat on his elevation to the Perrage.

The Assessivitian Bill the Second Session

his seat on his elevation to the Perrage.

7. The Appropriation Bill, the Second Session (Explanation) Bill, and the Treasury Bills Bill are brought up from the Commons, and carried through all their stages and passed. The Royal assent is given by Commission to the three Acts a "ove named. The Lord Chancellor reads the Queen's Speech closing the Session, which is accordingly duly proragued until Monday, January 15 h, 1300.

House of Commons.

Special Session of Parli ment opens. The Government asks for a Supplementary Vote of £το,οος,οοο sterling. Address: speeches by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, Mr. Balfour,

Mr. Labouchere and Mr. Dillon. Dillon's Amendment negatived by 322 votes

Mr. Labouenete and an incompanion of the policy of the pol

[Russell and Sons. Photograph by THE LATE LORD FARRER.

23. The Cost of the War. Statement by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Plan of Supply; Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman con-curs; Mr. Dillon condemns the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. On a division, the Resolution of the Government is:

the Chancellor of the Exchequer. On a division, the Resolution of the Government is carried by 336 totes to 28. The vote for thirty-five thousand additional troops is passed in Committee of Supply.

24. The war in South Africa: quest ons answered by Mr. Wyndham, who states that the Army Medical Staff will be supplemented by 56 civilian sr geons and 11 nurses, and that Sir W. Mz. Cormack will place himself at the disposal of the military authorities. Ways and Means; Report Appropriation Bill: Discussion; specches by Sir W. Harcourt, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Courtney, and Mr. Davitt. Second reading carried on division by 224 votes to 28. Mr. Davitt announces his intention to apply for the Chiltern Hundreds as a protest against the war. The Financial arrangements; speeches by Sir W. Harcourt and the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

26. The Appropriation Bill and Treasury Bills 211 pass through Committee.

27. Third reading Appropriation Bill, Treasury Bills Bill passed: Procogation.

SPEECHES.

- Oct. 1. M. Millerand, at Limoges, on Republican
- actence.

  The Bish p of Winchester, at Portsea, on the present teaching in the Church of England.

  Sir A. Noble, at Kensington, on Technical Education.
- Mr. Poultney Bigelow, at Berlin, on the administration of Colonies.

  6. Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, at Maidstone, on
- the Transval Crisis.

  Mr. John Morley, at Carna-von, on the Government and the Transval.

  M. Millerand, at Argenteuil, on the French - Republic.

  9. The Duke of Devonshire, at Sheffield, on the - situation in South Africa. Lord Tweedmouth, in London, on the Trans-
- Lord I weedmouth, in London, on the Trans-vaal crisis.

  Lord Halifax, in London, on the Oxford Movement and its effects on the English Church.

  10. President McKinley, at Chicago, on the United States love of liberty.

  Herr Bebel, at Hanover, on the aims of - Socialists. Socialists.
  Mr Stead, at Croydon, on the Results of the Peace Conference, with special reference to the Transvaal crisis.
  Mr. Asquith, at Dundee, on the Transvaal, Mr. Balfour, at Haddington, in defence of the Government's action in Africa.
  Government's action in Africa.
- 12. Mr. rd Tweedmouth, at Middlesbrough, on the - Transvaal. 16. Mr. Rider Haggard, in London, on South Africa.
- Africa.

  Mr. Fitzpatrick, in London, on the Transvaal.

  M. Millerand, at Lille, on what should be the practical and peaceful methods in France of working out Socialism.

  7. Professor Martens, at St. Petersburg, on the Peace Conference at the Hague.

  19. The German Emperor, at Hamburg, on his hopes for a great German navy.

  25. Sir Edward Grey, at Glasgow, on the Transvaal. The Archbishop of Canterbury, in London, on the medical profession.

  26. The Bishop of London, in London, on the true functions of the teacher.

- functions of the teacher.

  Lord Rossbery, at Bath, on Chatham and Pitt.

  Lord Spencer, at Cleator Moor, on the War.

  Mr. Chaplin, at Manchester, on the War.

OBITUARY.

- Oct. 1. Mr. R. Palmer Jenkins, 73. 3. M. Etienne Charavay, 51. M. Eugene Noel, 83.
- M. Eugene Noct, 53.
  Mr. John Don:Idson (engineer), 58.
  M. Paul Janet (Paris).
  M. Paul Lonnes, 57.
  M. Louis Moland, 75.
  Miss F. M. Sk.ne, 78.
  Colonel Sir Charles P. P. H. Nugent, K.C.E.,

- M. Cauler (Brussels).

- St. Cauer (Brusses).
  Colonel Grant.
  Rev. Dr. Trou's ck, 67.
  Lord Farrer, 80.
  The Right Rev. Dr. Hicks, Bishop, of Bloem-
- fortein, 5... Pr. Ricks, Dissopport Blockming fortein, 5... Mr. Hamilton Y. Castner (scientific chemist). Mr. W. E. Marford. Vice-Admiral P. H. Colome, 68. Canon Rev. E. Rhys Jones, 32. Mrs. W. E. Foster, 78. Dr. J. I. G. Wilkinson, 87. Shakir Pasha.

- Prince Schevket Eff.ndi (at Scutari).
- Prince Schevket Eff-ndi (at Scutari)
  Grant Allen, 51.
  Hon. Peter Mitchell (Montreal), 76.
  Florence Marryat (Mrs. F. Lean),
  Mgr. Flick (at Metz), 75.
  Mr. Jam.s L. Bowes, 65.
  Mr. Jam.s R. Bowes, 65.
  Mr. Othmar Mergenthaler
  Rev. Richard Alliott, 60.
- 30. Dr. Alridge (of Stoke). Sir Arthur Blomfield, A.R.A., 70.

Other Deaths Announced.

Mr. Charles Hunting: Rev. D. McCave; Mr. W. O. Foster; Mr. H. E. Hutton; Mr. Nutcombe Gould; Dr. Oscar Baumann.

Photograph by Elliott and Fry.]

THE RIGHT HON. CECIL JOHN RHODES, P.C.

rag frie

the how Pos bett son den tho

Afri any war Sou pred prec he t coul busi lette oppo him is ce into plain disp he h was whil but M insu ing into

If h able

Emp the the Unio mate cons

CHARACTER SKETCH.

CECIL RHODES OF AFRICA.

I T is my strange fate at this moment to occupy a position that is almost absolutely unique in its combination of incompatibilities. I am the uncompromising opponent of the War which is now raging in South Africa. At the same time I have been, and am still, one of the most loyal and devoted of all the friends of Mr. Rhodes. Most of my Rhodesian friends cannot understand why I should oppose the war, and the friends of peace are equally at a loss to understand how it is that, detesting the war as I do, I should persist in my regard and admiration for Cecil Rhodes. Possibly when they read this sketch both parties may be better able to understand my position, and it may help some of those who have been misled into ignorant denunciation of the personality of a man they know nothing about to understand some of the reasons why those who know him best believe in him most.

I.-MR. RHODES AND THE WAR.

Mr. Rhodes occupies no official position in South Africa. He is no soldier, neither is he intrusted with any official or diplomatic functions. But he is still, in war as in peace, the most conspicuous figure on the South African stage. During the long negotiations which preceded the war he maintained the strictest reserve, taking no part in the blundering mismanagement which precipitated war. He said in Africa, as in England, that he had made such a mess of Transvaal affairs when he tried to take a hand in them that the least he could do was to keep out of them, and let a new man see what could be done. Incredible as it would have appeared, the new man has made an even greater mess of the business than Mr. Rhodes. Nothing impressed me more as to the confidence inspired by Mr. Rhodes than a letter which I received from one of his strongest political opponents in this country, who wrote saying, "Your Milner has done you little credit, and has made a very bad mess of it. I am sure that Mr. Rhodes himself would have managed much better." One thing is certain-that Mr. Rhodes would never have blundered into war for lack of ability to make his meaning plain. There would have been no misunderstood dispatches if the negotiations had been in his hands. If he had meant acceptance, he would have said acceptance. If he had meant rejection, he would have said rejection in terms unmistakable to all men. But, unfortunately, the ablest man in South Africa was an outsider whose advice was not sought, much less taken, by Sir Alfred Milner, while the real negotiator was not in South Africa at all, but in Downing Street.

HIS MISCALCULATION.

Mr. Chamberlain, who appears to have spoiled the insurrection in Johannesburg in 1895 by endeavouring to turn a revolutionary movement for civic rights into a plan to add the Transvaal to the British Empire, has had this year free scope for carrying out the policy of aggression which was thwarted in 1895 by the refusal of the American reformers to tolerate the Union Jack. Mr. Rhodes probably never rightly estimated the extent to which Mr. Chamberlain's share in the conspiracy of 1895 rendered impossible the success of negotiations which depended upon the confidence of the negotiators in the honesty and good faith of the Colonial Secretary. Certainly Mr. Rhodes, down almost to the end of September last, maintained publicly and privately that there would be no war, and that President Kruger would certainly give in to the demands of Sir Alfred Milner for a five years' franchise. Mr. Rhodes was right, for President Kruger has given in to the five years' franchise. But what Mr. Rhodes did not realise was the fact that Mr. Chamberlain would turn a mere matter of form into an excuse for forcing on war, when, according to his own admission, nine-tenths of his demands had been conceded, while the remaining tenth was, by his own confession, not worth a war.

AT KIMBERLEY.

That incredible crime was, however, consummated, and Mr. Rhodes, finding that war was inevitable, suddenly found himself restless at Cape Town, and, yielding to an uncontrollable impulse, set out for Kimberley on the very eve of its investment by the forces of the Boers. There he is, and there he is likely to remain. He has equipped a force of 400 men at a cost of £15,000, and cheerfully awaits the development of events. Of the wisdom of placing himself in such an exposed position, almost within grasp of the enemy, it is unnecessary to speak. Mr. Rhodes is not a man who acts upon calculation in such a case, but upon instinct. The same instinct which carried him into the Matoppos when it was necessary to induce the Matabele to lay down their arms, ledhim to throw in his lot with the beleaguered town which has sprung up round the diamond mines of De Beers. The fate of Kimberley is as nothing in popular estimation compared with the fate of Mr. Rhodes. Kimberley might be taken and retaken. The valuable machinery of De Beers might be destroyed and the town razed to the ground. These incidents of warfare would be regarded as mere trivialities compared with the sensation that would be produced if Mr. Rhodes were a captive in the hands of President Kruger. It is doubtful whether he would ever be taken alive, and throughout the Empire the disappearance of Mr. Rhodes would be counted a loss that would be dearly purchased by the annexation of both the Dutch Republics of South Africa.

IF MR. RHODES WERE CAPTURED!

Great men are always rare, and the loss of Mr. Rhodes would be felt alike by our friends and foes throughout the world as a greater blow to the Empire than any conceivable reverse that might be inflicted upon British arms. Hence it is that the news from Kimberley is awaited with such intense anxiety, and the telegrams reporting the nonchalance and cheery confidence which Mr. Rhodes is manifesting within the beleaguered town, do much to counterbalance the anxiety which is undoubtedly felt in well-informed quarters about the military position in Natal.

HIS BROAD-MINDED TOLERANCE.

Whatever Mr. Rhodes may have thought of the policy of the war, he has subordinated his own judgment to that of Sir Alfred Milner. As he told me in the last conversation I had with him at Mr. Beit's house just before I left for the Hague, he was prepared to support Sir A. Milner blindfold, even should Sir Alfred lead him into war. I drew the line at war. Mr. Rhodes drew no line, and, now that Mr. Chamberlain's war has begun, Mr. Rhodes sup-ports it without reserve. That he disapproves of my oppo-sition to the war I know, but my relations with Mr. Rhodes have never been based upon the principle that I had to subordinate my judgment or govern my action according to his wishes. After a tolerably long experience of working with statesmen, both at home and abroad, whose policy I have had alternately to support and oppose, I may say I know none who is so tolerant of difference of opinion, and who recognises so fully the right of private judgment and of independent action on the part of his friends. I have repeatedly opposed Mr. Rhodes on matters on which he felt very strongly, but it has never affected the cordiality of our friendship or the sincerity of our alliance for the attainment of those objects on which we were agreed. It is true that I have never put it to quite so great a strain as at present, and it may be that Mr. Rhodes may consider that I have gone too far in opposing this war ever to resume the old confidential relations which have now lasted for nearly a dozen years. If so, I should regret it extremely, but of course that would not in the least affect the question of the right course to pursue in the present circumstances. I can hardly give a stronger proof of my inherent confidence in the broadminded tolerance of the man than to say that I do not anticipate any such result. I know the real Mr. Rhodes so well, and appreciate the greatness of his ideals. This war, important as it is and momentous as are likely to be the issues which it will raise, is but an incident. Mr. Rhodes's ideas, his aspirations, if you like, his ambitions, are too vast for him to allow difference of opinion upon detail, even such a detail as this, to affect his relations with those whom he knows to be thoroughly at one with him in his ultimate aim.

A TEST OF CONFIDENCE.

. This I know will be utterly incomprehensible even to many of those who are loudest in their protestations of admiration for the African Colossus. But Mr. Rhodes appreciates at its proper worth much of the support which he now enjoys. Even Mr. Chamberlain's support of Mr. Rhodes has been largely tempered by suspicion and mistrust. Had it not been so we should never have had those telegrams sent by Dr. Harris, after receiving communications from the Colonial Office, as to the necessity for introducing the British flag, as a security that Mr. Rhodes would not run the insurrection solely for his own ends.

As I write these lines I remember a curious instance which illustrates the point that I am driving at. When Mr. Rhodes came home in 1896, I was very anxious to have him sent to prison, and made no secret of my desire, to him or to Ministers. Mr. Rhodes had no hankering after gaol, but although he knew that I wanted him locked up, believing that it would have been much better for him, for the cause of the Empire, and for the future of South Africa, he recognised that was one of the questions upon which I had a right to my own opinion, and that my desire to clap him in Holloway was prompted by the same motive which led me to help him to his Charter and to support his African policy. There are very few statesmen who would be willing to allow their friends and su porters so large a latitude in judgment on matters affecting their personal liberty.

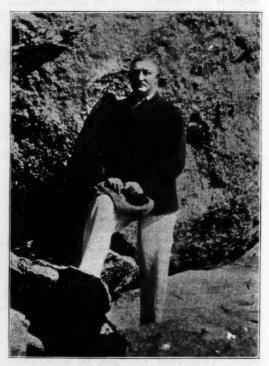

I have always treated Mr. Rhodes, both publicly and privately, as a man who regarded his own personal interests and his own personal aims as dust in the balance compared with his great ideal. When you have had twelve years of experience of acting on this principle, it is impossible not to know whether your working hypothesis has or has not been verified by results. After that test I shall "believe in Rhodes."

II.-THE REAL RHODES.

Cecil J. Rhodes, a dozen years age, was unknown outside the narrow confines of the Cape Colony General Gordon, who had been in South Africa, had met him there sixteen years ago, and formed so high an estimate of his character, that when he started on his heroic mission to the Soudan in 1884, his first act was to telegraph to Mr. Rhodes, asking him to accompany him to Khartoum. Mr. Rhodes was then Treasurer of the Cape Colony, and so he was unable to accept General Gordon's invitation. Had it been otherwise, the recent history of Africa, both North and South, would have to be rewritten; for the life of one of these men and the death of the other are the two great factors which at this hour dominate the destinies of Africa.

A RECENT PORTRAIT, TAKEN IN THE MATOPPOS.

FROM GORDON'S STANDPOINT.

It is well to approach the study of Mr. Rhodes from the standpoint of General Gordon's invitation to Khartoum. The ordinary standpoint from which Mr. Rhodes is judged is that of the financier or the politician. Those who look at him from either the Stock Exchange or Downing Street never discover the key to the strangely complex character, which is the fascination of h wan begi well the selfle Tha calu othe Gen a ve myst powe he st saini and latte

Ye who that took -an thou even ence

of his friends and the despair of his enemies. If you want to understand Cecil Rhodes, it is necessary to begin by remembering that General Gordon knew him well and trusted him absolutely. General Gordon was the Bayard of our generation. No more absolutely selfless man ever served his country and his Queen. That pure and lofty spirit was never stained even by the calumny of the e sordid souls who delight to impute to others the folly and baseness of their own nature. General Gordon was a man passionate for humanity, a very knight-errant of philanthropy, full of religious mysticism and an abiding sense of the reality and the power and the love of God. Alike in life and in death, he stands before the world a man of the stuff of which saints and martyrs are made; the most conspicuous and splendid type of the hero which Britain in these latter days has given to the world.

GORDON'S FRIEND.

Yet this man was the friend of Cecil Rhodes. Gordon, who knew him, believed in him and trusted him so much, that in the supreme moment of Gordon's career when he took his life in his hand and fared forth to the post of duty—and as the result proved, of death—at Khartoum, his first thought was to send for Rhodes.—Rhodes, who was not even a soldier or a diplomatist, and who had no experience whatever of the problems of the Soudan. Gordon, however, who was a keen, shrewd judge of men, knew

MR. RHODES STUDYING THE MAP OF AFRICA AT HIS HOUSE IN CAPE TOWN.

Cecil Rhodes to be a man after his own heart. And I, who knew both men, can well understand the secret of his confidence in Rhodes.

A PARALLEL-

Both men were singularly selfless. Neither of them was married. Each of them had dedicated his life to the pursuit of a lofty ideal, over which both had brooded long years in the solitude of the African desert. To each of them, although in widely different ways, had come an abiding sense of the insignificance and brevity of life compared with the eternal realities which underlie the fleeting phenomena of this transitory life. It is difficult to say which despised more profoundly the gew-gaws of pomp or the trappings of power, although Rhodes undoubtedly had a keener sense of the possibilities within the grasp of those who possess the sinews of war. Both were devoted to the service of their country, and each in his own way had a deep sense of the justice that was due to the dark-skinned races among whom their lot was cast. Rhodes, like Gordon, was a man of action rather than a man of speech. Both possessed that rare gift of personal charm, which is due to a certain frank simplicity of manner and directness of speech. Both, in short, were real men and not shams, earnest men with a keen outlook into the world of men, strenuous to do with their might whatever their hand found to do in their brief working day of life. Rhodes, like Gordon, was a man accustomed all his life to ponder the problems of Empire. I said of him years ago that some men think in parishes, others in nations, but that Rhodes thinks in continents. So did Gordon. The voluminous papers which the latter wrote on questions of Imperial policy are a mine of political wisdom, in which statesmen might still delve and quarry with good profit.

-AND A CONTRAST.

There were differences between the two friends, as is natural between men one of whom believes in God Almighty, the Father of all men, as his Father and personal Lover of his soul, and the other to whom it seems but an even chance whether there be any God at all. One was a soldier; the other a diamond digger. One had commanded armies and conducted negotiations in three continents. The other had merely made a million in South African finance. Nevertheless they knew and trusted each other; and in Gordon's confidence in Rhodes there is the best possible answer to the vulgar calumny which represents the great African as a mere millionaire of the Bourse, or an unscrupulous intriguer in Imperial politics.

THE GREATNESS OF THE MAN.

Cecil Rhodes is at this moment, notwithstanding his temporary eclipse after the unfortunate affair of the Jameson Raid, the greatest personage in the British Empire, bar two; the greatest man bar one. The Queen and the Queen's Prime Minister, Lord Salisbury, alone tower above the African Empirebuilder in the estimation of the world, both within and without Greater Britain. After Mr. Rhodes, Mr. Chamberlain is a bad fourth. But Mr. Rhodes is so much greater than Mr. Chamberlain that he could afford to accept the odium of a Parliamentary censure in order to save Mr. Chamberlain from an exposure which would have extinguished his political career, and to emerge practically unaffected by his sacrifice. It was not, indeed, until Mr. Rhodes fell on evil days, and was exposed to the bitter disappointments of unaccustomed failure and disasters, that the general public began to realise how great a man the Empire had reared in South Africa. Not until there is a run on a bank do men appreciate the immensity of its resources. It is the storm, not the calm, which tests the seaworthiness of the vessel. And so it was not until Mr. Rhodes had been passed through the fiery ordeal of defeat and humiliation that his contemporaries realised the manner of man with whom they had to do. "My career is only now beginning," he is said to have remarked as he took ship after the Raid to "face the music " of the Parliamentary inquiry; and events have justified, and more than justified, his confidence. Subjected to the strongest possible temptation to win an easy victory by betraying a by no means too loyal colleague, he endured rather all the odious imputations cast upon him in silence. He refused either to lie, as others did without scruple, or to give away the men who had shared his confidence. And so he emerged from the protracted baiting to which he was subjected as a man who could be relied upon to keep his counsel and to shield his friends. Hence the net result of the blunder of the Raid was to enlarge, not indeed the field of his vision, but the general conception of his importance in the world. He came home to be tried as a mere African; he returned to Africa as the most notable statesman in Greater Britain.

A MILLIONAIRE WITH IMAGINATION.

Mr. Rhodes is a millionaire with an imagination. There are many millionaires in the world; but, as was said of a learned pedant, who "put so many books on the top of his head he crushed out his brains," so the millionaire, as a rule, puts so much money into his pocket that he has no space left in which to accommodate an imagination. It has usually been thought that, while men who inherited millions were more likely to carry their wealth so easily as to be able to indulge in the luxury of an imagination, men who made their millions were certain to have used up in the process all the faculties of their mind. Mr. Rhodes was not a born millionaire. He was born, if not without a penny, at least in the usually impecunious condition of the younger son of a country parson. Neither did he start in life with any favourable handicap. He had to abandon his studies at Oxford in order to flee for his life to South Africa, to escape the fell disease which had apparently fastened itself upon his lungs. So ill was he before he left England, that his physician never expected he would live for a twelvemonth, even in South Africa. But the pure dry air of the African veldt worked wonders. Rhodes not only recovered his health, but being fortunate in the early days of diamond-digging in Kimberley, he laid the foundations of a great fortune. Then, with characteristic doggedness and tenacity of purpose, he returned home and completed his studies at Oxford. He was not a bookworm. His life at the University was more social than intellectual. But he went through the term of an undergraduate's study, graduated in due course, and returned to Africa. The episode is worth remembering, not merely because of the light it throws on Mr. Rhodes's character, but because it will be found hereafter to bear fruit in his aspirations after the realisation of the unity of the English-speaking race.

MR. RHODES'S OLD CLAIM AT KIMBERLEY.

(From an old print).

HOW HE MADE HIS FORTUNE.

It is not necessary here to introduce any detail as to the way in which Mr. Rhodes built up his fortune. It did not probably differ much from the methods in which other millionaires have made their piles. A fortunate selection of diamondiferous soil was the beginning of it all, followed up by patient manual toil in the digging and the washing of the dirt. Then when enough had been found to constitute a nucleus of a fortune, there began the speculation in buying and selling claims which goes on without ceasing in every mining camp. Young Rhodes was very fortunate in his financial operations. By degrees it became evident that he was coming to the top. The Jews there, as elsewhere, proved too many for the Gentiles. But there was one Gentile whom they

when the vone the a is th

man his v the c Com in th suppl broug howe De lits ch able direc

* D was no miners a half diamon igneous with a Consoli mines compar owners great control they re amalga £4,000, one-thii dividen could neither circumvent nor overcome. Ultimately, when the time came for the great amalgamation of all the various interests engaged in the diamond fields in one great trust or combine, Mr. Rhodes stood forth as the amalgamator, and the colossal De Beers Company is the monument of his success.

"ONE OF RHODES'S FADS."

As the essential thing to aim at in an estimate of the man is his character, rather than the precise details of his work, I relegate to a foo:note the figures describing the capital, dividend and operations of the De Beers Company.* It is the largest diamond-producing company in the world. Since its amalgamation in 1885, it has supplied the world with diamonds which, sold wholesale, brought in no less a sum than £40,000,000. This, however, is by no means the chief distinction of the De Beers concern. It is chiefly notable because in its charter, or Articles of Association, Mr. Rhodes was able to secure the insertion of a proviso authorising the directors to appropriate from time to time such funds as * Diamonds were first discovered in South Africa in 1867 and 1869. It was not until 1870 that the rush set in to Griqualand West. Ten thousand miners encamped in 1871 in Kimberley, where, within an area of three and a half miles, nine-tenths of all the diamonds have been discovered. The diamond mines are craters of exinct volcanoes, filled with blue ground of igneous origin. The De Beers Mining Company was first founded in 1880, with a capital of $\frac{1}{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty\colon\top{2}\infty

ly

le ld

ne

S.

te

e le

as ne

ie

h

vs

e

to

It

e

it

d

n

n

25

S

they deemed it advisable to set apart out of profits for political or Imperial purposes.

It was introduced by Mr. Rhodes, and assented to by his fellow-directors and shareholders solely out of deference to him. It was one of Rhodes's fads, they said; let him have his way. So he had it—as is his wont. They gave in to the commanding genius of their colleague, dominated by his will rather than convinced by his arguments. For Mr. Rhodes is far in advance of his class in realising the responsibility of the millionaire for the stewardship of his millions.

AN IMPERIAL SOCIALIST.

It is the curious fortune of Mr. Rhodes to be the special mark for the attacks of the Socialists of the baser order, and of those Radicals who are delighted to join in the hue and cry against any one whom the Socialists dislike. But if the Socialists did but know the man as he is, they would elect him honorary president of their association. He alone, so far as I know, among the millionaire class not only accepts the doctrines of the state scientist in theory, but acts upon them in practice. He is not a man of phrases. He is a man of deeds. He is reputed to be a rich man. It is true that he has the control of millions. But I seldom knew a rich man who had less ready cash. If any one were to give Mr. Rhodes a million sterling to-day, he would not have a penny of it to-morrow. As soon as he gets money, he spends it or invests it in the service of the Imperial idea. The Socialist, no doubt, would demur as to the wisdom of Mr. Rhodes's selection of the object on which the money should be spent. But that is a detail. The essential unity of idea on the part of Mr. Rhodes and the Socialist is that both absolutely agree that the money should not be spent upon self, and should be employed solely for the benefit of the community. Mr. Rhodes sees the community on its Imperial side. The Socialist naturally confines his attention to the social side. But both are alike in believing that it is in the service of the community, and not in the building up of great fortunes for a family, that wealth should be employed.

A MAN OF ANOTHER KIDNEY.

There is another millionaire in South Africa, whose name begins with the same initial letter, who has built up a much greater fortune, who, so far as is known to his contemporaries, has never been even momentarily betrayed into a fit of public spirited generosity. His one aim in life is said to be to leave a million sterling to each of his children. Nota Social Democrat or a Radical in the whole pack ever breathes a word of reproach against this supreme type of the selfish individualist million-aire. All their execrations are hurled against the one Socialist millionaire of our time. It is ignorance probably, sheer ignorance, with a strong touch of personal prejudice on the part of a few leaders.

DIAMOND MINES, KIMBERLEY.

How the old open workings used to be worked; now replaced by a shaft.

ON PROVIDING FOR CHILDREN.

Mr. Rhodes does not pose as a Socialist. But he frankly admitted to me that his ideas were essentially socialistic.

He was denouncing a rich friend of his who, much to Mr. Rhodes's disgust, had only left half of his fortune to public purposes, dividing the remaining fifty per cent. of his millions among his children. "No man should ever leave money to his children," said Mr. Rhodes. "It is a curse to them. What we should do for our children, if we would do them the best service we can, is to give them the best training we can procure for them, and then turn them loose in the world without a sixpence to fend for themselves. What happens when you leave children fortunes? They have no longer any spur to effort. They spend their money on wine, women and gambling, and bring disgrace upon the name which they bear. No; give your boys the best education you can, and then let them make their own way. As for any money you may have, it should all go to the public service, to the State in some form or another. They tell me," he added laughing, "that that is State Socialism. I cannot help that. These are my ideas, and they are right."

HIS "GOSPEL OF WEALTH."

If ever the present tendency of the financial world towards trusts, amalgamations and consolidation is to be brought into harmony with the socialistic aspirations of the masses, Mr. Rhodes stands out as the statesman to whose hands such a reconciliation could best be entrusted. He alone among the millionaire class has not only acce; ted, but has acted up to the theories of the Socialists. To make money only to use it in the service of the State, to regard one's self solely as an agent or instrument whose energies are all due to the community in which you live, to be dedicated, if not consecrated, to the ministry of the Commonwealth—that is what Mr. Rhodes has done, is doing, and hopes to continue to do till the end of his days.

MR. RHOD'S'S FARM IN THE MATOPPOS.

Mr. Rhodes, who lives among millionaires, believes in them, which is in itself an evidence of the robustness of his faith. But although he believes in them, he is filled with a profound compassion for their unsatisfying existence. He realises the unsatisfying nature of the ordinary millionaire's life so vividly, that he hopes out of their discontent will come an aspiration for better things by which the whole world will profit. There is no one whom Mr. Rhodes pities more than those mortals whom he derides as "safe-keys in breeches."

PITY THE POOR MILLIONAIRE!

I remember once paraphrasing some of his talk some years ago, when it was still fresh in my mind, as follows:

"What is wealth to the individual who inherits it? A burden too great to be borne. Increase of wealth up to a certain point means increase of comfort, increase of power; beyond that point it means for its possessor increase of burden without compensation. A man may spend £100 or £1,000 a week on luxurious living or in lavish expenditure, but beyond the latter sum few millionaires ever go. But the revenues of many far exceed that sum, and every penny of that excess, although it may bring them the miser's sordid exultation, brings with it the miser's fears, the miser's foreboding. I could point out to you millionaire after millionaire who left the University, longing to do something, or at least to be somebody, who are now nothing more or less than safekeys in breeches, the whole of their life consumed in the constant worry of seeing that their enormous investments do n inves Their politimone round south risk r in an paune

In is just treatr dollar but is chaple a per publis after Africa

In one withem, insurrrebel broug

Mr.

rests 1

as tha emper Ironsi Ignati unlike the St it has develo under conce ordina born i he is idea pulver though the d agains writing In the unbelie world on the knows dogma certitu of the be, tha

It m Mr. Rl Midas that th serious modern ask, m much t do not deteriorate, and the not less arduous task of investing to the best advantage their surplus revenues. Their imagination is crushed by their millions. A political career is barricaded against them by their own money-bags. A crowd of parasites and beggars swarm round them like mosquitoes round a weary wanderer in a southern swamp. They can do nothing, see nothing, risk nothing. They sit like golden Buddhas, cross-legged in an Eastern temple, eternally contemplating their gilded paunch."

HIS RELATIONS TO THE NATIVES.

In his dealings with his own workpeople, Mr. Rhodes is just and generous. It is the fashion to denounce his treatment of the Kaffirs, five thousand of whom earn a dollar a day in the diamond compound at Kimberley; but the Rev. Donald Macleod, one of the Queen's chaplains and editor-of Good Words, who recently made a personal investigation of the facts of the case, has published a very remarkable testimony to the effect that after the missionaries no person has done so much for the African natives as Mr. Rhodes.

In Matabeleland he is regarded by the natives as the one white man whom they can trust. He conquered them, but they felt him to be just; and after the terrible insurrection, it was by his venturing unarmed into the rebel stronghold of the Matoppos that the struggle was brought to a peaceful conclusion.

HIS RELIGION.

Mr. Rhodes's conception of his duties to his fellow-men rests upon a foundation as distinctly ethical and theistic as that of the old Puritans. If you could imagine an emperor of old Rome crossed with one of Cromwell's Ironsides, and the result brought up at the feet of Ignatius Loyola, you would have an amalgam not unlike that which men call Cecil Rhodes. The idea of the State, the Empire, and the supreme allegiance which it has a right to claim from all its subjects, is as fully developed in him as in Augustus or in Trajan. But deep underlying all this there is the strong, earnest, religious conception of the Puritan. Mr. Rhodes is not, in the ordinary sense of the word, a religious man. He was born in a rectory, and, like many other clergymen's sons, he is no great Churchman. He has an exaggerated idea of the extent to which modern research has pulverised the authority of the Bible; and, strange though it may appear to those who only know him as the destroyer of Lobengula, his moral sense revolts against accepting the Divine origin of the Hebrew writings which exult over the massacre of the Amalekites. In the doctrine of eternal torment he is an out-and-out unbeliever. Upon many questions relating to the other world his one word is Agnostic—" I do not know." But on the question of Hell he is quite sure he knows, and he knows that it is not true. Indeed, it is his one negative dogma, which he holds with astonishing vigour and certitude. It conflicts with his fundamental conception of the nature of things. Whatever may be or may not be, that cannot be.

es

he

in of

ed

stry

eir

by

ne

m

ne

to

of

or

ay

in

n-

at

ay

it

he

be fehe

its

HIS MEDITATIONS.

It may appear strange to those who only realise Mr. Rhodes as a successful empire-builder, or a modern Midas at whose touch everything turns to gold, to hear that the great Afrikander is much given to pondering seriously questions which, in the rush and hurry of modern life, most men seldom give themselves time to ask, much less to answer. But as Mohammed spent much time in the solitude of his cave before he emerged to astonish the world with the revelation of the Koran, so Cecil Rhodes meditated much in the years while he was washing dirt for diamonds under the South African stars. He is still a man much given to thinking over things. He usually keeps three or four subjects going at one time, and he sticks to them. At present he has on his mind the development of Rhodesia, the laying of the telegraph line to Tanganyika, the Cape to Cairo railway, and the ultimate federation of South Africa. These four objects preoccupy him. He does not allow himself to be troubled with correspondence. He receives letters and loses them sometimes, but answers them never.

In the earlier days, before he was known, he kept his thoughts to himself. But he thought much; and the outcome of his thinking is making itself felt more and more every day in the development of Africa.

THE SEARCH FOR THE SUPREME IDEAL.

When Mr. Rhodes was an undergraduate at Oxford, he was profoundly impressed by a saying of Aristotle as to the importance of having an aim in life sufficiently lofty to justify your spending your life in endeavouring to reach it. He went back to Africa wondering what his aim in life should be, knowing only one thing: that whatever it was, he had not found it. For him that supreme ideal was still to seek. So he fell a-thinking. The object to which most of those who surrounded him eagerly dedicated their lives was the pursuit of wealth. For that they were ready to sacrifice all. Was it worth it? Did the end, even when attained, justify the expenditure of one's life? To answer that question he looked at the men who had succeeded, who had made their pile, who had attained the goal which he was proposing he should make his own. What he saw was men who, with hardly an exception, did not know what use to make of the wealth they had spent their lives in acquiring. They had encumbered themselves with money-bags, and they spent all their time in taking care of them. Other object in life they seemed to have none. Wealth, for which they had given the best years of their life, was only a care, not a joy—a source of anxiety, not a sceptre of power. "If that is all, it is not good enough," thought Rhodes.

IN POLITICS.

Then his thoughts turned to politics. Why not devote his life to the achievement of a political career? He might succeed, if he tried. Rhodes seldom doubts his capacity to succeed when he tries. Again he looked at the ultimate. In South Africa, the top of the tree was represented by the Cape Premiershp. What kind of men are Cape Premiers? He had known some of them. They were men who had alternate spells of office and opposition. Most of them were mediocrities; few of them had power, even when they held place. They were dependent for their political existence upon the goodwill of followers, whom they had to wheedle or cajole. The position did not seem enviable; so once more Rhodes decided "it was not good enough." The true goal was still to seek.

IN THE CHURCHES.

His mind turned to religion. Was there to be found in the Churches a goal worth the devotion of a life? Perhaps—if it were true. But what if it were not? He thought much of the marvellous career of Loyola, the man who underpinned the tottering foundations of the Catholic Church, and re-stablished them upon the rock of St. Peter, which had been shaken by the spiritual dynamite of the Reformation. There was a work worthy the best man's life. But nowadays who could believe in the day's tion which certain here. Christ devot As to of a kindle The cworth dead,

Back View of Groot Schuur (Mr. Rhodes's Cape Town Residence) seen from the Hill Behind, running up to Table Mountain.

So

Photograph by S. B. Barnard |

A CHARACTERISTIC PORTRAIT.

in the Roman, or even in the Christian, creed? Every day some explorer dug up in Palestine some old inscription which made havoc with a Bible text-a conclusion which the reports of the Palestine Exploration Fund certainly do not bear out, but that need not be discussed here. Mr. Rhodes was a Darwinian, rather than a Christian. He knew there was no Hell. How could he devote himself to the service of the Catholic Church? As to the others, these were merely vulgar fractions of a fraction. He respected them all with the wide tolerance of a Roman philosopher, but they neither kindled his enthusiasm nor commanded his devotion. The old faiths were dying out. If his life were to have a worthy goal, it must be among the living, not among the dead, with the future rather than the past.

A DARWINIAN IN SEARCH OF GOD.

So he went on digging for diamonds, and musing, as he digged, on the eternal verities, the truth which underlies all phenomena. He was a Darwinian; he believed in evolution. But was it reasonable to believe that the chain of sentient existences which stretched unbroken from the marine Ascidian to man, stopped abruptly with the human race? "Was it not at least thinkable that there are Intelligences in the universe as much my superior in intellect as I am superior to the dog?" "Why should man be the terminus of the process of evolution?" So he reasoned, as all serious souls have reasoned long before Darwin was heard of.

Reincarnation, the possibility of an existence prior to this mortal life, did not interest him. "Life is too short, after all," he used to say, "to worry about previous lives. From the cradle to the grave-what is it? Three days at the scaside. Just that and nothing more. But although it is only three days, we must be doing something. I cannot spend my time throwing stones into the water. But what is worth while doirg?" Then upon him there grew more and more palpably real, at least as a possibility, that the teachings of all the seers, of all the religions, were based on solid fact, and that after all there was a God who reigned over all the children of men, and Who, moreover, would exact a strict account for all the deeds which they did in the body. He combatted the notion; but the balance of authority was against him. All religions, in all times-surely the universal instinct of the race had something to justify it!

A FIFTY PER CENT. CHANCE!

Mr. Rhodes argued the matter out in his cool, practical way, and decided the question for himself once for all. He did not surrender his agnostic position; but he decided that it was at least an even chance that there might be a God. Further than that he did not go. A fifty per cent. chance that there is a God Almighty is very far removed from the confident certainty of "I know that my Redeemer liveth." But a fifty-per-cent.-chance-God fully believed in is worth more as a factor in life than a forty per cent. faith in the whole Christian

"WHAT WOULDST THOU HAVE ME TO DO?"

Mr. Rhodes had no sooner ciphered out his fifty per cent. chance than he was confronted with the reflection, "If there be a God, of which there is an even chance, what does He want me to do, if so be that He cares anything about what I do?" For so the train of thought went on. "If there be a God, and if He do care, then the most important thing in the world for me is to find out what He wants me to do, and then go and do it." But how was he to find it out? It is a problem which puzzled the ancients. "Canst thou by searching find out God?" Are not His ways past finding out? Perhaps yes; perhaps no. They "did not know everything down in Judee." Anyhow, Mr. Rhodes was much too practical and thoroughgoing a man not to set himself to the task of ascertaining the will of God towards us-if so be that there be a God, of which, as aforesaid, the Rhodesian calculation is that the chances are even, for or against.

WHAT IS HE DOING?

Mr. Rhodes, as I have said, is a Darwinian. He believes in the gospel of evolution, of the survival of the fittest, of progress by natural selection. With such outfit as this, he set himself in his diamond-hole to attempt the solution of the oldest of all problems. "If there be a God, and if He cares anything about what I do, then," said Rhodes to hinself, "I think I shall not be far wrong in concluding that He would like me to do pretty much as He is doing—to work on the same lines towards the same end. Therefore, the first thing for me to do is to try to find out what God—if there be a God is doing in this world; what are His instruments, what lines is He going on, and what is He aiming at. The next thing then for me to do is to do the same thing, use the same instruments, follow the same lines, and aim at the same mark to the best of my ability."

Having thus cleared the way, Mr. Rhodes put on his thinking cap and endeavoured to puzzle out answers to these questions. It sounds somewhat profane, the way in which he puts it ; but in its essence, is it not the way in which all earnest souls, each according to his own light, have endeavoured to probe the mystery of the universe? Is not the supreme profanity not the use of mundane dialect to describe the process, but rather the failure to put the question at all?

(1) THE DIVINE AREA OF ACTION.

The first thing that impressed Mr. Rhodes, as the result of a survey of the ways of God to man, is that the Deity must look at things on a comprehensive scale. If Mr. Rhodes thinks in continents, his Maker must at least think in planets. In other words, the Divine plan must be at least co-extensive with the human race. If there be a God at all who cares about us, He cares for the whole of us, not for an elect few in a corner. Whatever instrument He uses must be one that is capable of influencing the whole race. Hence the range of the instrument, or, as a Papist would say, the Catholicity of the Church, is one of the first credentials of its Divine origin and authority. Holeand-corner plans of salvation, theological or political, are out of court. If we can discover the traces of the Divine plan, it must be universal, and that agency or constitution which most nearly approximates to it in the universality of its influence bears the Divine trade-mark.

(2) THE DIVINE METHOD.

This conception of the Divine credentials seemed to Mr. Rhodes to be immediately fatal to the pretensions of all the Churches. They may be all very good in their way; but one and all are sectional. The note of catholicity is everywhere lacking. Even the Roman Catholic but touches a decimal of the race. Besides, all the Churches are but of yesterday. They belong to the latest phase of human evolution. What Mr. Rhodes was after, was something older and more universal. He found it in the doctrine of evolution. Here, at least, was a law or uniform method of Divine procedure which, in point of view of antiquity, left nothing to be desired, and which at this present moment is universally active among all sentient beings. What is the distinctive feature of that doctrine? The perfection of the species, attained by the elimination of the unfit; the favourable handicapping of the fit. The most capable species survives, the least capable goes to the wall. The perfecting of the fittest species among the animals, or of races among men, and then the conferring upon the perfected species or race

A NEW PORTRAIT BY MISS FULLER.

Mr. Rhodes as he has come in from his morning ride and thrown himself into his chair.

the ti throu is gov to go

The activi natur recog Ruler at the instru of thi obviou He wa impor There Black. numer be the destini The Y contin cally o are do White

The the su of the which enviror persiste

At th

the mo which is it th is the What presses, ultimate or even the drift He has Then w of prob If, there first thi We do Pigmy, the fore of the c have ar What th individu whole p They ar Progress level.

THE T

Procee and most found th moral qu conception the high Mr. Rho the title-deeds of the future; that seemed to Mr. Rhodes, through his Darwinian spectacles, the way in which God is governing His world, has governed it and will continue to govern it, so far as we can foresee the future.

Mr. f all

ay;

city

but hes

ase

was

the

or

t of nich

all

hat

the

g of east

test

and ace

(3) THE DIVINE INSTRUMENT.

The planet being postulated as the area of the Divine activity, and the perfecting of the race by process of natural selection and the struggle for existence being recognised as the favourite instruments of the Divine Ruler, the question immediately arose as to which race at the present time seems most likely to be the Divine instrument in carrying out the Divine idea over the whole of this planet. The answer may seem to Chauvinists obvious enough. But Mr. Rhodes is not a Chauvinist. He was conducting a serious examination into a supremely important question, and he would take nothing for granted. There are various races of mankind—the Yellow, the Black, the Brown, and the White. If the test be numerical, the Yellow race comes first. But if the test be the area of the world and the power to control its destinies, the primacy of the White race is indisputable. The Yellow race are massed thick on one half of a single continent; the White exclusively occupy Europe, practically occupy the Americas, are colonising Australia, and are dominating Asia. In the struggle for existence the White race had unquestionably come out on top.

The White race being thus favourably handicapped by the supreme Handicapper, the next question was which of the White races is naturally selected for survival which is proving itself most fit in the conditions of its environment to defeat adverse influences and to preserve persistently its distinctive type?

(4) THE DIVINE IDEAL.

At this point in the analysis Mr. Rhodes dropped for the moment the first line of inquiry to take up another, which might lead him more directly to his goal. What is it that God-if there be a God-is aiming at? What is the ultimate aim of all this process of evolution? What is the Divine ideal towards which all creation presses, consciously or unconsciously? To find out the ultimate destination of sentient creatures may be difficult or even impossible; but the only clue which we have to the drift of the Divine action is to note the road by which He has led us hitherto, to see how far we have got already. Then we may be in a position to infer, with some degree of probability, the route that has still to be travelled. If, therefore, we wish to see where we are tending, the first thing to do is to examine those who are in advance. We do not go back to the ape, the Bushman, or the Pigmy, to see the trend of evolution. We go rather to the foremost of mankind, the most cultured specimens of the civilised race, the best men, in short, of whom we have any records or knowledge since history began. What these exceptionally, it may be prematurely, evolved individuals have attained, is a prophecy of what the whole phalanx of humanity may be destined to reach. They are the highwater mark of the race up till now. Progress will consist in bringing up mankind to their level.

THE THREEFOLD TEST: JUSTICE-LIBERTY-PEACE.

Proceeding further in his examination of the foremost and most highly evolved specimens of the race, Mr. Rhodes found them distinguished among their fellows by certain moral qualities which enable us to form some general conception as to the trend of evolution. Contemplating the highest realised stundard of human perfection, Mr. Rhodes formed the idea that the cue to the Divine purpose was to discover the race which would be most likely to universalise certain broad general principles. "What," asked Mr. Rhodes, "is the highest thing in the world? Is it not the idea of Justice? I know none higher. Justice between man and man-equal, absolute. impartial, fair play to all; that surely must be the first note of a perfected society. But, secondly, there must be Liberty, for without freedom there can be no justice. Slavery in any form which denies a man a right to be himself, and to use all his faculties to their best advantage, is, and must always be, unjust. And the third note of the ultimate towards which our race is bending must surely be that of Peace, of the industrial commonwealth as opposed to the military clan or fighting Empire." Anyhow, these three seem to Mr. Rhodes sufficient to furnish him with a metewand wherewith to measure the claims of the various races of the world to be regarded as the Divine instrument of future evolution. Justice, Liberty, and Peace-these three. Which race in the world most promotes, over the widest possible area, a state of society having these three as corner-stones?

Who is to decide the question? Let all the races vote, and see what they will say. Each race will no doubt vote for itself, but who receives every second vote? Mr. Rhodes had no hesitation in arriving at the conclusion that the English race—the English-speaking man, whether British, American, Australian, or South African—is the type of the race which does now, and is likely to continue to do in the future, the most practical, effective work to establish justice, to promote liberty, and to ensure peace over the widest possible area of the planet.

QUOD ERAT DEMONSTRANDUM!

"Therefore," said Mr. Rhodes to himself in his curious way, "if there be a God, and He cares anything abou what I do, I think it is clear that He would like me to do what He is doing Himself. And as He is manifestly fashioning the English-speaking race as the chosen instrument by which He will bring in a state of society based upon Justice, Liberty and Peace, He must obviously wish me to do what I can to give as much scope and power to that race as possible. Hence," so he concludes this long argument, "if there be a God, I think that what He would like me to do is to paint as much of the map of Africa British red as possible, and to do what I can elsewhere to promote the unity and extend the influence of the English-speaking race."

Mr. Rhodes had found his longed-for ideal, nor has he ever since then had reason to complain that it was not sufficiently elevated or sufficiently noble to be worth the devotion of his whole life.

III .- A LOYOLA OF THE EMPIRE.

I used a phrase about Mr. Rhodes many years ago, the truth of which, seems to me to be illustrated and confirmed by his support of the present war policy in South Africa. I said he was a great man whose ethical development had been somewhat neglected. Considering how many small men there are taking part in journalism and politics whose ethical development has never even begun, that fact is no reason why I should refuse to recognise the grandeur and sublimity of Mr. Rhodes's political ideas. But this neglected development of the ethical side of the man exposes him to the same temptation before which Ignatius Loyola and his followers succumbed. Loyola believed with intense and passionate earnestness in the theory that the Roman Church was the divinely appointed agency for saving the world. To strengthen that church, to extend its dominion, and to suppress all those who rebelled against it, became his supreme morality; and in the attaining of that end the question of means became a mere detail. Hence Jesuitism, with its doctrine that the end justifies the means, brought the society into disrepute, and enormously weakened the influence which it exerted in realising its ideals. It is just the same with Mr. Rhodes. He is the Loyola of politics. To him the extension of the influence and authority of the English-speaking race and the maintenance of its unity are things which overshadow all other objects. And in attaining that end he is apt to be regardless of the scruples which would weigh with other men.

HIS SHARE IN THE JAMESON RAID.

Nevertheless while admitting this sorrowfully and even mournfully, it is well to remember that the extent to which he over-stepped the strict rules of right in the case of the Jameson Raid has been enormously exaggerated. That he labours under an undeserved opprobrium, is entirely due to the fact that he was so magnanimous and patriotic that he preferred deliberately to bear the burden of other people's sins, preferring to suffer rather than vindicate himself by letting the whole truth be known. There are few finer spectacles in contemporary politics than the way in which Mr. Rhodes shielded Mr. Chamberlain before the South African Committee. It is true that while he was in Africa he had in unguarded moments blurted out the truth as to the support which he had received from the Colonial Office; but when it came to the point, and he had to choose between giving away a department of the empire or enduring silently the unjust censure for which his enemies were thirsting, he chose the latter without a murmur.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN COMMITTEE.

I have in my pamphlet, "The Scandal of the South African Committee," given sufficient proof, from the cablegrams produced and the evidence of unwilling witnesses who did their utmost to conceal the facts, to justify what I am saying, so that there is no need to go over the whole story here. Suffice it to say that the Committee returned a scathing verdict which found him guilty of almost every conceivable crime a statesman can commit, and clinched the matter by declaring that he had used the cablegrams received from London in order to induce his supporters to embark on an illegal conspiracy thinking that they afforded a justification for doing so! In proof whereof they triumphantly produced the fact that, while he had shown Mr. Chamberlain the cablegrams he would not show them to the Committee!

A FALSE VERDICT.

The Committee having declared that Mr. Chamberlain was absolutely innocent, it naturally followed that Mr. Rhodes was also a liar, a blackmailer, and a man who had betrayed his superiors and deceived his subordinates. That was the verdict of the Committee, and if Mr. Chamberlain had been innocent, no other verdict would have been justified. Now there was one man on the Committee who knew that it was false, and that man was Mr. Chamberlain, to whom the cablegrams had been shown. What did Mr. Chamberlain do? No sooner had the Committee been dispersed than he stood up in his place in Parliament and declared twice in the strongest terms that nothing had been proved, and to his knowledge nothing existed that reflected the least on Mr. Rhodes's personal honour. Nothing could be clearer or more explicit. If Mr. Chamberlain were innocent, Mr. Rhodes must have acted most dishonourably; but Mr. Chamberlain, knowing the facts, certifies that nothing exists to prove that Mr. Rhodes's personal honour was stained. Comment is needless. For the full story 1 refer the reader to my pamphlet, "The Scandal of the South African Committee."

IN GROOT SCHUUR GROUNDS: AT THE LION HOUSE ON A PUBLIC HOLIDAY.

(The public wanders in at will, all classes and colours.)

for the

becau Krug shoule 20,000 relatin home the si ing c in su policy evolut there head, the d optim necess resista agreed withou all the wards. settled there a of whi to be s and th questic Presid Outlan For w a five receive franchi Mr. Ch as so re But ow accomp Preside that re declare w r. I Kruger Jameso

There talked a which is he regard as a coment, so in order

Chamb and rei per cen

THE TOPIC OF THE MONTH.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S WAR.

I.—HOW MR. CHAMBERLAIN MADE THE WAR.

SSES

hat I hole rned every ched rams rters

they ereol

had not rlain

Mr.

who

ates.

Mr.

ould

the man

been oner p in

the

o his

t on earer cent,

but hing

was ry I

the

ME are at war, and all other topics disappear. Inter arma silent leges. It is not only the laws that are silent in war time, but everything else that makes for the progress and civilisation of mankind. The hoarse beating of the war-drum drowns all other sounds, and because Mr. Chamberlain has quarrelled with President Kruger over the precise form in which a concession should be made to secure the political rights of some 20,000 British subjects in the Transvaal, all questions relating to the welfare of 40 million British subjects at home are shunted for the time. War is the great fact of the situation-a great fact which supplies the most crushing condemnation of the policy which has culminated in such a catastrophe. Remember that when this policy was begun, and at every stage of its successive evolutions, its authors and originators protested that there would be no war. Only let them have their head, give them a free hand and they would settle the dispute without forcing a fight. The least the dispute without forcing a fight. The least optimist held with Dr. Jameson, that it might be necessary to put 30,000 men on the water before the resistance of President Kruger would collapse, but all agreed that Sir Alfred Milner would settle South Africa without bloodshed. We now see that all the experts and all the South African authorities, from Mr. Rhodes downwards, have been mistaken. Sir A. Milner has not settled Africa. There have been many shots fired, and there are still more to follow. War has begun, the end of which none can foresee. Yet it is plain and easy to be seen that our South Africans were not so far wrong, and that Sir A. Milner might have settled the whole question by securing the concession of his demands from President Kruger, if his allies, Mr. Chamberlain and the Outlanders, had acted with good faith or good sense. For what are the facts? Sir A. Milner demanded a five years' franchise. On the 21st of August he received from President Kruger an offer of the five years' franchise, provided certain conditions were accepted. Mr. Chamberlain tells us that he regarded the conditions as so reasonable that he accepted nine-tenths of them. But owing to difference as to a mere matter of form he accompanied his acceptance with a declaration that the President's proposals were unacceptable. The one-tenth that remains still in dispute, Mr. Chamberlain has declared, was not worth a war. Nevertheless, we are at w.r. But war has come about not because President Kruger did not give in, as Mr. Rhodes and Dr. Jameson predicted, but because after he gave in Mr. Chamberlain raised a difficulty on a question of form, and refused to accept an offer which conceded ninety per cent. of his demands.

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE?

There has been a great deal of misleading nonsense talked about paramountcy and suzerainty and the like, which in view of Mr. Chamberlain's admission that he regarded President Kruger's offer of August 21st as a concession to our demands and a basis of settlement, stands self-confessed as a mere blind employed in order to conceal the real criminality of Mr. Chamberlain's policy. Mr. Chamberlain complains that President Kruger interpreted his "qualified acceptance" as a refusal, and attributes this to the malign influence which was exercised upon the Transvaal by some of their advisers. There was a "malign influence" undoubtedly, but it emanated from Mr. Chamberlain and his allies. This can be demonstrated with almost mathematical accuracy from the Blue Books. On August 21st the Government received President Kruger's offer to concede the five years' franchise on three reasonable and moderate conditions, to nine-tenths of which Mr. Chamberlain said he was willing to concede. On August 23rd the Outlander Council met and repudiated their previous resolution to accept the five years' franchise as a settlement of their claims. The African League followed suit. As long as they believed that President Kruger would not concede the five years' franchise they supported Sir A. Milner in demanding it. The moment President Kruger conceded it they turned round and passed a resolution declaring that the five years' franchise was worthless, that they had only agreed to it out of deference to Sir A. Milner against their better judgment, and that now they would have nothing to do with it unless it was accompanied by a series of conditions entirely destructive of the independence of the South African Republic.

AN AFRICAN SPENLOW AND JORKINS.

It may be said that President Kruger could have ignored the Outlanders. But he is a practical man. The British Agent at Pretoria had told him that the Government was under pledges to the Outlanders. President Kruger must have believed after that intimation that the Outlanders and the British Government were a kind of firm of the "Spenlow and Jorkins" type. The official Spenlow was most desirous of accepting the President's offer, but the other member of the firm, the Outlander Jorkins, was unfortunately quite irreconcilable. He would not hear of the franchise, he would not have it as a gift. And as the franchise was claimed solely for the sake of Jorkins, his instant repudiation of the five years' franchise, unless it were accompanied by half-a-dozen other concessions fatal to the independence of the Republic, was quite enough to convince President Kruger that a pacific settlement was impossible. Any lingering doubts that he might have had on the subject were dispelled by Mr. Chamberlain's speech at Highbury, in which the Colonial Secretary menaced him with war if he did not make further concessions, the nature of which Mr. Chamberlain did not specify. This was on the 26th of August. Two days later came the despatch from Mr. Chamberlain in which the official Spenlow declared that he meant to say "yes," with an accent that sounded like "no." If the Outlanders had not repudiated the five years' franchise on the 23rd, and if Mr. Chamberlain had not vaguely demanded further concessions on the 26th, President Kruger might have considered the despatch of August 28th as what Mr. Chamberlain tells us it was intended to be—the "qualified acceptance" of nine-tenths of the President's conditions. in view of the resolutions passed by the Outlanders and the Highbury speech, President Kruger felt that the ambiguity of the despatch of August 28th could only have one meaning, and that his offer had been flung back in his face. Thereupon he noted the rejection of his offer with regret, and formally accepted Mr. Chamberlain's own proposal, which was to appoint a general commission to investigate the seven years' franchise.

HOW MR. CHAMBERLAIN WENT BACK ON HIS WORD.

This offer Mr. Chamberlain had expressly declared should be kept open while he considered the alternative proposal of the conditional five years' franchise. Hence President Kruger had a right to assume that Mr. Chamberlain would abide by his explicit promise to keep his proposal still open, and that their acceptance of the joint commission of inquiry into the seven years' franchise would end the matter. Unfortunately President Kruger was dealing with a man who, if we may judge from these negotiations, had not even an elementary conception of honesty or straightforward dealing in diplomatic matters. As the Outlanders had repudiated the five years' franchise as soon as it was offered them, so Mr. Chamberlain went back on his own proposal of the seven years' franchise and brought forward new demands. Thereupon the negotiations broke off, and war shortly after ensued. But Mr. Rhodes may contend, and contend justly, that, without firing a shot, President Kruger had been brought first to accept the five years' franchise with conditions, only ten per cent. of which were unacceptable, owing to a mere matter of form, and that when this had fallen through, he had accepted the other basis of settlement proffered by the Government, a joint commission to the seven years' franchise. President Kruger, therefore, did climb down, and there was no need for war to secure a settlement on terms laid down by Mr. Chamberlain himself.

THE RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE ULTIMATUM.

That, however, did not suit the book of those who were determined at any cost to destroy the independence of the Transvaal. The attempt to destroy the independence of the Transvaal, by foisting the British flag on the revolutionary movement in Johannesburg in 1895 had miscarried. It was necessary to adopt other means for accomplishing the desired end. Those means were not lacking. A despatch was sent to President Kruger, telling him that we were about to formulate our own proposals for the settlement of the question-proposals which we set about preparing to enforce by despatching ten thousand men to Africa with an army corps in reserve. There was no attempt to disguise the nature of the menace. President Kruger was confronted with a demand that he had to do as we told him or take the consequences. He waited for our proposals for a fortnight. These were held back, and all the while military preparations were pushed forward. Every day the note of menace in our press waxed louder and louder, while our arsenals continued to ring with the clangour of military preparations. The Boers, therefore, believing that they had to submit to their extinction as an independent state or to fight, decided to fight at once instead of waiting until we had brought up all our reinforcements. Hence their ultimatum, in which they formulated a demand that all our troops should be withdrawn from the frontier, and that all the reinforcements sent to Africa since May should be removed. Of course, if the ultimatum were to be regarded as a measure of negotiation, it would be impossible to condemn it too severely. But it was not a possible to condening it to severely. But it was not a measure of negotiation. It was the first act of war. Negotiations had been tried beforehand by President Steyn of the Orange Free State, who in correspondence with Sir A. Milner did his utmost in conciliatory fashion to secure a withdrawal of troops from their menacing positions on the frontier President Steyn's letters had been telegraphed to London, with the omission of the most conciliatory passages, and they shared the same fate as every other proposal emanating from the Dutch of South Africa in favour of peace. The Transvaal ultimatum was merely a cry of defiance and despair. Its very extravagance probably served a purpose in rallying the forces of a little State confronted with extinction. It is difficult adequately to characterise the canting cry of indignation which was raised in this country at the insolence of the Boers. When an empire of 400 millions declares its determination to threaten the extinction of a little republic of forty thousand farmers, it is to the last degree undignified for the stronger Power to pretend to be insulted by anything its smaller victim may say in the hour of its extremity. An eagle pouncing upon a rabbit might as well feel insulted at the squeal of its prey! Mr. Courtney, in the debate which followed Mr. Chamberlain's apology or confession, put the point very fairly when he

Here is a force pressing round these Republics day by day more tightly. Here is a burgher force without any organisation—(Ministerial laughter and cries of "Oh!")—they have no organisation like our own. It is a volunteer force with difficulty kept together and with difficulty sustained. How can you expect them to wait until you come up with all your forces and then communicate your demands under conditions which require instant fu'filment? It is as if two men are disputing and one says, "Tell me what you want," and the other says, "Wait five minutes and I will come back and tell you what I want, and I will bring a loaded pistol with me." (Opposition cheers.)

IS THE PEACE PARTY TO BLAME?

Down to the very day on which the ultimatum was launched appeals were being made by the friends of the Transvaal urging President Kruger to renew in set terms his offer of the five years' franchise. But to all such representations the answer was returned that it was no use going back upon old proposals which had been formally withdrawn by the British Government, and that they were awaiting the new proposals. No mistake can be greater than accusing those who were in support of peace in this country of ever having represented to President Kruger that he could rely upon any support from any section of public opinion. He was told from the first that if Mr. Chamberlain meant to make war no one could stop him. And as President Kruger found all his efforts to make peace were rejected by Mr. Chamberlain, he naturally came to the conclusion that there was for him no escape. If Mr. Gladstone had been alive, and if there had been any organised peace movement in England, the ultimatum would never have been sent, and President Kruger would have trusted to the influence of the peace party to secure the acceptance of the five years' franchise. Unfortunately he had no security. He was shut up face to face with the man whom he believed had conspired to overthrow the Republic in 1895, and was now bent upon forcing him into war in order that he might seize his country. If Mr. Morley, Sir William Harcourt and the rest of us are at all responsible for bringing on this war, it is because we were so careful to insist upon our own impotence. If only we could have inspired President Kruger with the conviction that we could make a good fight for the cause of honesty and right in Parliament, he might have succeeded in keeping back the ultimatum.

IF PARLIAMENT HAD BEEN SITTING.

In that case, it is at least open to discussion as to whether the Government would not have been compelled to kee of Sir Africa says t it was
If this have speech himsel
terms
Presid
The m of the suppor

Lord during have a sudden the nat terms anothe: the inv an emp would followe quently Gladste upon th had pro takes balance explana ranks o have st not pre

The colossal on the Mayor afforded teristic arrogan meeting member almost South 1 " Jeame when a within : into his the lead who ach one can who at o arbitrati ashamed the Boer with all dictum, Republic Chambe ness of The imn a height.

to keep the peace. As Mr. Burns interjected in the course of Sir Edward Clarke's speech, all our troubles arise in Africa when Parliament is not sitting. Mr. Shaw-Lefevre says that Parliament should have been summoned when it was decided to bring the Indian contingent to Natal. If this had been done, it is probable a settlement might have been arrived at. For Mr. Chamberlain's own speeches show how impossible it was for him to justify himself, except by professing a readiness to accept terms which, if the same readiness had been shown to President Kruger, would have averted the present conflict. The moment the ultimatum was issued all the weaklings of the Peace Party hastened to declare that they must support the Government and defend the Empire threatened by the Boer invasion.

to

ing

ad

ost

as uth

vas

va-

of a cult

ion

the

its

olic

fied ny-

its ght Mr.

in's

he day

tion

no

ulty

you

and uire one five nd I

was

the rms

uch no

een

that n be eace

lent

tion

Mr.

im.

ake

ally

ape.

een tum

ould

cure

tely with row

cing

try.

rest war,

own

dent

good

, he

s to

lled

LORD ROSEBERY.

Lord Rosebery, who had preserved a sphinx-like silence during the time when one strong word from him might have arrested the Government in its drift towards war, suddenly found utterance, and emitted a letter summoning the nation to close its ranks and abandon all differences in terms which would hardly have been exaggerated if another Napoleon encamped at Boulogne was threatening the invasion of the country. He concluded his letter by an emphatic declaration that no Ministry in this country would ever make another settlement like that which followed the battle of Majuba. Lord Rosebery subsequently explained, in a speech at Bath, that Mr. Gladstone's policy in that action was an attempt to act upon the divine precepts of the Gospel, but that experience had proved that it was a failure. The Gospel therefore takes a back seat, as it has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. It is doubtful whether the explanation will tend to assuage the bitterness in the ranks of the Liberals, especially of Scotch Liberals, who have stood many things from Lord Rosebery, but were not prepared to hear him flout the hero of Midlothian.

THE MEETING AT THE GUILDHALL.

The action of the Boers in thus turning on their colossal adversary provoked an almost apoplectic display on the part of the City. Sir John Lubbock and the Lord Mayor must divide between them the renown of having afforded the closing century one of the most characteristic exhibitions of purse-proud insolence and vulgar arrogance that has been witnessed in our time. meeting at the Guildhall, attended in full force by members of the Stock Exchange and other patriots, was almost speechless with indignation at the cheek of the South African Republic. It reminded us of a fat "Jeames," purple with rage, cursing himself hoarse when a little rascal whom he was preparing to thrash within an inch of his life, managed to stick a pin into his calves. There are degrees in absurdity, and the leaden laurel should surely be awarded to the man who achieves the zenith of folly. To this high honour no one can dispute the claim of Sir John Lubbock, a man who at one time made great professions in the cause of arbitration and peace, but on this occasion was not ashamed to lead the City claque which howled against the Boers. But even this may be forgiven him, together with all his other offences, for the sake of his famous dictum, that in the negotiations with the South African Republic, Mr. Chamberlain-the Right Honorable Joseph Chamberlain of Birmingham-had displayed the meekness of Moses compounded with the patience of Job! The immortal Pecksniff never surely attained so sublime a height.

THE CALLING OUT OF THE RESERVES.

Meanwhile the turbulent tide of military enthusiasm was swollen by the mustering of the reserves, twenty-three thousand of whom were called up from the pursuits of peaceful industry and restored to their places in the line. Of these twenty-three thousand men great numbers were married, and none, whether married or single, was torn from home without a wrench, bitterly felt by his friends and relatives. The result was a curious development of anger, not against Mr. Chamberlain, who had brought on the war, but against the unfortunate Boers, whose country was to be invaded and whose independence was to be extinguished. It is safe to say that the great majority of the thousands who crowded the streets shouting after their friends had no idea whatever as to the merits of the controversy. The Boers-whose name alone was sufficient to damn them—would not give in, and they had to be made to. That was enough. Among the soldiers themselves the feeling was expressed in the hoarse cry of "Avenge Majuba!" Nineteen years ago a handful of British soldiers, out-generalled and out-fought, were beaten in fair fight by the peasant warriors of the Republic, therefore after nineteen years 70,000 men were to be despatched with vengeance in their hearts in order to pay the Boers out for daring to beat us at Majuba!

Photograph by]

[Wind w and Grove. GENERAL WHITE.

(Commanding the Forces in Natal.)

A. WAR OF REVENGE!

While these feelings were palpitating in the heart of the masses, our spiritual pastors and teachers were for the most part silent, and in some cases were not ashamed to swell the cry for war. Of course they disclaimed the fullvoiced clamour of the people for vengeance, although they are responsible for their spiritual welfare. They talked fine moralities concerning equal rights and the other gilded phrases with which they masked the realities of things. The war itself may be right or may be wrong, may be just or may be unjust-that is a question upon which there may be difference of opinion; but there cannot be any gainsaying the fact that unless the Christian creed is a hollow lie, war for revenge, war for lust of power, or for mere passion for mastery, is a deadly sin. Even if this be the justest of wars, the passions which have urged 90 per cent. of those who clamoured for it are passions which in the old scriptural phrase "are set on fire of hell." What those who constitute our spiritual teaching apparatus seem to ignore is that they are responsible for the souls of their flocks, but they are not responsible for the misconduct of President Kruger. But our warlike pastors, who alas! are found among the Methodists as well as among the Anglicans; have uttered never a word audible to the world in deprecation of the wholesale abandonment on the part of their flocks to this spirit of elementary savagery. Let no apologist for these recreant prelates and apostate ministers pretend that the knowledge of the facts was withheld from their eyes. "Avenge Majuba!" was the cry raised time and again at the railway stations as the troop trains steamed out past the crowded platforms. "Avenge Majuba!" was the watchword given to the troops on their arrival in Natal, and it was with the cry "Avenge Majuba!" on their lips that our troops stormed Elands Laagte and bayonetted the Boers who could not escape their steel. When public meetings were held in favour of peace, bills headed "Remember Majuba!" were distributed broadcast among the people. A scandalous but widely read illustrated sheet places in the centre of its page the declaration that "Avenge Majuba!" is the watchword of the contest. And when Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman made a pointed appeal to the Leader of the House to repudiate any desire for revenge as one of the motives of the war, his appeal appears to have fallen upon deaf ears, for he elicited no response. Anything more unworthy for a great Empire can hardly be conceived than cherishing up a beating for nineteen years, and then to justify a war to destroy the independence of a State by a desire to avenge the defeat of a single regiment in a brush on the frontier. How often must the sun have gone down on our wrath since 1880! We commend that reflection to the eloquent exponents of "The Philanthropy of God," who pride themselves on their consecration to the service of the Prince of Peace.

II.—HOW THE BOERS DEFEND THEIR FATHERLAND.

If the scenes at home were calculated to stir the imagination and rouse the emotion of the most careless bystander, what must those scenes have been which were occurring at the same time in the two small Republics of South Africa? Even at the distance of 3,000 miles, Europe perceived what was passing with sentiments of amazement not untouched with pride, for the universal human heart ever responds to the display of self-sacrificing devotion. In the Orange Free State and the Transvaal the whole manhood of the country, from the grey-beard of seventy to the beardless youth of fifteen, mustered under the four-coloured flag to defend their Fatherland against the legions of Britain.

2. Photograph by gilled 101 110 2000

- [G. R. Kemp.

Helle Salar for th not w led to Civili emoti Ther of the of D fields they A con this r sends Chron the d the st for lib The

waitin

Teleg

Th

whole ancie

stood of th

The

Volks bright retirin psalm is tha same men o since testan camp of pea which Ironsi forgot what upon . be des was st in our never a walk revers Boer I be left people might to ad narrow which Laing' occupi in Na occupi of the the Ti chiefly

Who

A RISING EN MASSE.

The story of this marvellous raising en masse of the whole population recalls the great days of old, when the ancient Greeks of Athens and Sparta, with their allies, stood up to battle and to die to defend the civilisation of the West against the flood of Asiatic invasion. The Boers may have few of the gifts and graces of the Hellenes; but none of the immortal dead who fell at Salamis or Marathon showed greater readiness to die for their country than these peasants of the veldt, who, not waiting to be commandeered, insisted upon being led to the frontier to defend the Republic against its foes. Civilised mankind, which in its boyhood thrilled with emotion at the thought of the gallant three hundred at Thermopylae, cannot remain unresponsive at the spectacle of the simple peasant-folk faring forth through the passes of Drakensburg to seek a bloody death in the battlefields of Natal, glad indeed to die if by their death they can save their Fatherland from the British yoke. A correspondent at Johannesburg, who was a witness of this marvellous rush to arms on the part of the Boers, sends an account of a spectacle, published in the Daily Chronicle of October 31st, which recalls the memory of the days when the Tyrolese rose against Napoleon, or the still more famous struggle which the Switzers waged for liberty against the Hapsburg.

THE CAMP AT VOLKSRUST.

The Boers collected in great camps on the frontier, waiting the declaration of war. Mr. Burleigh, of the Telegraph, furnished a vivid picture of the great camp at Volksrust, extending for two miles, which at night glowed bright with innumerable camp fires, round which before retiring to sleep the peasant warriors raised their evening psalm. For one of the bitter elements of this struggle is that the war is raging between men not only of the same colour and essentially of the same race, but also men of the same common creed. It is the first time since Waterloo that we have been in arms against a Protestant nation. The vision of the long extended African camp with its innumerable camp fires, and its thousands of peasant warriors chanting solemnly the same psalms which fired the soul and nerved the arm of Cromwell's Ironsides, dwells in the memory-a picture not to be forgotten. As ex-President Harrison said when asked what he thought of the war, "A people which enters upon a campaign praying and singing psalms is not to be despised." But even while the camp at Volksrust was still waiting the word to advance, there were those in our country who still persisted that the Boers would never fight; that the result of the conflict would be a walk over for our soldiers, and that at the first serious reverse the untrained, undrilled, irregular forces of the Boer Republics would melt away, and that nothing would be left but a promenade to Pretoria. It seemed as if our people were given over to strong delusions that they might not escape the tribulation that was in store.

THE OFFENSIVE DEFENSIVE.

When the ultimatum expired and the word was givento advance, the Boer commandos poured into the narrow neck of territory, known as the tongue of Natal, which is stretched into the territory of the two Republics.
Laing's Nek, the scene of Colley's reverses, was promptly occupied. Newcastle, the nearest town of importance in Natal, was at once evacuated by the British and occupied without bloodshed by the Boers. The army of the Free State entered Natal further south through the Tintwa Pass. While a third commando, composed chiefly of men raised in Johannesburg, including many Outlanders who had cast in their lot with the Boers, poured through Biggarsberg Nek. Before war broke out the British officers in Natal, General Symons and General Sir George White, expressed themselves sure that they could hold Natal against any number the Boers could bring against them. The available number of the Boer invaders was under-estimated by those who have from the first underrated the serious nature of the task upon which we are embarked.

THREE VICTORIES AND A RETREAT.

The first news we had of the reality and strength of the Boers was concealed by the fact that in the first collision with our troops they experienced a reverse, which cost us, however, the life of General Symons, who fell fighting at the head of his men near Glencoe at the battle of Talana Hill. The Boers, who had taken up a strong position from which to attack our camp, were vigorously assailed and driven back. Our losses were-officers, 11 killed and 22 wounded; men, 27 killed and 167 wounded. This action was represented as a great and at first as a decisive victory. The Boers were said to have been utterly routed, cannon captured, and the whole force demoralised. Hardly had we time to rejoice over this first success when the news came of the battle of Elands Laagte, in which our arms were again triumphant over a force in a strong position, and again we were told that the Boers were utterly routed and cut to pieces. Then came news of a third fight at Rietfontein, in which General White was engaged, and which also terminated

THE LATE GENERAL PENN SYMONS.

ded

ong

ted

ion

est.

ate

ar,

for ra

up

10 age

ier.

ath

ent

ide

the

he

ess

ere of

es

of ic-

he

he

n,

eir

victoriously for our arms; but again the victory was won with a severe loss of life. Three victories, all decisive, all crushing, against three separate Boer armies, who we were told would never dare to face our men again—such was the news which cheered the British heart at the opening of the campaign. And then to the amazement and dismay of those who had exulted over their three brilliant victories, we were astonished by hearing that the Foors instead of being dispersed in irretrievable ruin were closing in, and in the face of their steady advance it was indispensable to abandon our camp at Grencoe and make a hurried retreat to Ladysmith, leaving our wounded and some of our stores in the hands of the Boers!

The strategical movement to the rear was brilliantly executed, but the two-mile column which threaded its way through the narrow defiles between Glencoe Ladysmith and was fortunate in escaping the attention of the enemy, otherwise it is not difficult to see what might have happened to the heavilyladen column as it tramped through the mud and wound its way through passes where fifty men could have kept an army at bay. The concentration of our force was successfully accomplished at Ladysmith. General White has 10,000 men under his command, and the Boers are said to have 18,000 men concentrated within striking distance of Ladysmith.

THE LOSS OF THE TWO BATTALIONS.

The Boers under General Joubert closing in upon Ladysmith in great force, General White made a reconnaissance in force on October 30th, which pushed the Boers back for several miles and revealed the strength of their position—information gained at the cost of 100 killed and wounded. But at the moment when the success of the reconnaissance was secured, a force of from 1,000 to 1,500 men, consisting of the 10th Mountain Battery, four and a half companies of the Gloucester and six companies of the Royal Irish Fusiliers under Lieut.-Colonel Carleton, which had been sent out on the 20th inst. to turn the Boers' right flank near Nicholson's Nek, was forced to surrender. When within two miles of their destination two boulders rolling down the hill—apparently by accident—and a few rifle shots stampeded the mules, which bolted, carrying with them the battery and the greater portion of the reserve small arm ammunition. Colonel Carleton, who appears to have had no communication with Ladysmith,

and

on

the

the car

offic

our

nati

to d agai

The

prey

that vear

torti

mor

dare mea

hum

gnat

been

but (

taint

Batt

tainl

Mr.

Nata

front

War

subje

regar

Mafe

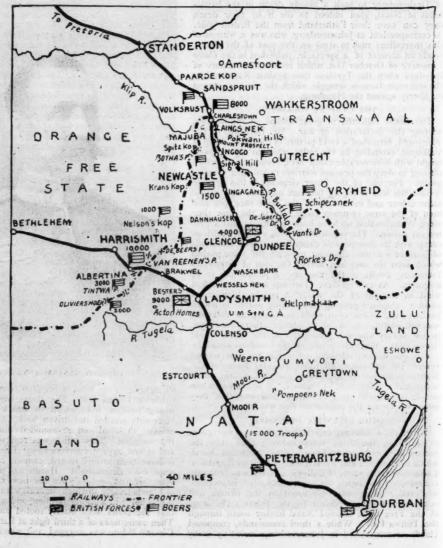

smal

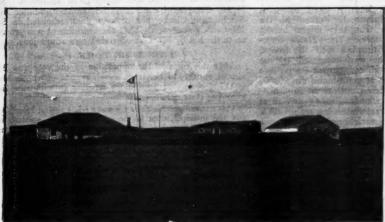

enem

has e

La

T

THE FORT AT MAFEKING.

and his troops established themselves in a strong position on a hill-top and waited for dawn. When the sun rose they were attacked by the Boers. The little force on the hill-top fought till three o'clock, and then their last cartridge having been fired, they surrendered. Forty-two officers, a battery of screw guns and over a thousand of our best soldiers fell into the hands of the Boers.

THE RÔLE OF THE BATTERY MULE.

There is a story in the mythology of the Semitic nations which is told to illustrate the folly of the arrogance which mortal man displays when he ventures to defy the Almighty. The mighty monarch who reared the Tower of Babel in order that he might wage war against high Heaven found all his plans miscarried. Then God sent a gnat which, entering in at the ear, preyed upon his brain, causing him such exquisite agony that he was glad to have his skull incessantly beaten for years with brazen hammers as a counter-irritant to the torture within. And this was done, says the Eastern moralist, to show that when the most powerful of mortals dare to defy God, the Almighty can use one of the meanest of His creatures to abase the pride of man and humble him in the dust. The rôle assigned to the gnat in the Semitic legend seems last month to have been entrusted to the battery mule.

Ladysmith, for the present, is reported to be secure, but General White's position gives rise to grave uncertainty. So far as the campaign has gone, the God of Battles, to whom Mr. Chamberlain appealed, has certainly not pronounced a very favourable verdict upon Mr. Chamberlain's war.

THE WAR ON THE WESTERN FRONTIER.

While the chief fighting has taken place in Northern Natal the Boers have swarmed across the western frontier into the territory secured for Great Britain by the Warren expedition. They have severed railway communications between Kimberley and the Cape, and have subjected Kimberley and Mafeking to what may be regarded rather as a beleaguerment than a siege. At Mafeking, Colonel Baden-Powell is in command of a small force, with which he has succeeded in holding the enemy at bay. At Kimberley, where Mr. Cecil Rhodes has established his headquarters, there are about three thousand diamond miners armed with rifles, and about one thousand other troops. Mr. Rhodes declares he feels as safe as if he were in Piccadilly, but communication with the outside world is only obtained by despatch riders, who risk their lives in riding through the lines of the Boers in the darkness of the night. There have been various menacing movements in the direction of Aliwal North and elsewhere on the Cape frontier, but up to the moment of writing no serious military operations have taken place outside Natal, and the investment of Mafeking and Kimberley.

"MY BROTHER BOER."

There are few things so utte ly bad in this world but that they have some compensations in their train, and this war is no exception. It has not lasted more than a fortnight, but both Boers and Britons have learned to respect each other much more than at the outbreak of the war. The contempt with which the baser Boers and Britons regarded each other would yield to nothing short of the rough surgery of the battlefield. Already those of our newspapers which distinguished themselves by the most infamous attacks upon the Boers before the war have been compelled to change their tune and to confess that the Boer of the Transvaal is a foeman not unworthy of our steel. The war correspondents on the spot who saw how the Boer acquitted himself in the fight, are loud in their praises of the sturdy valour of these untrained men. Pitted against regular soldiers, they have fought as bravely as if t'rey had been trained to arms, and have proved, considerably to the astonishment of the professional soldier, that a mere militia, gathered at random from the farm, the counting-house, and the mine, is capable of holding a position with a tenacity and courage that could not be outdone by the regular soldiers of any European army. There is, after all, something in the righteousness of a cause, and patriots who are voluntarily giving their life for the sake of their country are apt to sell that life very dear. The Johannesburg levy, which held the crown of the hill at Elands Laagte, was regarded by the Boers as the worst belonging to their army. But, according to Mr. Steevens, they fought with astonishing resolution against, our terrific attack. Their artillery was in particular splendidly served, two of the guns being so skilfully and continuously worked in the face of a superior gun-fire that they might almost have been a complete battery. The Times correspondent, who charged up the hill with the troops, has described how much he was impressed by the splendid stand made by a small company of Boers, into whom we were pouring bullets at point-blank range. Of the Boers themselves the correspondents speak in high terms. Mr. Mitchell, of the Standard, says nearly all of them are tall, strongly built men, while a few are veritable giants. Mr. Steevens says their bearing is at once manly and grave, dignified and courteous. In short, they appear like rather dirty country gentlemen. campaign will not last long before our own men will need a deal of washing to be made clean! A strong testimony borne by Mr. Selous to the character of the Boers has done something to still the campaign of calumny by which the better judgment of the nation was poisoned when peace or war hung in the balance. The conduct of the Boers in the treatment of the wounded and their regard for the amenities of chivalrous warfare have been repeatedly recognised by correspondents, but there are still accusations as to the abuse of flags of truce. These occur in all wars and are common to both sides.

ARMOURED ENGINE IN USE AT MAFEKING.

III .-- THE WAR IN PARLIAMENT.

To provide for the expenses of this war, Parliament voted a sum of ten millions sterling, hypothecating for the purpose a prospective surplus of three millions, and making provision to add eight millions to the floating debt. This is but the beginning of the expenditure. What the war will cost before it is over no one ventures even to estimate. It will not really begin until the 15th of December, when General Buller expects to be ready with his army corps, now on its way to the Cape, to begin his northward march to Pretoria. The world has been scoured for mules to serve as baggage animals on the thousand mile march from the Cape to the Transvaal. The railway will, no doubt, be available for part of the distance, but for the greater part of the way General Buller will have to march, as did Julius Cæsar.

SIR EDWARD CLARKE'S INDICTMENT.

The chief feature in the debate in Parliament was the speech in which Sir Edward Clarke exposed to the world the hollowness of the Ministerial plea for the war. Sir Edward Clarke is a staunch Conservative, and therefore his arguments were listened to with much more attention than if they had proceeded from a Liberal mouth. This lamentable war, said he, was absolutely unnecessary, and his exposure of the method in which the blundering negotiations of Mr. Chamberlain had brought about this great catastrophe will sink deeper and deeper into the both sides of the House that a great blow had been dealt the Administration. Sir Edward Clarke's exposure was followed up by Mr. Morley and Mr. Courtney with great effect, and it was a scene of strange excitement in which Mr. Balfour made his appeal, ad misericordiam, to the House not to accept an amendment the carrying of which would be regarded by the world at large, not as a mere condemnation of Mr. Chamberlain's diplomacy, but as an attack on the good faith of the country, and as showing that we deliberately intended and desired to provoke war. One hundred and thirty-five members, a majority of the whole Liberal Party, voted in favour of this amendment, which was defeated by a majority of 227, 362 votes being given against it. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman did not vote, neither did Sir Edward Clarke, but both of them admitted, in Sir Edward Clarke's words, that the amendment was proved up to the hilt by Mr. Chamberlain's own admissions.

THE PLAIN TRUTH.

After this division the opposition of the vote was left almost entirely to the Irish members, one of whom, Mr. P. O'Brien, was suspended for refusing to withdraw the following statement:—

This war was an unjust war; it was a crime against humanity, and the principal actor in the crime had, in his opinion, his hands as deeply stained with blood as any criminal who ever went to the scaffold. He referred to the Colonial Secretary.

VIINA

replie

to se

his v told be s Char after with to sa

I h

Mr.

autho

Trans

Majes

ono No

these

dedi

is no

the s pass

of st almo

of C

of th

servi for e

stan

The motion for suspension was carried by 316 votes to 26. The House of Commons is supposed to be the arena dedicated to freedom of speech, but it would seem that it is not permitted for an honourable member to anticipate the sentence which the historian of the future will assuredly pass upon the war and its author.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S TRUTHFULNESS.

Mr. Chamberlain, in the course of the brief session, succeeded in preserving his evil prominence for inaccuracy of statement. In small things, as in great, it seems almost impossible for him to avoid misleading the House of Commons. Take, for instance, his point blank denial of the charge that he had refused to avail himself of the services of the representative of the Transvaal in London for explaining his meaning and for promoting a good understanding between the two Governments. Mr. Chamberlain replied to this accusation by saying that Mr. Montagu White, the Consul-General in question, had never asked to see him, or had he done so he would not have refused his visit. That is not the question. Mr. White had been told by the Colonial Office that if he was wanted he would be sent for. He was sent for repeatedly when Mr. Chamberlain was in trouble about the Jameson Raid, but afterwards he was left severely alone. But not content with this misleading answer, Mr. Chamberlain went on to say:

New York World.]

IS THIS THE REASON FOR AMERICA'S SILENCE ?

I have never heard it, it has never entered into my mind, that Mr. Montagu White was ever commissioned, instructed, or authorised by President Kruger, or by the Government of the Transvaal, to enter into any negotiations whatsoever with Her Majesty's Government.

210 Now what can be thought of a Minister who makes these statements to the House of Commons in the face of the fact that he himself produced before the South African Committee a letter addressed to himself from Mr. Fairfield of the Colonial Office expressly affirming that Lord Salisbury was communicating with the Transvaal Government on the Drift question through Mr. Montagu White? This is written evidence, and on record, and it can be confirmed to any extent. As to the political negotiations, Mr. Chamberlain, when he was in difficulties, was very glad to try to arrange through Mr. White. It was only when he determined to destroy the independence of the Transvaal that he refused to recognise the diplomatic functions of her accredited representative in London.

IV.-A PIRATE WAR.

The war which was begun on glozing pretexts by a demand for equal rights for all white men in South Africa, has been rapidly converted into a war of conquest pure and simple. The juggle commenced with the word Suzerainty, which, not being sufficiently intelligible to the man in the street, has been abandoned for the word Paramountcy. We are told we are fighting for the Paramountcy of Great Britain in South Africa. Now paramountcy is a word meaning everything and nothing. It may be taken to include the right of dictating to the South African Republics on matters of internal regulation, in a fashion which would not be tolerated in any British Colony. The doctrine of paramountcy, which has been extended from the Transvaal to the Free State, which is admittedly a sovereign international State, is not likely to be regarded with complaisance by the other South African Powers-Portugal and Germany, to wit. There is room here for a pretty quarrel if our highflyers do not abate the extravagance of their pretensions.

" EQUAL RIGHTS."

The cant phrase about equal rights as applied to the refusal of President Kruger to naturalise foreigners within less than seven years after their arrival in the country, is one of the question-begging phrases which are dear to those mischiefmongers who make wars. Thanks to the misuse of this term many people believe that the Transvaal does not give to Englishmen the same privileges which they give to Dutchmen of Europe or Dutchmen of the Cape. As a matter of fact, all foreigners are treated on a footing of exact equality. Dutchmen equally with Englishmen must reside seven years in the country before they can get a vote, and they must undertake the obligation to serve in commandos equally with the Burghers of the country. It is in order to compel the Boers to reduce the term of years necessary for naturalisation from seven to five years that this war is being waged. Of course it is a fraud, and a very transparent fraud, but how anybody can appeal to the God of Battles to give us the victory, when we have gone to war with a lie in our right hand, it is difficult to say.

FOREIGN OPINION.

The spectacle of two Christian nations engaged in a death struggle over such pretexts as this has naturally scandalised the world. Europe is absolutely unanimous. One of the ablest Ministers of a neutral and minor Power, who is very well disposed to England, remarked the other day: "There is not a legation on the Continent in which the good name of England does not stand lower than it did before. There is only one opinion everywhere: we all think that your war was got up on hypocritical pretexts in order to enable you to grab the gold mines." We are, in short, everywhere regarded, to use Mr. Morley's expressive phrase, as a pirate Empire. Nor are we any better than pirates because, before setting out on this pira-

Sir

Sir

ved

left

Mr.

the

ity,

his

ever

tical expedition, we have arrayed ourselves in the garments of Chadband and used the cant of Pecksniff. It is easy to say that it is all their jealousy which leads them to express such an opinion. That might explain the minds of the only three great Powers in Europe who are in any way our rivals, but excluding France, Germany and Russia, none of the other nations can be regarded as rivals, and many especially of the smaller States have looked up to us with feelings of admiration and reverence, but whether it is Switzer or Swede, Belgian or Portuguese, the verdict is universal. None has a good word to say for us, and everyone would feel that if we met some crushing disaster we should only be reaping our deserts.

WHAT THE AMERICANS THINK.

Mr. Chamberlain, casting his eye round the horizon in the hope of finding any Christian civilised Power who did not consider his conduct worthy of reprobation, imagined he heard some faint approbation from across But so far from American opinion the Atlantic being favourable to our action in this matter, it is in America only where there has been a strong organised and vigorous effort to compel their Government to interfere nominally in the cause of Peace, but in reality to save the Republics of South Africa from the grasp of The memorial to President McKinley, the spoiler. calling upon him to offer his mediation in the interests of Peace, is signed by President Kruger, President Steyn and Mr. Schreiner as head of the Dutch Ministry at the Cape. The expressions of opinion which have accompanied the signatures to the memorial are very significant, and show better than anything else how severe a strain Mr. Chamberlain's predatory raid on the Republics of South Africa is placing on our relation with the great Republic of the West.

THE PROSPECT OF MEDIATION.

It is very natural that President McKinley should shrink from offering his mediation between Mr. Chamberlain and the Transvaal, owing to the fact that Mr. Chamberlain has proclaimed aloud that he would regard the mediation of a foreign Power as an equivalent to a denial of his thesis that the Transvaal Republic has no sovereign international rights. All this is mere jugglery with words. The South African Republic is a sovereign international State, subject to one limitation only, that of the fourth article of the Convention of London, which says nothing to deprive it of the advantage of the friendly intervention of neutral Powers in the quarrel in which it is engaged. The Transvaal has treaties with foreign states, it is a party to the Geneva Convention, it is expressly authorised to appoint its own diplomatic agents abroad, and to conduct its own international diplomacy without let or hindrance, so long as it does not make treaties hostile to British interests. Should it do so, that treaty may be vetoed by England six months after its completion. In every other respect the international status of the Transvaal is as good as the international status of the United States of America. Nevertheless, so long as Mr. Chamberlain is in his present mood there is no likelihood of any serious offer to mediate. But it will be with him as it was with the sinner spoken of by the Psalmist, who, in the time of his prosperity forgot his Maker, but in the time of adversity was very quick to implore His aid. For the moment the wicked is spreading himself like a green bay tree, but before the war ends we may have reason to implore that mediation which at present we scornfully

WILL GERMANY INTERFERE?

It is gaily assumed by the light-hearted war-makers, who so far have seen their every prediction falsified, that we are to be allowed a free hand to wipe out the Orange Free State and the Transvaal. Many a brave man will die, both British and Boer, before we are in a position to discuss that question; but supposing that superior force triumphs, and that we have slaughtered the Boers into sullen submission, what warrant is there for believing that the annexation of the South African Republics will meet with no protest abroad? It is assumed that Germany is ready to acquiesce in anything we wish, but no Power in the world is more strict in acting upon the principle, nothing for nothing, than the Government of Germany. Germany warned us four years ago that she regarded the maintenance of the independence of the Transvaal, under the Convention of 1884, as indispensable for German interests, and that warning still stands.

POSSIBLE COMPLICATIONS.

Further, the Dutch Government has great interests in the country, not merely because of sympathy of race, but also because the Netherlands Railway is a Dutch company. Holland, it will be said, is a little Power, and we can snap our fingers at any representations from the Government at the Hague. But supposing, what is by no means improbable, that we should not see our way to give in to Germany, in Samoa for instance, to the extent desired at Berlin, what would be more natural than for the Dutch Government to receive the friendly support of the German Government in protesting against any proposal to alter the political status of the South African Republic. Nor is that the only danger that may be anticipated. If Russia were to obtain the cession of Ceuta from Spain where would we be then? In France the memory of Fashoda still lingers, and as soon as we are fast by the leg in South Africa, and in strained relations with Germany, France would be more than human if she were to abstain from raising the Egyptian Question. What will happen in China no one can foresee. But one thing is certain, and that is that we shall be blackmailed by all our rivals, who will squeeze us remorselessly now they have the chance. And more—they will feel morally justified by the evidence which this war affords of the absence of all good faith by the present Ministers of the Crown.

OUR REAL WEAKNESS.

This brings me to the last point—which is to repeat once more the warning which has hitherto fallen upon deaf ears-namely, that our strength depends much more upon our integrity and good faith than upon any material elements whatever. If we are at this moment hated and distrusted by all our neighbours, it is because we have given them good occasion to believe that in our dealings with the South African Republic we have trodden truth under foot and have trampled honour and good faith in the dust! "The Scandal of the South African Committee," which I have set out in plain words for plain men in my last published pamphlet, tells a story which no Englishman can read without a blush. The conduct of that Committee and the way in which the plain issue vital to the honour and good faith of the country was shirked, despite the most vehement protests of those who knew the facts, has done more to weaken us and will do more to weaken us, than the loss of a pitched battle or the destruction of a fleet.

"There was one thing more important than men, more im the It Er de inf by who are tion of info the the now must pen Afi persord

can

Photograph by]

[Elliott and Fry.

important than money, more important than ships when they dealt with the affairs of such an Empire as ours. It was that honour and good faith and the word of Englishmen should be maintained. . . . They might depend upon it that, however great our power and our influence, our Empire was maintained more surely than by anything else by the honour and good faith of England."

LT.-COL. BADEN-POWELL, THE DEFENDER OF MAFEKING.

These are the words of Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, who is not only a member of the present Administration, but has done more to destroy confidence in our honour and good faith than anything else that has happened in his lifetime. It is not a party question-would that it were; for if we had one party free from the stain of this infamy there might be some hope. Unfortunately both are tarred with the same brush, and we must flounder from dishonour to dishonour and from disaster to disaster until we learn from bitter tribulation the consequence of putting our trust in a refuge of lies.

TO ALL FRIENDS OF PEACE.

I SHALL be very glad to hear from those of my readers who feel as I do on the subject of this iniquitous war, and are willing to co-operate with me in forming an Association of Friends of Peace with branches in every centre of population, which can be relied upon to circulate information and to use every available means-whether the Press, the platform or private conversation-to open the eyes of the people to a sense of the crime which is now in progress in South Africa. As a medium of communication between all such persons I have started a penny weekly paper, entitled War against War in South Africa, a sample copy of which will be sent to any person on receipt of a postcard. It can be obtained on order from any bookstall or newsagent.

I have also published the following pamphlets, which can either be ordered through the trade or else obtained direct from my office at Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, London, W.C. :-

"Shall I Slay My Brother Boer?" (price 6d.).

"Are We in the Right in South Africa?" (price 6d.). "The Scandal of the South African Committee" (price 6d.).

The above will be sent in quantities for distribution at 30s. per hundred.

A penny pamphlet of sixty-four pages, entitled "The Truth about the War," uniform in size with the Masterpiece Library of Penny Poets, is supplied, for purposes of distribution, at 5s. a hundred or £2 a thousand (not including carriage).

War against War in South Africa is a penny weekly, which can be posted for 11d., or three copies will be forwarded, post free, for 4d.

kers, . that range n will on to force ullen t the with ready n the ciple, nany.

d the vaal, e for ts in race. utch and 1 the at is way the tural endly sting s of only e to 1 we still outh ance from n in tain, vals, the l by fall

once deaf nore erial and have ings ruth h in omlain

h no t of vital ked, new nore the

nore

LEADING ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE POLICY THAT LED TO THE WAR.

(1) THE "QUARTERLY'S" VERDICT.

THERE is a melancholy agreement between opponents and supporters of the present Administration that for the war in South Africa the Imperial Government is very largely responsible. Opponents blame the conduct of our Government during the last few months. Supporters blame the conduct of our Government in 1881 and 1884. According to either version it is still our Government which is chiefly to blame. The patriot, as distinguished from the partisan, can only reflect with shame that, whichever account be true, Great Britain is accountable for most of the blood that is now being shed. The nation, one and the same, whether under Gladstone or under Salisbury, bears the guilt. This agreement as to our national blood-guiltiness between otherwise opposing witnesses ought to exert a chastening influence. The Quarterly Review, in its paper on British supremacy in South Africa, applauds Mr. Chamberlain's present policy, but traces most of the trouble back to the policy which Mr. Chamberlain supported fifteen and eighteen years ago.

THE BLUNDERS OF OUR GOVERNMENT.

The reviewer calls up what he considers a succession of blunders. The annexation of the Transvaal was a grave mistake: in manner and time rather than in the act itself. "The incapacity of our civil administration in the Transvaal was only exceeded by the incompetence of our military administration." The indictment culminates with "Majuba." "Throughout South Africa our surrender to the Boers after our defeat at Majuba was regarded in its true character as an absolute and ignominious capitulation." It was regarded as "a deathblow to British supremacy in South Africa." Then in 1884, when we allowed the Transvaal to call itself the South African Republic, "the consent of Great Britain to the assumption of this title by the Boer State was considered throughout South Africa as the formal recognition of the claim of the Transvaal to the hegemony of the Dutch race." The reviewer declares :-

Even at the present day our South African fellow-countrymen cannot get rid of their innate distrust of the sincerity and continuity of our Imperial policy; and this distrust is by no means the least potent of the causes which have now forced Great Britain to undertake another war with the Transvaal.

WHAT LIES AT THE BOTTOM OF ALL

The secret of the war policy of Mr. Chamberlain is thus explained:—

We are convinced that when the inner history of the events which have led up to the present crisis is more fully known, it will become manifest that the dominant consideration which has led our British authorities, both at home and abroad, to espouse the cause of the Uitlanders, at the risk of war, has been a conviction that a refusal to espouse this cause would be attended with the greatest peril to Great Britain as the paramount Power in South Africa. That such peril should exist may appear unintelligible to stay at-home Englishmen. The peril, however, is only too intelligible to all persons acquainted with South Africa. It may well seem to outsiders that in all discussions about South African matters Majuba crops up much in the same way as King Charles's her a used to crop up in Uncle Dick's memorials as related in "David Copperfield." But, as a matter of fact, Majuba lies at the bottom of the whole Boer-

British controversy, now drawing near to a conclusion. Our surrender of the Transvaal after an ignominious campaign and a disgraceful defeat well-nigh signed the death-warrant of British empire in South Africa.

Majuba lies at the bottom of it all. There the stately Quarterly joins hands with the gutter-prints of Jingoism. The writer rejoices in the way "the new diplomacy" has educated the opinion of the Empire to discern the true issue, the maintenance of British "suzerainty, supremacy, paramountcy, call it what you will." He says:—

For this unanimity of British sentiment, even if we think our negotiations have been unnecessarily protracted, our dispatches too frequent and too long, we have deep cause to be grateful to the policy of the Colonial Office under the direction of Mr. Chamberlain.

CURIOUS PARALLEL.

The writer concludes by drawing a parallel between the present struggle and the American Civil War. He says:—

According to the strict letter of the written law, it seems probable that the Southern States were within their rights. But a higher law was against them—the law of salus populi; and the greatness of Lincoln consists in his grasp of this fact, and his resolve that, at whatever cost, it must take precedence of every other consideration. . . We have been driven, like Lincoln, to desert technicalities and minor issues, and to place the conflict on a broader basis; and we have now to carry it to a similar end.

(2) THE "EDINBURGH'S" CRITICISMS.

The Edinburgh Review takes a more independent line. At the outset it remarks on the superior ability of the Scotch to understand the Boers, and quotes Sir Harry Johnston's statement that "had Scotchmen been sent out to administer Cape Colony in its early days it is probable that something like a fusion might have taken place." Passing to the present crisis, the writer describes Sir Alfred Milner's "helots" as "an absurdly exaggerated phrase," and deeply regrets that High Commissioner and Colonial Secretary did not at once and publicly repudiate the extreme demands of the South African League. The writer proceeds:—

Perhaps as a mere matter of diplomacy (if the importance of an immediate settlement of the franchise difficulty is considered) it might have been better for the Secretary of State to have abstained in his despatch from any reference to the doubtful claim of the "suzerainty" under the Convention of 1881, and to the "paramountey" of Great Britain over the South African Republic, both of which claims not unnaturally always suggest to the Boers that they hold a position of vassalage to the British Empire, far beyond the restrictions imposed by the Convention of 1884, which restrictions have never seriously been disputed by President Kruger.

Referring to the excellent prospect which once prevailed of the Boers conceding the five years' qualification and a larger share of Outlander representation, the writer says:—

Perhaps, in view of these immense and immediate gains, it might have been more diplomatic not to refer to the "etymological question" of the suzerainty, or to propose to bring the President to Cape Town to talk over with the High Commissioner all other outstanding questions. We do not know how this may be; but the South African Republic did not at once send a reply, and the High Commissioner, representing Utilander feeling, urgently pressed the Home Government to come to an immediate decision.

The It is should and p race a nation by mu are to South has bee send of inva at pub with s and his counse door o they, a tember reader astonis vaal, t should show t in Soul

In the made of in such be lar, mostly is hard will de ultimat and go there in fluence the stra "Impe

The

"AN
The paid to Free S collision viction it to express Britis

British to ever fighting When fourteer to them cannot whether with wi is over constitution on the control of the cannot the variations of the control of the control of the control of the cannot constitute the cannot constitute the cannot constitute the cannot control of the cannot cont

A po nation down."

Mr. Review "MUCH WILD, WRITING AND SPEAKING,"

The writer thus rebukes the stokers of racial hatred :-It is right that cases of injustice, or unfairness, or tyranny should be inquired into; but it is not right by gross exaggeration and partisan statements to use them to inflame still further a race animosity already lamentably violent. Since August last national feeling has run high, and excitement has been fanned by much wild writing and speaking. It is not a question, we are told, of justice or of good faith, but of who is to rule in South África. And throughout September constant pressure has been put on the Government to break off negotiations and 'send an ultimatum" to President Kruger, backed by an army When responsible men urged patience and peace at public meetings, attempts were made to drown their voices with shouts of "Majuba Hill." Nevertheless, Lord Salisbury and his Cabinet have resolutely refused to listen to these violent counsels, and at the date we are writing they have not closed the door on their temperate proposals of September 8th; nor have they, as might have been expected from the despatch of September 22nd, made any further demands. Surely the intelligent reader of this long diplomatic correspondence must feel lost in astonishment when he remembers what war means to the Transvaal, to South Africa, and to the British Empire, that war should arise out of a discussion in which the two Governments show themselves so very nearly agreed! But is British power in South Africa really trembling !

"THE STRANGEST NIGHTMARE."

The issue which the Quarterly finds to be so plain and urgent the Edinburgh thus laughs out of court:—

In the South African Republic itself, because money is to be made there, and because there is a future, Englishmen flock in in such overwhelming numbers as to prove that that future will be largely and surely theirs. Already the foreign element, mostly English, number two-thirds of the population, though it is hardly more than a dozen years since the influx began. Facts will decide far more surely than the best penned despatches what ultimately will be the complexion of South African civilisation and government—whether English or Dutch. The notion that there is a formidable Dutch conspiracy "to oust British influence" (that, we think, is the phrase) "from South Africa" is the strangest nightmare that ever afflicted the most nervous of "Imperialist" minds.

"AN UNCOMFORTABLE SEARCHING OF CONSCIENCE."

The writer regrets that more attention has not been paid to the attitude of the Cape Dutch and of the Orange Free State. The Free State has everything to lose by a collision with the Imperial Government, and only a conviction that its independence is threatened could induce it to fight us. The same uneasiness of conscience is expressed towards the close. The writer says:—

British victory, therefore, which is not in doubt, involves British rule. But the mere fact that this is so makes it appear to every citizen of the Republic of the Free State that he is fighting for national independence against an English conqueror. When Englishmen read of old men of seventy and of boys of fourteen flocking into the ranks to fight what undoubtedly seems to them the battle of freedom against a foreign conqueror, they cannot but feel an uncomfortable searching of conscience as to whether these things must really be, and whether this war cannot with wisdom and honour be even yet avoided. When the war is over what is to be our next step? All of us had hoped to see the various States of South Africa freely working out their own constitution, and forming in time a great federation under, and proud of, the British flag. It is bad to build a free constitution on the ruins left by racial war.

A postscript written after the ultimatum declares "the nation must accept the challenge so recklessly thrown down"

(3) A CONTEMPORY JUDGMENT.

Mr. Percy A. Molteno, writing in the Contemporary Review upon "The Cause of the War," maintains that it is largely due to the Press; and of this evil influence he regards Sir Alfred Milner as the chief embodiment. He says that the "hopes excited by Sir Alfred Milner's appointment were grievously and utterly disappointed. The Press of the world in its excitement of the more violent feelings is not a force tending to the peaceful solution of international difficulties," Unfortunately Sir Alfred Milner has received his training as a pressman, and that in a highly dangerous school-a school of extreme sentiment. "If Mr. Stead may be believed," says Mr. Molteno, "Sir Alfred Milner acted as a moderating factor during his Press experience. Yet a perusal of his despatches shows that the sciolism of the Press is patent on every page. The position of High Commissioner of South Africa demanded the highest diplomatic qualities, and the widest and most tried experience. It has been filled by a man who writes brilliant leading articles and calls them despatches."

THE HIGH COMMISSIONER'S FAILURE.

Sir Alfred Milner's action in South Africa exactly reproduces the character and action of the governors who habitually misinformed George III. as to the feelings of the American colonists. Sir Alfred Milner began by aspersing the loyalty of the Dutch inhabitants of South Africa, and indicted a whole nation. He lectured the people of Graaff Reinet as though they had been children, and when they assured him of their loyalty he told them he did not need any superfluous assertions of this character. He knew that they could not be disloyal. Nevertheless, in his famous despatch of May 4th he impugned their loyalty, and supported his statement as to the disloyalty of the Dutch by quoting an anonymous article published in a newspaper called the Stellalander in a remote country town, the very existence of which was unknown to ninety-nine out of a hundred South Africans. Mr. Conyngham Greene's method of conducting negotiations with the Transvaal Government was modelled upon the tone and manner of the officials sent out to America a hundred years ago.

LORD ROSMEAD'S SUCCESS.

Then Mr. Molteno quotes Lord Rosmead as a greater authority than Sir Alfred Milner. Lord Rosmead laid it down in the strongest manner that the day for direct Imperial interference in the affairs of South Africa was passed;

The consensus of opinion of Imperial and colonial statesmen is all but alsolutely unanimous on the point. To-day we see a Governor and High Commissioner who goes full in the face of this great consensus of opinion, who refuses to modify his policy by a consideration of the expressed views of the Ministers of Cape Colony, who appeals to the "British Press," as he calls it, against the views of the constituted authorities—Her Majesty's Ministers in South Africa—for support to his views. "The British Press throughou: South Africa is practically unanimous at my back" (C. 9415, p. 14). The result was patent to all who knew anything of the history of the country and its circumstances. The aspersions on the loyalty of the Dutch by men in official position can only tend to make them disloyal. All their actions have been of a contrary character. Their support to the Imperial Navy, their grant to the Imperial Government of the full control of Simonstown, have testified that they are absolutely loyal. But these go for nothing against the extracts from the Stellalander.

MAKING A REVOLUTION.

We are now stationing troops in opposition to the warnings of local constituted authorities in the midst of the Dutch districts, with a result which will probably resemble only too closely the adoption of a similar policy when the British troops were quartered on the inhabitants

Jur

ish ėly

m.

he

re-

ink

lis-

be en

He

li;

ct,

ice

ke

ice

he

TV

ut.

ole

e."

Sir

ed

nd

ite

he

of

d) ful

to an est

sh

on

by

on

ne

it

ohe

n.

W

at

ng

of Boston. Benjamin Franklin told a Committee of the House of Commons that if troops were sent to America, they would not find a revolution, but they would be only too likely to make one. Mr. Molteno ridicules the idea that there was any danger, even the most remote, to British predominance or to British prestige in South Africa. The sciolists of the Press, making constant reference to newspaper articles printed in a journal edited by men who have only recently arrived in the country, and whose leading exponent has admitted that they have long since abandoned all moderation, and who have not hesitated to clamour for the blood of their fellow-subjects, have forced on a disastrous war, in opposition to the warnings of all authorities, including Mr. Chamberlain himself. The policy of force was always reprobated by Lord Rosmead:—

To the writer, in discussing this question, he expressed the view that "the British Government might send large forces to Sou'h Africa, it might spend £20,000,000 upon an expedition, it might conquer the country, it might largely increase the income-tax to do so, but that when it had done all that it would have achieved the result of having created an Ireland in South Africa." We are now witnessing the results of the very policy condemned by Lord Rosmead, and his forebodings are being only too faithfully fulfilled. We have seen above that South Africa unanimously supported Lord Rosmead's policy, it was acquiesced in by Mr. Chamberlain while Lord Rosmead remained in Africa, and apparently until March of this year, when it was suddenly abandoned for the new policy of the new man.

THE DUTCH AS INTERCESSORS.

Mr. Molteno's conclusion is that the Cape Dutch may still be relied upon to bring this war to an end :-

The way was open for mediation and the Government desired it. Mr. Schreiner and his Government and Mr. Hofmeyr had allowed their willingness to be known to do all in their power to effect a peaceful arrangement. This service is still open, notwithstanding the fatal steps already taken. It should be our object to minimise and bring to a conclusion, with as little delay as possible, a war which should not have been begun. Let us reflect that the question fifteen or twenty years hence will not be, whether we had the power to invade and conquer independent Dutch South Africa, but whether we were doing right when we did so.

(4) A CAPITALIST'S COMPANY.

Mr. W. Niddrie, writing in the Humanitarian for November, maintains that the chief cause of the agitation which led to the war was the determination of the capitalists to bring about a lowering of wages, and thus increase their already immense profits. The "iniquities" of the Boer Government-consist in fiscal measures which, by keeping up the general cost of living, force the mining companies to pay wages which leave, perhaps, a larger margin for the workers in the Transvaal, than they can hope to obtain in Europe. The Boer Government must, therefore, be "reformed," so that capital may be enabled to absorb the "preposterously" wide margin which exists between the actual remuneration of labour in South Africa and in Europe. This is the avowed object of the leaders of the mining industry in the Transvaal. No attempt has been made to conceal it. They have stated in public meetings and in the public Press that the days are gone when workers could hope to make more than a bare living in Johannesburg. The workers are calmly told that they must be content to remain there with their wives and families, exercise the franchise when they get it, accept low wages, and so place the industry on "a sound and permanent basis."

The writer of " Notes and Comments " says :-

Though the Boers made what was virtually a declaration of war, the blame must be laid to the blundering diplomacy of Mr. Chamberlain. He is responsible for the war in the first instance; he will now be responsible for its undue prolongation and the people will hold him strictly to account. We believe that this crime against civilisation (for all war is such a crime) might have been averted by statesmanlike diplomacy and recourse to arbitration. The Venezuelan boundary question has just been settled by arbitration, why not the Transvaal difficulty also? It is a curious comment on the progress of humanity that such a war should have broken out on the very morrow of the Peace Conference, at which England was one of the moving spirits.

(5) SIR WEMYSS REID'S TESTIMONY.

Sir Wemyss Reid has transferred to the Nineteenth Century the comment on current affairs which used to adorn the pages of the Speaker; and in the November number he begins under the heading "The Newspapers" from the standpoint of the London Club. His diary of impressions refers to the bewildered and divided state of public opinion about the policy which led up to the war. He observes also that "the announcement that for the first time for nearly half a century we are at war with a white race, has been received by the better part of the nation with a gravity and dignity befitting the event " :-

Whatever may be said by the newspapers, the great majority of thinking persons would have been thankful if this war could have been avoided. That fact does not, of course, imply that there will be any hesitation on the part of the majority in supporting those who have to carry it on to a successful issue. Most men of both parties know their duty, and feel that now that the sword has been drawn it cannot be sheathed until its work is done, and done thoroughly.

But whilst this is the feeling of the overwhelming majority, there is a small minority who take a different line.... A certain number of men amongst us, not mere fanatics, not Celtic enthusiasts or intriguing politicians of the baser sort, but men ordinarily sober in judgment and abhorrent of sentimental excesses, do not conceal the fact that they to result in our discomfiture. They are not, I am thankful to say, a numerous body of men. But one meets them where one least expects to do so, and they are so outspoken in their sentiments that everybody is free to know what they think. The existence of such a body as this at a time like the present is almost unprecedented in our recent history. One can understand and sympathise with the man who thinks that war might have been avoided if our diplomacy had been more skilful, and if it had been inspired by good-will, and who is bitterly angry at the blundering which has involved us in this catastrophe. But it is a far cry from such a frame of mind to that which leads a man openly to express his hope that defeat may attend the efforts of the soldiers of his own race and nation. Yet there are those amongst us who are in this frame of mind just now.

(6) THE CONSEQUENCE OF "LITTLE ENGLANDISM."

The English Illustrated for November is a "Special Transvaal number." The history of the Transvaal crisis is told by "Imperialist," and this writer, like others who support Mr. Chamberlain, makes Great Britain responsible for the present bloodshed. He says :-

The blame must be laid, not at the door of English colonists, who have achieved as much in South Africa as elsewhere, but at the door of the Home Government, whose vacillation can be traced in blood and race hatred from Simon's Bay to Johannesburg. . . . The destinies of Canada and Australasia were guided by statesmen who worked towards the ideal of Anglo-Saxon unity: hence they are to-day pillars of England's Imperial might. The destinies of South Africa were guided by Colonial Secretaries with more or less pronounced views on separation: hence she is a continual thorn in the flesh of the Mother Country. It is the price she pays for two generations of Little Englandism.

MILNER AND RHODES.

The career of Sir Alfred Milner is sketched in the English Illustrated by "Africanus," who, in closing, thus distingu great A Sir Al is not hi Jameson and confi cult for t where it discredite difficulty affections criticisms can affor confidenc before hi

The . its Tran the othe Their time of th propagan older inh than the of the Gr a membe more esp It was pr in and re bullets fo But th criminal Humanit of the ser agains grief. T but again against t against, 1 the Kim unpunish Merril extenders even show stained se twentieth strength. Gener wood's "The T bury ser Sekukur incident no very were at preparin

Decemb of indep (I) Th State Pre

the

(2) Th (3) Th (4) Th pendence

(5) Th independ (7) Th submit it distinguishes between the High Commissioner and the great Amalgamator:—

Sir Alfred Milner went to South Africa at a critical time. It is not his fault that the times are now more critical. The Jameson Raid had at once shaken the loyalty of the Cape Dutch and confirmed the obstinacy of President Kruger. It was difficult for the new High Commissioner to suppress Dutch disloyalty where it existed without appearing to identify himself with the discredited Raiders, Mr. Rhodes and his satellites. Yet this difficulty has been overcome. And now he stands firm in the affections of his South African citizens, exposed to the ignorant criticisms of party hacks in England. But Sir Alfred Milner can afford to disregard such criticisms. He commands the confidence of the Empire, and he will do the work that lies before him.

"THE RHODESIAN EMPIRE EXTENDERS."

The English Illustrated is so far fair as to include in its Transvaal papers an emphatic pronouncement from the other side by J. C. Voigt, M.D. He gives "another view" of "Leading Uitlanders." He says of them:—

Their grievances were of their own creation; for from the time of their first appearance in Johannesburg their agitators and propagandists lost no opportunity of irritating and insulting the older inhabitants of the State. That they aimed at nothing less than the destruction of the Republic. As the agents provocateurs of the Great Power of whose Privy Council their High Priest is a member, the prominent leaders of the agitating Uitlanders, more especially of the Kimberley group, have played their rôle. It was prearranged that they should sow where others would step in and reap the harvest. Merrily they go to the harvesting of bullets for Progress and Reform.

But the unscrupulous diplomatists who are engineering the criminal movement of the forces of Empire-extension against Humanity will find that they have under-estimated the strength of the sentiment of nationality in South Africa. This sentiment is against them. If they ignore it their Empire will come to grief. The civilised world is—not for them, as they say it is, but against them. The intelligent public opinion of England is against them. Thousands of Uitlanders in the Transvaal are against, not for them; for the Uitlanders do not all belong to the Kimberley group—do not all take their orders from an impunished Privy Councillor.

Merrily they go to the harvesting—the Rhodesian Empireextenders. The reaping may last longer than they expect; for even should they succeed in making all Africa red, the bloodstained soil would yield another crop—a richer harvest for the twentieth century. Then the real reapers would rise up in their strength. Then the Rhodesian Empire would be no more.

(7) LOOKING BACKWARDS.

General Sir Henry Brackenbury contributes to Black-wood's Magazine for November some reminiscences of "The Transvaal Twenty Years Ago." General Brackenbury served as Chief of the Staff in the campaign against Sekukuni in 1879, and his article deals mainly with the incidents of that campaign. He seems to have retained no very vivid impressions of the Boer population, who were at that time holding meetings of protest and preparing for revolt. He quotes the resolution passed by the Boers at the great Wonderfontein meeting in December, 1879, which is probably the simplest declaration of independence ever made by any people:—

(1) That the Vice-President, Mr. Paul Kruger, should become State President.

(2) That he should convene the Volksraad.

(3) That the people will never submit to the British.
(4) That the people desire to shed their blood for independence.

(5) That they demand that their Government be reinstated.
(6) That the committee should take steps to recover their independence.

(7) That if the committee knew a better method they should submit it to the people,

(8) How the Case Looks to the Boers.

Dr. F. V. Engelenburg, editor of the Pretoria Volksstem, contributes "A Transvaal View of the South African Question" to the North American Review for October. Dr. Engelenburg reviews impartially the present position in South Africa and the causes which have led up to the war; but he does not throw any new light on the problems which are now being confronted, and there is little in his article which has not already been advanced by controversialists on either side. The only interest in his article is the insistence with which he maintains that South Africa is naturally one of the poorest of countries; and he thinks that the Dutch Afrikanders are the only race that could possibly live an independent, self-supporting existence there. The Phœnicians, Arabs and Portuguese never succeeded in colonising it, and the industrial population must pass away when the source from which it draws its present prosperity has been exhausted. Dr. Engelenburg says:—

Only the Boers, who eke out a frugal existence on their secluded farms, and have not yet become dependent on frozen meat, European butter, American meal and Australian potatoes —only the Boers, who, with rare endurance, the heritage of their hardy race, boldly face years of drought, rinderpest, locusts, and fever, could survive such a collapse of the economic machinery of a country so severely dealt with by nature. The remaining Europeans would gradually disappear, just as the Phoenicians and the Arabs disappeared in the days long past. As long as the gold mines and the diamond mines can be worked and made to pay, so long will the abnormal economy of South Africa preserve its balance; but as soon as South Africa has swallowed up its capital to the very last bit of gold, the Uitlander will have to seek for fresh fields for the exercise of his nervous-energy, and the Afrikander will be abandoned to his struggle with the inimical elements, as has ever been his lot in the past. By the sweat of his brow he will have to lead his carefully stored-up water to the fields continuously threatened by locusts he will have to shield his flocks from plague and theft, he will have to preserve continual watch against the inroads of the everincreasing blacks. The Boer—that is the agriculturist—is destined to be the Alpha and Omega of South Africa's white culture; he alone, in this quarter of the globe, can save civilization from the ultimate gulf of bankruptcy. To say that South Africa is a rich land, or to paint its future in glowing colours, and to dilate on the brilliant prospects that it offers to an unlimited white population, is only possible to an extraordinarily superficial observer, to an unscrupulous company-promoter, or to an over-zealous emigration agent, whose salary is in proportion to the number of his victims.

A CRY FOR JUSTICE.

The Briton the coast, and the Boer the hinterland, is Dr. Engelenburg's remedy:—

British statesmen apparently failed to see that South Africa could only be served by giving each race the domain which destiny had prepared for it, viz., the Boer the hinterland and the Britisher the coast, together with the rights and obligations connected therewith.

Dr. Engelenburg points out that it is on the Dutch pastoral communities that the Colony must ultimately depend. He concludes:—

The Boers do not ask for mercy; they ask for justice. Those who keep up the unfair agitation against the South African Republic are the last men, however, to listen to the voice of righteousness, or to be guided by any noble impulse; political corruption is the seed they sow, and by their unexampled opportunities they feel confident of reaping their criminal harvest. Up to the present they have gathered only tears; a still more bitter time of reaping has yet to come. In the past, the Boers have been able to fight against immensely superior odds. They feel that the final victory will be theirs; for they know they have right on their side.

the first ngation believe crime) recourse ist been so? It such a Peace rits.

eteenth sed to rember apers" iary of tate of the war. for the

of the at ":—
najority or could oly that in supl issue.
at now until its ajority, ne.... anatics, baser horrent it they it were hankful them oken in think.

esent is undermight iul, and ngry at e. But leads a pecial crisis who onsible

e those

lonists, but at can be nannesguided -Saxon nperial olonial ration:

in the ountry.

(9) A PROFESSOR OF DIPLOMATIC HISTORY

Mr. J. G. Whiteley, the President of the International Congress of Diplomatic History, contributes to the Forum for October a short article on "The Relation of England to the Transvaal," Mr. Whiteley's view is generally unfavourable to the English claims. He says that even if England could prove a protectorate over the Transvaal-it-does not necessarily follow that the British Government has a right to intervene in behalf of the Uitlanders, under the present circumstances. The Transvaal is struggling for its very existence. The danger from the invasion of miners is as real as if it were an invasion of armed men; for it is all one to have your Government captured by a troop of horse, or to have your privileges taken away by alien voters.

Mr. Whiteley concludes :--

The interpretation of an agreement, as I have just indicated, is determined principally by the intention of the parties thereto. It seems that by the Convention of London the high contracting parties intended to make the Transvaal a semi-sovereign state, limited in its power of making treaties, but free from intervention in its domestic affairs. Consequently, it does not appear that England has a right to demand any change in the law of the franchise, or in any other measure of domestic policy in the South African Republic.

(10) A NORWEGIAN OPINION.

In Ringeren (September 30th) a Norwegian review, edited by Carl Naerup with the support of Björnstjerne Björnson and J. E. Sars, Dr. R. Besthorn, under the heading, "The South African Conflict," gives briefly the history of the Transvaal, and recounts the disputes which now have culminated so disastrously. In the course of his article we come upon an appreciation of Kruger. whose portrait, of course, accompanies it. Incidentallyas if some line of thought had led him to the comparison he remarks that Paul Kruger and Alfred Dreyfus have the 10th of October in common as their birthday. "The self-convinced, brave, honest, and religious, if also somewhat narrow-minded Boers, have," says Dr. Besthorn, "in Paul Kruger a worthy representative Those foreigners who have seen him in the Volksraad with his h reulean bearing, and have heard his indignant speeches, can testify that Stephanus Johan Paulus Kruger is a remarkable personality who compels respect and attention.

Oom Paul is something more than the most prominent statesman of the South African Republic. veteran of liberty; the standard of the freedom-loving Boers. And however much we may have to say against the government system of the Boers and their attitude towards the foreigners trooping in; one is compelled to feel from a humane and national standpoint," says Dr. Besthorn in conclusion, "a deep sympathy with their efforts to save their independence and live their own life in freedom; and, in spite of England's Imperial claims, one must admit that the Uitlander question is distinctly a home affair of the Transvaal with which England has nothing to do."

The Revue de l'Art. ono ell In the October number of the Revue de l'Art the notice of the Van Dyck Exhibition at Antwerp, by Jean Durand, is concluded. The full-page supplements to the article include "Arthur Goodwin," "Anna Maria de Camudio," and "Lords John and Bernard Stuart"; all interesting examples of Van Dyck's art. Another important article is "M. Bartholome and the Monument to the Dead," by Maurice Demaison, M. Fiérens-Gevaert writes on the Hôtel de Ville at Paris; Art-Teaching in Japan is the subject of a paper by Félix Régamey. It is an excellent number.

all box THE CHINAMAN AT HOME CONTROL

MR. J. K. GOODRICH-contributes to the Forum for October an article on "Chinese Daily Life," in which he gives some interesting glimpses of the domestic economy of the Celestials. Mr. Goodrich writes from personal experience, and his article is instructive and amusing. The Chinaman rises early. It is not unusual for the Emperor to hold audience with his Cabinet at two in the morning, and the ordinary Chinaman never rises after daybreak, and in winter a long time before :--

The morning toilet does not consume much time. The Chinese are not fond of bathing. Like our own ancestors, they think we go to a great deal of unnecessary trouble to help nature keep us clean; and really they seem to live as long and as happily as we do. To wash the face and neck with a cloth which has been wrung out in hot water is considered quite enough in the way of ablutions. Occasionally this process is extended to the whole body. It must be said, however, that, a a rule, the Chinese take good care of their teeth.

His first act is the worship of his ancestors, after which he drinks tea, sometimes cold. The prevailing idea that the Chinese are gross feeders is, says Mr. Goodrich, erroneous. He is largely given to a vegetable diet

One may live for years in a Chinese city without seeing rats or mice offered for sale as food. They are sold for medicine; but even for this purpose they are not so easily caught as to be cheap. The treatment to which the common people often subject unfortunate rats which have been caught in the granary militates strongly against the notion that these animals are selected as choice tid-bits for the table. Because the rats steal their most precious article of food, rice, the Chinese hold that they are criminals of the deepest dye, and that they merit the worst kind of torture. Black dogs and cats are favourites among the most superstitious natives of the south. These animals invariably command a higher price than others, and are eaten in midsummer, in the belief that the meat insures both health and strength for the ensuing year.

"Football Extras" seem to have little chance in China. The Chinaman does not love undue exertion :-

Active, manly sports are not popular with grown men. A naturally phlegmatic temperament works against such; and there are further obstacles in the inconvenience of dress as well as in the peculiar notions of dignity and decorum. Instead of engaging in a regatta, a game of ball, tennis, bowls, young men, to prove their muscle, lift beams with heavy stones at each end, like huge dumb-bells. Or, tucking up their long gowns under their girdles, they kick their heels in a game of shuttle-cock; using the thick soles of their shoes as the battledore, never fouching the shuttlecock with their hands until it falls to the ground after a misplay, when a forfeit is scored against the player who misses. The outdoor amusements of gentlemen consist in flying kites; carrying birds on perches and throwing seeds high in the air for them to catch; sauntering through the fields; capping verses at some swell restaurant in the town or at a favourite suburban garden; or lazily boating on the water of harbour, lagoon, or river, as one passes the dolce far niente in a Venetian gondola.

Gambling, says Mr. Goodrich, is universal:

Hucksters at the roadside are provided with sup and saucer : and the clicking of their dice is heard at every corner. A Chinese urchin with but two copper cash (about one-sixth of a cent) prefers to risk their loss on the throw of a die to simply buying a cake without the chance of getting it for nothing; the shrewd pedlar usually laying enticing odds to lure on his victim. The most common game of luck is fan tan; which, by the way, is not, as is frequently supposed, a game of cards, but is played with cash. Chinese cards are smaller, more numerous, and essentially different in character from ours, as are the native games played with them; but poker and whist, played with our cards are seconically appropriate the treaty norts with a few of decks, are becoming popular at the treaty ports with a few of the advanced natives, many of whom are displaying marked skill, as some foreigners know to their cost."

M Rev of th the o pred and mak

M

Briti

Th famil matu of co negat rathe and comn quite milita produ view Com Meye Erasi Evide has n skelet parati

Th

Th

world lives the v our s is at t Canac this 1 ration streng Nelso has it British " serv absorb his mi it com world itself, with r counte

Th to a v Heth to un gives It is justic real i mode the go every that i

SIDE LIGHTS ON THE WAR.

(1) THE MORAL FACTOR.

MR. SPENSER WILKINSON, writing in the National Review on "Moral Factors in the War," makes an analysis of the factors which go to make up the military spirit in the contending armies. War is an affair of the soul; the predominant partner in the business is the mind or spirit, and it is the collective traditions of individuals which make up the fighting whole.

THE MORALE OF THE BOERS.

Mr. Spenser Wilkinson finds that in this spirit the British are superior to their adversary. He says:—

The Boer living on his farm has his spiritual backbone made up of the elementary ideas of a half-developed community—the family, the clan, and the country. But he has hardly a matured conception either of justice or of freedom, and his love of country is based upon a very short history. His patriotism is negative rather than positive; it is a bias against the foreigner rather than a conception of the State as something to live and die for. So little has the thought of the State or community penetrated the average Boer that he has never quite grasped the duty of paying the taxes. The idea of military duty has not grown beyond the first stage; it has produced a readiness to fight and to die, but no systematic view such as gives cohesion to an army. On October 21st Commandant Joubert telegraphed to Pretoria:—"Commandant Lucas Meyer has had an engagement with the British at Dundee. Meyer made a plan of campaign by messenger with Commandant Erasmus, who, however, did not put in an appearance." Evidently the notion of cohesion, of subordination, of discipline, has not yet come to form an essential part of the Boer's moral skeleton. The tie which binds one Boer to another is comparatively weak.

THE MORALE OF THE BRITISH.

The British are in a different position :-

The British are in a different condition. In their mental world the idea of Great Britain fills an immense place. Their lives are to a great extent made up of co-operation in all the various forms which I have enumerated as the sources of our stock of thoughts. The consciousness that one thought is at this moment being thought in Great Britain, in Australia, Canada and India, lifts up every man who shares it, and this kind of consciousness has been developed from generation to generation, each successive period of war having strengthened it, till it found its perfect expression in Nelson's signal at Trafalgar. This aspect of the national idea has its embodiment in the naval and military services. The British officer lives his professional life in the atmosphere of a "service" and in the idea of service. When war begins he is absorbed in service; it commands him, and he has caught from his military community the habit of taking death cheerfully when it comes in the course of the day's duty. This belonging to a world of developed ideas, to a civilised nation, is a power of itself, to which the membership of a half-organised community with no store of recorded deeds furnishes scarcely an adequate counterpart.

(2) WHAT WE CONTEND WITH.

The "Looker on" in Macmillan's devotes some pages to a very intelligent survey of the South African problem. He thinks the 70,000 troops may have many greater tasks to undertake than the conquest of the Transvaal, and gives an innumerable list of complications that may ensue. It is pleasant to find a writer who, while convinced of the justice of the war, has at once the honesty to recognise the real nature of the problem, the generosity to plead for moderation, the wisdom to see its absolute necessity, and the good manners to condemn the baseness masquerading everywhere in the guise of patriotism. It may be taken that if all those who believed in the justice of a war with the Transvaal had similar moderation and decency there wou'd have been no war at all. Speaking of the anticipations of a speedy peace fostered by the victory at Glencoe, he says:—

There are two things against that expectation: not alone the coldly ferocious obstinacy of the Boer in a quarrel, but the desperation of the case for that people when they look beyond defeat. This particular has a great interest for us, on account of its inconvenience for ourselves. Did we look with their eyes beyond defeat, we should see nothing but the worst humiliation, the worst misfortune conceivable to their minds; the rest is thick darkness. Now, their obstinacy may be a brutal fault (we think differently of it as a branch characteristic grown in Britain), and their view of the life for them after defeat thay seem unreasonably pessimistic; yet if the product of these feelings is a desperation of recklessness, of violence, likely to infuriate the animosity of race yet more and heighten the difficulties of future government, it becomes a merely selfish duty to find some means of appeasement.

"The prevailing flood of cant," he declares, sickens

I stop to read confirmatory news of the serious first engagement, with its fine success for our side, its radiant witness to the courage of our soldiery and the devotion of its officers, mixed up (the newspaper reporters will have it so) with jeers at chickenhearted Boers who cannot face cold steel. Ah, what a pity that patriotism can be so atrociously mouthed and parodied and marketed!

(3) THE LESSON OF 1881.

In Macmillan's Magazine for November there is an article by Major Pearse on "The Lesson of 1881," which is little more than a history of the campaign of that year, the only lesson being that over-confidence should never be allowed to interfere with due precautions. The same number contains an article by "Templar" on "The State Suzerainty," which is wholly legal and historical, and throws no light whatever on the present dispute.

"An Old Campaigner," writing in the Contemporary under the title of "Glencoe, Elandslaagte, Mafeking," gives an intelligent survey of the state of military affairs in the invaded territory. As his article will certainly be out of date before this notice can appear, I restrict myself to noting his recommendation as to the treatment of the problem of a native attack on the Boer Republics. He agrees, of course, that the natives are not to be allowed to attack; but notice should be given to the Boers that they must not invade Zululand or Basutoland, and the native chiefs must be instructed to resist any such invasion. If such an arrangement could be effected the advantage would be obvious; but it is plain that the Boer commanders could not be expected to give such an undertaking without an undertaking from our side not to use those territories for the purpose of invading the Republics. Though writing under the immediate influence of the victories at Glencoe and Elandslaagte, the "Old Campaigner" does not think that the immense forces we are placing in the field will be one too many. It is pleasant to read the following paragraph of the general whom the swashbuckling libellers in the press expect to execute their behests of vengeance :-

It is a question for the future to determine whether the war will heal up all the sores that have been opened, but under that aspect it is well to remember that a wiser choice for the Commander-in-Chief of the expedition could hardly have been made. Numbers of, Boers served under Sir Redvers Buller against the Zulus, and, whilst they had a profound admiration for him, he had the greatest possible liking and respect for them.

for

h he

omy

onal

sing.

the

the after

The

they help

and cloth

quite it, a-hich that rich,

ts or

o be nary

are

that nong

mal

and ina.

A

well

d of oung

each owns attledore.

Is to

the wing

the or at er of

in a icer :

inese cent)

ying

rewd

The

y, is ayed ative

our

w of rked

AFTER THE WAR-WHAT?

THE policy of counting your chickens before they are hatched, and then over-counting them, is set forth with delightful humour by an anonymous writer in the Fortnightly Review. It is a pleasant thing in these cynical days to find a writer so innocent as to weep over the "ingratitude" which the Boers have shown us for our kindness, not merely in surrendering after Majuba, but for the unblemished generosity and justice which we showed them when we took them over from the oppressive Dutch Government. Not only have the Dutch been passively ungrateful, but with "loyalty on their lips and treason in their hearts," "the cunning Boer politicians and their sympathisers in the colonies have formed a deep and dark conspiracy against the English Crown, octopus-like having its suckers everywhere." They have been aided in this by the German settlers. "And this," says the writer with all the bitterness of disillusioned innocence, "is the way our Teutonic neighbours reward us!" Having shed these bitter tears over the ingratitude of mankind, this amusing writer proceeds to develop his theory of a plot, needless to remark without a scrap of evidence, which theory is the most fatuous manifestation of panic and ignorance that Ihave ever read. The writer is perpetually putting his handkerchief to his eyes over what might have been, if our statesmen had been less innocent and trustful. For then we would have been spared the evil consequences of giving freedom to a race so incapable of showing proper gratitude as the Dutch:—

Better, some might exclaim, in the bitterness of their hearts, that the Cape Colony, Dutch in the main, had remained a Crown Colony to this very hour. Better the German system of the rifle and sabre and all the methods of crude militarism. Better the jack-boot of the Cuirassiers. Better the heavy heel of despotism than the mild wand of Constitutional Government.

Now this little paragraph is an answer to the question why all these tears have been shed. The Dutch, says our author, have shown us so little gratitude for removing them from the corrupting influences of the Diamond Fields, and our other innumerable acts of grace, that we are to show them no mercy now.

CHICKENS NOT YET HATCHED.

"The jack-boot of the Cuirassier," clothing the "heavy heel of despotism," with "rifles and sabres" as supporters, is to be the new coat-of-arms of united South Africa:—

Mr. Chamberlain's scheme, that "the whole of the Rand district, from end to end, should be erected into something more than a municipality, as that word is ordinarily under-stood," will probably be revived, only with such further modifications as the time and circumstances may admit. district may be so enlarged as to include Potchefstroom, Lichtenburg, and Bloemhof, and thus be coterminous with British Bechuanaland, the ninth electoral province of the Cape Colony. Indeed, as time goes on, the goldfields and the south-western angle of the Transvaal might be counted as the tenth electoral province of the Cape Colony, with a very powerful electoral representation of its own. For, considering the immense wealth of the goldfields, and the large numbers of the British Uitlanders, their representatives, as electoral rolls go in the Cape Colony, could hardly be fewer than twenty-five or thirty for a population, chiefly of adults, of more than 120,000. Such an addition to the Cape Parliament would be highly desirable from every point of view, and the Uitlanders would then have a powerful voice in the representative system of South Africa, from which they have been so long and so unjustly debarred. That they will have it, somehow or other, is morally certain, although at present it may not be expedient that their representation should be merged with the Cape system. At the same time, they will always have their own powerful municipality and High Court, following the example, more or less, of the diamond mines, and sound municipal government will mean a great deal to the Rand, that has groaned for years under the maladministration of the Boers.

A "DREAM" VERILY.

Such, in rough guise, may be the possible settlement of South Africa. It will mean a loss of territory for the Transvaal as the aggressors in war, the usual penalties for bellicose States. In this case the "Alsace and Lorraine" will be a rich territory that will view its detachment from the government of Pretoria as the fulfilment of a political dream. South Africa will see, in all probability, the beginnings of a long and peaceful era, and the numerous shareholders of Europe will exult. For together with proper municipal government and the assertion of the Pax and Lex Britannica, prosperity must come again to the deserted mines of the Rand. Aggressive Boerdom will have been driven back further to the north, where still there is ample space for them to roam and mind their herds and flocks, and will realise at their leisure the political truth of "equal rights for all white men south of the Zambesi," and possibly, after military occupation, Pretoria, their capital, may be given back to them. The loyal British Colony of Natal will look forward to the time when, not far distant, her northern frontier will reach to the Barberton goldfields and to the hinterland of Delagoa Bay. With such a redistribution of territory and of electoral power, it is probable that the era of South African Confederation may be realised more quickly than most people imagine.

If this settlement seems to any one to be too drastic, the answer, which the writer thinks is a sufficient one, is that "nothing less can possibly satisfy England." And then he adds with noble pathos: "Her wounded dignity might have asked much more."

A MUCH "TOO PREVIOUS" ESTIMATE.

The second Transvaal article in the Fortnightly, also anonymous, is illustrated with a good clear map, but is little more than a statement of the military position, and calls for no special notice. The article was evidently written immediately after the exaggerated Boer reverse at Glencoe, and is but another instance of the absurdity of counting the chickens before, I may say, even the eggs are laid:—

It is early yet to forecast the consequences of the Boer defeat at Glencoe, but the infliction of so crushing a disaster after the hopes raised by President Kruger's bombastic ultimatum must have far-reaching influence on future operations. "A la guerre les trois quarts sont des affaires morales. La balance des forces-réelles n'est que pour un autre quart." The immediate result will be to bring to a sharp end the project of invasion so wantonly conceived, so ignorantly undertaken, and so deservedly punished.

WHAT MR. EDWARD DICEY HOPES.

Mr. Edward Dicey is not a particularly good adviser at any time, but he takes some pains to know what he is writing about, and his advice is worth while listening to, even if we make up our minds to disregard it. In the Nineteenth Century he writes a paper "After the Present. War," in which he pleads for the establishment of a South African Federation, in which the two Dutch Republics have to be incorporated whether they like it or not. His one dread is that peace may be concluded before we have attained the objects for which we have gone to war, a misgiving which it is very satisfactory to note, for Mr. Dicey evidently has not much confidence in the determination of his own friends to carry matters through to the bitter end. If the Orange Free State and the Transvaal are to be induced to take any part in a Conference for establishing a South African Federation we shall have to remain in military occupation of their capitals, and administer their territories as if they were Crown Colonies until federation is an accomplished for the

After allow antic Outla Dutc

in a l Boers once remove present admir Africa Kruge where expect active rest as be div all to major represent

The count butes which which a corterrite claim laws of guard guide the e Power We have d tardy a

how in ourselv for all Africa Coloni about erected appoin federat desirab forced as con that, by and the proclain taxpaye able bu of incre Transv: the mai

The E Natal. pushed Orange line dra should

tion of

Let the

After federation he thinks that the Republics might be allowed the right of self-government, but he seems to anticipate that the Transvaal, in spite of its majority of Outlander population, would continue to be ruled by the Dutch:—

al

5-

he

In

at

he ill

he

th

d d

en

or

se

te.

une.

ne

e

c,

d

60

is

ly-

se

ty

3S

at.

he st

re. es. lt.

n-

ly

at 15 0, le.

nt.

a h

or

d

n

rs

d

a

n

ir

re

The naturalisation difficulty would disappear automatically as in a Federal Government under British supremacy. British and Boers would alike be citizens of the British Empire. When once the grievances of which the Uitlanders complain were removed, the forts destroyed, the local armies disbanded, the present rigime at Pretoria replaced by an intelligent and honest administration, the liberties of the citizens guaranteed by a South African Conferation under British supremacy, and President Kruger removed from the post, and probably from the country, where he has wrought such dire mischief, I see little cause to expect that the Uitlanders would concern themselves very actively in local politics. The Boer electors would, one may rest assured, vote solid; the British would, one may also assume, be divided by sectional interests, and it would not surprise me at all to learn that after the excitement of the war was over, the majority of the Volksraad was found to consist of Dutch representatives.

THE HON. EVELYN ASHLEY'S VIEW.

The National Review is no exception to the rule of counting the chickens. The Hon. Evelyn Ashley contributes a short article on "'After' in South Africa," in which he sets forth in detail his ideas of the settlement which is to come after the war has been terminated. As a conquered people, he says, who first invaded our territory, the Dutch will lie at our mercy, and have no claim to consideration beyond that recognised by the laws of civilised warfare. But though we must carefully guard against all promptings of generosity we must be guided by caution. If we wish for a fusion of races and the elimination of feelings hostile to the Paramount Power we must not annex after the war:—

We must not justify the taunts of those all over the world who have declared that it was gold and gold alone that attracted our tardy attention to these matters. It is impossible to exaggerate how infinitely raised our reputation will be if we can master ourselves sufficiently to resist the temptation of "settling once for all" (as the phrase will be) "all our uncertainties" in South Africa by turning the whole of it into a group of British Colonies. A plan is whispered, as this paper is being written, about a scheme cut and dried, by which a dominion is to be erected on the model of Canada, with Lieutenant-Governors appointed by the Crown for each of the provinces. Now, confederation, with a uniform mode of treating the natives, is most desirable, and will come in due time. But confederation, if forced on after a successful war, will not be the same thing as confederation brought on naturally, as it will be now that, by our action, its chief obstacles will have been removed. We shall also have to keep a considerable force in the Transvaal and the Orange Free State, and for a considerable period, if we proclaim them British Colonies. This burden upon the British taxpayer and British resources can be avoided, and any avoidable burden should not be assumed by our rulers in these days of increasing demands upon the Empire. In the cases of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State, it will not be confined to the maintenance of law and order within, but also to the protection of the inhabitants from possible native attacks from without. Let them bear the burden for themselves as hitherto.

There must, however, be a rectification of frontiers. The Boer portion of Zululand must be handed over to Natal. On the Western frontier the boundary should be pushed in, thus securing the railway from attack. The Orange Free State frontier should be rectified by a frontier line drawn from Boshof to Ladybrand. All south of this should be added to Cape Colony, including Bloemfontein.

The fullest autonomy must be granted to the Transvaal, and-either by Royal Proclamation or by Act of Parliament (whichever the proper legal authorities may decide upon as necessary and sufficient) it should be declared that no existing British subject shall forfeit his British citizenship by any naturalisation or other necessary form of compliance with the law of the Transvaal State in order to qualify—equally with the Dutch burgher—for the exercise of the franchise or other political privilege. It would seem that if the Sovereign of the British Empire is suzerain no legal impediment should exist to a defined number of her subjects remaining her subjects although qualified as full citizens in the subordinate State.

Mr. Ashley's conception of the position is that honest but ignorant Boers are being sent to slaughter by the corrupt and selfish Pretoria clique. It is worth while pointing out that it is this corrupt clique, the officials and members of the Volksraad, who are now leading the Boer forces on the field of battle, and some of them have already sacrificed their lives.

The Brownings and Dissent.

THE Church Quarterly Review deals with the letters of the Brownings in a way which would have greatly amused the two poets. The worthy reviewer is much exercised by their connection with Dissent. He admits that "both show a knowledge of and taste for the fine arts - music, painting, sculpture, as well as poetry. Above all, both take a high standard of morals and religion." But, the good Anglican proceeds, "we wish we could add that both took as their guide in morals and religion the English Church, which really would have been their natural home, if they had but known it." Alas! they were both Dissenters, as the reviewer shows by extracts from their own letters. He is touched by their intense beliefs, and exclaims, "Of such earnest souls may we not say, Cum tales sint utinam nostri essent?" But he goes on : "The religious views of both writers were evidently very crude and unformed; and perhaps it would have been as well if the passages in which they are touched upon had been omitted." Such a judgment upon the two leading Christian poets of the century is very funny.

An Old Question.

"OUGHT Christians to go to the Theatre?" is the theme of a symposium which forms the leading feature of the November Puritan. Mr. Sam Smith, M.P., says the stage is a teacher of vice. Dr. Horton thinks it useless to speak about the theatre, as it is useless to speak about lubricity, but hopes that under deeper religious influences we shall leave the theatre for nobler entertainment. Rev. Dr. Monro Gibson would not go himself, but would not condemn those who go. He suggests reform in the late hours of the theatre. Rev. F. B. Meyer says five times over, "Don't go." Rev. W. J. Dawson suggests that it is possible to Christianise the dramatic art; advocates discrimination between theatre and theatre; insists on the rights of the Christian conscience and Christian liberty; and, what will perhaps tell most, says the last time he saw the late Dr. Berry was in a theatre. But he condemns confirmed and habitual theatre-going. Rev. Archibald Brown answers in effect that the true Christian would never wish to go. "Ian Maclaren" urges reform by encouraging good theatres and goodliving actors. Dr. Cuyler says the stage is deteriorating:

A RELIGIOUS REBELLION IN SOUTH AFRICA.

An element of grave moment in the complicated African problem is forcibly stated by Mr. R. M. Green in the Nineteenth Century. His subject is "Native Unrest in South Africa." It is not, however, the familiar dread of native savagery of which he writes. The menace is from the side of religion. South Africa may not be without its Mad Mullah.

A KAFFIR "MAD MULLAH."

Mr. Green tells of a fanatic who "goes round the country, addressing the red Kaffirs, and stating that he has been to heaven and found that all their ways and customs of dress are practised there and are quite right." He quotes the letter of an educated native, who says:—

This individual is regarded by some of the natives in the Location and adjoining districts as no less a personage than the "Son of God." Last Sunday the Location was alive with red Kaffirs from the surrounding districts and farms who had come here to see this extraordinary man. He tells these people that to know him is to know God. Nay, he is the very gate of heaven; having been once dead for six days he had an interview with "The Supreme Being," and was by Him initiated into all the mysteries of the spiritual world, and was henceforth divinely ecommissioned to tell his countrymen that all the customs of, their forefathers, such as Kaffir beer drinking, red clay, &c., are much indulged in and admired by the hosts of heaven, and to pour out denunciations of divine indignation against the whites who had, by their conduct towards the blacks, brought upon themselves and their children His displeasure.

A NATIONAL "ETHIOPIAN CHURCH."

This heathen fanaticism is not the only religious peril. A much more difficult matter has appeared within the Christian pale. While white men are quarrelling about the secular franchise, black men are setting about the assertion of their religious franchise. They will have an Ethiopian Church, staffed by native clergy. The founder of this Black Church is a Methodist minister of the name of Dwane:—

He was born in the Queenstown district, and belongs to Khama's tribe. He was educated by the Wesleyans at Hilltown near Fort Beaufort, studied for the ministry, and became a Wesleyan minister. But in 1896 he left the Wesleyans and went to America; there he joined the American Methodist Episcopal Church.

Mr. Green quotes from the "South African Congregational Magazine" as follows:

We seem to have arrived at a critical stage in the history of our native Churches in South Africa. The evidence of an inflowing tide-wave of revolutionary tendency sweeping over them is everywhere apparent. It is not confined to the congregations of one denomination, but is more or less affecting all of them. It probably began with the revolt of certain native ministers among the Wesleyans from the authority of their Conference. The ground of their revolt appears to have been a sense of resentment against the social barriers in the way of their advancement to the chief seats of official authority in their ecclesiastical system. Conceiving that they had a grievance on the ground of such suppression of their self-importance, the dream of a formation of a native Church, dissociated from all European influence and control, began to impress itself on their imagination.

UTILIZING AMERICAN NEGROES.

How to get the financial aid necessary to such a Church was a difficulty, until a bright idea occurred to the Rev. Mr. Dwane:—

. Why not get the negroes of America to take up the movement? The very thing! So off he set with a grand scheme of Church Extension to unfold to their astonished gaze. And being a lad of parts—an accomplished linguist—speaking

English as to the manner born, as well as Dutch and his own native tongue, and being moreover a born orator, and free from any shadow of a questionable character, having a record of unsullied reputation and honourable Christian service behind him, he succeeded in raising a sensation among his coloured brethren in the States. He was enthusiastically received into the fellowship of the Methodist Episcopal Church, blessed by its bishops, and sent back with the assurance that the new cause would be taken up and backed by the available resources of the denomination in America.

A Moravian missionary even went so far as to say :-

I think in time that it will lead to a native rising. The Ethiopians say now that we ought to have no white missionaries. When they have got rid of them, the next step will be to get rid of the magistrates, and there will be a war of races.

When white Christians are seen to be murdering each other with Maxim and Mauser, black Christians may perhaps be excused for thinking that they could manage things a trifle better.

THE REVOLT AGAINST WHITE MISSIONARIES

Mr. Green himself saw Dwane in Queenstown. "He was dressed as a clergyman, and his English was excellent." Speaking of his work, he said to the writer that "the white missionaries did not understand the native customs, and the natives thought that when they became Christians, they must give up all their old ways, even in such matters as wearing bangles:"—

My people, said Dwane, believe that the missionaries call all these things sin. The missionaries cannot understand how we feel about our old customs, and we think that if all the ministers for natives were natives themselves it would be better. You tell us that we are all the same in God's sight, but your people will not worship in the same church as our people.

THE CIVILISED KAFFIR OUT ON VE HOUSE

"You tell us that we are all the same in God's sight." So we sow the seeds of revolution; and when the harvest is ripe, there will be a day of humbling for our racial pride, if nothing worse. Mr. Green proceeds:—

So far Dwane's followers have been drawn almost entirely from the Wesleyans; but it is the national side of his movement that is worthy of attention. Do the Europeans sufficiently realise that after these years of education and civilisation, the educated Kaffir of to-day is on a very different footing from the Kaffir in his original state? . . The Kaffirs of South Africa are probably the most loyal of all the subjects in the British Empire.

Unfortunately we make them feel too painfully our sense of their inferiority. The natives say "The land of our birth is oftentimes to us a land of tears."

THE FRANCHISE FOR KAFFIRS.

Mr. Green raises the question of franchise for natives. He says :—

The Uitlanders' demand for franchise is now occupying the attention of the whole world. It may be reasonably asked why should not the natives of the colony have representatives in the Lower House of Assembly, who should bring these questions to the notice of the Government? There are men among the natives sufficiently educated not only to see all these points but to put them intelligently before others.

This remarkable paper ends with the warning:-

If honour, justice, and integrity be placed before personal gain or selfish ends, then for the coloured race as for the British Empire a bright future lies before South Africa; but if private ends and the desire of wealth be allowed to dominate, then it may be that a racial struggle of grave dimensions lies before the colony, for the Kaffirs are no longer untutored savages; they have begun to realise their grievances, and to desire their rights, which unless we give them they may take for themselves in a manner that can be little anticipated

SI butes Africout : The the r

-cond

Of month haunt that r

TI

first line

Th

that:

of D

once

Every run in upon mode with strelin with higher continuity depasted be at beaut fellow surfa Nic oppose told to to the borne

So

Th

as it

Briti

a san house upho Empi peepe thatc midst tion sisted of "sand, desol image haver

Noth

MATAL FIFTY YEARS AGO.

nwo

rom

of

ind

into

its tuse

the

The

ries.

rid ach

ay

age

He

vas

iter

ive

me

in all

we

ters

tell

will

So

tis

de,

rely

ent

the

the

are ire.

our

nd

es.

the

hy

the

to

the

but

ain

ish

ate

it

the

its,

1 a

AN EX-PREMIER'S REMINISCENCES.

SIR JOHN ROBINSON, late Premier of Natal, contributes to Cornhill, the first instalment of his "South African Reminiscences." He recalls vividly his voyage out as a child on board a very primitive sailing-ship. The contrast between the luxuries of travel now and the miseries then is strongly drawn. He says:—

The ship in which I first sailed to South Africa was 117 days on the voyage from London to Natal, and 98 days from Plymouth to Durban. During that period she sighted land only once before the shore of South-East Africa rose in view.

The accommodation, the food, the uncleanliness on board ship left gruesome memories:—

Of the atmosphere 'tween decks the less said the better. For months or even years afterwards, the "smell of the ship" haunted the nostrils of the emigrants with a sense of loathing that no words can describe.

THE APPEARANCE OF THE COAST.

The writer almost breaks into poetry as he recalls his first sight of his destination—"as soft and sweet a coast line as ocean's surges lap." He says:—

The shore of Natal is neither mountainous and frowning like that of the Cape of Good Hope, nor flat and marshy like that of Delagoa Bay. It is hilly, sylvan, and singularly attractive. Every few miles, streams that have passed down wooded valleys run into the sea. From the strip of dazzling sand-beach below, upon which the breakers pound or croon incessantly, hills of modest height rise more or less abruptly. They are skirted with thick bush, over which the plumes of the dwarf palm or strelitzia droop gracefully, while their grassy brows are dappled with patches of woodland. Buyond, the land rises rapidly to higher altitudes, seamed by deep gorges, but keeping a level continuity of outline until the far western horizon closes the pleasant prospect. The outlook from the sea reveals a luxuriant and attractive land, with a manifest capacity for tilth, depasturage, and home-making—a wilderness, as we knew it to be at that time, but a wilderness, nevertheless, of bounty and of heanty.

"Africa, as seen from the sea, seemed an idyll. Africa, as it proved to be ashore, was disenchantment. Natal, when I first landed there, had only seven years been a British dependency." Disillusion awaited him. He says everything was in an embryonic state. He and his fellow-immigrants crossed the bar in a flat-bottomed surface-boat:—

Nimble and naked figures bounding along the sand-dunes opposite were taken to be baboons or monkeys; but we were told that they were "Kaffirs." That was our first introduction to the baffling savage. Not long had we to wait for a closer acquaintance, as the women and children of the party were borne ashore on the backs of laughing barbarians.

DURBAN IN THOSE DAYS.

So landed, the ex-Premier proceeds :-

Then began our first experience of the Dark Continent. On a sand-mound above the landing-place stood the little block-house, with its garrison of a dozen redcoats, who then sufficed to uphold the majesty of British rule at that remote outpost of the Empire. Two or three old carronades of a type now extinct peeped harmlessly out of the undergrowth. Three or four small thatched cottages, with a more solid brick building in their midst—the Custom-house—represented commerce and civilisation on the threshold of the colony. . . Durban then consisted only of about a score or so of thatched shanties with walls of "wattle and dab," scattered about a trackless waste of blown sand, with clumps and patches of "bush" to redeem it from desolation. Rougher or humbler abodes could hardly be imagined, and yet to women of gentle nurture they seemed havens of rest and comfort after the ships they had left. Nothing by way of domicile could be more crude. The floors were of mud smoothed over with cowdung. Walls might or might not be whitewashed. Doors and window-places might or might not be filled in with planks, calico, or matting. Ceilings were not.

Yet the "gentler-bred" faced their privations with heroism. "Coarse and humble though their surroundings might be, they never forgot what they had been, and never ceased to be what they were."

THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

Law and order were meagrely represented in Durban then:—

The collector of customs acted as magistrate, and he was supported by a badly, paid person in plain (and very shabby) clothes, known, politely, as a policeman. At first there was no place of confinement for prisoners, but ere long a tiny cottage was secured as a gaol. Its walls were built of clay and twigs, and could easily be broken through by the hands of an enterprising inmate; but the rigours of existence there were slight and escapes were rare. Unruly captives were clapped into the stocks, or handcuffed, while the certainty of a flogging if caught again aeted as an effective deterrent upon efforts for liberty.

THE CHILDHOOD OF THE STATE.

The impression left by that early time is by no means depressing. Sir John says:—

Civilisation in its rudimentary stages implies unconstrained equality, artless confidence, and cheerful content. It is sad to think, how soon these qualities disappear as the community advances, never to exist again. It is something, fifty years later, to feel that one has witnessed life under such primitive, if not Arcadian conditions, and to know from actual experience that it is possible for European men to live, not unhappily, with so little to help, to guide, to serve, or to equip them in the struggle of existence. One's faith in human nature is strengthened, one's disdain of mere conventionalism is quickened, by the memories of those early days.

THE MAKING OF A HEAVY GUN.

MR. W. J. GORDON sketches Woolwich Arsenal in the November Leisure Hour. Among a host of interesting descriptions may be selected here what he says about the making of a gun:—

In their early stages these guns are unexpectedly long and slender things, owing to their being without the coils and jackets that build them up to such bulkiness. They look their longest during their wiring, that modern process which enabled us to reduce the bulk of the gun so much that the podgy There is Woolwich infants have developed into graceful boys. something startling in finding a gun being treated like a bathandle, the only difference being that instead of waxed thread you wind on a thin flat strip of steel having a breaking strain of 100 tons to the square inch, and wind this on in several layers instead of one. The gun revolves in a lathe as the cricket-bat does, but much more slowly, and in place of the wooden spool of thread there stands, at right-angles to it, a huge iron reel, from which the riband or wire, as it is called, which is about a quarter of an inch wide, is wound on spirally at high tension, the spirals being knocked up tight to each other with a punch whenever they fail to wind on closely together. The gun is thus wrapped with literally miles and miles of wire, mostly in the region of the powder chamber.

Over the wire jacket come the hoops of cast steel cut out of ingots as disks, and forged into rings just a trifle smaller than the finger they are to fit; and when these are finished, they are one by one, for there are many of them, heated just enough to expand them, and slipped over the gun to shrink and grip it as they cool, the gun being upright at the time, with a stream of water flowing through its bore to keep its temperature down. In this way the wiring is all hidden, and the gun looks as though it were built up entirely of these massive hoops, as it used to be. The lathe work and other operations necessitated by all this may be imagined, and we case to wonder why it takes longer to make a heavy gun than it does to build the ship that carries it.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN.

MR. JAMES CAPPON, writing in the Canadian Queen's Quarterly, on "Current Topics," makes some interesting comments on Mr. Chamberlain, of whom he is evidently a keen a lmirer. Mr. Chamberlain, he thinks, first showed his really great qualities in steering the Liberal Unionist party through the perils which followed the great Secession. The position of the Liberal Unionists was precarious, being based on a negative, and its extinction was freely prophesied by the Liberal press, and to lead this forlorn hope, to guide this small party wisely amongst the strong currents and intrigues of party politics, to justify its delicate and ambiguous position in the constant conflict of Conservative and Liberal principles, to keep the Conservative policy on a path in which it was possible for men of professed Liberal opinions to work, to control Conservatives without irritating them, to oppose Liberal statesmen while generally maintaining Liberal principles, and through all this to keep its line of action clear, consistent and intelligible in the eyes of the British public; this was a work which could not have been done except by leaders for whose character and ability their Conservative allies and the country in general had a profound respect. Yet this is the work which Mr. Chamberlain has performed during all these years with consummate skill and success.

HIS STRENGTH-IMPERIALISM.

The real bond between the Conservative and Liberal Unionist parties has been Imperialism. The positive policy of Imperialism has done what the negative resistance to Home Rule could never do—it has furnished both parties with a clear and assured ground for common action. Here Mr. Chamberlain has found his feet:—

The chief features of Mr. Chamberlain's Imperial policy are the encouragement he has given to Imperial federation, his manner of dealing with the United States on Canadian questions, and his policy in the Transvaal. Some of these things are still dark to the outside public, and some have yet to be judged in their ultimate development. Perhaps even now we may give him at least the credit of a discretion and candour in these matters which have given no handle to the enemies of Great Britain. But the case of the Transvaal Republic is more open to public judgment. There he has had comparatively a free hand, and has decided to bring up for solution a difficulty which has long disturbed the South African portion of our Empire. If that difficulty should prove insoluble except by war, he has certainly chosen the time well. Russia has her hands full in China. France is in no position to give trouble, and an understanding has evidently been arrived at with Germany that Great Britain is to settle the Transvaal difficulty without interference from that quarter.

HIS WEAKNESS-SOCIAL REFORM.

For this Imperial popularity he has, however, been compelled to sacrifice his more solid work:—

It is evident, indeed, that as a social legislator his popularity, if not his work, is gone. Legislation, like the Workmen's Compensation Bill, may be honest and well designed, but it cannot be carried out by a Conservative Government with the same brilliant effect upon the minds of the working classes as by a Radical Government. For one thing it is not heralded in the party organs with fine phrases about the claims of the working men, and hints that it is only a foretaste of what they are to sobtain, all that at present it is safe to ask from a nation still imbued with prepossessions in favour of property and capital. It is not and it cannot be loudly proclaimed by its imitators as a great victory over long-standing injustice and prejudice. No trumpets are blown or flags waved over it, either by the Conservative Government that introduces it or by the Liberal party that dare not do otherwise than accept it. It is coolly accepted by the working-man as a dole. It excites no enthusiasm in his class, and it excites more or less irritation amongst the mass of employers who support the Unionist Government. There is a certain weakness here in Mr. Chamberlain's position. What he said in his famous Hackney speech of 1885 against "the Tories," that "a democratic revolution is not to be accomplished by aristocratic perverts," now applies by the irony of fate to his own position. He may do and indeed has done good work in social legislation; he may even do it in a better spirit, a judicial and impartial spirit, not the exasperated spirit of party strife, but it has no longer quite the same effect upon the masses. With them, at least, his popularity must find some other means of support.

HIS ACHIEVEMENT-DEMOCRATIC CONSERVATISM.

Mr. Chamberlain owes something to his new colleagues, but even more to the changed principles of Conservatism. While they have been amiable and long-suffering with him, he has paid them back by bringing their education up to date, transmitting their cast-iron principles in the Radical crucible into that ductile and convenient metal called Democratic Conservatism:—

The career of Mr. Chamberlain, like that of most eminent men, seems to owe something to fortune as well as to great abilities. The stars in their courses have proved not unfriendly to him. The generosity of Conservatives, the sympathy of the country for his position, his own skill as a tactician, all these would not have availed to maintain Mr. Chamberlain in his equivocal position unless something in the nature of a fundamental change in the political atmosphere had taken place something that made it possible for men of Liberal tendencies to work harmoniously and honestly with men of Conservative tendencies. Two things have made this possible. The first is the rise of the new Conservatism, of which Mr. Balfour perhaps, rather than the Marquis of Salisbury, is the exponent. This type of Conservative sees clearly that a wise Conservatism will never oppose itself blindly and impulsively to reform and reconstruction, but that on the contrary the only possible life for Conservatism lies in its being ready to assist in every readjustment of the constitution or laws which is really needed to accommodate them to the growth of democratic forces. To distinguish such required adjustment from mere aspirations of the advanced Radicals which are not shared by the people generally has now become its task. And in this task the Liberal Unionist party, representing as it always did the moderate section of the Liberals, can very heartily co-operate. The alliance is natural and workable, and Mr. Chamberlain becomes in the new aspect of politics an educative influence in the councils of the Conservative party, and not a mere element of opposition and difference to which sacrifices must be grudgingly made.

BETTING is the subject of a symposium in the Leisure Hour for November. It reveals afresh the difficulty felt in finding the intrinsic evil in gambling. Lord Aberdeen thinks it hardly logical to condemn every form of "staking." He does, however, hint at a much more drastic principle by suggesting "that there is something ignoble in pocketing another person's money without having done anything to gain it." Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman declares betting and gambling to come next to drink—"if they really come below it "—in the measure of the curse they inflict on society. Mr. Barber, head-master of the Leys Schook, insists on "the immorality of gain without labour of head or hand "—another comprehensive principle extending much further than bets and wagers—which Rev. J. W. Horsley endorses by speaking of "the immorality of the desire to get money without giving value in return." The practical proposal, beyond the vague counsel of educating public opinion, is legislation to forbid the publication of betting odds. Mr. Robert Anderson, Assistant Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, finds that "betting begets a hungry greed of illicit gain."

M Chro artic sider to h Lord over Glad most as his that The o with mode resign into Glads of pea add t Mr. C he ap 1885, prograthe pi camp senter world Liber person canno Cann strong

OU

should

Imper

he cri

when nothin from 1 and th to stic matad flanks men, condes system drama unwor depres puzzle when Mr. M public, his pa serious that L his car

Lord R his tale serve a Salisbu

Fron

appoin

stitutio

OUR DARK HORSE IN A LOOSE BOX.

A SAD WORD ABOUT LORD ROSEBERY.

MR. H. W. MASSINGHAM, the editor of the Daily Chronicle, contributes to the Nineteenth Century an article on the Future of Lord Rosebery which bears considerable trace of the bitterness that characterises "love to hatred turned." Not that Mr. Massingham hates Lord Rosebery. On the contrary, he wrings his hands over him with unaffected grief. He tells us that Mr. Gladstone once characterised Lord Rosebery as "the most irresponsible of men," and Mr. Massingham adds as his contribution to the description of our late Premier that he has now become the most impossible of men. The evidence that Lord Rosebery has decided to break with the Gladstonian tradition, that is to say, with modern Liberalism, he regards as decisive. Since his resignation of the Premiership he made four incursions into politics, each time in absolute antagonism to the Gladstonian tradition. The first was when in the name of peace and tranquil digestion of our vast Imperial meal he crushed out the Armenian agitation. The second was when he emerged in the Fashoda incident in order to add the coping stone to the North African Empire which Mr. Gladstone disliked. His third intervention was when he appealed to City Liberalism to return to the ideals of 1885, that is to wipe Home Rule out from the Liberal programme, and finally he has come in to proclaim that the policy of Majuba associated with the first Midlothian campaign is dead. Both sides in politics agree that the sentence about Majuba is a formal notification to the world that its author has stepped out of the ranks of the Liberal party as it has existed since 1886. A small personal following will cling to him on account of his personal grace and distinction, but a party leader he cannot be.

Mr. Massingham is particularly grieved that Lord Rosebery, who in his Anti-Armenian speech dwelt so strongly upon the need for the intensive culture of the immense additions recently made to the British Empire, should now have identified himself with the cruder Imperialism which represents the Daily Mail and nothing else. Hence Lord Rosebery's political isolation from progressive forces is equal to his moral isolation, and that is complete. Then Mr. Massingham proceeds to stick a variety of pins into his late leader, much as a matador in a bull fight inserts stinging darts into the flanks of the tortured bull. This most irresponsible of men, he tells us, never consults his old colleagues or condescends to recognise the importance of the committee system in English politics. He is consistently melodramatic, and indulges his whims with the levity unworthy of a statesman. When he speaks it is to depress a party in misfortune, not to stimulate it, and to puzzle it with inexpert or dubious phrases at moments when it wants a clear lead. Excepting the Daily Mail, Mr. Massingham knows no other Rosebery party. The public, no doubt, likes to see Lucullus issue from one of his palaces and to discuss his moods, but in England seriousness counts for much, and Mr. Massingham thinks that Lord Rosebery is not serious. Even when he began his campaign against the House of Lords, he neither appointed a Cabinet Committee nor appealed for constitutional advice to the Law Officers of the Crown. As the conclusion of it all Mr. Massingham suggests that Lord Rosebery could not do better than take himself and his talents over to the Unionist Party, and undertake to serve as Foreign Secretary on the retirement of Lord Salisbury.

From all which Lord Rosebery will perceive how sadly he has grieved his best friends. For in all the press there was no one a more hearty Roseberyite than Mr. Massingham, who now wails this threnody over his lost leader.

THE ETHIOPIAN EMPEROR:

AND SOME OF HIS LITTLE WAYS.

MR. CLEVELAND MOFFETT gives in the November Windsor a very brightly written sketch of "Menelik and his People." After explaining how these Ethiopians (as-Abyssinians prefer to be called) could defeat the Italian army at Adowa, the writer shows the monarch in a more amiable light than has been cast on him sometimes. The portrait is by no means unattractive.

AS INSPECTOR-GENERAL.

Of the many original ways of keeping his people inorder, one or two may be cited here. Mr. Moffett says:—

If a chief has displeased him in some slight manner, he calls him to the palace . . . and gives him a sound beating with his own strong hands, and the chief departs the better for it. Again, instead of getting reports about happenings in the city from his policemen or other subordinates, he finds out what is going on himself with the help of a powerful pair of field-glasses. With these in hand, he spends many hours in a tower built for the purpose, from which he can sweep the principal streets and open places. And as the people never know when the Emperor may be watching them, they are careful what they do. Then he is constantly supervising all that goes on in the palace, making his tour of inspection at all times of the day or night through the narrow streets and among the countless little straw-covered buildings that compose the palace-for this is really only an agglomeration of separate structures, a small city within itself, with a population of three or four thousand. Now he stops at the kitchen, which is a building by itself, and sees what the cooks are doing. Now he looks in at the treasure-house, where the gold and precious things of the kingdom are guarded; now at the saddler's and blacksmith's; now he watches the women making hydromel, and now the children chanting their reading lessons in dull sing-song. Or, again, he walks through the gardens, where acres of fruit-trees are growing, many of them specially imported from Europe. He loves every detail of gardening, and is particularly interested in experiments in irrigation, fertilising, and the like. If a Gatting gun arrives from abroad, he must set it up with his own hands and understand every detail of its working. If his watch gets out of order, he must take it apart himself and find out what the trouble is and how to remedy it. When he first saw a pair of European shoes he insisted upon having them taken apart piece by piece, so that he might have another pair made like them.

It is a very vivid description which Mr. Moffett gives of the weekly gathering of his chief men at the Palace, "the Sunday feastings when the Emperor literally feeds his people." A comical element is the rule which forbids the generals to look on their superior in the act of eating. Whenever the Emperor will put food in his mouth they must rise and screen him from their and the multitude's view by lifting up their chemna, or outer robe, before their faces. The effect must be remarkable.

"Pot-Herbs" form the subject of an instructive paper by Rev. John Vaughan, M.A., in Longman's for November. It gives a swift glance over the advance of vegetables in the national diet. The sixteenth century saw a movement in this direction among the learned and wealthier classes. In 1778 Gilbert White remarked on the increased use of vegetables in all classes, and attributed to it the disappearance of leprosy. Among other interesting, facts we learn that many of our garden herbs are in reality native British plants.

ech

is

by ted ect

ind

es,

m.

ith

on

he tal ent eat

lly

the

ese

his dane-

ies

ive he

ich

is ely

nly

in

lly

tic

ere

by sk

he te.

in

in ent be ire

elt

en

of

re

ng

ut

11-

to

of

er

in ve

he

ng

he

on ert

an

A STUDY OF OLIVER CROMWELL.

By JOHN MORLEY.

A THEOSOPHICAL friend of mine, who believes strongly in reincarnation, announced the other day with an air of profound conviction that John Morley was the reincarnation of Oliver Cromwell. The ways of Theosophists in deciding the identities of reincarnated personalities are past finding out. You cannot argue with them any more than you can argue with a prophet. You can only disbelieve them. But my friend was positive that the Lord Protector of the Commonwealth had come back to earth in this our day and generation in order to work out his Karma. Cromwell in his lifetime had sinned grievously against Ireland; that was the explanation of the fervent zeal for Home Rule which characterised Mr. Gladstone's Irish Secretary. There were other reasons which need not be mentioned here, but the theory is amusing and may suggest some curious trains of thought to those who care to follow it out. With this conversation fresh in my mind, I naturally turned with great interest to read Mr. Morley's study of Oliver Cromwell, the publication of which has been begun in the November number of the Century Magazine.

The first instalment brings us down to 1635, and is distinctly remarkable for its introductory sketches of the character of Cromwell and his place in history, and very vivid, sympathetic and judicial appreciations of the character of Charles I., Henrietta Maria, Archbishop Laud and the Earl of Strafford.

INITIAL ANTIPATHIES.

Mr. Morley is by no means a hero-worshipper of Cromwell. The character of the late Protector was one of the numberless points upon which we had agreed to differ in the old days at Northumberland Street, for Mr. Morley was the austere Republican who could never forgive the man who dissolved Parliament by military force, even although that Parliament was but the discredited rump of the House of Commons. Mr. Morley's mental temperament was very antipathetic to that of the great Puritan leader. He could never forgive him the massacres of Drogheda and Wexford, and his prejudice was intensified by the fact that the rehabilitation of Cromwell in this century was due to so uncom-promising an apostle of force as Thomas Carlyle. We may depend upon it, therefore, that in the study which is begun, if Cromwell receives justice, it will be carefully measured, with anxiety that not one feather-weight more than his due shall be given him. The opening chapter, however, is better than I expected it to be, knowing Mr. Morley's standpoint; but there are here and there glimpses of what we may expect in the chapters that are to come, as, for instance, when Mr. Morley dismisses with a lordly contempt "those impatient and importunate deifications of Force, Strength, Violence, Will, which only show how easily hero-worship may glide into effrontery." His object is "to seek measure, equality and balance," and he protests that to do so is not necessarily the sign of a callous heart and a mean understanding.

HIS PLACE IN THE ENGLISH CALENDAR.

Nevertheless, even Mr. Morley was constrained to admit that Cromwell's name stands first, "half warrior, half saint, in the calendar of English-speaking democracy." He begins with a fine sentence:—

The figure of Cromwell has emerged from the floating mists of time in many varied semblances, from the blood-stained and hypocritical usurper up to the transcendental hero and the liberator of mankind. The contradictions of his career all come over again in the fluctuations of his fame.

"It is difficult," says Mr. Morley, "for us who are vain of living in an age of reason, to enter into the mind of a mystic of the seventeenth century." "Yet," he maintains, "by virtue of that sense even those who have moved furthest away in belief and faith from the books and the symbols that lighted the inmost soul of Oliver should still be able to do justice to his free and spacious genius, his high heart, his singleness of mind."

ONE OF A RARE COMPANY.

As an influence in shaping the destinies of his country, Mr. Morley evidently declines to think Cromwell's part has been over-estimated, for wherever force was useless Cromwell failed, but—they had little more share in the government of the nation than if Cromwell had never been born. To perceive all this, to perceive that Cromwell did not succeed in turning aside the destinies of his people from the deep courses that history had preappointed for them, into the new channels which he fondly hoped that he was tracing with the point of his victorious sword, implies no blindness either to the mighty gifts of a brave and steadfast man, or to the grandeur of his ideals of a good citizen and a well-governed state. . .

Yet Oliver's largeness of aim; his freedom of spirit,

Yet Oliver's largeness of aim; his freedom of spirit, and that energy that comes of a free spirit; the presence of a burning light in his mind, though the light to our later times may have grown dim; his good faith, his valour, his constancy, have stamped his name, in spite of some exasperated acts that it is pure sophistry to justify, upon the imagination of men over all the vast area of the civilised world where the English tongue prevails.

The greatest names in history are those who, in a full career and amid the turbid extremities of political action, have yet touched closest and at most points the wide everstanding problems of the world, and the things in which men's interest never dies. Of this rare company Cromwell was surely one.

All this is well said, and if Mr. Morley keeps up the rest of his study to that level, we shall not have reason to complain, but I have my misgivings.

HIS EARLY LIFE.

Then in a rapid sketch of Oliver Cromwell's early life, Mr. Morley summarises the little information that is available. Cromwell was the only brother among many sisters; but notwithstanding the warning of Homer, Cromwell showed no default in either the bold and strong or the tender qualities that belong to manly natures. At school the youth drank of the pure milk of that stern word which bade men bind their kings in chains and their nobles in links of iron. Mr. Morley says that the Bible comprehended for him all literature; but the brief hints of his riper days, when he expressed his ideas as to the education of his eldest son, make no bad text for an educational treatise:—

Man is born for public service, and not to play the amateur; he should mind and understand business, and beware of an unactive spirit; the history of mankind to be studied as a whole, not in isolated fragments; true knowledge is not literal nor speculative, but such as builds up coherent character, and grows a part of it, in conscious harmony with the Supreme Unseen Powers.

Of Mrs. Cromwell Mr. Morley says she was simple and affectionate, full of homely solicitudes, intelligent, modest, thrifty, and gentle, but taking no active share in the fierce stress of her husband's life:—

Marriage and time hide strange surprises: the little bark floats on a summer day, until a tornado suddenly sweeps it out to sea, and washes it over angry waters to the world's end.

Mr. Morley scouts the Royalist libels as to the dissoluteness of his youth, and also dismisses as unproved the familiar story as to his intention to emigrate to America. Leaving the central figure of his study in 1635, Mr.

rpart a sing beacc In by the S gover In mona posses times

Mor

Of great He h an ide grasp chani unger Of ship, constairony kingdo

and-tw

had le

of good, intrep undau black the worse found phrase politic

In conspi the sc drivell is full Straffo sinceri chaste to hav power Even . chief fa becaus with a saintlie ing lav

Of I "His in discern the cen comme lutionis Morley turns aside to describe the King, Queen, Wentworth, Laud and Pym. In a fine phrase, he says:—

ain

of

ain-

ave oks ver

ous

try,

part less

han

, to

had ndly

ord,

and izen

irit,

ence

later

his

ated

tion

the reer

yet

ding

erest

the n to life,

t is

any mer.

rong

At

bles

pre-

uca-

onal

ware

as a

, and reme

mple

gent,

re in floats sea,

lute-

the

erica.

Mr.

Truly has it been said that universal history makes a large part of every national history. The lamp that lights the path of a single nation receives its kindling flame from a central line of beacon-fires that mark the onward journey of the race.

In the seventeenth century the English were dominated by the dread of the reconquest of Christendom by the Jesuits, with the aid of the arm of flesh. Mingled with this was the great struggle between the absolute power of the Sovereign and the aspirations of the people for selfgovernment:—

In nearly every country in Europe the same battle between monarch and assembly had been fought, and in every case the possession of concentrated authority and military force, sometimes at the expense of the nobles, sometimes of the burghers, had left the monarch victorious.

CHARLES STUART.

Of Charles Stuart, Mr. Morley maintains that his great fault was that he never saw things as they were. He had taste, imagination, logic, but he was a dreamer, an idealist, and a theoriser. He neither had vision nor grasp, and although he was not without the more mechanical qualities of a good ruler, his manners were ungenial and displeasing:—

Of gratitude for service, of sympathy, of courageous friendship, he never showed a spark. He had one ardent and constant sentiment, his devotion to the Queen. What a strange irony of the stars it was that threw the fortunes of a great kingdom at a deciding hour into the hands of a pedant of five-and-twenty and a foreign school-girl!"

HENRIETTA MARIA.

Of Henrietta Maria Mr. Morley has little to say that is good, beyond admitting that she possessed an abnormal intrepidity and fortitude, an unsparing energy, and undaunted courage. She had radiant and sparkling black eyes, with great vivacity in conversation, but of all the women that ever tried to take a part in the affairs of State, from Cleopatra downwards, nobody was ever worse fitted than she for such a case as that in which she found herself. "Tried to take" is rather an unkind phrase, but then Mr. Morley is a sworn champion of the political monopoly of the male.

STRATFORD AND LAUD.

In dealing with Strafford and Laud, Mr. Morley is conspicuously judicial. He will have nothing to do with the school that dismissed Charles as a tyrant, Laud as a driveller and bigot, and Wentworth as an apostate. He is full of admiration for the ardent and haughty genius of Strafford, and thinks there is no reason to doubt his sincerity or to impute to him any low ambition. "It is a chaste ambition," says Mr. Morley, "if rightly placed, to have as much power as may be, that there may be power to do the more good in a place where a man lives." Even Archbishop Laud comes in for a good word. His chief fault was that "he was unfit for the state of England, because, instead of meeting a deep spiritual movement with a missionary inspiration of his own, he sought no saintlier weapons than oppressive statutes and persecuting law-courts."

THE CHARACTER OF PYM.

Of Pym Mr. Morley speaks in terms of enthusiasm. "His massive breadth of judgment, his luminous and discerning mind, which had the rare secret of singling out the central issues and choosing the best battle-ground," commend him to Mr. Morley, who, like Pym, is no revolutionist, either by temper or principle.

With the character-sketch of Pym this first instalment concludes. The paper is copiously illustrated with the portraits and sketches by Mr. Pennell of scenes amid which Cromwell's life was passed.

THE PLEA FOR A RUSSO-AMERICAN UNDERSTANDING.

AN AMERICAN REJOINDER.

MR. A. MAURICE Low contributes to the Forum for October a reply to Mr. Holmstrem's article in the July number, pleading for a Russo-American Understanding. Mr. Low is an Anglophile, which is a very good thing, but he is also a Russophobe, which is a very foolish thing, and he quite gives himself away by the ridiculous statements he makes as to Russian institutions. To prove the enmity entertained by Russia towards America, he quotes a Russian newspaper, and comments:—

It must be remembered that in Russia nothing is printed until it has received the approval of the censor; and when a Russian newspaper suggests a bombardment we may feel certain that the suggestion is not made without official sanction.

As this is one of the cardinal articles of the Russophobe's creed, it may be observed that the first part of this statement is a gross error, and that a Russian newspaper which receives the approval of the censor before printing is almost as rare as a Russophobe who understands what he writes about; while the second part of the statement is equally grotesque, since Russian newspapers have full liberty to say what they like about foreign politics, as Count Mouravreff complained somewhat bitterly to me this year at St. Petersburg.

Mr. Low is on safer ground when he argues that the Russian's desire for an entente with America is based upon selfish grounds, but he shows childlike innocence in imagining that international ententes were ever based upon anything else. He says:—

Russia needs money, and the only way she can obtain it is by mortgaging the future. With the European markets closed to her, her sole hope of relief is from the United States. I am informed that negotiations are at the present time in progress for the placing of a Russian loan in this country. Whether the negotiations will be successful I am unable to say; but it is evident that in her extremity, and failing to obtain money in London, M. Witte will be forced to seek the assistance of New York financiers. Possibly this explains in a measure why Russia is anxious for an American understanding.

There is probably a good deal of truth in this, but as it is quite certain that America will never lend her money on the security of sentiment, Mr. Low need be in no fear. Mr. Low thinks a struggle over China is inevitable, and that America cannot remain neutral. He says:—

Diplomacy may postpone the evil day; but the time must finally come when Russia and Great Britain will face one another with a naked sword between them, to decide who shall be master of China. When that time comes the United States will have to elect whether she shall cast her lot with the autocrat of the North, or with the Western Power, which has always held the van in the march of liberty and progress. No matter how much we in this country may be opposed to expansion or imperialism, the United States cannot then be an unmoved spectator of events; she cannot remain neutral; circumstances will compel her to decide whether she shall be the ally of Russia or England. The question involved is simply this: Is it worth while for the United States to encleavour to obtain a share of the trade of China? If the answer is in the affirmative, the United States owes it as a duty to herself not to permit Russia to do with China what she has already done with Manchuria.

Which is sheer nonsense. If Russia ruled China to-day American trade with China would immediately and enormously increase.

VIIM

FEATURES OF THE CAPE PARLIAMENT.

Good Words for November has an illustrated sketch of the Cape Parliament by Mr. George Ralling. He reports that responsible government has on the whole worked undoubtedly well.

BROADCLOTH VERSUS TWEEDS.

Church here, too, as elsewhere, has preceded State in teaching what may be termed representative manners :-

On the personal side the Cape Parliament differs as much from its great model at Westminster as it does from the Parliaments of other British Colonies. It has derived something of its complexion, as the Volksraads of the Republics have to a still greater extent, from the Synods of the Dutch Reformed Church, with which the country is most familiar. There is, indeed, a rule in the Transvaal Volksraad that members must be dressed in black clothes, with white ties, as in the Synod. Many years ago an amusing friendly little passage of arms between Mr. Rhodes and Mr. Hofmeyr took place on this very point. Mr. Hofmeyr had been paying a visit to the Free State Volksraad, and when he came back to his own Parliament he took occasion to express admiration for what he regarded as the superior order of the Free State Volksraad, in which all members were compelled to attend decently attired in black, whilst in the Cape Farliament they could go as they pleased. This touched the British susceptibilities of the then youthful Rhodes, and, tossing his head back with a familiar gesture, he said that if the honourable member chose to appear in black clothes, well and good; that was his business. For himself, he thought he could legislate as well in a suit of Oxford tweeds as in any other garment, and he begged to adhere to his own opinion on the subject,

A BI-LINGUAL CHAMBER.

It is comforting to read this assurance :-

The use of two languages in one chamber might naturally be supposed to result in Babylonish confusion, but both English and Dutch members as a rule understand sufficient of each other's language to follow the debates throughout, although they may not have conquered the alternative tongue sufficiently to address the House. . . . Very little practical inconvenience is found from the use of the two languages, which is a hopeful augury for similar results in the Transvaal, if the Boers can be induced to put both languages on an equal footing.

"NEVER VULGAR OR RUDE."

Still pleasanter is it to know-

Parliament habits at the Cape have always been marked by singular decorum. There has never been anything approaching to the nature of a personal conflict on the floor of the House. . Possibly one must again refer to the synodical precedent for the explanation. A further explanation may be found in the fact that . . . the members may be said to represent a white oligarchy; and whatever may be the disadvantages of such a system, it does result in the return of members who feel that something is due to their class. Members may have a natural ruggedness of speech, and are certainly much simpler in their notions than an assembly of cultivated Englishmen, but they have never been vulgar or rude.

MR. RHODES' MAIDEN SPEECH.

Consolers of broken-down beginners in the art of oratory will probably be glad of the following variant on the story of Disraeli's first speech in Parliament :—

When Mr. Rhodes entered Parliament in 1881, a mere boy, no one could have dreamt of his coming greatness. He was nervous to a degree seldom exceeded in a new member, and upon ásking a too candid friend what was his opinion of his first Parliamentary speech, the reply was, "Rhodes, I think you are a great Parliamentary failure."

A GRENADIER PARLIAMENT.

The day of great speeches is almost over: businesslike debate has taken their place: South African Government has become "a huge Socialistic machine." But if not in the figurative, yet in the literal sense, the Cape Parliament is, it appears, an assembly of

I may add that, in point of physique, the Cape Parliament will compare favourably with any similar assembly in the world. It is not the custom to keep a record of either height or girth or weight, but I do not believe I am far beyond the mark when I say that the average height approximates to 5 feet 11 inches, and the weight, say, 16 stone-it may be more

A TRIBUTE TO THE REV. JOHN MACKENZIE. BY SIR CHARLES WARREN.

I AM glad to read in the Contemporary Review for November the following tribute to the services rendered by the Rev. John Mackenzie to the Empire, in securing the despatch of the expedition which saved the great northern road to Central Africa :-

Fortunately there was one man in South Africa who had sufficient ability, personal weight, and knowledge of the subject to bring before the public both in South Africa and Great Britain the true position into which the British Government had drifted, and the deplorable condition into which the British colonists had been forced, and who was untiring in his efforts on behalf of the Empire.

It is not too much to say that the Empire is indebted to John Mackenzie, the Kuruman missionary, the successor to Moffat and Livingstone, for stemming single-handedly the tide of the "giving-up" policy, and bringing round public opinion to a sense of the duties of the Empire as the paramount Power. The history of these times and the account of the action taken by John Mackenzie have yet to be written; in Britain's days of difficulty men have always risen fitted for the occasion, and on no more momentous occasion was a true son of Britain required than in the dark days of South Africa, the years 1881 to 1884. He was not merely a missionary speaking for the South African natives—as such he could have had little effect on public opinion; but he took a high aim as a true Imperialist, and asked for fair play for all, British, Dutch, and natives. His was no local cry of "Africa for the Afrikander," nor was it a narrow-minded proposal to tread down the Dutch under the British, but he took the broad view that all who were fitted for the position were fellow-subjects of Great Britain, and he lectured on the matter in the Cape Colony to Dutch and English, Boers and British Afrikanders, and won the hearing and suffrages of many.

owing to John Mackenzie's efforts, and the support given to him by many conspicuous leaders, Liberal and Conservative, by little and little the "giving-up" policy was abandoned, and the same statesman, who in one year declined to listen to any proposal for the exercise of British influence where a gunboat could not go, in the following year came round to the view that the Empire required an active interference with an Imperial force in the heart of South Africa.

It is interesting to note that when the Warren Expedition was under discussion in the Cape Assembly, on the 16th July, 1884, Mr. Rhodes made some observations upon the Imperial factor which are worth quoting! :-

Mr. Rhodes, the leader of the Opposition, said that the Imperial factor which he had warned the House against in the previous year had now been introduced into Bechuanaland, and he believed it their duty to act immediately and remove the Imperial factor on the border of the Transvaal, which must lead to danger in South Africa.

How freely the Bible is being handled nowadays in religious circles is suggested by a paper which is headed "Inexact Statements in Holy Scripture." This appears in the Sunday Magazine. It comes from the pen of the Rev. Canon Hayman, D.D. It breathes throughout the spirit of a devout and reverent believer.

TH A Quar Peac speci Confe world sinist sumn All knew nothin were of dis Engla Neith establ practi indici amend not be

Ha

Tsar His

mascu

from indivi ascend and t painft chara hered side : strikir cunni Alexa was s tradic to b prede but, a maint Synoo and c Spani solem contir her o when forces great under contin policy likely whose men a Th

army

Suc

acco milit and Then The by M

"A MISPRINT IN WORLD-HISTORY."

THE "QUARTERLY" ON THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

ense.

of

ment

orld.

th or en I

and

€.

for ered

ring

reat

had ject

had itish

s on

ohn

and

the

ense

The

1 by

s of

on ired

384.

ican

blic

and

was it a

the

for

he

and

ing

to

by any oat

hat

rial

en

ly,

ra-

rth

the

the

nd

he

in

ed

rs

he

he

A PLEA for an Anglo-German alliance appears in the Quarterly Review under the heading of "A Note on the Peace Conference." The writer seeks to promote his special aim of a Dual Compact by belittling the Conference with its promise of the federation of the world, by aspersing its august initiator, and by imputing sinister designs to its promoters. He begins with these summary assertions:—

All persons acquainted with the political position in Europe knew from the commencement that the Conference would end in nothing. The majority of the Governments which took part in it were dominated by a desire to paralyse Germany by some scheme of disarmament which would disorganise her army, and to injure England by weakening her commanding position at sea. Neither of these objects has been attained. . . The plan for establishing a Court of Arbitration, which was regarded as a practical scheme by some persons more enthusiastic than judicious or well informed, was rendered worthless by the amendment proposed by Germany, that reference to it should not be obligatory.

A FANCY PORTRAIT OF THE TSAR.

Having disposed of the Conference in this slap-dash style, the writer goes on to blacken the character of the Tear :—

His education was not calculated to form a broad-minded and masculine character. . . . A tendency to retire more and more from general society, and to lead the secluded life of a private individual, has been steadily growing upon him since he ascended the throne. This has developed very rapidly of late, and those who are most nearly in confact with him have been painfully struck with his extraordinary taciturnity. Other characteristics also, which have been for some generations hereditary in his family, seem to point to his belonging to that side of it of which Alexander I. and the Emperor Paul were striking representatives. A strange mixture of mysticism and cunning, of magnanimous sentiments and of tyrannical intentions, was apparent in both these sovereigns. A close study of Alexander I. may help us to understand Nicholas II. Alexander was a strange compound of contradictions. . . . The contradictions observable in the character of Alexander are to be seen again in the present Emperor. Like his predecessor, he appears as the champion of suffering humanity, but, as Alexander trusted the savage Araktschéjew, so Nicholas maintains Pobyedonostzeff as Procurator-General of the Holy Synod—a persecutor who for cold-blooded cruelty, fanaticism, and craft may be compared with the most sinister figures of the Spanish Inquisition. In April, 1807, Alexander I. made a solemn promise that he never would desert Prussia if she continued to resist Napoleon: in the following July he threw her over completely at Tilsit. Nicholas II., at the very moment when he asked Europe to disarm, was increasing his military forces to a greater extent than any other Power. He makes great professions of a desire to benefit mankind, while treading under foot the ancient privileges of Finland, in order that the contingent hitherto furnished by the Grand Duchy to the Russian army may be increased fourfold.

Such contrasts are calculated to raise suspicions about Russian policy, which the character of many Russian officials is not likely to allay. This appears, indeed, to have affected the Tsar, whose natural cynicism has increased with growing knowledge of men and affairs.

THE MOTIVES OF RUSSIA.

The immediate occasion of the Peace Rescript was, according to the reviewer, the demands for increased military expenditure made by the Russian War Minister and the difficulties raised by the Minister of Finance. Then, the writer proceeds:—

The Tsar then remembered some Consular reports and a book by M. Bloch on military expenditure. It seemed an opportune moment to formulate the idea expressed in the circular which the Russian Chancellor handed to the representatives of the Powers at St. Petersburg in August, 1898, and which proposed a general disarmament. The statesmen of St. Petersburg eagerly adopted the suggestion. Russia had certainly nothing to lose by it, and they calculated that the mere proposal of disarmament would embarrass foreign Governments. In particular, they expected that it might make it difficult for the English Government to obtain from the House of Commons the votes necessary for the maintenance and increase of the navy. They had great hopes of the effect of the circular in deluding the British public, and in this they were not altogether disappointed. They even hoped to embarrass the German Government in its military estimates. In any event, it was plainly the interest of Russia to get breathing time, in order to escape her financial difficulties and to restore her credit. When this was done she could, more easily than any other Power, resume her armaments.

NOTHING DONE!

As to diminishing the risk of war, the writer opines that the Conference has not done anything appreciable. He goes on :—

Professor Mommsen described it as "a misprint in Universal History" ("ein Druckfehler in der Weltgeschichte"), and rightly so, for things remain much as they were before it assembled. France, Germany, Russia, Italy, Austria, maintain their armies in their full strength, and have even added to them this year. Russia possesses the largest army in the world.

"A MORE EXCELLENT WAY."

Having relieved himself of this pessimistic bile, the reviewer develops his plans for promoting peace. The best hope for peace will lie, he thinks, "in the development of an enlightened public opinion in regard to international relations." Here is even a compliment to democratic international policy:—

Democratic states are, on the one hand, exposed to the risks which arise from want of knowledge and foresight; on the other, they are liable to be carried away by sudden and uncontrollable gusts of passion. But in spite of these difficulties and dangers, inseparable from popular government, it is justifiable to believe that the force of public opinion, on the whole, makes even now and will make more and more in favour of peace.

A STILL SHORTER CUT.

But "a surer and more immediately effective method of securing peace" would be, in the writer's judgment, the formation of an alliance between Germany and Great Britain. The writer declares that "it cannot be too widely known that it was he (the Kaiser) who took the first step to bring about a better understanding between England and Germany." The mutual advantages of such an alliance between the greatest navy and the greatest army in the world, the need each has of the other, their common desire for peace and for commercial expansion, etc., are then set forth. The effects of such an arrangement on our American relations are thus lightly touched:—

It would not be displeasing to any but the most bigoted Monroeists in the United States, for though it would doubtless strengthen us in handling Canadian along with other colonial questions, it would prelude no aggressions in the Far East of the Pacific, while it would reconcile that element which, next to the Anglo-Saxon, contributes most to the wealth and the power of the Republic.

A LADY mountaineer, Fanny Bullock Workman, F.R.S.G.S., tells in the Scottish Geographical Magazine for October how she made two pioneer ascents in the Karakorum (Himalayas), the peaks being 18,600 and 19,000 feet high. She named them Siegfried and Mount Bullock Workman.

THE DREYFUS CASE.

M. BLOWITZ contributes to the North American Review for October an interesting article on "The French Press and the Dreyfus Case," in which he sums up the attitude of the leading French newspapers on the great trial. M. Blowitz thinks that the present license of the French Press dates from the law of 1885, before which there were certain restrictions on the liberty of the Press, but which was the death-blow to tranquillity, and bound sooner or later to be fatal to the existence of the country.

ABSOLUTE IMPUNITY.

But what is certain is that the press now has absolute impunity, and that nothing can henceforth deprive it of this impunity. Whoever endeavours to escape from it, in the tempest it raises, is sure to perish, body and soul. It is before the assizes that a person defamed is obliged to cite the journal that attacks him. Nearly always, those who have no profession obliging them to undertake the struggle hesitate at the idea of appearing at the assizes. Several days before the trial begins, the journal that is prosecuted publishes the list of jurymen; and, when its adversary, already terrified by the solemn surroundings, appears in court, it terrifies the jury that is to pronounce the verdict. It is very rare for a private person to undertake such a combat, still more rare to see a judge who dares brave a journal to protect, a citizen, so that the latter, condemned by the acquittal of the journal, leaves the court room slandered and insulted, first of all, by the journalist, and secondly, dishonoured by the verdict of the jury.

THE BATTLE OF THE PAPERS.

M. Blowitz proceeds to classify the newspapers, and, as will be seen, the superiority of numbers was strongly against Dreyfus :-

As will be seen, the opposed forces, if reckoned merely numerically, are far from equal. Eight newspapers are for Dreyfus and twelve against him. Those of the former class which are intermittent in their devotion to the cause, are four in number; those of the second class, also spasmodic, are three in number. And to sum up, out of twenty-seven papers engaged in the battle, there are, speaking generally, twelve for Dreyfus and fifteen against him.

The Figaro, the Siècle, the Aurore, the Radical, the Rappel, the Fronde, the Petit Blen, and the Petite République, have been resolutely on the side of revision and believers in the innocence resolutely on the side of revision and believers in the innocence of Dreyfus. The Temps, the Débats, the Matin, and the Petit Parisien have defended his cause fittully. The Petit Journal, the Echo de Paris, the Croix, the Univers, the Gazette de France, the Moniteur Universel, the Eclair, the République Française, the Libre Parole, the Intransigeant, the Gaulois, and the Patrie, have been resolutely and absolutely against Dreyfus. The Auterité, the Soleii, and the Liberté have mitigated by certain fits of instice (the Saleil, however, to its honour early come of of justice (the Soleil, however, to its honour, early came out valiantly in favour of revision) their hostility to the cause of

The real brunt of the Anti-Dreyfusite attack was borne by the Figaro, and this was mainly due to the accession of M. Cornely, who had left the Gaulois to become a pillar of strength to the Dreyfusite cause. Not the least of the Figaro's achievements was the daily publication of a complete stenographic report of the Rennes trial.

CRUCIFIED ANEW.

M. Blowitz concludes his article with a reference to La Croix, which I quote here in view of the newspaper controversy that has been raging on the subject of that journal's responsibility:-

La Croix has, at the top of its first page, the image of Christ crucified; and in each number, in fact, it crucifies anew, on its very threshold, by its abominable prose, the gentle Saviour who chased the money-changers from the Temple. Each day it stirred up hatred against the unfortunate prisoner at Devil's Island, and rendered suspicious even the pity which it preached in his favour, when the revolt of all hearts had shown the horror of the new condemnation. It is an abominable journal, trying to supplant all other popular publications, and to dry up the pure blood of the French nation. It is an abominable journal, and the Catholic Church must be powerfully rooted in French hearts to resist such an ally.

AGAINST FOREIGN EXAGGERATIONS.

Mr. Spencer Brodhurst's article in Macmillan's Magazine for November on "The Outlook in France" is but another example of the reaction which has set in against the exaggerations to which sympathy with Captain Dreyfus has given birth. He denounces as deplorable the tone of the foreign press, and thinks it did much more harm than good to the cause of justice.

"A SUPERB SPECTACLE."

M. Trarieux, formerly French Minister of Justice, and a witness for Dreyfus at the Court Martial at Rennes, contributes to the Contemporary a short but very necessary defence of the attitude of French people during the great controversy. He applies the tu quoque argument very appositely to show that other nations, not excluding ourselves, are just as liable to lose all sense of justice and decency in great national crises. But,

Is it certain that any other country would have been able to exhibit the superb spectacle of a handful of courageous citizens constituting themselves for two years the champions of right and law against all the combined forces of Government? Is there a finer example of citizenship known than this epic resistance to insult, intimidation, and menace, solely by the use of those legal weapons which enabled these volunteer soldiers of duty to make their voices heard? Should we not also pay homage to the institutions which have allowed such a conflict? And if the attempt has not been crowned with full success, has it done nothing towards the triumph of truth? Picquart, Scheurer-Kestner, Zola, finally, tower above the illusory trials and false sentences; they have been the true interpreters of that national spirit which has always shown itself alive to questions of justice and generosity. And their work has been by no means unproductive. Dreyfus is free; his rehabilitation has, in fact, been achieved in the eyes of three-quarters of the world; and to accomplish the reparation which is due to him is but a question of patience and time. These are the results obtained so far, and truly they deserve better things, imperfect as they may be, than a threat of boycotting.

America in the Pacific.

THE HON. JOHN BARRETT, formerly United States Minister to Siam, contributes to Harper's Magazine for November a review of America's relations to China, Japan, Siam, Corea and the Philippines. Mr. Barrett's article is based on five years' residence and travel in the East, and he has brought back very precise conceptions of the peoples with whom America has now to deal and the problems to be met. Mr. Barrett rates American influence in Japan very high, and in China weak, but hopeful. He thinks that if America were to adopt a vigorous policy at Pekin, China might be compelled to adopt radical reforms, and that an accord for common action might easily be attained by all the Powers. The United States is now the first Power in the Pacific; and

She will for ever hold that position if we master the situation in the Philippines, maintain our rights of trade in China, united or divided, lay a Pacific cable, and in the near future construct the Nicaragua Canal.

TH Cond the elect Ra candi journ pertir the f prom of pa whom cal th In great chan Aust impo Ro

for t

facili

of ca only electi not b Th the I The Italia cardin one. Italia and I

Or resto to-da the S Th " nati all ev nals r comp Latin at pre are I Frenc Орро Kopp Austr Pole one E Amer

Fo relati utter prop Rom ment

> Th Simp. the h

have for th

meet

THE NEXT POPE AND HIS ELECTORS.

THERE is much interesting gossip about "the future Conclave" in the Quarterly Review. It is curious to find the Press recognised as a controlling power in the election of Pope:—

Raffaelle De Cesare says: "To-day, in advance, the different candidates for the papal chair are discussed, and it is in reality journalism which exercises the right of veto." The remark is pertinent: the Press, even before the Pope's death, exposes to the fierce light of day the distinctive qualities of the most prominent of the papal candidates. When a cardinal, ambitious of papal honours, is attacked by the Press of a great country, to whom it is not a matter of indifference who sits upon the pontifical throne, the election of such a candidate is improbable.

In this way Cardinal Rampolla, who has made himself greatly disliked in Germany and Austria, stands little chance of becoming Pope. The opposition of the Austrian Press saves Kaiser Joseph the trouble of imposing his veto.

ITALIAN PREPONDERANCE.

Rome is held to be after all the best and safest place for the meeting of the Conclave: and the improved facilities of travel makes possible a very full attendance of cardinals. The Archbishop of Sydney is probably the only cardinal too far away to arrive in time to join in the election. It is just possible that Cardinal Gibbons might not be in time.

The writer brings to light the curious fact that during the Pope's illness last March—

The College of Cardinals was in fact so composed that non-Italian influence seemed likely to predominate. Fifty-seven cardinals would have buried the old Pontiff and elected a new one. Among these were thirty Italians and twenty-seven non-Italians. No Conclave can be remembered in which the foreign and Italian elements were so nearly equal.

LATINS VERSUS NON-LATINS.

On his recovery Cardinal Rampolla got the Pope to restore something of the old proportions: and "there are to-day thirty-five Italians and twenty-six non-Italians in the Sacred College":—

Thus the papacy may still be styled, as Döllinger styled it, a "national Italian institution." Even if this be denied, it is, at all events, almost exclusively Latin. Of the eleven new cardinals no less than ten belong to the Latin-speaking races, and the composition of the Sacred College was never so preponderatingly Latin during Leo XIII.'s pontificate of twenty-one years as it is at present. Among the sixty-one cardinals no less than forty-nine are Latin, distributed as follows: thirty-five Italians, seven French, one French-Belgian, five Spaniards, one Portuguese. Opposed to these are twelve non-Latins, viz., two Germans (Dr. Kopp, and Dr. Steinhuber, a Jesuit living at Rome), two German-Austrians (Gruscha and Haller), one Slovenian (Missia), one Pole (Ledochowski), two Hungarians (Vaszary and Schlauch), one Englishman (Vaughan), one Irishman (Logue), one English-American (Gibbons), one Irish-Australian (Moran). As we have remarked, two of these would scarcely reach Rome in time for the Conclave. This would leave only ten non-Latins to meet forty-nine Latins at the election.

LOWLY ORIGIN OF CARDINALS.

Forty-nine to ten is altogether out of proportion to the relative numbers of Latin and non-Latin Catholics. So utterly far does the papal electorate fall of any like proportionate representation of its constituents. Nevertheless, in another respect the democratic spirit of the Roman Church shines out in contrast with the arrangements of other communions:—

There have been Popes enough who sprang from the people. Simple birth has never formed an obstacle to the attainment of the highest dignities that the Roman Catholic Church has to offer. In respect of the origin of his cardinals Leo XIII. is entirely unprejudiced. Cardinal Prisco of Naples is a carrier's son: Cardinal Cassetta, Patriarch of Latin Rites at Antioch, is the son of a Roman joiner. Among the present cardinals there are few of noble descent, and of these few three were appointed by Pius IX., who thought much more of a brilliant name than Leo XIII. Among the cardinals appointed by the former were a Chigi, a Borromeo, a Bonaparte, a Hohenlohe.

THREE POPES: WHITE, BLACK, AND RED.

Of the several papabili, the writer chats in a way of which a specimen may be selected in the following paragraph:—

Di Canossa, Bishop of Verona, is the oldest member of the Sacred College, even older than the Pope. His Eminence is also sickly, and can no longer play a great part. He will obtain no vote in the next Conclave. As for Ledochowski, he is also old, but though he has reached seventy-seven, he is a factor that must be reckoned with. A nun is said to have prophesied that this Cardinal would become Pope; and the prophecy has in a sense been accomplished. For ten years Ledochowski, as Prefect of the Congregatio de Propaganda Fide, has been a sort of Pope by the side of the Pope. There are three Popes, named from the colour of their robes: the real Pope, who is called the "White Pope"; the General of the Jesuits, the "Black Pope"; and the Prefect of the Propaganda, the "Red Pope," who as cardinal wears a red robe. The reason why the Prefect of the Propaganda is regarded as a sort of Pope is that many prerogatives are connected with his office, and that in the government of the Church he takes nearly the same place as the Minister for the Colonies takes within the sphere of British influence. The Propaganda is the centre for all Roman Catholic missions. As chief of the Propaganda, Ledochowski has so many opportunities to distribute benefits and to extend patronage that he can count many clients and creatures of his own. The next Conclave may give him therefore more than one vote, perhaps two, perhaps even three; but this will not transform the red Pope into the white one. Votes given for a non-Italian have only a symptomatic value. In the next Conclave the principle that the tiara is by no means legally an Italian monopoly, even though for nearly four centuries only Italians have been elected to the papal crown, will probably be still more strongly marked than in 1878. It is possible that besides Ledochowski, the Cardinals Gibbons of Baltimore and Vaughan of London will be honoured by single votes.

MEN IN THE RUNNING. 1 .908.504.11918

The writer thus recapitulates his estimate of the papabili :-

We have already named, beside the aged Capecelatro and Di Pietro, the Cardinals Rampolla, Parocchi, Serafino Vannutelli, Svampa, and Gotti, as the chief candidates for the tiara. There are still two names which must not be overlooked in speaking of the future Pope: the Cardinals Sarto and Domenico Jacobini.

THE English Illustrated for November, besides its Transvaal articles noticed elsewhere, has in it much that is readable. The fact that M. Zola stayed some time during his English exile at Oatlands Park, leads Mr. H. C. Shelley to describe the sights and the history of that celebrated spot under the title "One of Zola's Hiding-places." M. C. de Thierry writes on "The Empire's Coaling Stations," and accompanies his sketch with interesting pictures of the more remote of these naval harbours. The coloured stage portrait shows Mr. Lewis Waller as the Duke of Buckingham in "The Musketeers." Mr. W. M. Webb expounds Mr. Flinders Petrie's discoveries concerning "The New Race" whose remains have been found in Upper Egypt, whose date was first put three or four thousand years B.C., but who are relegated to the "pre-historic" era.

hed

TOP

ing

the

al,

nch

out

nst

fus

ne

rm

nd

es,

ng

ot

se

ıt,

to ns

nd

to se

to

to

he

ne

r-

se

al

ce

0-

en

to nc

nd

an

or a, ie

15

d

n

ıt

a

0

n

le

d

n

le

IS BRITISH STEEL DOOMED?

AN APPALLING OUTLOOK.

MESSRS. JEREMIAH HEAD and ARCHIBALD HEAD contribute to Cassier's for October a paper on the Lake Superior iron ore mines which bodes sadly for the future of the iron and steel industry in Great Britain. The consternation which the presentation of the facts by the writers caused at the British Institution of Civil Engineers is justified by this later publication.

THE OBJECT OF THE INQUIRY.

The reasons for investigation are thus put by the writers:—

In the period 1895 to 1898 the United States exports to the United Kingdom included the following items, viz. :--

 Pig iron
 ...
 3,668 ...
 ...
 7,417 ...
 91,196 ...
 ...
 29,870 ...

 Unwrought steel
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 ...
 <td

Steel rails and steel plates from the United States have also recently made their appearance in the United Kingdom, but not as yet in any great quantity.

The recent unexpected invasion by American competitors of markets which had hitherto been considered exclusively British has naturally somewhat disturbed home producers, among whom there are those who question the allegation that the mineral resources of American iron and steel masters are superior to those available here. They believe that the new competition is carried on at a loss, and will never attain serious dimensions, but there are others who consider it permanent, and certainly the preparations and extensions undertaken in the United States provide evidence at least that the Americans have the courage of their convictions.

With the object of satisfying themselves on this question, which appears to be one of almost national importance, the authors decided early in June, 1898, to visit the Lake Superior region and to investigate some of the principal mines, the ores obtained from them, the routes by which they are carried southward to the blast-furnaces, and the means employed for mining, loading, unloading, and transporting them. The results of this investigation are given in this paper.

PITTSBURGH VERSUS MIDDLESBROUGH.

The eminence of the investigators, and the nature of their quest, combine to invest their report with exceptional significance. They really went to inquire whether American resources did not involve the doom of British steel. Their conclusions, quietly and soberly stated, make sorrowful reading:—

The authors will conclude with a few remarks as to the influence of these abundant, excellent, and cheap ores upon the supply of iron and steel to the markets of the world.

The following is approximately the cost price of one ton of Bessemer pig-iron at Pittsburgh, and at Middlesbrough, England, on January 1, 1899 :-

| , , , ,         | 22           |         |       |      |        |    |    |    |     |
|-----------------|--------------|---------|-------|------|--------|----|----|----|-----|
|                 |              |         | SBUR  | GH.  |        |    | £  | 5. | d.  |
| 1.66 ton of or  | e at 12s     | . 81.   | 01.3  |      |        | -4 | 1  | 1  | 1   |
| 16 cwts, of col | ke at 7s     |         |       |      | 111.20 |    | 0  | 5  | 7   |
| 12 cwts, of lin | nestone      | at 35.  | 11.   |      |        |    | 0  | I  | 91  |
| Labour .        |              |         |       |      |        |    | 0  | 2  | 0   |
| Repairs         |              |         |       |      |        |    | 0  | I  | 0   |
| Other items.    | 100          |         | 6.4   |      |        | 1. | 0  | 1  | 0   |
| Total           | 1.5 00 1     | 100     | my in | W    |        |    | £ī | 12 | 51  |
|                 |              | AIDDL   | ESBR  | OUGH |        |    | £  | S. | d.  |
| 1'95 ton of or  | e at 15s     | . 2d.   |       |      |        |    | 1  | 9  | 7   |
| 20'5 cwts. of   | coke at      | 15s. 6  | id    |      |        |    | 0  | 15 | 10  |
| 9 cwts. of lime | estone a     | t 35. 9 | d.    |      |        |    | 0  | 1  | 81  |
| Labour .        | 112 6 31     |         |       |      |        |    | 0  | 3  | 0   |
| Repairs .       |              | 2001    |       |      |        |    | 0  | 1  | 0   |
| Other items.    |              |         |       |      |        |    | 0  | 1  | 0   |
| Total           | The state of | un c    | 24/9  | 7    | 1-11/1 | 1  | 12 | 12 | - 2 |

AMERICAN IRON LI A TON CHEAPER.

From these figures it appears that Bessemer pig-iron can be produced at Pittsburgh under present conditions for almost £1 per ton less than at Middlesbrough. This advantage is principally due to the Lake Superior ore and the Pennsylvania fuel supply. It will readily be seen that by the time the pig-iron has been converted into ingots, and further into finished steel, the advantage has been increased in proportion to the loss in conversion, and by reason of the lower cost of the fuel required in the later processes.

SELLING PRICES.

| GLLL                        | 18 74 | 0 1  | LECTA | W 3 W | 30  |           |              |     |       |      |          |  |
|-----------------------------|-------|------|-------|-------|-----|-----------|--------------|-----|-------|------|----------|--|
| h was a same                |       | Pitt | .S.A  | rgh   | , M | iddEn | lesbglar | rou | P     | rice | rghs |  |
|                             |       |      | S.    |       |     |           |              |     | £     | S.   | d.       |  |
| Steel rails (heavy) per ton |       |      |       |       |     |           |              |     |       |      |          |  |
| steel ship-plates per ton   |    | 5    | 10    | 9     |     | 6         | 15           | 0   | I | 4    | 3        |  |
| steel billets and blooms    |       | 3    | 2     | 6     |  | 4         | 5            | 0   | I | 2    | 6        |  |
| "THE WE                     | AT    | H    | TO    | 0     | COM | E.        | ))           |     |       |      |          |  |

The words of Messrs. Head are cautious and temperate, but the prospect they express is none the less gloomy on that account. They say :-

These figures seem to show that the present low prices of American steel are justified, if only by the cheapness of the pigiron from which it is made; and that the competition now felt in England and in neutral markets is likely to continue, and can only be met by lower costs on the part of English producers in all available directions.

The authors are inclined to the view that Lake Superior iron ores are likely to have a considerable and permanent effect in cheapening iron and steel and all goods made therefrom throughout the markets of the world; and that they will tend to encourage the production of such goods, and especially of oceangoing ships and engines at United States ports to a hitherto unprecedented extent.

The British producer will need all his British pluck and all his inventiveness to face this prospect. The United States have on their side an unequalled exuberance of natural resources. They have all the economies which result from a colossal concentration of capital. The entire steel industry of the Republic is practically in the hands of a single Trust. Against such enormous odds what can our petty mineral stores avail, or our Liliputian capitalists?

THE IRON TRADE EVERYWHERE ADVANCING.

In instructive contrast to Messrs. Head's lugubrious conclusions stands Mr. Archer Brown's paper in the October Engineering Magazine on "The Outlook in the American Iron Industry." Mr. Brown begins with a reminder that the price of iron has gone up 100 per cent. in six months. The enormous advance since Messrs. Head's figures were put together can best be seen by inspecting the following table:—

| Pig Iron.                                   | Sept. 6,1899. | Aug. 23,1899. | Aug. 2, 1893. | Aug. 31,1898. |
|---------------------------------------------|-------------------|-------------------|---------------|-------------------|
| Foundry Pig, No. 2 Standard,                | Dols.             | Dols.             | Dols.         | Dols.             |
| Philadelphia                                | 22.00             | 20.75             | 20.25         | 10.50             |
| Foundry Pig, No. 2, Southern,Cincinnati | 19.25             | 18.50             | 18.00         | 9.50              |
|                                             | 21.00             | 20.50             | 20.00         | 11.00             |
| Bessemer Pig, Pittsburgh                    | 23.25             | 22.50             | 21.25         | 10.00             |
| Gray Forge, Pittsburgh                      | 19.50             | 18.50             | 17.75         | 9.35              |
| Lake Superior Charcoal, Chicago             | 24.00             | 23.00             | 22.00         | 11.50             |
|                                             |                   |                   |               |                   |

In answer to the question, "Will it last?" the writer declares the demand to be increasing. The inevitable replacements which were postponed during slack trade cannot longer be put off. "The real factor in lowering prices will be in increased production, not diminished demand." The writer reckons that the output of the furna face perha Wh new marke believ steel 5 per will n

labou

and A

reass But won, ironw bicycl great

> Ag do no sharin The commone na were i expor

felt in stimul mills their and B The g are fill Great largely Great but he indust risen t brough

sevent The China the ne of pro spirit. future electri etc., a benefi Ameri indust

The increase velocing geom production

T

T

increa

furnaces cannot be increased over 15 to 18 per cent. per annum.

WHAT OF AMERICAN IRON EXPORTS?

be nost

e is

ania

iron eel,

s in ired

rgh

9

3

te.

on

of felt can

in

ron

in

om

to

an-

nd

ted

of

ich

he

he lds

an

i.

us

he

he

a nt.

rs.

by 32, le.

50

50

00

35

50

ter

ole

de

ng

ed

he

What he has to say of the domain wherein we have to face American competition will be read with interest and perhaps relief on this side of the Atlantic:—

What of the export trade? It is generally believed that this new factor is the all-important one in sustaining American markets. Taking the iron and steel manufacture as a whole, I believe this to be true. But so far as ores, pig-iron, and even steel billets are concerned, the movement has never reached 5 per cent, of the product of the United States and probably will not for years to come. Radical changes in the freight and labour situations must occur before America can capture English and American markets with crude iron.

Whereat Middlesbrough may again take breath. Less reassuring words follow:—

But it is in the finished forms where American victories will be won, as they are now being won. In locomotive, wood and ironworking machinery, agricultural machinery, nails, wire, bicycles and a hundred other lines, American inventive genius, great productive capacity, modernised plants, superior business organisation, &c., will maintain and doubtless increase the great total of 80,000,000 dollars reached last year in her iron and steel exports.

THE INDUSTRIAL AWAKENING WORLD-WIDE.

Against the belief that exports will diminish if prices do not fall, the writer replies that the whole world is sharing in the upward movement. He says:—

The world is now knit closely together in its industrial and commercial as well as its financial fabric. Influences that affect one nation are soon felt by the others. England and Germany were in the midst of industrial prosperity two years before it was felt in America, but now that she has responded, the added stimulus is felt over there. We think it phenomenal that the mills and furnaces throughout the United States should have their product booked half through next year, but in Germany and Belgium they are already booked all through the year 1900. The great Krupp works at Essen, employing 30,000 men, are filled with orders until 1901. Germany has nearly overtaken Great Britain in pig-iron product, but is nevertheless importing largely from both England and America to supply her deficiency. Great Britain shows a slackening in her shipbuilding industry, but her export trade in iron is again growing, and all her lesser industries are exceedingly active. Prices of iron and steel have risen there almost as rapidly as in the United States. Middlesbrough pig that sold last year for forty-three shillings has reached seventy-five shillings, and is now a little under seventy.

The fact is the great industrial awakening is world-wide. China, India, South Africa, the Philippines, Japan, Russia, and the new island possessions nearer to the United States, are full of projects for improvement. They have caught the renaissance spirit. The beginnings are small, but they suggest immense future possibilities. They want steam railways, electric lines, electric lighting, water-works, locomotives, machinery, bridges, etc., and it scarcely seems probable that having felt some of the benefits of modern progress, they will decide to turn back. America has shown her ability to compete with the other industrial nations for this trade, and will continue to get it in increasing quantity.

A PHENOMENAL INCREASE.

The demand for iron is shown by the writer to be increasing through the generations with increasing velocity. "The world's consumption of iron grows in geometrical ratio." These are his figures of the world's production of pig-iron:—

| In | 1856  |        |     |   | 6,600,000  | gross | tons. |
|----|-------|--------|-----|---|------------|-------|-------|
| In | 1867  |        |     | 4 | 9,300,000  |     | 99    |
| In | 1878  |        |     |   | 14,100,000 | 99    | 99    |
| In | 1889  |        |     |   | 25,000,000 | 99    | 3.9   |
| In | 1890  |        |     |   | 26,500,000 | 99    | **    |
| In | 1900, | estima | ted |   | 35,000,000 | 99    | 99    |

AUSTRALIAN AND AMERICAN

FEDERATIONS COMPARED.

THE "Federation of Australia" is the subject of a paper in the Quarterly Review. It is an interesting study in "comparative federation," if the phrase may be forgiven.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

Of the judicial system, which carefully protects the independence of the judges, the writer says :-

Like the Supreme Court of Canada, but unlike the Supreme Court of the United States, the High Court of Australia is to have jurisdiction to hear appeals, not only from federal Courts and in federal matters, but from the Supreme Courts of the States in every case; and the judgment of the High Court will be final and conclusive. But the appeal to the Privy Council from the State Courts is not abolished.

SELF-ADJUSTMENT.

The Constitution of Canada can only be altered by the Imperial Parliament; the Australian Commonwealth has the power of altering its own Constitution. "Australia has been built upon the frame of American federalism" and "has little in common with Canadian federalism." But Australia adopts the Cabinet system, as does Canada, and is even more anxious than Canada for uniformity of law. "The Commonwealth Parliament has wider powers in domestic and commercial law than the Dominion Parliament. But neither in Canada nor in Australia do we find the 'legal' concentration of Germany."

CONTRAST IN SPIRIT.

Whatever resemblance in form he may find between the American and the Australian Constitutions, he bears closing witness to the immense difference in spirit. His words suggest how the English genius for self-government has grown during the last 110 years:—

A comparison of the Australian Constitution with other federal systems reveals very plainly the prevalence of democracy in Australia. The general plan of the Constitution is that of the United States, but the men of 1787 and 1789 were democrats of a different order from the men who wrought in 1897 and 1898. The watchword of the first was "Trust in no man"; that of the second, "Trust in the people."

AMERICAN DISTRUST,-

The Americans were firm believers in selection; the direct participation of the people in the functions of government seemed impracticable and mischievous: therefore they established a College of Electors for the Presidency, and chose the Senators through the Legislatures of the States. The possession of power is an invitation to abuse it; therefore the constitutional organs must be placed in opposition rather than combination, that they may check rather than support each other. Government is necessary, but an evil; therefore that people is best off that has as little of it as possible. Large States, where the central power is far off, are more dangerous to individual liberty than small States where popular control is more readily exerted; therefore central power is to be as limited as external and internal security will permit. Finally, some rights of man are so fundamental, so precious, that they must be put beyond the reach of government altogether.

-AUSTRALIAN TRUST, IN THE PEOPLE,

In Australia, on the contrary, the policy of "Trust in the people" has been adopted with an almost naïve confidence. The people believe themselves to be vigilant and competent to undertake every function of government; therefore they will have no intermediaries in the formation of their Senate; they need no Conventions to approve amendments of the Constitution. The possession of power by a Government readily answerable to the people need cause no fear; government is not evil but beneficent. Power then is to be concentrated, not divided; the only safeguards the individual requires are those which ensure his ahare of political power; individual liberties are not to obstruct the path of State action.

THE EXPECTED SHOWER OF METEORS.

PROBABLY on the very day on which this issue appears will arrive one of those tremendous meteoric displays which seemingly recur at intervals of about thirty-three years. The Edinburgh Review devotes an article to these November meteors, which will consist not merely of the Leonids, but probably also of a battalion of Andromedes.

THE CAUSE OF "SHOOTING STARS."

The writer thus explains these celestial fireworks :-

In the light of modern research they may be described as terrestial collisions with cosmical bodies—collisions fortunately on a small scale, and deadened by the interposition of our atmospheric buffer; else incidents more tragic than a chance confligration, or an ignorant panic, might have to be recounted. As it is, the meteorites get the worst of it. The vast majority are utterly consumed in the highest air strata, and, in the guise of shooting stars, announce almost at the same instant their existence and its close. Nothing remains but an imperceptible quantity of gas and dust. Not all, however, are thus fragile. A few of larger build reach the ground, generally as the fragmentary products of explosions due to the resistance of the air and the ensuing sudden development of heat. "Aerolites," as these samples of other worlds are commonly called, bear every mark of rough usage. They are coated with melted slag, as if they had passed through a furnace; they are pitted, sometimes almost riddled by the furious onsets of the air-blasts they raise and meet. "Yet so swift are their transits from ether to earth that the cold of space at times survives inside their roasted shells. As Agassiz said, of the Dhurmsala meteorite, which fell in the Punjab on July 14, 1860, they realise the Chinese culmary ideal of "fried ices." These survivors of the middle passage are indeed of vanishing scarcity compared with the multitude that succumb. One in ten millions, at the most, escapes to tell the tale of its hardships.

WHAT THEY ARE MADE OF.

Meteors which have not been parts of comets are virtually the exclusive source of stonefalls: meteoric streams result from cometary decay. Of the constituents of aerolites the writer says:—

Between thirty and forty of our home-bred elements, and no foreign substances, enter into their composition. But the modes of combination of these elements present novelties. In other words, meteoric chemistry is familiar, meteoric mineralogy strange to our experience.

Meteorites separate of themselves into two classes—"siderites," which are virtually blocks of native iron; and "uranoliths," or "sky stones." Intermediate or "siderolithic" varieties consist of an amalgam of metal and stone. Siderites contain notable proportions of nickel and cobalt, and a small percentage of the rare metal gallium.

WHAT IS THEIR ORIGIN.

Their resemblance to volcanic ejecta suggests an explosive origin in celestial volcanoes; but to this theory the writer finds a fatal objection in the preventive force of the atmosphere, which would resist forcible expulsion as it resists forcible injection of meteoric matter. The writer proceeds:—

The alternative view is that meteorites are the very dust of cosmic decay, mementoes of world-mortality, proclaiming the six transit of the "pale populace of heaven." As globes cool and harden they cease to be plastic; and at last, instead of yielding to strains, they are rent by them. The fissures in the moon, due possibly to this cause, are held, with good show of reason, to betoken incipient disruption. A fractured sphere, however, will not permanently continue to revolve and rotate as one mass. It must finally go to pieces, and strew its orbit with ruins.

In spite of balloons and photography by moonlight—here in England, especially, the outlook for a celestial "sensation" is discouraging. It should be at its best, if calculations are verified, about noon, Greenwich time, on November 15th;

so that the sun and moon will conspire to exclude us from the spectacle, which may be additionally cloaked by an unwelcome canopy of clouds.

STANDARDISATION.

THAT is the word chosen to describe a movement which, according to the editor of the Engineering Magazine, "promises to be one of the greatest of the century," even the "century which saw the birth of steam and electricity and the general introduction of machinery." With standardisation goes specialisation: and the advantage of both is the saving of waste, in material, labour and time. In the same October number Sir Benjamin Browne writes on "Standardising in Engineering Construction." The standardisation practised in the United States explains, according to Sir Benjamin, the Americans getting the orders for the Atbara Bridge, for many British locomotives, and for an ever-increasing number of machine-tools. American makers have bridges, locomotives and what not ready made or readily makeable according to specific patterns or standards. Fresh plans and specifications are not required for each new order. As Sir Benjamin says :-

If you repeat the same process over and over again, and especially if a large number of men are involved therein, the speed at which it can be carried out will be enormously increased, and the last article of any kind out of a large number may easily be made in the same number of days as the first one took weeks to complete.

The problem indeed is :-

Where can we draw the line between the point where we ought to use standard designs, and the point where we should begin to use special designs? It is obvious that a large majority of railway bridges cross over roads or railways the width of which varies very little, and as there are probably hundreds, or perhaps thousands, of such bridges constantly being required in the world, an engineer will, in most cases, do better to adopt an existing design, which has often been used and of which every possible weakness has been discovered by practical wear and tear, than to design something out of his own head. It will probably be better and certainly far cheaper.

English engineers are believed to be "too fond of their own designs, and too unwilling to adopt those of other people." When they are driven to place orders in America they do, however, accept the ready-made American designs, but when placing orders in England some of them at least insist on their own designs. This is hardly fair to the English manufacturer. The writer urges that "as we get from bridges to smaller articles the desirability for working to standard types probably becomes greater." He points out that manufacturers themselves are great sinners in this respect. When they want a new workshop, they turn on an ordinary draughtsman to design it, instead of an architect who has made a speciality of this kind of work. He adds:—

I fear there is no doubt that in this matter the Americans see far more clearly than we do. You can find an engineering firm in America that makes only one type of lathe, and one size of that lathe. Of course, the proprietor knows perfectly well that many other types are necessary, and many other sizes, but his business is to make that one type, and that one size, and make it absolutely perfect; if people want something else, they must go elsewhere. He sees at once that he cannot supply all the wants of the world, and what he wants is to have sufficient business for his own purpose, and in that to supply something better and cheaper than anybody else can give. I believe this way of doing business is eminently successful.

In the same number Mr. J. Slater Lewis treats of a kindred subject—the organisation of works as an important factor in output.

which success a luther the Maparithe were who

5d5

N

arti

in (1)
(3) I flyin is to is a is, m work you hard do the of years.

Th

as m

has o

have which throu By m existin power veloci carryi from lift I possib only 8 a load be son more i the b ascend prima

The Otto I life so was the depen equipp proved flights pressu and he suit the feeling perfect indescr slope, take ve we are feel ho diminus pass ov

" A!

and THE ROMANCE OF THE AIR.

MR. W. E. GARRETT FISHER contributes an excellent article to the Fortnightly on "The Art of Flying," in which, without being too technical, he summarises the successes and failures of aeronauts in the past, and gives a lucid statement of the problems which await them in the future.

HISTORY OF FLYING.

Mr. Fisher thinks that flying on a scientific basis, as apart from ballooning, had made no real progress before the beginning of the present reign. The older attempts were mainly based upon charlatanry. Bishop Wilkins, who wrote in the seventeenth century, classified the ways in which the problem might be solved as follows: "(1) By spirits or angels; (2) by the help of fowls; (3) by wings fastened immediately to the body; (4) by a flying chariot." The problem of flight, properly so called, is to support a heavy body by its own motion. Ballooning is a very different thing. The air, thin and yielding as it is, may be made to bear the largest birds or the framework of a flying machine. In fact, "the air is a solid if you hit it hard enough. The difficulty just lies in hitting hard enough: and the proper way is to let the air itself do the hitting. The condor has known this for millions of years: we have only just begun to see it."

of years: we have only just begun to see it."

To find the only flying machine which has been a real success we must go to America:—

The "aerodrome" of Professor S. P. Langley has flown for as much as half-a-mile at a time, driven by a steam-engine, and has descended without injury when the motive power was exhausted. Professor Langley has not only made models which have actually flown, but has worked out the conditions under which a plane or set of planes can be supported in the air, through a long series of elaborate and convincing experiments. By means of these he has demonstrated that we possess, in existing steam and other heat engines, "more than the requisite power to urge a system of rigid planes through the air at a great velocity, making them not only self-sustaining, but capable of carrying other than their own weight." Mr. Maxim claims from experiments with his machine that one horse-power will lift 133 lb. In either case, as Mr. Maxim has shown the possibility of building engines up to 300 horse-power weighing only 8 lb. per horse-power, there is clearly ample power to drive a loaded aeroplane. The real difficulty, as has been said, is to be sought elsewhere. The obstacles in the way of flight "lie more in such apparently secondary difficulties as those of guiding the body so that it may move in the direction desired, and ascend or descend in safety, than in what may appear to be the primary difficulties due to the nature of the air itself."

The most famous of all flying machine inventors was Otto Lilienthal, who paid the penalty of success with his life some three years ago. Lilienthal's main contention was that the construction of a flying machine was not dependent on motors, and that with a strong wind a man equipped with proper sustaining planes could soar. He proved the truth of this theory by a series of sliding flights from the summit of a hillock, in every case the pressure of the atmosphere raising him from the ground, and he soon acquired great skill in adjusting his wings to suit the currents of wind:—

"After a few trials," wrote Lilienthal, "one begins to have a feeling of mastery over the situation... Finally, we become perfectly at ease, even when soaring high in the air, while the indescribably beautiful and gentle gliding over the long sunny slope, rekindles our ardour anew at every trial. It does not take very long before it is quite a matter of indifference whether we are gliding along two or twenty yards above the ground; we feel how safely the air is carrying us, even though we see diminutive men looking up at us in astonishment. Soon we pass over ravines as high as houses, and sail for several hundred yards through the air without any danger, parrying the force of the wind at every movement."

Of Mr. Maxim's experiments Mr. Fisher says :-

Mr. Maxim's machine has, undoubtedly, power to fly, if let loose: that it has not yet done so is due to difficulties of another kind, which make it very uncertain whether the machine would survive a single trial; and as the engine alone is understood to have cost its weight in silver, no one can wonder that the crucial experiment is delayed until there is every prospect of a safe result.

The future of flying is thus described :-

It is safe to prophesy that the flying machine of the twentieth century will be analogous to a sailing vessel with an auxiliary screw, rather than to a mastless steamer. This is the prospect, indeed, that makes flying worth while to search after. It is the effortless soaring of the condor, not the fussy flapping of the sparrow, that must be taken as a model.

THE EXPANSION OF EMPIRE.

FROM AN AMERICAN POINT OF VIEW.

MR. J. G. SCHURMAN, President of the Cornell University and Chairman of the Philippine Commission, contributes to the American Review of Reviews an article on the problem of territorial expansion. He says that the most obvious and fundamental lesson which may be drawn from the colonial history of Europe is "let no ruling race ever treat its colonies or dependencies like its possessions." That theory cost England her first colonial empire in America, and because she abandoned it her colonies are now her pleasure and her pride. England certainly neither owns the soil nor the inhabitants of India. Mr. Schurman says Americans will never realise their true relations with the Philippines so long as they retain that fatal confusion of government and property. The sovereign power owns nothing, but it has the responsibility of government.

or dependencies is not a money-making enterprise for the sovereign power or its citizens. There is no instance in history of the successful government of a colony where profit to the parent state or its citizens has been a leading consideration. Hence, every nation which seeks to enrich itself or its citizens at the expense of its colonists impoverishes all. Mr. Schurman compares the trade which England had with India while India was the possession of the East India Company, with its trade to-day, and declares that the increase is a splendid economic compensation to England for single-hearted devotion to the welfare of her great dependency and scrupulous impartiality in administering the trust of government. The cardinal principle of getting profit from colonies is not to seek it at their expense. Another principle of colonisation is that colonies and dependencies should always be self-supporting. England has made financial self-sufficiency the corner-stone of her vast colonial fabric. The fourth principal point which Mr. Schurman insists upon is that the sovereign power should delegate all the functions of government to the authorities on the spot.

The second lesson is that the government of colonies

Good Words for November is an interesting number. Its imperial scope may be discerned from its charming sketch by Phil Robinson of a drive "from sea to summit" in the Jamaican Hills, from Mr. G. Ralling's account of the Cape Parliament, and from Mr. W. C. Mackenzie's phases of Australian City life, both of which claim separate mention. "Ætheric telegraphy" is hailed as a correct title for Marconi's invention, which, strictly speaking, can never be "wireless."

the

ome

ich,

ine,

ven

city

an-

e of

and min

on-ited

ans ber

able ans

der.

and

the

sed,

asily

eeks

we

ould

ority

hich

haps

orld,

sting

sible

n to etter

heir ther in ade

and

This

riter

the ably rers

hts-

de a firm

ze of that

t his

ke it

t go

vants

s for and loing

of a

an

OLD CRIMEAN DAYS.

A MIDSHIPMAN'S REMINISCENCES OF THE WAR.

THE Contemporary for July contains a delightful paper of memories of the Crimea by Sir Edmund Verney, who served as a midshipman on the flagship Britannia, and afterwards on the Terrible, a paddle wheel steam-frigate, which gained a great reputation during the war. Sir Edmund Verney seems to have seen everyone and everything worth seeing in the course of the campaign, and his article is full of amusing anecdotes of the men and events of that turbulent epoch.

STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE.

The commissariat department seems to have been the chief fountain of humour among the middies of the time. Sir Edmund Verney's description of a dinner which he had at Constantinople with Lord Stratford de Redcliffe is worth retailing:-

Noticing my devotion to a glorious plum-pudding, the like whereof was not to be seen in a gun-room, he assured me that for his part he preferred the plainer "plum-duff" of the ship's galley; he volunteered to make a bargain with me, that if I would send him a sailor's plum-duff he would send me the best pudding his cook could make. So when I returned on board the plum-duff was carefully made according to regulation, and I myself carried it to the Embassy and left it for his Excellency; but I never got my plum-pudding, or any acknowledgment whatever; whether the lacqueys ate it, or whether it was given to his Excellency's pigs (if he had any), I know not; this comes of bring a blackbeetle. One can believe anything of an ambassador who could so ruthlessly break a solemn treaty. Years and years afterwards I met Lord Stratford in the Lobby of the House of Commons and reminded him that I had never had my pudding; I regret to say that he affected to have forgotten the incident.

AN HEROIC COWARD.

A unique illustration of what the sense of duty will do is given by Sir Edmund Verney in the following anecdote:—

Our forecastle quarters, deserted by Lieutenant S. at the bombardment of Odessa, were at this time commanded by Lieutenant E. He was universally popular; he was very fat, and had the usual characteristics of fat men. H: had often told me in conversation of his great desire to distinguish himself, and particularly that he would like to belong to a Highland regiment. But as soon as the Russian shot came flying about the forecastle he entirely lost his nerve, he became physically incapable, the perspiration streamed down his terrified face, and he became actually ill; some of the men even ventured to chaff him, advising him to put his head into a newly made shot-hole, as he might be certain no second shot would strike exactly the same spot. So it devolved wholly on me at Sebastopol, as at Odessa, to fight the forecastle quarters. Now, I have always thought he was the bravest man I have ever seen in action; incontestably ill, paralysed with terror, wholly incapable, nothing would induce him to leave his quarters; by a stupendous and amazing moral effort he stuck to his post, and remained on the forecastle until the fight was over. Not many men would have had this courage.

SANGFROID ON SEA AND LAND.

A hero of a different type was the captain of the Terrible, McCleverty, whom Sir Edmund Verney describes as—the one and only man I have ever seen absolutely unaffected in voice or manner by the surrounding conditions. When Russian shot were really giving us a lively time in the attack on Odessa and at the bombardment of Sebastopol, his face was a picture of content, worthy of a City Alderman; his manner calm as a Serene Highness.

The civilian spectators on the cliffs of Odessa seem, however, to have outdone McCleverty. After the bombardment of Odessa-when the field artillery withdrew, the cliff was soon crowded with ladies and gentlemen; some forty or fifty carriages full of people, and children of all ages came out from Odessa; at least about a thousand people assembled. The ladies showed the utmost sangiroid, putting up their parasols, walking arm-in-arm in the line of fire, as the shot came bounding up the hill close to them. One shot which went rather wide of the mark buried itself in the earth close to a group of little boys, who immediately rushed forward struggling who could obtain possession of it.

THE OTHER SIDE OF IT.

Not all the war was wit and indifference, however, and here and there is a glimpse of the grim realities:—

No preparations worthy of the name were made for the care of the wounded when we invaded the Crimea. It was horrible to see the shattered frames of what were lately stalwart soldiers lying on the decks or in swinging cots; it was dreadful to hear the shrieks, the cries, the groans, as shock after shock was inflicted by the rolling of the ship on the sensitive bodies of poor creatures already in frightful agony. Since those days I have myself suffered amputation, and I know now the awful tortures those brave men must have endured. Then, when at last they did reach Constantinople, "the arrangements were so bad in the hospitals that some of the wounded were not attended to for three days together, England's best blood lying about without even a mattress under them."

Women and Emotions.

WRITING in the Humanitarian for November, Professor Mantegazza continues his analysis of the emotions of women. He says that love is the chief mainspring of all woman's action. Friendship with women occupies but a secondary place:

The love of a woman is stronger, more delicate, more constant, more modest, more rich in its comprehensiveness and in its pathological forms; perhaps also more jealous, and certainly more expansive and richer in forms.

nore expansive and richer in forms.

In the path of her life it stands as a guide, and governs all the world of the affections and of the thoughts.

This last characteristic is, perhaps, the highest of all the others; it certainly is the widest and the most comprehensive.

The love of woman does not find in the cerebral centre—even moderately—forces that can bend it or dominate it. The woman thinks as she loves, the man loves as he thinks. In all books, in religious and political options, in the diverse morality, in the character, the habits of the life of woman, love is always present, whether menifested or concealed; it is the primary motive power, the scal of everything, and the responsible promoter of every sin and of every virtue.

Professor Mantegazza's article is one long string of epigrams, the tendency of all of which is to glorify womanhood :-

Man seeks in love, first of all things, voluptuousness; woman, first of all, the conquest of the heart.

Woman loves almost always more by the heart than by the senses. She also constantly loves without the need of voluntuousness.

Modern women, civilised women, would be Christians even if Christ had never lived.

Motherhood is the first and the most essential mission of woman, and she can only become a mother through love, which stands towards maternity as flowers to fruit.

All that is wanting to transform Eve into an odious and

All that is wanting to transform Eve into an odious and cantankerous witch is a snuff-box and a pair of moustaches.

The astuteness, the infinite resources of the quick and subtle

The astuteness, the infinite resources of the quick and subtle falsehoods, the quick perceptions, make of a woman a strong ally for a man in politics, and when love goes arm-in-arm with political genius, the woman becomes a heroine, and history makes her immortal.

SII sine perha moun incre to re the b but s climb Marti carrie witho of 16 cease panio glacie more Tha of Chi in our sanctu summi to thei Indian thing t was for glacier Nex dragg innum

where lost in

of a started of a

The expedi his expedi his expedi short st feet 200 rest and have sle sleep. if it is r But hardsh that thi

The dar utter si expanse peaks ir combine spoke n be light

MIIX

CLIMBING MOUNT SORATA.

the

ded

l of east

the arm

e to

ried

me-

sion

and care

rible

liers

hear

was 1000 have ures

they

the

for hout

Pro-

ions

g of pies

tant.

n its ainly

1 the

ners :

even The verse

love

s the

g of orify

man.

n by ven if

on of which

s and subtle

strong

with istory

24,255 FEET ABOVE THE SEA.

SIR MARTIN CONWAY contributes to Harper's Magazine for November a fascinating account of what is perhaps the greatest climb recorded in the history of mountaineering. To reach, after several failures and incredible difficulties, an altitude of 24,255 feet, and then to return, baffled by a beggarly 250, is probably one of the bitterest experiences that ever befell a mountaineer; but such was the fate of Sir Martin Conway in his great climb of Sorata in the Bolivian Cordillera Real. Sir Martin, accompanied by his Alpine guide and Indian carriers, started on his great climb from Umapusa, and, without dismounting from his mule, reached an altitude of 16,000 feet, and at 17,500, where all vegetation had ceased, pitched his tents, dismissed his Indian companions, and spent the night on a ridge between two glaciers. Here he had a narrow escape from a much more serious danger than avalanches or crevasses :-

That night a party of superstitious Indians from the village of Chiara-uyo crept up in the darkness, intending to murder us in our sleep. They knew that we had come to profane the sanctuaries of the mountain gods, and to carry away from the summit of Illampu the cross of gold and the bull of gold which to them are well known to be planted there. Hostility to the Indians of the village from which our men came had also something to do with the raid. Fortunately for all parties, the camp was found empty, and as the Indians dare not ascend by the glacier, we were left in peace.

Next day the three mountaineers continued the ascent, dragging their sledge across the glaciers and over innumerable crevices, reaching a height of 19,000 feet, where the second night was passed. The next day was lost in struggling with mist, and, the day after, all hopes of a successful descent were lost:—

The storm broke once more, and the clouds swooped down in yet blacker battalions; so, piling the sleeping-bags and provisions into a heap and rolling the tent about them, we left the bundle to take its chance, and hurried away for less boisterous regions below. With no sledge to drag and no packs to carry, we ran in a few hours down the 4000 feet it had taken two days to ascend. By sunset we were in the base camp, and next day we returned to Umapusa. Even thither the bad weather pursued us; snow lay on the potato-fields. Such weather in September is almost unknown in Bolivia. What could be the cause? The Indians were in no doubt. The gods were enraged at our attempt to profane their sanctuary, and had risen in wrath to drive us down. All men looked askance at us.

The next attempt was more successful, and brought the expedition to within a short distance of the summit. Of his experience this time, Sir Martin says:—

The secret of how to gain a very high altitude is to ascend by short stages, and to stop a night at each stage. Above 17,000 feet 2000 feet a day is enough. You can do more, but the loss in rest and rehabilitation outweighs the apparent gain in time. I have slept for four nights at ahout 20,000 feet, and am satisfied that this is by no means the limit of height where a man can sleep. Probably 23,000 feet is not an impossible camping altitude, if it is reached by stages of 2000 feet or less.

But the magic of the great mountain amply repaid hardships and fatigue:—

The climb in the night up the glacier was delightfully romantic. The darkness, the uncertain flickering of our fire-fly candle, the utter silence, the angry clouds, the starry heaven, and the expanse of snow, vaguely felt, rather than seen, and surrounding peaks in the bonds of a frost like the grip of a demon's hand, combined to produce on all of us an immense impression. We spoke none but necessary words. The silence was too awful to be lightly broken.

At last, when but a few hundred feet remained to be surmounted, a crevass some 50 feet across was met with, to cross which would have involved climbing a steep slope covered with powdery snow, accumulated by recent storms, with the probability of starting an avalanche. To accept the risk would have been foolhardy, and the ascent was abandoned. Before returning Sir Martin determined the exact height of Mount Sorata to be 24,710 feet. He concludes:—

As our climb recedes into the past, the memory of its dangers grows less, whilst the desire for complete success abides unchanged. I ask myself whether that slope might not have been crossed; whether a better man would not have risked it and won. There come hours when I stand condemned at the bar of my own judgment. But in saner moments another conclusion obtains the mastery, and I decide that at the supreme instant I did right not merely not to risk my own life for what is, after all, a passing triumph, but not to risk the lives of my two admirable guides. The tangible results of a journey of exploration are not the mere attainment of particular points, but the accumulated group of observations and collections, whereby the sum of human knowledge is, however little, increased. In turning my back on the peak, I knew that I did so for the last time. Maquignaz might come to it again with another employer, but I should not return; for that year it was certain the mountain would not come again into climbable condition before the beginning of the rainy season (November to March), whilst future years would bring other duties.

THE FUTURE OF ENGLISH-SPEAKING DRAMA.

MR. WILLIAM ARCHER writes in the Pall Mall Magazine for November on "The American Stage." The theatre, he reports, is not obtrusive architecturally in New York, but is numerous and popular. "In the proportion of its theatrical seating power to its urban population, America is probably a good way ahead of any European country." Theatres "in central and civilised New York" number between thirty and forty. "We have in America a vast amusement-loving public, crowding nightly to handsome, well-appointed, commodious theatres." Perhaps the most significant passage in Mr. Archer's paper is this glimpse of future possibilities:—

If it were interesting in no other respect, the mere magnitude of the public to which it appeals would render the American stage a sociological phenomenon of real moment. But it would be absurd to deny it an artistic interest as well. Never in the history of the world has there been such a gigantic audience for any dramatic literature as that which the Anglo-Saxon race to-day affords. For the moment, the immensity of the public is a source of bewilderment, of weakness; but it rests with us and with our sons to find in it a source of strength. The problem of the future is to make our Anglo-Saxon democracies the seed-plot of a spiritual aristocracy; and in that movement the theatre is predestined to a leading part. Several cultivated Americans, taking the contemptuous or despairing view of the stage which is so common in England, have asked me, in effect, "What came you out into the wilderness to see?" I might have replied, grandiloquently but truly, "I came to look into the future of the English drama." We have in America a nation of playgoers, unaffected in the main by the Puritanism or snobbery which for so long held the better part of the English people aloof from the theatre. This nation of playgoers is enormously wealthy, and is advancing by leaps and bounds in culture and taste. What developments may we not look for in the American theatre, and what rections from America, upon the store of the theatre, and what reactions from America upon the stage of our own country!

For the present, however, the American playwright has not merely to face the competition of plays from London, Paris and Berlin; he has to write to please "the matinée girl," the half-educated young girl, shop assistant, typist, and what not.

THE PROGRESS OF ENGLISH PROSE.

It is quite a history in petto of English prose which finds its way, under the modest heading of "Some Tendencies of Prose Style," into the pages of the Edinburgh Review for October. The writer begins by describing prose:—

Broadly speaking, prose is the natural medium of ordinary speech, which aims not at the feelings, but at the mind, and it is used to relate, to convince, or to discourse.

He declares that "no one since the world was created ever wrote better prose than Swift."

PLAIN ENGLISH-

"Admirable plainness" was the characteristic of early English prose. "Foxe and Holinshed wrote roughly and with some uncertainty of grammar; but they wrote better, because plainer English, than the average Englishman with pen in hand wrote a century later." Then love of decoration developed "an elaborate prose," which came to a head in Lyly's "Euphues." Then the stage swept off the decorative writers into dramatic work, and prose was left to "the cultured amateur, the scholar, and the controversialist "-all Latinised in habit of style and diction.

-SPOILT BY LATIN AND SAVED BY FRENCH-

The writer offers this explanation of what has often puzzled believers in the upright and downright character of English speech :-

Thus, written for a limited audience and written by Latinists who set an exaggerated value upon the Roman literature, the language was warped from its natural directness and wrapped up in a convolution of relative clauses. If the Restoration did nothing else for England, at least it clarified the language. The stage again became popular, but the dramatists were members of a society guided by France in its tone and sympathies at a time when the French literature was at the height of its perfection. French models marred our poetry, but they made our prose. Congreve and Wycherly set an example of lucid, terse, and pointed English in dialogue, which Dryden applied to the more formal manner of his critical discourses; and the thing was done. At last men wrote as they spoke, and wrote well. For, after all, that is, in our opinion, the root of the matter. . . No man could have commanded a hearing who spoke as Milton wrote; and for that reason we should characterise his prose treatises as magnificent examples of mistaken prose.

From which remark it will be seen that the reviewer is not lacking in courage.

-CLARIFIED INTO THE CLASSIC STYLE-

Of the Queen Anne writers the reviewer thus sums

"Style," says Professor Raleigh, "is gesture"—it is the way in which personality expresses itself. But by the ordinary rules of good breeding we are taught to subdue our gestures, to keep them within bounds, and whatever we do, to do it in the closest possible conformity to a certain accepted type. That was practically the theory of the eighteenth century about writing. The writer was urged rather to avoid blemishes than to seek after qualities. Lucidity was their ideal, and they attained it by confining their attention to what could be analysed—the operations of the mind—and neglecting what could only be suggested, the sense impressions. The result was a curiously impersonal view of life, and a curiously colourless style.

-AND RESTORED TO NATURE.

The reaction was led by Lamb, and still more by Hazlitt: who in his turn afforded a model to Stevenson-"the man who has done more than any other in this century towards a deliberate remoulding of prose style." The reviewer says :-

Hazlitt is no votary of abstract reason; his way is to insist upon the personal aspect of every argument, and in his frank egotism he goes back to the example of Montaigne. Prose in his hands takes a warmth and colour from the fact that he persistently deals, not with abstractions, but with sensations, and directly the testimony of the senses comes to be heard the resources of language are taxed to afford a corresponding vivacity of impression.

HARD ON MACAULAY.

Of Macaulay the present day Edinburgh is unkind enough to say :

He arranged the old thing in a new way by a lavish use of full stops, so as to make it more telling to the eye. He heightened the emphasis of each individual part in his utterance; but he added to English style nothing personal to himself; he never really set his stamp upon the language. . . . . He must always be instructing, and his voice has the strident insistence of a teacher's harangue.

TWO EXEMPLARS OF ENGLISH STYLE.

Napier stands alone, but he stands as one of the great masters of style; only, the gesture which becomes him is appropriate to very few in a generation; the rest of us cannot be heroes. If we were to select from Sir Henry Craik's list the men who have afforded to the world an example of what English style may be and ought to be, in its perfect adaptation to all the needs of life that have to be chronicled or commented upon, we should name without hesitation Thackeray and Newman.

Carlyle's style is declared to reach the extreme limit of what can be known for English. He chiefly expressed his own abnormal personality. "Ruskin at his best is incomparable"; but "Ruskin and Carlyle lie out of the common track; their manner is not for ordinary uses." "In the historical manner Froude's mastery is unchallenged."

STEVENSON'S INFLUENCE.

The modern tendency in art is, the writer observes, to lay stress on what is individual-on the vivacity of personal impressions—and on the purely technical qualities

There is no doubt that Stevenson's critical writings have done much to produce a similarly self-conscious method of expression in literature. He divides prose style into four elements—the logical evolution of thought; the apt choice of words; rhythm, the artistic disposing of longs and shorts; and, lastly, the combining of single sounds, vowel or consonantal, not merely in alliteration, but according to what he calls certain ancient harmonies in nature. Now all these four elements have been present more or less, consciously or unconsciously, to the mind of every good writer. But with such writers as those of the eighteenth century logical arrangement has been paramount; Stevenson elevated the other considerations to a parity with it, and later writers have made rhythm and sound predominate considerably

The reviewer condemns Mr. Pater's style as unnatural, and his vocabulary as affectedly antique. Of Mr. Meredith he says: "Surely, since literature began, so good a writer never had so bad a way of writing before." The best prose of to-day makes this Edinburgh critic regret the eighteenth century manner.

THE Quiver for November is distinguished by admirable reproductions of Raphael's Sistine Madonna (the title carefully Protestantised into "The Holy Child") and of F. W. Topham's "Dedication of Samuel." These are themselves worthy to be cut out and framed. But they are only miniatures of large fine art plates of the same pictures, to be given to every purchaser of the current and two following numbers, who forwards coupons and sixpence. In this way Messrs. Cassell claim that they are providing "Art for the Million." The same number begins, in serial form, a new "Life of Jesus," by Dean Spence.

land coni a m T Edin nativ Roy and hom and him. exhi 1860 1862

L

It theupon it he praise

execu

Acad

lands

Th

but

scap

High

"Tw In chief exhib Since often work easily which at Ho the n Inver. a coup birds, them notes for pa " T Cladd shire l the ca about they o heathe In fully High! the ye large Gen

> finishe show p

Scotti

SCOTTISH LANDSCAPE.

se in

ions,

1 the acity

kind

He nce;

; he

must ce of sters

te to If have

y be life

ame

imit

ssed

t is

es."

hal-

, to

of ties

lone

sion

-the hm,

om-

y in harsent enth

ason

ater

ably

ral,

lith

iter

est

the ble itle of

are hev

me

and sixare

ber

ean

THE ART OF MR. PETER GRAHAM.

LOVERS of the mountain scenery of the Scottish Highlands will welcome the Art Annual, 1899, issued in connection with the Art Fournal, for this "extra" is a monograph on the Art of Mr. Peter Graham.

The artist, Mr. W. M. Gilbert tells us, was born in

The artist, Mr. W. M. Gilbert tells us, was born in Edinburgh in 1836, and he won his first honours in his native city. The first picture which he contributed to the Royal Scottish Academy in 1855 was "The Nettle Sting," and it was followed by several other pictures with equally homely subjects. In 1859 he spent a holiday on Deeside, and his eye was captivated by the fair scenery around him. The result of his visit was five landscapes for the exhibition of the Royal Scottish Academy in the spring of 1860. His first sea-piece was exhibited in 1861. In 1862 he returned to figure-painting with "Frà Angelico," but the same year he had no fewer than six new landscapes on exhibition. The following year came "In the Highlands," of which Mr. Gilbert writes:—

It was the first of those beautiful and suggestive epitomes of the-"Land of brown heath and shaggy wood,

Land of the mountain and the flood."
upon which his reputation as an artist is so solidly based. With it he carried the admiration of the public by storm; and it was praised for its powerful grasp of natural effect and vigour of execution.

The leading position as a landscapist in the Royal Scottish Academy which Mr. Graham had secured with "In the Highlands" was further strengthened by his picture in 1864, "Twilight after Rain."

In 1865 "Ruins of Other Times" was Mr. Graham's chief picture, and in 1866 "Culloden Moor" was exhibited. It was early in 1866 that Mr. Graham came to London, and his first picture at the Royal Academy, "A Spate in the Highlands," took the town by storm. Since then he has exhibited at the Academy every year, often two pictures, sometimes more. How carefully he worked and studied every detail for his paintings will be easily understood from Mr. Gilbert's account:—

Mr. Graham has studied these giant sea-cliffs and the birds which live upon them, at several places: on the Caithness coast, at Hoy in the Orkneys, and notably, at the island of Handa, off the mainland of Sutherland, between Cape Wrath and Loch Inver. He has spent days on end in a boat off the island, with a couple of stalwart Highland boatmen, studying the cliffs, and the birds, and the sea. He has landed on the rocks and painted them in oil colour, and filled his book with all sorts of useful notes and sketches.

Equally painstaking is Mr. Graham in his preparations for painting Highland cattle:—

"The Cattle Tryst" was studied in the neighbourhood of Claddich, a small Highland clachan, deep among the Argyllshire hills.

Mr. Graham practically lived on the hillside among the cattle. He studied their every attitude—standing, looking about with their large liquid eyes, with that curious, alert air they often assume, browsing the pass, cropping the rough heather, or lying down to rest.

In addition to the pictures of Highland scenery and Scottish coast scenery, Mr. Graham has depicted faithfully many phases of crofter life—"Homewards," "A Highland Croft," and many others.

The artist's London studio is at Notting Hill, but half the year he resides at St. Andrews, where he has another large studio:—

Generally speaking, a canvas is begun at St. Andrews and finished in London. Neither of these studios, however, is a show place. They are both in the strictest sense of the word merely the artist's ateliese—nothing more. They have no lavish adornments; they have no pictures hanging around the walls, for the artist is always in the happy position of never having any work left upon his hands.

Few people, indeed, see his landscapes until they appear on the wall of the Royal Academy. He has never paid homage to "studio Sunday," and he seldom shows his work in a half-finished

The supplements to the "Peter Graham" number are an etching of "Caledonia Stern and Wild," and two Rembrandt-photogravures—"Ribbed and Paled In by Rocks Unscaleable and Roaring Waters" and "Sea-Worn Rocks."

THE "BRIAR" PIPE.

MR. FREDK. A. TALBOT, in the November Windsor, describes the making of a pipe; and he begins by clearing up a popular misconception about the raw material. He says:—

The so-called briar pipe is not made of briar at all. This may sound rather-paradoxical, but nevertheless, such is the case. "Briar" is a corruption of the French word bruyère, meaning heath, and the misnamed briar is in reality the root of the heather. This peculiar corruption, like many others, is solely due to the English tradesman, who, on finding the correct word bruyère somewhat difficult for the British tongue to negotiate, quickly reduced it to the more convenient "briar," and the wood has been known by that name ever since. This heather thrives in great profusion on the rocky slopes of the Tuscan Alps in North Italy, and on the mountain side in Corsica.

How it came to be used for its present purpose is a curious chapter in economic adaptation:—

The Swiss side of the Jura Mountains was formerly the home of snuff-box making, nattily turned from the root-wood of the box tree, which, as is well known, is extremely hard and durable. The demand for these snuff-boxes was so great that the box-wood was exhausted, and the peasants thereupon experimented with other woods found in the neighbourhood, so as to prevent the industry dying out from lack of the necessary material. Many root-woods were tried, but none were found to equal the heather in the essential characteristics. This wood, indeed, proved even more suitable for the work than the box-wood hitherto employed, After a time the natives manufactured their pipes from the newly discovered heather, and these rapidly displaced the crude clay pipes which had formerly been in vogue among them. When the Jura heather became exhausted the peasants had to seek pastures new in order to carry on their industry, and the Tuscan Alps then came into prominence. Snuff-boxes, however, soon became obsolete commodities, and the peasants consequently devoted their whole attention to pipe-making.

This diversion of uses was furthered by another fact. The tops of the heather had long been cut off to make brooms; and as a consequence the roots of the heather had been much developed, and was thus undesignedly prepared to make better pipes. It is also interesting to know what an English maker says of his workmen:—

The pipemakers are a very select, small body, and observe every precaution to prevent their trade being learned by outsiders. They will have no apprentices, and if I introduced any boys into my factory I should have to pay them the Union minimum wage, which is two pounds a week. On the other hand, the workmen are clever, and they earn high wages.

The same authority is quoted as saying that "you may take it for granted that a briar pipe will last you as many years as it costs you shillings."

In the Studio of October Isabella M. Anderton writes on the work of Pietro Fragiacomo, and Mr. Aymer Vallance deals with British Decorative Art in 1899 and the Arts and Crafts Exhibition.

LONDON'S DINNER, AND WHENCE IT COMES.

"THE Food of London" is the subject of an instructive paper in the Quarterly Review. The writer occupies himself, as he says, only with "the main items in the dinner menu—fish, meat, vegetables, and bread." He begins by alleging that of all communities of men that ever existed London is probably the least self-sufficing.

BREAD

In the year 1898 London did indeed actually produce 7,076 bushels of wheat; from without in the same year the writer reckons there came 5,800,000 quarters of wheat, or its equivalent in flour. Of this quantity the larger half came as flour. The writer reckons that London herself consumed 3,400,000 quarters, or three-fifths of the total, passing on two-fifths to be consumed elsewhere. Only one-sixth of the total came from the home country; five-sixths were foreign or colonial in origin :-

Of the foreign and colonial wheat imported as grain into London last year more than half (1,270,000 quarters out of 2,360,000 quarters) came from the United States, and about a seventh (305,000 quarters) from Russia; India accounted for 270,000 quarters, Canada for 208,000 quarters, and Australasia for 194,000 quarters, the total contribution of British Colonies and dependencies being 672,000 quarters, or rather more than a quarter of the whole. Of the remainder the bulk (89,000 quarters) came from the Argentine Republic . . . If we look at the aggregate wheat supply which reaches London, both grain and flour, foreign and British, we shall find that of the grand total of 5,800,000 quarters, Great Britain last year contributed rather more than a million, and the rest of the Empire rather less than a million quarters, the aggregate contribution of the Empire being roughly 2,000,000, while that of foreign countries was 3,800,000 quarters. Thus the foreign element was nearly double that furnished by the British Empire.

MEAT.

Londoners are reckoned to eat annually about 6,000,000 cwts. of meat. The writer contrasts the figures given in the Quarterly's article on the Commissariat of London in 1853 with the meat supply of 1898. In 1853 the foreign supply of cattle, sheep and pigs was more than one-seventh; in 1898 it was roughly two-thirds of the whole number sent to London:—

In the earlier year, out of 80,785 oxen and calves imported into London, three-fourths came from Holland, and almost the whole of the remainder from Denmark, the Hanseatic towns, and Bilgium. At present the United States, Canada, and the Argentine Republic account among them for the whole of the foreign and colonial imports of cattle, of which, in 1898, 222,853 were brought into London by sea. As regards sheep, the change is quite as striking. In 1853, 229,918 sheep were imported into London, of which the whole came from ports on the North Sea, chiefly from Holland. In 1898 the number had risen to 351,204, but the sources of supply had entirely changed. No fewer than 322,720 animals came from the Argentine Republic, and the whole of the remainder from other parts of America. The European supply has entirely disappeared.

IMPERIAL SUPPLY LARGER THAN FOREIGN.

But in 1853 dead meat was to live cattle as 1 to 3: in 1898 it was as 3 to 1. The writer, reckoning up the total of both live and dead meat, estimates that "in 1898 about 450,000 tons of meat of all kinds passed through London, of which, roughly speaking, one-third, or 150,000 tons, was home-grown." He goes on:—

We estimate roughly that of the 450,000 tons of meat which reach London yearly from all sources, about 200,000 tons are beef and veal, and not less than 170,000 tons mutton and lamb, the remaining 80,000 tons being pork, bacon, ham, rabbits, poultry and game. . . Of the 300,000 tons of meat dead and alive coming into London by sea, rather more than a half, about 160,000 tons, is the produce of other parts of the Empire, while about 140,000 tons come from foreign countries. Hence, in the final analysis, the Empire, including the United Kingdom, furnishes about 310,000 tons of meat annually to London, compared with 140,000 tons derived from foreign countries. The supply of meat drawn from the British Empire is more than double that derived from foreign countries: thus the relative importance of these two sources already noted in regard to the corn supply is reversed in the case of meat.

FISH.

Over 200,000 tons of fish were brought into London last year, and two-thirds of this quantity came by land. The writer reckons:—

If only three-quarters of what comes to market are consumed in the capital—and this is almost certainly an under-estimate—the amount would be over 150,000 tons per annum, giving a consumption of about 75 lb. per head. This figure is of course much above the average for the whole country. Of this large quantity by far the greater proportion is the produce of British fisheries. . . . Probably 20,000 tons would be an ample estimate of the quantity of foreign fish annually consumed in London, so that at least six-sevenths of the total supply are the produce of our own fisheries.

FRUIT.

The reviewer is right when he says that "the following figures, showing the imports of foreign and colonial fruits into the port of London last year, may cause some surprise":—

| Apples    |       |  |  | 820,106   | bushe |
|-----------|-------|--|--|-----------|-------|
| Grapes    |       |  |  | 435,646   | **    |
| Oranges   |       |  |  | 2,501,769 | ,,,   |
| Lemons    |       |  |  | 724,516   | - "   |
| Plums     |       |  |  | 177,848   | - 91  |
| Other raw | fruit |  |  | 1.014.797 |       |

These amounts give a total of nearly six million bushels of raw fruit, exclusive of nuts and almonds, of which a quantity valued at over £600,000 was imported during the year. To this enormous total have to be added over 500,000 cwts. of preserved fruits of all kinds; and even then we have taken no account of dried fruit—currants, raisins, figs, prunes, &c.—of which more than a million cwts. came to London last year. Altogether (if we assume that a bushel of fruit on the average weighs 56 lb.), at least 220,000 tons of fruit, raw, dried, or preserved, must have entered the port of London in 1898, in addition to the vast supplies drawn from the country districts.

WHERE PLUCKED.

The sources from which these foreign supplies are drawn are very various. Currants come almost exclusively from Greece; raisins from Spain and Asiatic Turkey; apples chiefly from Canada and the United States; grapes from Spain and Portugal; lemons from Italy; oranges from Spain; plums from France and Germany; pears from France; almonds from Spain, Portugal, Italy, and Morocco; and figs from Spain, Portugal, and Turkey. The imports of fruit, and especially the imports of fresh fruit, from particular countries are subject to very marked fluctuations from year to year. Thus, taking the United Kingdom as a whole, Canada sept us 1,000,000 bushels of apples in 1894, 2,600,000 in 1896, and 1,400,000 in 1898.

Thus, it appears every meal is a sacrament of worldwide service and omni-national brotherhood.

"Was Australia Discovered in the Sixteenth Century?" is the question which Mr. Edward Heawood discusses in the Geographical Journal for October. A number of MS. maps about the middle of the sixteenth century, the earliest 1530-36, show to the south and south-east of Java a land of continental proportions. Was this Australia? Mr. Heawood gives grounds for supposing a reduplication of Java to have taken place. There is no authentic evidence of Australia being discovered before 1606, the date usually assigned.

the lin to Monthat Euro

E

have

mou foun the yello plag adde nam the befor was to a habi 1720 three appe 1844 cam so, in and and the

Prac

Ye

scou in o recor twen centi babl prov Ann Fron south and disco one i on th the : mucl meas national show Englifor vibutes says adds Suez unscriptions of the second various coming the second com

Et

tection

THE PLAGUE.

the fur-ared

pply

ance

oply

don

nd.

med

te-

ga urse

tish

nate

, so

ing

iits

me

raw ued

this

ved

t of ore

(if

b.), ust

rast

are ce;

om

and

ms

om

in.

the

to

the iels

ld-

211

in

of

he

of

his

ga

no

ore

So much is now appearing in the newspapers about the bubonic plague that M. Dastre's article on the subject in the first October number of the Revue des Deux Mondes must be called unusually topical. He shows that the plague which has so often ravaged Western Europe is not endemic there, but is an importation from the East.

BORN AT THE RIVER MOUTH.

Each of the four great epidemic maladies which have decimated humanity has had its origin at the mouth of some great river, in the marshy flats to be found there. Thus the cholera springs from the delta of the Ganges, typhus from the mouths of the Danube, yellow fever from the delta of the Mississippi, and the plague from the delta of the Nile. To this last must be added, in all probability, another source for the plaguenamely, Indo-China. As regards Egypt, it is certain that the country was already infested in the third century before the Christian era; the death of St. Louis in 1270 was certainly due to this malady, which has been spread to a great extent from time to time by the Turks, whose habits of life are not such as to discourage it. In 1720 we find one inhabitant of Marseilles in every three falls a victim, and in that century the pest appears also at Messina and at Moscow. It was not till 1844 that the long contamination of the soil of Egypt came to an end, if indeed it can be said yet to have done so, in view of the recent outbreaks at Alexandria in 1896, and again this year. These, however, are really local and accidental outbreaks, the necessary consequence of the position of Alexandria as an international port. Practically Egypt has been free from plague since 1844.

NEW BIRTH-CENTRES.

Yet the battle which humanity wages against this scourge is one of varying fortunes, and if there is a victory in one place, what looks very much like defeats must be recorded in others. China was undoubtedly the source of that almost incredibly destructive plague which destroyed twenty-five millions of people in Europe in the fourteenth century; now, in this century, we see the plague, probably endemic in Canton, Hongkong, Formosa, and the province of Yunnan, spreading ever since 1894 into Annam, the Malay Archipelago, and, above all, into India. From India it can be traced to the Persian Gulf, then southwards to Portuguese Africa, Madagascar, Mauritius, and Reunion, until it has reached South America. Recent discovery has been made of two new endemic centresone in Asia, in the neighbourhood of the Lake of Baikal, on the Russo-Chinese frontier, and the other in Africa, in the neighbourhood of the great Lakes of Uganda. So much for the plague itself; it remains to consider the measures which have been adopted for repelling it.

THREE LINES OF DEFENCE.

Europe has adopted three principal means of protection; the first consists of the organisation of an International Sanatory Service, the working of which, however, shows some grave defects, and M. Dastre declares that England prevented the establishment of strict disinfection for vessels about to enter the Suez Canal, and he attributes this to our solicitude for our commerce, which he says we prefer to the health of other countries. M. Dastre adds that the medical inspection which takes place at Suez is a very poor substitute, for captains are sometimes unscrupulous and doctors are sometimes negligent. The second protection of Europe lies in the police at the various ports, who are supposed to remedy the short-comings of the International Sanatory Service. The plague can be communicated not only from man to man, but also by means of goods, such as linen clothing and so on, and also by rats, which are as liable to the contagion as men are. In the absence, therefore, of a rigorous disinfection of all the cargo of any suspected ship it is clear, M. Dastre thinks, that there are many defects in the armour of Europe through which the enemy may creep unseen and may break out, as it has done recently at Oporto. M. Dastre goes on to consider the scientific methods of vaccination and immunisation against the plague. He assures us that the anti-plague serum of various well-known doctors has the effect of greatly reducing the violence of the malady even if the patient is attacked by it at all, and it is certainly remarkable that even the worst modern outbreaks do not destroy life on the enormous scale recorded in the Middle Ages.

THE PENAL SETTLEMENTS OF SIBERIA.

In the Revue de Paris M. Dujour contributes a most interesting paper on that much discussed but little known subject, transportation to Siberia.

Russia is one of the few countries in the world that still pursues the system of transporting and attempting to colonise her criminals; but last May a decree was signed by the Emperor arranging for the appointment of a Special Commission, to be presided over by the Russian Minister of Justice, whose duty it will be to inquire into the whole matter, and it is hoped and believed on the Continent that this inquiry will end in the suppression of Maximoff, an authority on the subject, states that in the hundred years which elapsed between 1764 and 1864 nine hundred thousand convicts were sent to Siberia. Even now Professor Kotliarevski has made researches which proved that each year one hundred and twelve thousand men and women leave Russia for Siberia, never to return. Since the system was first introduced, that is to say since the seventeenth century, the Russian Government has made all kinds of attempts to improve the lot of the convicts, and to form regular renal settlements, but not till quite lately was it found possible to really police the immense tract of country where these penal settlements have been founded. Accordingly a great number of exiles found their way home again, committing every kind of crime on the way, for of course they were entirely without money wherewith to purchase food or clothing. In 1869 an attempt was made to confine the convicts in the Sakhalin Islands; there the more deserving were given plots of land, but this effort to turn the convict into a colonist came to nothing. It is said that of five men and women who reach Siberia, only one really remains there; the others die or escape. Even now it is comparatively easy for a convict to make good his escape, and from some convict settlements fifty, and in some cases ninety, per cent. of the convicts disappear. On certain great occasions, notably when a new Emperor is crowned, immense numbers of Siberian exiles are granted a pardon. M. Dujour touches on the question of the political prisoner who is condemned to Siberian exile simply by an "Administrative Order." This he declares amounts to about six thousand men yearly; they are generally accompanied by some four thousand women and children. In some ways the political exile is less to be pitied than his less fortunate and more criminal brother, for if he is an educated and intelligent man he can often find good employment in Siberia, and end by making the country really his home.

AN AMERICAN VIEW OF THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

BY A DELEGATE.

MR. Holls contributes to the November number of the American Review of Reviews an article on "The Results of the Peace Conference in their Relation to the Monroe Doctrine." Mr. Holls was one of the youngest men at the Conference, and he achieved one of the best reputations at the Hague. He is the author of the famous "Holls' Clause," prescribing special mediation in order to avert the outbreak of war—a course which, if it had been acted upon by Lord Salisbury, would have averted the present war. Mr. Holls naturally deals in his article with the subject from an American point of view, and devotes special attention to the arguments which are used by opponents of "The Parliament of Peace" to oppose the Convention. He deplores the way in which the Press was treated, and maintains that if a more rational method had been adopted of dealing with the newspapers the results of the Conference would have been even greater than they are. After paying a tribute to Hugo Grotius as the Father of International Law, Mr. Holls maintains that the Arbitration Convention signed at the Hague on July 29th was the Magna Charta of International Law adopted and ratified by substantially the whole civilised world, and binding upon every individual inhabitant. This, he says, gives to the Conference its true importance. But the solemn declaration of all the great Powers of the civilised world in favour of the pacific solution of differences between them "on the basis of respect for right "marks an epoch in the history of mankind. Although the entire system provided by the Conference is purely voluntary, there is one exception. That is their solemn promise to perform a duty deliberately recognised in Article 27.

THE WORLD'S ASSENT TO THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. Holls exults that this duty has been qualified by the most emphatic and successful declaration of the Monroe Doctrine ever made in their history. This declaration, which was read by the secretary of the Conference, was in the form of a binding notice upon every Power there represented from thereafter quoting the proposed treaty to the United States Government in a sense contrary to this declaration; and the Convention was signed subject to the reservation of that declaration. The declaration itself was as follows:—

"Nothing contained in this Convention shall be so construed as to require the United States of America to depart from its traditional policy of not intruding upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions or internal administration of any foreign State; nor shall anything contained in the said Convention be so construed as to require the relinquishment by the United States of America of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions." . . . . Never before July 25th, 1899, has the Monroe Doctrine been officially communicated to the representatives of practically all the great Powers, and never before was it received with all the consent implied by a cordial acquiescence and the immediate and unanimous adoption of the treaty upon that condition. Whatever reasons may be advanced against ratification by opponents of the treaty, if any should appear, a neglect of the Monroe Doctrine on the part of the American representatives cannot honestly be urged as one of them.

In discussing the application of the Hague Convention to the dispute between Great Britain and the Transvaal, Mr. Holls has accepted the assurance made by Mr. Chamberlain that the Transvaal is not sufficiently independent and sovereign to admit of mediation between the Boers and Great Britain. Mr. Chamberlain's contention, however, is not justified by the facts, nor would the acceptance of, say, the United States as mediator between President Kruger and ourselves add one feather-weight to the sovereignty of the Boers, whose right to international existence was solemnly confirmed in 1884. A State which has the right to declare war and to appoint its own Ministers and conduct its diplomatic undertakings without any reference to the Power whose rights are strictly limited to such treaties as conflict with our interests, could certainly be made a party to mediation or arbitration without raising the question of its international status. This, however, by the way.

THE CHIEF THING DONE.

Mr. Holls then passes in review the provisions of the Arbitration Convention, and after explaining the especially new features of the new scheme, says that the principal achievement of the Conference was without doubt the establishment of an International Court of Arbitration. Speaking of Article 27, by which the Powers recognise it as their duty to remind Powers who are in danger of going to war of the provisions of this Convention, Mr. Holls says:—

There are numerous instances (M. Bourgeois claimed that it was in nine cases out of ten) when a foreign minister responsible to a parliament might want to arbitrate, but hesitated on account of the imputation of alleged weakness shown by the suggestion of arbitration, and in such cases the purely friendly intervention of neutral Powers could have only beneficial effects. The article may therefore be said to contain splendid possibilities of good, with practically no dangers of evil, and in this respect it was rightly called by one of the American representatives in the grand committee of arbitration "the crown of the whole edifice."

A CONVERTED CONFERENCE.

Speaking of the Conference as a whole, Mr. Holls confirms what I have frequently stated as to the extraordinary change which came over the members during their stay at the Hague. In the beginning the very atmosphere seemed charged with pessimism and distrust:—

It was most instructive to see how from week to week, and almost from day to day, this condition changed and a spirit of mutual confidence and good-will took the place of suspicion, until at the last those who had come to scoff stayed longest to pray and seemed most impressed with the results achieved.

He pays a special tribute to the commanding influence exerted by Lord Pauncefote, and he also pays a tribute to the loyal support and fine diplomatic tact of Professor Zorn. Mr. Holls concludes his article as follows:—

The result of the Conference, so far as the United States is concerned, may be summed up as the establishment, with our co-operation and assistance, of what may prove to be the Magna Charta of international law, and what surely is a step, however modest, in the world's progress toward peace and order—our traditional foreign policy having at the same time been announced, vindicated, and maintained more clearly and more emphatically than ever before.

THE Royal for November gives prominence to two novelties in the popularisation of public worship. Mr. Stanley White tells how cyclists are attracted to Fyfield Church, near Ongar, by Rev. E. Lewis, who, after a half-hour's service in the church, provides tea for cyclists in his grounds at 6d. per head. About 800 cyclists at a time have availed themselves of this novel hospitality. Mr. M'Govern's sketch of "the picturist" or pulpit lightning-cartoonist claims separate notice. Mr. H. Seton-Karr gives a thrilling account of "How I Shot My Lions."

of le Colvis a appris o volu gene thin dedi Tus

LA

Si

Sun the Ti well easy reas leav peop exul

K

app

pre cop

("I ball

hav

that

sure rate was flyin mys and cou beg rose fair

you any hol me Liu and fee I fo

cea

back for you bo

wo

LAST LETTERS OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

Scribner for November contains the last of the series of letters by Robert Louis Stevenson which Mr. Sidney Colvin has been bringing out in that magazine. There is a great deal in this last instalment suggestive of the approaching end. The letter which concludes the series is one to Mr. Gosse acknowledging the dedication of a volume of poems by the latter. It is full of Stevenson's generous friendliness and unfeigned delight over a good thing. It ends thus: "You can never write another dedication that can give the same pleasure to the vanished Tusitola."

HIS VIEW OF GERMAN ANNEXATION.

There is one political reference. The writer avows that he is going to ride a paper-chase on the next Sunday, and gives this reason for so shamelessly violating the "Scottish Sawbath":—

The obligation's poleetical, for I am trying every means to live well with my German neighbours—and O Barrie, but it's no easy! I think they are going to annex; and that's another reason to hurry up your visit, for if the Herrs come I'll have to leave. They are such a stiffed-backed and sour-natured people; people with permanent hot-coppers, scouring to find offence, exulting to take it. To be sure, there are many exceptions.

ON KIPLING.

Stevenson's appreciations of younger authors are characteristically generous. Of Kipling he says:—

Kipling is by far the most promising young man who has appeared since—ahem—I appeared. He amazes me by his precocity and various endowment. But he alarms me by his copiousness and haste. He should shield his fire with both hands "and draw up all his strength and sweetness in one ball." ("Draw all his strength and all His sweetness up into one ball"? I cannot remember Marvel's words.) So the critics have been saying to me; but I was never capable of—and surely never guilty of—such a debauch of production. At this rate his works will soon fill the habitable globe; and surely he was armed for better conflicts than these succinct sketches and flying leaves of verse? I look on, I admire, I rejoice for myself; but in a kind of ambition we all have for our tongue and literature I am wounded. If I had this man's fertility and courage, it seems to me I could heave a pyramid. Well, we begin to be the old fogies now; and it was high time something rose to take our places. Certainly Kipling has the gifts; the fairy godmothers were all tipsy at his christening: what will he do with them?

ON "THE LITTLE MINISTER."

The letters to Mr. Barrie are full of fun and unconcealed admiration. In one he writes:—

You should never write about anybody until you persuade yourself at least for the moment that you love him, above all anybody on whom your plot revolves. It will always make a hole in the book; and if he has anything to do with the mechanism, prove a stick in your machinery. . . . . The Little Minister ought to have ended badly; we all know it did; and we are infinitely grateful to you for the grace and good feeling with which you lied about it. If you had told the truth, I for one could never have fergiven you. As you had conceived and written the earlier parts, the truth about the end, though indisputably true in fact, would have been a lie, or, what is worse, a discord in art. If you are going to make a book end badly, it must end badly from the beginning. Now your book began to end well. You let yourself fall in love with, and fondle, and smile at your puppets. Once you had done that your honour was committed—at the cost of truth to life you were bound to save them.

"ONE OF THE CHIEF JOYS OF LIFE."

A reassuring note about the tenderness of the New Youth intoxicated with Ibsenism bids his correspondent remember "the highly practical timidity of youth." He recalls his own fears, though "I was a particularly brave boy." He adds :--

I do not mean to say I do not fear life still; I do; and that terror for an adventurer like myself is still one of the chief joys of living. But it was different indeed while I was yet girt with the priceless robes of inexperience; then the fear was exquisite and infinite.

THE CHIEF NEWSPAPERS OF EUROPE.

MR. GEORGE A. WADE contributes to the Pall Mall Magazine a study in comparative journalism under the heading of "Famous Foreign Newspapers." The papers he selects for mention with one or two leading particulars we have put together in this table:—

| NAME.                   | PLACE.              | PRICE INENGLISHCOIN. | DAILYCIRCULA-TION- | EDITOR.                    | FOUNDED        |
|-------------------------|---------------------|------------------------------|----------------------------|----------------------------|----------------|
| Petit Journal           | Paris               | ∮d.                          | 1,300,000                  | M. Marinoni                | 1862           |
| Figaro                  | Paris               | zɨd.                         | -                          | M. deDodays            | 1854           |
| Berliner Tage-blatt | Berlin              | 2‡d.                         | 70,000                     | HerrLevasohn           | 1870           |
| Kölnische Zeitung       | Cologne             | 3d.                          | 40,000                     | HerrSchauberg          | 1802           |
| Neue Freie Presse       | Vienna              | gd.                          | -                          | Dr. EdwardBacher       | Before1869 |
| Tribuna                 | Rome                | ıd.                          | -                          | N                          | 1884           |
| IndependanceBelge   | Brussels            | zd.                          | -                          | M. CharlesTardieu      | 1830           |
| Epoca                   | Madrid              | zd.                          |                            | Marquis deValdiglesias | 1849           |
| Novoe Vremja            | St. Peters-burg | ıd.                          | 30,000                     | M. Federoff                | -              |
|                         |                     | 1                            |                            | 1                          |                |

Of these Le Petit Journal has the largest circulation of any newspaper in the world; Die Kölnische Zeitung is the oldest Continental paper; Die Neue Freie Presse has forty-two pages (each the size of the Pall Mall Gasette), two-thirds of which are filled with advertisements, and these in almost every European language.

"OUR VILLAGE:"

HAS IT A CIRCULATING LIBRARY?

THE great drawback to a small permanent village library is that the books are so soon read by all the inhabitants, and then the library loses its interest. To obviate this defect, the Review of Reviews' Circulating Library supplies boxes of books which are changed quarterly, so that there is a continual new supply of books. It differs in many respects from any other library yet put into circulation in the country districts; for one thing, it contains more printed matter and more illustrations that any other of its kind.

Any newsagent, bookseller, or other tradesman in a village or small town who cares to make his shop a local centre for the REVIEW OF REVIEWS' Circulating Library can obtain a box of books quarterly which, if he could keep half their contents in constant circulation at two-pence per week, would enable him not merely to add a new feature of interest to his business, but also to cover his quarterly subscription and make a profit of nearly three pounds a year.

Anybody who wishes to try the experiment of commencing a small circulating library should make application to the Secretary at once; for most of the reading of the year—in the country, at least—is done in the winter months. Further information, if required, from the REVIEW OF REVIEWS' CIRCULATING LIERARY, Temple House, Temple Avenue, London, E.C.

ediator

done

whose

conht to nduct

to the eaties ade a g the er, by ns of

the

thout

owers re in Con-

that it

count

estion ention erticle

good, t was vhole

Iolls

the

bers

the and

and it of

ion,

it to nce

ssor

s is

our gna

ver

our ced,

ally

wo Mr.

eld

alfin

ty.

pit

H.

STORIES FROM THE MAGAZINES.

A SHY MAIDEN AND A BATTLE-KISS.

A QUEER story of kissing a miss and of missing a kiss is told in "Studies of 'the Forty-five,'" contributed to the grave pages of the Quarterly Review. It was the afternoon of the battle of Preston Pans. The writer says :-

Cope cannot be blamed for not being aware of the secret path through the swamp, which was known only to one person out of the whole five thousand there assembled. A young man, a sportsman who had often shot snipe in the marsh, communicated its existence to Lord George Murray, and thus enabled the Prince to take Cope at a disadvantage against which the most skilful general in the world could not possibly have guarded. His name was Robert Anderson; and an interesting anecdote has been preserved of the two young ladies, his cousins, who lived with their father at Windygoul, just outside the village of Tranent. As Charles, with some of his staff, was observed near the house on that September afternoon, old Mr. Anderson, unable to go out himself, desired his eldest daughter to take some refreshments to the Prince on a salver. But the girl was "blate" (shy), and her younger sister volunteered to go instead. Charles drank a glass of wine and rewarded the bearer with a kiss. When the elder sister witnessed this reception she is said to have exclaimed, "Eh, but I had kent!"

A POSTCARD TO A POETESS.

Cornhill as usual abounds with anecdotes. Mr. James Payn opens by retailing the experiences of himself as "an editor and some contributors." The genial spirit which pervades the paper is as attractive as any of the incidents recounted. Here is one which he tells against himself :-

I had on one occasion received from a young lady in the country a charming set of verses, which I had hastened to acknowledge. . . . But in this case I got no reply. This so amazed me that after a while I wrote again, expressing a hope that my first communication had not miscarried. It had been only a postcard, such as I usually send when accepting small poetical contributions, but I had always found it sufficient for its purpose. This young poetess, however, was not, it seemed, so easily satisfied; she appeared to think a postcard beneath her dignity, for in her reply she enclosed the one I had sent to her.

"Sir, the cause of my silence was that I saw no sufficient encouragement in your communication, enclosed, to offer another

My postcard was as follows: "I hope to make use of your pretty verses." Not an elaborate eulogy, it is true, but perfectly polite and appreciatory.

A friend happened to call upon me while I sat with this inexplicable letter in my hand.

"What do you think of this?" I said, giving it to him to read.

"Poetesses are kittle cattle to deal with, are they not?"
"But you were not civil to the lady," he replied. "'I cannot make use of your silly verses' was downright rude." That was what he had made my postcard out to be, and so had the poetess! I had never had the fact of my handwriting being but indifferent brought home to me before.

A YOUNG LADY'S GREAT DISCOVERY.

Lady Broome contributes to Cornhill what she calls "a cooking memory." It consists of recollections of her adventures as first Lady Superintendent of the National School of Cookery, adventures certainly not wanting in drollery. This is a story of one of her earliest pupils :

She was very young and very pretty, and we all consequently took the greatest interest in her progress; but, alas! she was privately reported to me as being a most unpromising subject. One day, when her lesson was just over, I chanced to meet her and inquired how she was getting on. She took the most hopeful view, and declared she "knew a lot." I next asked her to tell me what she had learned that day.

"Oh, let me see; we've been doing breakfast dishes, I think."

"And what did you learn about them?"

"I learned this "-with an air of triumph-" that they are all the same eggs which you poach or boil. I always thought they were a different sort of egg, a different shape, you know !

THE CURATE WHO WOULD BE A COOK.

Lady Broome's paper closes with a story which only the high authority of the writer compels the reader to credit. For, as the Scotch would say, "it's gey

One day I received a letter stating that the writer was most anxious to become a pupil of the school. It was from a young curate in a distant and out-of-the-way part of the north (I think) of England. I never read a more clever and amusing letter, describing his sufferings in the food line at the hands of the good woman who "did" for him in his modest lodging. He was evidently desperate, and professed himself determined to learn how to cook, so as to be independent of this dame. But, although I assured him of my profound sympathy and pity, I had at the same time to decline him as a pupil, alleging that we did not teach men at all. Letter after letter followed this pronouncement of mine, each one droller than the last, though the poor man was evidently in deadly earnest all the time. He pleaded and besought in the most eloquent words, assuring me of his harmless nature and wishes, offering to send testimonials as to character, &c., from his bishop or his rector's wifeanything, in short, that I required to convince me of his worthiness. I had no time, however, to waste on so fruitless, though so amusing, a correspondence, and I had to cut it short by merely repeating the rule and declining peremptorily to go on with the subject. I had nearly forgotten all about it, when one morning, some weeks later, my deputy-superintendent came into my office and said :-

"There is such a queer girl among the new pupils this morning.

"Is there? What is she like?" I asked rather indifferently, for a "queer girl" was by no means unknown in the crowded

"Well, she is so big and so awkward, as if she had never worn petticoats before, and has such huge hands and feet, and quite short hair with a cap, and, oh! such a deep voice. But she works very hard, and is rushing through her lesson at a great

"What is her name?" I asked, as a light seemed suddenly to dawn on me

"Miss-Miss-Oh, here it is," said the deputy-lady, holding out the counterfoil of her book of receipts for fees. "She sent me up a post-office order for the fees some little time ago, but there was no room for her in any class until to-day.

I looked at the name, rather a remarkable one, though I have quite forgotten it, turned to the letter-book, and, lo, it was the same as the curate's! I did not say anything to my second in command, but made an opportunity for going into the kitchen where the "queer girl" would be at work. No need to ask for her to be pointed out, for a more singular-looking being I never beheld, working away with feverish energy. The cook who was giving the lesson told me afterwards that the dismay of that pupil was great at being first set to clean stoves and scrub tables, and that "she" had piteously entreated, in a deep, bass voice, to be shown at once how to cook a mutton chop. The set of lessons were also much curtailed in that instance, for the queer girl did not appear after the end of that week, instead of going on for another fortnight.

The quest after "the sufficient reason" compels the inquiry, was there among the fair learners of cookery one in whom Master Curate was more deeply interested than in any phase of the culinary art? Have we here a counterpart in real life to Tennyson's "Princess," with curate for Prince and a sweet young cook for Ida?

A CYCLIST'S WOEFUL MISTAKE.

Mrs. Hugh Price Hughes has a bright and chatty paper in the Sunday Magazine on "the cycle from many standpoints." She tells one story, the moral of which for cyclists in love is precisely the opposite to that of "Ren duty Lov quite forth t when conseq follow time h on wit just gi behind of his ear to irretrie of a m

In

king,

Nove Who young and pi gave I to beg doorwa happer includi Havin draw, head, fragile When ran do gift to

R ON those excep After declar injury Khali EG

His

Tardin

Muc ruin ca when devasta the cul of sixt his pre of man remove conside plunde womer them a total a tithe o Power men r prospe It is a > name ( than is

"Remember Lot's wife." She inculcates, in short, the duty of "looking backward." She says:—

re all only er to gey

most '

oung

nink)

the

He

d to

But,

ty, I

that this

ough

He

me

nials

ife---

his less,

hort

go go

when

this ntly,

rded

ever

and

But

reat

y to ady,

fees.

time

have the d in chen

c for ever

was

that oles,

pice,

et of ueer

oing

the one

han

e a

vith

atty

any iich

t of

Lovers, however, must be wary, especially if they are not quite at home on the cycle saddle. We know an engaged couple who in the early days of their cycling experience rode forth together. They were in that stage of their cycle education when it is impossible to look behind you without catastrophic consequences. The gentleman was riding ahead, the lady followed close behind—as he fondly imagined. From time to time he turned his head as far as he dared, and cheered the lady on with words of loving and tender encouragement. He had just given vent to terms of special endearment when the cycle behind him suddenly came alongside, and to his horror, instead of his lady love, a man rode slowly past him grinning from ear to ear. The shock was so great that his machine wobbled irretrievably, and he lay in the dust. The lady was a quarter of a mile behind!

AN ELEPHANTINE JOKE.

In an entertaining sketch of Menelik, the Abyssinian king, which Mr. Cleveland Moffett contributes to the November Windsor, the following story occurs:—

When Monsieur Buffet was in Abyssinia the Emperor had a young pet elephant that was allowed to wander about the city and pick up food as it pleased. This habit of the elephant's gave Monsieur Buffet a fine surprise one evening, and nearly frightened his cook into convulsions, for just as they were about to begin their evening meal, a black form appeared in the doorway of the cabin, and before any one knew what was happening, everything eatable on the table had disappeared, including a dish of potatoes, an omelet, and an excellent chicken. Having thus satisfied his appetite, the elephant started to withdraw, but could not get through the door for the height of his head, and in his struggles to get out he all but carried off the fragile structure, like a big straw hat resting on his shoulders. When Menelik heard of this adventure he laughed until the tears ran down his cheeks. The elephant has since been sent as a gift to the President of France, and is now kept in the Paris Jardin des Plantes.

RECENT GLIMPSES OF THE UPPER NILE.

ONE who evidently writes from recent investigations in those regions contributes to the Edinburgh Review an exceptionally able paper on the Blue and White Niles. After the inevitable historical introduction, the writer declares that the Egyptian Government did ten times the injury to the Soudan ever inflicted by the Mahdi, the Khalifa and their following!

EGYPTIANS TEN TIMES WORSE THAN DERVISHES.

His words are :-

Much has been said and much has been written about the ruin caused by the Dervish rule. It must not be forgotten that when the Baggara succeeded to power the land was already devastated, and that whatever infamies they committed were only the culmination of the series of atrocities perpetrated for a space of sixty years by the Egyptian and the Turk. The Khalifa and his predecessor were savage despots, who, following the example of many Oriental rulers, called in Terror as their Minister, and removed wholesale, and without scruple, all whom they considered to be dangerous or who stood in their way. They plundered the unhappy villagers ruthlessly, seizing their cattle, women, and goods, either exterminating the men or employing them as slaves. Admitting this, it must be maintained that the total amount of ruin which they caused to the land was not one tithe of that occasioned by the officials of a nominally civilized Power, acting under the sanction of their Government. These men reduced a country which they found flourishing and prosperous to a state of desolation almost impossible to imagine. It is a significant fact that to-day, among the Negro tribes, the name of a Turk is a byword of hatred and of fear, far more so than is that of either the Dervish or the Abyssinian.

BRITISH TRANSFORMATIONS.

Yet that was the rule we ostensibly fought to reimpose on the Soudan. Happily, the real sway we exercise is very different. This is the testimony of a chief of the Medani tribe, whose town is one hundred and forty-eight miles from Khartoum:

According to him, the people are extremely well satisfied with the new rule, so much so that mothers frequently name their boys after the victorious English generals; thus one is named "Kitchener Mahommed," another "Hunter Hassan," and so on.

In Omdurman strange transformations have taken place:—

Slatin's house is now the post and telegraph office, while the irony of history is displayed in the conversion of the Mahdi's house into the English club. It is with strange feelings that the visitor sees the walls of this building, once occupied by a self-styled saint, now decorated with prints from the illustrated papers, and hears English voices and laughter resound in the passages once thronged by savage fanatics.

THE NEW KHARTOUM.

Khartoum itself is being rapidly reconstructed :-

Of the old town . . . not a building now remains standing . . . The process of rebuilding the town is being pushed on with great activity. Broad, well-laid-out streets have been cut and levelled, and trees have been planted on either side. The work on the public buildings is being rapidly carried out, and in a few years' time a new town will arise which will have few rivals in Central Africa.

THE SPELL OF THE SOUDAN.

A dismal account is given of the long and monotonous stretches of swamp which line the White Nile southward from Khartoum; but the writer finds them clothed with a strange glamour at sunset and in moonlight. He says:—

Many more instances might be given, did space permit, of the charm which the Soudan possesses for the sportsman and the naturalist. Upon all, indeed, who have once visited it, this country appears to cast a spell which impels them to endeavour to return to it. The influence is inexplicable, but it is there. However glad the traveller, at the time, may be to leave its fierce heat, its mosquitoes, and its fever-stricken swamps, it is certain that, sooner or later, he will forget all these discomforts, and only long to once more see that mysterious and fascinating land. Should it happen that, even when far away, anything, such as the faint sweet smell of the mimosa flower, shall recall the Soudan to him, he will be seized with an irresistible longing once more to revisit its lonely plains, and once more to navigate its wondrous rivers.

LOCAL AILMENTS AND THEIR REMEDIES.

However treated, disease is a formidable foe; and, the writer insists, in view of the swamp malaria—

It is indispensable, if Englishmen are to remain in the Soudan and introduce the necessary reforms, that they shall be enabled to absent themselves annually for several months, and have the opportunity of recruiting their energies in a cooler and more healthy climate. Other diseases common to the Soudan are dysentery and small-pox. At times an epidemic of typhus fever sweeps over it, and syphilis is apparently prevalent everywhere... It cannot too strongly be insisted upon, that if Englishmen are to remain in and administer the Soudan they must be generously give up all social pleasures and ties, and it is to be feared that, with all precautions, the deadly climate will slowly but surely undermine their health.

The combining of the British and Egyptian flags at Khartoum reminds the writer to suggest as "a logical sequence that the two countries should share equally in the cost of administration," instead of leaving Egypt, poor as she is, to bear the whole burden.

THE REVIEWS REVIEWED.

LEADING ARTECLES IN THE REVIEWS .

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

THE Fortnightly for November is a fairly good number, but it contains no single article of striking value. With the three contributions to the South African problem I deal elsewhere; and I also quote among the Leading Articles Mr. Garrett Fisher's exposition of the problem of flight, and Mr. H. Whates's article on the Venezuelan Award.

AN INDO-CHINESE RAILWAY.

Mr. James Stuart, an engineer on the Assam-Bengal Railway, writes on "Railway Communication between India and China." His article is illustrated with a map. Mr. Stuart is convinced that it is by railways that the conquest of China will be achieved, and he courts the inevitable growl at the lack of British enterprise in that direction. A railway from the Assam Valley to the Yangtse Kiang would place Shanghai and Calcutta in direct communication. The advantages of this proposal he sums up as follows:

The Indian systems of railways is about to penetrate Assam, and troops will soon be able to reach that province from Delhi, Cawnpore, and Lucknow, without transhipment or break of gauge, within, approximately, seventy hours. Having attained this point they could be thrown into China within twenty-four hours by the proposed railway route. Russia with her Siberian railway and military base on the borders of Poland and Germany, would be nowhere in the race for supremacy in China, and we should practically be in a position to hold the field against all comers, by gaining complete mastery over its great inland waterway.

UNWRITTEN-LITERARY LAWS.

Ouida has an interesting article on this subject, in which she discourses, with characteristic downrightness, on libel, plagiarism and literary gossip. She thinks that the unwritten law of common honour should make such books as Dr. Busch's on Bismarck impossible, and comes down heavily upon the people for whom such books are written:—

The vulgar, insatiable curiosity of the general world breeds such traitors as these makers of post-mortem recollections; breeds them, nourishes them, recompenses them. There would be no supply if there were no demand. The general world has a greedy appetite for diseased food; as with its jaws it devours putrid game, decayed oysters, and the swollen livers of tortured geese, so it loves to devour with its frothy brain all that belittles, ridicules, dishonours, or betrays the few amongst it—the very few !—who are above it in mind, in will, in force, in fame. "Come, come!" they cry to the great man's servants when the great man lies dead; "tell us, you who saw him in his hours of abandonment, tell us of all that can drag him down nearer to our level! Tell us of his having—you saw them through the keyhole—tell us of his hasty words, his pettish foibles, his human mortal waywardness—you know so much about them, you who waited behind his chair and filled his tobacco-pouch—come, come, comfort us; his great shadow seems still to lie upon the earth and make us small and crawling insects crushed by his spurred boot—come, come, comfort us!

OVER-SEA EXPEDITIONS.

Major F. C. Ormsby-Johnson writes on "Maritime Expeditions in Relation to Sea-Power." He thinks the peculiar power of Great Britain lies in her ability to land troops, or move swiftly on an open or ill-defended coast:—

The opportunity of Great Britain lies, in war, in her capacity to prepare in secret those over-sea expeditions, which gain half their power by the suddenness of their setting forth, while the relative increase of the means of communication to our hands in these days of scientific warfare should teach us the lesson of properly adapting the still of a dominant navy to the forlorn hope of a military force charged with the completion of a task which no navy, however powerful, can compass without the swiftly following expeditionary force equipped for that special purpose, which has made our army, small as it was and is, a terror in the past, and promises for the future just such a measure of success as a due recognition of the value of surprise action must needs imply.

THE MENACING COMET.

Writing under this title, Mr. Edward Howard Vincent discourses of comets in general, and of Biela's comet in particular:—

It may not be prudent to generalise freely where theory, rather than actually assured experience, is our guide. If comets exist, the substance of which seems entirely gaseous, and so transparent that small stars remain visible through them, there are others which give evidence of possessing a dense, compact nucleus, since their light has been strong enough to be seen in the day-time, even when so close to the sun as to be apparently involved in his atmosphere. This happened in the case of the great comet of 1843, when, on the 28th of February, it was visible in full daylight near the sun's limb. A similar instance occurred in 1847 with the one discovered by Mr. Hind, which shone so brilliantly that it was observed at noonday, and for several hours afterwards, within two degrees from the sun.

But, whether dense or transparent, Mr. Vincent has not much fear of the consequences of a collision, even if Professor Falb's prediction be justified—that on the 13th of November, 1899, we shall come into collision with Tempel's comet.

JOHN DONNE.

Mr. Arthur Symons has an article in his usual subtle vein on John Donne, of whom he says:—

For the writing of great poetry something more is needed than to be a poet and to have great occasions. Donne was a poet, and he had the passions and the passionate adventures, in body and mind, which make the material for poetry; he was sincere to himself in expressing what he really felt under the burden of strong emotion and sharp sensation. Almost every poem that he wrote is written on a genuine inspiration, a genuine personal inspiration, but most of his poems seem to have been written before that personal inspiration has had time to fuse itself with the poetic inspiration.

OTHER ARTICLES.

"Vernon Lee" contributes a very able article on "The Need to Believe: an Agnostic's reply to Professor William James." The article treats, however, too categorically of Mr. James's contentions, and is generally too negative in tone to be susceptible of a quotation here. Edith Sichel reviews the letters of Mary Sibylla Holland. Mrs. Holland was a shrewd observer of things, and her letters are full of deep insight and philosophy. The number concludes with a delightful and characteristic allegory by Fiona Macleod.

of the Drey of the separ

TH

logic of b Lam decla takes quote Th bisho > them escap unhaj wides addre tolera super alike

> > Russ

Hou

shar

prin

The

but gran emin inter Th tion ance cruel meas activ purp that book Con Good hum cons righ

I w

man

and

division vert light hum host sinft dept

guil

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

THE Contemporary for November, with the exception of three articles dealing from various points of view with the South African crisis, M. Trarieux's article on the Dreyfus Case, and Sir Edmund Verney's "Reminiscences of the Crimean War," contains nothing calling for separate notice.

THE LAMBETH OPINION.

Canon Knox-Little continues to waste his valuable logic on a problem which has all the insufferable dryness of bimetallism without any of its importance. The Lambeth "Opinion" he characterises as "unfair," and declares it cannot stand, as "its inaccuracies and mistakes are being every day more and more exposed." I quote his conclusions:—

The English priests are anxious, indeed, to be with their bishops; one cannot but hope that their bishops will stand by them on Catholic principles. There can be but one way of escape from what might prove disastrous consequences of this unhappy "opinion," viz., to use Dr. Temple's words, by "the widest possible toleration," or—to employ the language of the address quoted above—by "a distinctly avowed policy of toleration and forbearance on the part of our ecclesiastical superiors in dealing with questions of ritual," as "demanded alike by justice and by the best interests of religion."

COMMERCIAL CORRUPTION.

Sir Edward Fry contributes a careful analysis of Lord Russell's Commercial Corruption Bill introduced into the House of Lords in the last session. Sir Edward had a share in the drafting of that Bill, and his exposition of its principles is not the less valuable because it is a defence. The question is too complicated to be dealt with here, but Sir Edward defends the Bill from the accusation of grandmotherly legislation. He thinks that this is eminently a case where the public should protect its own interests:—

There are two heads of criminal law with which this generation is familiar, but which would have been scouted by our ancestors as instances of grandmotherly legislation—I mean cruelty to animals and cruelty to children. The success of these measures in practice has been, I believe, largely due to the activity of the two societies which have been formed for the purpose of enforcing these laws; and I cannot help thinking that the formation of such a society in relation to commercial corruption would be followed by the like beneficial results.

THE SILENCE OF GOD.

Dr. Robert Anderson replies to the criticisms of his book on "The Silence of God," which appeared in the Contemporary for September. The real "Silence of God," he says, is not a testimony of indifference to human affairs, but proceeds rather from a divine consciousness of the sufficiency of things, and that "all's right with the world":—

And as for the divine silence in its aspect towards the world, I would urge that there is no greater proof of weakness in a man than incapacity to keep silence when all that is adequate and necessary has been already spoken. Heaven is silent because Christianity affords the full and final revelation of the divine character and the divine will. And the fact that men pervert or ignore that revelation gives them no valid claim to further light. The "Pharisee," rightly insisting upon the fact of human depravity, misrepresents the Deity as alienated and hostile, and sets up "the Church" to mediate between him and sinful men. The "Sadducee," on the other hand, denies the depravity, and therefore the need of mediation. But the Christian, recognising both, rejoices in a God of love who, in and by the divine and only Mediator, is reconciling fallen and guilty men to Himself.

THE LETTER AND THE SPIRIT.

The ceaseless conflict between the dogmas and the principles of Christianity is reviewed by Professor Sabatier in a long article entitled "Christian Dogma and Christian Life," in which he inquires what benefit can the Christian life obtain from that renewal of dogmatic conceptions which modern theology necessitates, and what should be our attitude towards the traditional formulas and symbols in use in the churches? Professor Sabatier answers:—

Our piety is disquieted and troubled by the antagonism obscurely felt between the new truths and ancient beliefs. Christian science can bring peace and dissipate our disquiet. As regards Holy Scripture, the radical transformation of old dogmatic views as regards inspiration and the canon has the advantage of delivering our piety from the intolerable yoke of the letter, and rendering us more attentive and more strongly attached to the spirit. Instead of a code, we have a book of life and fire. The Bible is no longer itself the revelation of God, but it is, as it were, the muniment room where its documents are preserved. Called ceaselessly in this way to distinguish everywhere between changing forms and secure foundation, between that which is essential and that which is but accessory, our piety necessarily gains in spirituality and morality; it is obliged to fall back on its principles, on the personal experience of its truth, on the actual and interior witness of the Holy Spirit, the source of all certainty and peace to the Christian's soul.

THE PRIMÆVAL LANGUAGE.

Mr. Charles Johnston attempts to reconstruct the language of our remote forefathers, and concludes that—the original speech, the true primæval tongue of man, was quite unlike any language we have ever heard; yet we have all talked it, and all its elements are present in the tongues of to-day. The primæval language was a vowel language altogether; it had no consonants, or contacts, as we ought to call them, at all. Its words consisted of vowel sounds following each other, repeated or varied—of words like aeaaa, aoaa, aia, auau, aeoia, iaua, oioi, ouou, uaua, ueue, all of which, I may say in passing, are taken from a language in use to-day. The sentences were intermittent streams of vowels, each stream held on so long as the speaker's breath allowed or whim dictated.

The primæval language, he says, is spoken to-day by every child in its first attempts at speech.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. Thomas Hodgkin, who represented Oxford and Cambridge at the Historical Congress of Cividale, in September, contributes an account of his stay in that town. He says that the Congress was a great success, and gives a pleasant account of the courtesy and hospitality which he received at the hands of the Italians. Professor Dicey writes on "The Teaching of English Law at Harvard," the system and success of which is, he thinks, an example to the English Universities. The number concludes with a letter from Lieutenant-Colonel Balfour on "The Employment of Volunteers Abroad."

"MEN as Town-makers" is the suggestive title of a paper in Harmsworth by Mr. A. Birnage. Civics form an important department of social science; but in it the personal factor still possesses creative significance. Even in this crowded age it can be hardly said that "the individual withers." The "town-makers" selected are George Palmer (Reading), Sir Charles Mark Palmer (Jarrow), Lord Burton (Burton-on-Trent), the Cadburys (Bournville), the Wilsons (Hull), Marquis of Bute (Cardiff), J. J. Colman (Norwich), Duke of Devonshire (Barrow-in-Furness), J. C. Richardson (Bessbrook), the Peases (Middlesbrough), Sir J. T. Brunner (Northwich), and Lord Mostyn (Llandudno).

to land fended capacity

ain half

hile the ands in sson of forlorn a task out the special and is, a such a alue of rather s exist, sparent others ucleus, ne day-volved

incent

great ible in curred one so l hours

, even at on into

d than poet, body incere den of m that subtle

rsonal vritten itself

illiam ically rative Edith lland. d her The eristic

XUM

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

THE monthly chronique has made its way into the Nineteenth Century also: and with the November number Sir Wemyss Reid begins his task as chronicler. His remarks on the war are noted elsewhere. So are five other articles.

REMEMBERING VERSUS WRITING.

"Literature before Letters" is the theme of an interesting paper by Professor Max Müller. He quotes from Finnish, Polynesian, Greek, and Indian records to show that extensive literatures existed and were handed down intact by aid of memory alone long before the alphabet came in. Such feats of memory seem scarcely credible to us. The writer exclaims:—

Alas! our memory has been systematically ruined, and it hardly deserves that name any longer when we remember what memory was in ancient times. We seem to be piling every day heaps of ashes on that divine light within us. Men who read the Times every morning, possibly Notes and Queries, then Blue-Books, then possibly novels, or it may be serious works on such different subjects as geology, philology, geography, or history, are systematically ruining their memory.

Yet-

I have heard Brandram recite several plays of Shakespeare entirely by himself, and without a hitch or a flaw. I have myself, in my youth, repeated compositions of more than a hundred thousand notes on the pianoforte without any effort. The memory is then, I believe, chiefly muscular, not mental, and if any little hitch happens, the chain is often broken, and we must begin again.

HOW TO VALUE DRAWN CRICKET MATCHES.

Mr. A. C. Wootton writes on "Cricket in 1899: the Valuation of Drawn Matches." His method and results appear from the following extract on the Australian test matches:—

The record shows one victory to the credit of the Australians, and four drawn games. Estimated by the method just explained, the valuation comes out as below:—

1. (Nottingham.) England 348 for 17 wickets = 20.47 average; Australia 482 for 18 wickets = 26.77 average. Match value, 6'30 to Australia's credit and England's debit.

2. (Lords.) England 446 for 20 wickets = 22'30 average; Australia 449 for 10 wickets = 44'90 average. Match value, 22'60 to Australia's credit.

3. (Leeds.) England 239 for 9 wickets = 26'55 average; Australia 396 for 20 wickets = 19'80 average. Match value, 6'75, this time in England's favour.

4. (Manchester.) England 466 for 13 wickets = 35.84; Australia 542 for 17 wickets = 31.88. Match value, 3.96, again to England's credit.

5. (Oval.) England 576 for 10 wickets = 57.60; Australia 606 for 15 wickets = 40.40. Match value, 17.20 to England's credit.

It thus appears that in this series of test matches Australia claims total match values 28'90, while England's three credits reach a sum of 27'91, leaving a balance of only '99 in Australia's favour, and showing a remarkable evenness of talent.

THE DEATH OF NELSON.

A very vivid description of the battle of Trafalgar is furnished in the letter (hitherto unpublished) of Captain Cumby of the Bellerophon to his son. One pathetic passage may be quoted:—

At half-past seven we observed that the Euryalus, to which ship we knew Vice-Admiral Collingwood had shifted his flag, carried the lights of the Commander-in-Chief, and that there were no lights on board the Victory; from which we were left to draw the melancholy inference that our gallant, our beloved Chief, the incomparable Nelson, had fallen. But so unwilling were we to believe what we could scarcely bring ourselves to doubt, that I actually went on board the Euryalus the next morning and breakfasted with Admiral Collingwood, from whom

I received orders without being once told, or even once asking the question, whether Lord Nelson was slain.

A chart accompanies the letter.

"THE NEW SOIL SCIENCE."

Mr. D. Young describes "the Dalmeny experiments: manuring with brains." The application of bacteriology to agriculture—the work begun by Messrs. Hunter and Macalpine—is, it appears, known as the New Soil Science. The New Science seems to have had a rough time of it until Lord Rosebery appointed as land agent on his Dalmeny estate a New Soil man with Mr. Hunter as his adviser. Among results obtained are these:

In the first season the beneficial results of a small dressing of ground lime were so marked that the system of applying to every field on the farm an annual dressing of 4 cwts. of lime was commenced, and has been continued ever since. . . . It was also found that when the lime required by the nitrifying and other soil organisms was thus supplied, the plots which had received their nitrogen in the form of sulphate of ammonia showed much better crops, alike as to quantity and quality, than were obtained from the plots which got their nitrogen in the form of nitrate of soda. . . . When these experiments were commenced, ground lime for agricultural purposes had never been heard of, whereas now there are at least six lime-works where extensive grinding "plant" is kept hard at work.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Horticulture as a profession for the education, by Miss A. G. Freer, is another variant of the same plea for putting brains into the land. Rev. D. Wallace Duthic, writing on the "remittance-man," roundly declares that "if his guardians wish a youth of reckless habits to go headlong to the devil they cannot do better than despatch him to the colonies and send him remittances monthly." Mrs. Corner-Ohlmüs gives a vivid sketch of a devil-dance she witnessed in Ceylon which resulted in the exorcism of a demon from a native woman. The woman was certainly changed into seemingly a new creature. Mr. A. Shadwell describes the progress of the plague in Oporto, and ascribes it to the century-old sanitation of the city.

Cornhill.

THE November number is full of reminiscences, but reminiscences of a very varied order. Mr. James Payn's experiences as editor with some of his contributors have been quoted elsewhere. So have Lady Broom's memories of the beginnings of the National School of Cookery and ex-Premier Sir John Robinson's of the beginnings or Natal. "M. H." records many "links with the past," of what she has heard from aged persons, in the most different ranks, of their early reminiscences. She met among others Miss Betsy Balcomb, the daughter of the merchant of St. Helena with whom Napoleon lodged before he was domiciled at Longwood. It was with her and her sister the ex-Emperor used to play blind man's buff! An actual visit to Longwood is described in extracts from the diary of Lieut. Herbert J. Clifford, R.N., who called at St. Helena in 1817. The diarist gives a very vivid account of his short interview with Napoleon and of the persons about him. Karl Blind tells the story of his solitary confinement at Rastaft. In the agony of utter isolation he recalls how his mind went wandering back to the rural scenes of his infancy. The gradual relaxation of the stringency of his captivity, the introduction of first the Bible, then other books, finally friends, the means he found of communicating with the outer world, are all graphically recounted. Miss J. H. Findlater goes over the story of George Borrow, who is now undergoing quite a revival in public interest, and gives illuminating extracts from his works. Urbanus Sylvan reflects with some vividness holiday life in the High Alps.

TH and slook if the interest adjusted demonstrated as a has riche.

The Count deare one of the ictum toty."

It is her transplant to the count city."

It is her transplant to the count city."

attitud

their imper

famili

Mushr traditi discorr railwa terms Bull is assimi passio expanfullest are sti for the surely sistent true n

The Hybro offspire earlied view dam information convictions open The convictions of the conviction of breed

attrac

of gre

work.

He mules work that that that in the place

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

THE October number is marked by much freshness and variety, as well as by the solid worth we naturally look for in its erudite pages. It has actually introduced the innovation of pictorial illustrations. Yet more interesting is it to observe the slow and gradual adjustment of its traditional Conservatism to the modern democratic environment. It treats sympathetically of the ultra-democratic scheme of Australian Federation, as is indicated elsewhere. It applauds the "new diplomacy" as a means of taking the people into confidence. It has even a word of appreciation for the nouveaux riches!

IN PRAISE OF "SQUIRE MUSHROOM."

This is in the half-playful paper on "A Place in the Country." That phrase is felt to express one of the dearest ambitions of the Englishman, as it also describes one of the best means for socialising and ennobling him. The improving tendency has not disappeared even when the decay of agriculture has made "a place in the country" dependent on a man being "something in the city." The writer concludes:—

It seems historically certain that during an advanced stage of her transformation from an agricultural to a commercial nation, England to some extent lost herself. In the social satire o Dickens and Thackeray—to say nothing of Carlyle, Kingsley, and Ruskin—one may trace a certain alarmist and disorients attitude towards the prodigies of nouvelle richesse conjured up in their "racing railroad" days, as if these phenomena were imperfectly understood and not easy to be classed. Increasing familiarity has since shown us that the New-broom, the "Squire Mushroom," the self-made parvenu, whose independence of the traditional route to respectability seems at first to strike so discordant a note in "Old England," the millionaire product of railways, beer, or soap (a force inexpressible at first except in terms of thousands a year) is after all only our old friend John Bull in another costume, with the old aggressive and the old assimilating energies, renewing his youth like the eagle. The passion for ruling, that last infirmity of his noble mind, for expanding his individualist self in some sphere or other to its fullest power, doubtless infects all his social ideals. But if we are still to develop from our aristocracy the demi-gods required for the duties and enterprises of world-wide empire, much may surely be said for that particular social instinct which so per-sistently cherishes the romance of feudalism and adapts it to the true needs of democracy.

THE ZEBRA MULE.

The illustrated article deals with "Zebras, Horses, and Hybrids," and the pictures are of zebras and their hybrid offspring. Most of the discussion is concerned with earlier and more recent experiments on "telegony"—the view that a "sire influences all the latter progeny of a dam which has once produced a foal to him." More information is asked for; but the writer does not seem convinced of the truth of this theory. The results of crossing horses or donkeys with zebras are, however, not open to doubt. The writer says:—

There is no doubt that it is a comparatively easy matter to breed these hybrids, and that they are not only extremely attractive animals to the eye, but hardy and vigorous, possessed of great staying powers, and promising to be capable of severe work

He urges they should be bred to supply the paucity of mules needed for Indian transport and mountain battery work, as well as for service elsewhere; and he suggests that they may, if bred largely in East Africa, as Colonel Lugard proposes, prove a source of wealth and revenue in the future. He recommends "the Zoo" as the best place for further experiment.

SCOTT'S INFLUENCE ON FRANCE.

"Scott and His French Pupils" is the title given to a most suggestive review of M. Louis Maigron's "Historical Romance in the Romantic Epoch: Essay on the Influence of Sir Walter Scott." The writer, after speaking of Scott's immediate success in this country, remarks:—

We confess that the account which M. Maigron gives of Scott's immediate popularity in France is a revelation to us. . . . M. Maigron multiplies undeniable proofs which we need not quote. If Scott was the rage in England, he was a passion in France; it was a case of love at first sight, which affected readers and authors alike. In French historical romance Scott wrought an immediate and subversive revolution. To that M. Maigron specially devotes himself, and he demonstrates conclusively from internal evidence that the most brilliant French romancers of the rising generation were more or less submissive imitators. It is a striking testimony from a French man of letters who has exhaustively studied his subject.

Papers on the South African problem, the Peace Conference, the Food of London, and the future Conclave claim separate notice.

Two Engineers' Monthlies.

Cassier's for October is famous for the report of Messrs. Head on the Lake Superior Iron Ore mines, which is dealt with on another page. Mr. Garforth deals with the comparative advantages for mining purposes of compressed air, electricity and steam. As a prime source steam possesses, he holds, the greatest advantages; for transmission of power to a distance, electricity is best : where there is danger of gas, the best is compressed air. He has recommended combining all three: steam above ground to generate the electricity: an electric motor below in a well ventilated part of the mine to work an air-compressor: the compressed air to be carried by pipes to the spot where gas makes working dangerous. Rear-Admiral G. W. Melville, U.S.N., advocates the use of the triple screw for warships, and argues their tactical and technical superiority. Mr. A. F. Yarrow adduces experiments to prove that nickel steel boiler tubes are greatly superior to tubes made of soft steel. Mr. H. C. Sadler discusses the increasing size of the steamship, indicates increase of length as the most economical, considers that the limit of increased length has nearly been reached, and anticipates that reduction of weight rather than increase of size will be the next problem for builders. Larger dimensions will probably be rendered unnecessary by the use of the stronger alloys of steel for ships' hulls, of water-tube boilers, and improved engines like the steam turbine. The illustrations are, as usual, excellent.

The Engineering Magasine for October is notable for the stress laid on standardisation, specialisation, and generally better organisation in the workshop. Articles bearing on these topics claim separate notice, as does also Mr. Archer Brown's optimistic view of the world's iron trade. Mr. Rudolph Haack gives an impressive description of the development of German shipyards on the Baltic, and in especial of the Vulcan works at Stettin. Dr. Louis Bell shows the immense advantages of using electric power in engineering works, by saving idly running and underloaded shafting; by centralising the power plant and distributing electrically; by reduced cost of labour; and by improving the morale of the workshop. Mr. John Barrett holds out the vast possibilities of engineering expansion in China, if only England, America, and Germany would continue as "allies for the open door." The pictures are illuminating.

XUM

ents :

asking

Soil rough agent unter

ing of every coms also other ceived much much tained ate of round hereas nding

Miss a for thie, that o go patch hly." ance hadand but

have

s or ," of most met the lged her i.N., es a leon tory y of ring dual

in nds, uter ater derives lps.

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

THE National Review for November contains no articles of note. Mr. Evelyn Ashley's and Mr. Spenser Wilkinson's articles on the war are dealt with elsewhere. The comments on the war in the monthly chronique are stupidly and ferociously bellicose, and deal largely with the question of foreign sentiment, which Mr. Maxse declares to be animated by hatred of England rather than by love of justice—a convenient theory when the sentiment is directed against yourself.

DEWEY AND THE PHILIPPINES.

The monthly letter from America deals largely with Admiral Dewey and the Philippine problem. Mr. A. M. Low thinks that the return of Admiral Dewey has resulted in a great accession to the expansionist strength. He says:—

Before Dewey's arrival the "anti-Imperialists"—the word is a misnomer, but it is part of the political jargon of the day—hoped much from him. He had been represented as opposing McKinley's policy in the Philippines, and as championing the cause of Filipino independence. "When Dewey comes home," said the anti-Imperialists, "the tide will set our way and there will be an end to this 'accursed war.'" When Dewey came home he shattered the hopes of the anti-Imperialists even as he had shattered Spain's pride. In unequivocal language he let it be known that he was in favour of putting down the rebellion first, and considering the form of government for the Filipinos afterwards. That he believes in "expansion," and in retaining every foot of conquered territory, and in prosecuting the war with the utmost vigour until the authority of the United States is recognised, we all know. The anti-Imperialists could get no comfort from his home-coming.

SUMMER IN ALASKA.

Mr. W. F. Bailey describes "A Summer Trip to Alaska," and gives a pleasant description of Skagway and Silka in the summer time. Speaking of the scenery, he says:—

To see glaciers in their Arctic magnificence one should go to Alaska. I have seen the ice-rivers of Switzerland and the Tyrol, of Norway and of British Columbia, but never anything like unto the frozen fields that surround Glacier Bay. As the traveller sails north from the Wrangel Narrows to the Lynn Canal, he sees many magnificent glaciers lining the mountainous shortes, but all sink into insignificance compared with the famous Muir Glacier, which comes into view as you sail through the Lcy Straits. Where this frozen river flows into the sea it has a width of nearly two miles, and presents a perpendicular front of from two to three hundred feet high. The great frozen lake behind extends back for at least thirty miles, and is bounded on one side by one of the grandest groups of mountains in the world—the great Fairweather Range, the peaks of which rise to a height of over 15,000 feet above the sea.

REDISTRIBUTION.

The question of the inevitable Redistribution is dealt with by Mr. C. A. Whitmore, M.P. He says:

Of the twenty-five seats in England and Wales which are doomed, twenty return Unionists and five return Radicals to this Parliament; of the ten Scottish seats, four are Unionist and six Radical; while the whole of the fourteen condemned Irish seats are Nationalist. So that this Redistribution would wipe out what are at present twenty-four Unionist and twenty-five Home Rule seats. On the other hand, in the fifty-six constituencies with an electorate of over 15,000, there now sit thirty-seven Unionists and nineteen Radicals. But of course it must not be assumed that it could be these fifty-six exact geographical units that would receive the additional representation transferred from the fifty merged seats.

CATHOLICISM IN FRANCE.

Mr. Urbain Gohier contributes a scathing attack on Catholicism and Clericalism in France. He says:—

France has not yet suffered so much from its effects, owing to the levity which the Frenchman displays in his Catholicism as in everything else. But all the same, that which was looked upon as impossible has taken place. Roman supersition—I may almost say fetichism—has recaptured the French nation. After the Revolution at the beginning of the nineteenth century there was not a single convent or order or ecclesiastical endowment left in France. To-day, without counting the secular parochial clergy, there are 1,468 orders (of which 694 exist in violation of the law), containing nearly 200,000 members possessed of a fortune amounting to 80 millions sterling of real property, personal property amounting to 8 milliards (320 million pounds sterling), and sufficient floating capital to produce a sudden crisis in the Public Funds, as was the case last July.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. Leslie Stephen writes on "The Cosmopolitan Spirit in Literature," Mr. W. R. Lawson on "German Finance," while Miss Godley sends "A Playgoer's Protest" against the exaggeration of scenic effects in English drama.

The Nonconformist Quarterly.

THE London Quarterly Review for October is full of excellent matter. A "Field Naturalist" opens with a discussion of "The Primrose and Darwinism." He reaches the conclusion that "Darwin has not established his theory that cross-fertilisation is necessary to the full fertility of flowers," but, on the contrary, "that the primrose gives strong confirmatory evidence to Akell's view that under natural and equal conditions self-fertilisation of flowers is both the legitimate fertilisation and the most productive." Mr. Hugh W. Strong writes an almost exultant paper on modern Oxford Nonconformity. When the Wesleyans set about their Oxford College scheme in real earnest, he expects to see "a new and greater Mansfield." But to this end "another Dr. Fairbairn" is necessary, and the writer thinks perhaps the missing principal is to be found in "the most brilliant student in Oxford to-day," who is a Balliol man and a Wesleyan. Mr. J. H. Moulton treats of lines of cleavage in Christianity which, however named, he finds resolved into the fissure between devotion to past and devotion to future: "mystical" and "sacramental"; "Greek" and "Ro-man"; "Protestant" and "Catholic"; Liberal and Conservative; Pauline and Petrine. Mr. U. A. Forbes backs up Mr. Macdowell's plea that modern civilisation should draft a new code of international law which should secure justice for the forty-five millions of mankind still in an uncivilised state. Sir W. H. Rattigan studies and contrasts three great Asiatic Reformers—Buddha, Muhammad, and Baba
Nanak (the founder of Sikkism). Professor Rendel Harris gives a charming paper on the mysticism of Madame Guyon. Mrs. Clement Parsons revives the memory of Hezekiah Woodward (fl. 1640) as a Puritan educationist, and in brief "an embryonic Professor A. S. Geden writes on Nigeria. Professor Denney furnishes a eulogy of the theological work of the late Dr. Bruce, laying especial stress on his lifelong devotion to Matthew, Mark and Luke as the true sources of the Gospel; and the consequently new and deeper meaning he found in the "grace" and the severity and the "faith" of the Christian religion. "Dr. Bruce did not go to St. Paul for the Gospel; he went to St. Paul with his Gospel."

on "Ru "Chine tains no several

Writi Degene ment wi complai charity the unfi ago hav physicia lives, te The sel means a munity. unfit in formerly destruct cipation

The opporture superior But it is must reability of the medi

Mr. this sub position the last weakne lies in t Japan located production addition industrie entering with the the Unit even if steel in a at least, with al United S

Dean Questio promise indiffere I shou Sunday became ment be boon. but is b seekinginterests recurring good our the best even to a over his goal-wi all in all

THE FORUM.

ck on

ing to upon may

After

there

vment

ochial

ion of

of a perty,

ounds

crisis

litan

man

Pro-

glish

Il of

th a He shed

full

the cell's

lisa-

the nost

hen

eme

ater irn "

sing

at in yan.

ris-

the

ire :

Ro-

and bes

lern

nal

five ate.

reat

aba

of

the

el."

sor

the ong ces

per did aul

tan '

I HAVE noticed elsewhere the articles on the Transvaal, on "Russia, England and the United States," and on "Chinese Daily Life," Beyond these the Forum contains nothing calling for special attention, though it has several articles of average interest.

PROGRESS AND DEGENERACY.

Writing under the title of "Social Progress and Race Degeneration," Mr. Frank A. Felter revives an old argument with something more than old force. Mr. Felter's complaint is that the safeguards erected by law and charity about our daily life have the result of preserving the unfit, who, in the natural order of things, would long ago have been eliminated. Each generation of surgeons, physicians and sanitary engineers, by preserving worthless lives, tends to increase the clientage of its successors. The selective process is weakened, and a lower death-rate means a general levelling down of the health of the community. Even the old safeguards which weeded out the unfit in the past now preserve them, and war, which formerly was a massacre of the weak, now means the destruction of the ablest and the best. Even the emancipation of women means deterioration :-

The opening of business and professions to women and the opportunities for independent careers thus offered to those of superior ability are in many respects a distinct social advance. But it is evident that any considerable extension of the custom must result in the lowering of the average intelligence and ability of the race, in so far as it tends to limit motherhood to the mediocre and inferior representatives of the sex.

COMMERCIAL JAPAN.

Mr. Oscar Austin contributes an interesting article on this subject, and quotes some remarkable figures on the position of trade in Japan, the imports of which alone in the last seventeen years increased 900 per cent. Japan's weakness as a manufacturing country, says Mr. Austin, lies in the deficiency of iron—of coal she has plenty:—

Japan's iron supply has not yet proved to be large, nor so located as to furnish the facilities for cheap and satisfactory production which are found in other parts of the world. In addition to this, present conditions in the iron-manufacturing industries of the world require enormous expenditures for those entering upon production, and who expect to compete in prices with the well-established modern ironworks, especially those of the United States. Owing to this fact it seems improbable that, even if Japan should succeed in producing her own iron and steel in a crude state, she would, during the present generation at least, obtain the facilities for manufacturing in competition with already well-established manufacturing plants of the United States.

A FREE SUNDAY.

Dean Farrar writes a short article on "The Sunday Question," which he thinks should be solved by a compromise between pharisaical strictness and worldly indifference, and not by one or the other. He says:—

I should regard it as nothing less than a national misfortune if Sunday became more and more secularised, if public worship became more and more neglected, if frivolous personal amusement became the one transcendent end of a day granted us as a boon. It was given us for rest indeed—which is most necessary, but is by no means best secured by indiscriminate pleasure-seeking—but also to secure for us deliverance from mere carthly interests and all-enslaving routine; and for calm amid constantly interests and all-enslaving routine; and for calm amid constantly good ourselves, and doing good to others and helping forward the best work of the world; and for hope, which lends sweetness even to a bitter present, and which, like a charioteer who bends over his swift steeds, leans forward with eager gaze fixed on the goal—which is that unimaginable future wherein God shall be all in all.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.

Senator J. C. Burrows contributes an article which, in view of the impending elections in eleven States, is not without interest. Senator Burrows issues a warning against prophesying the result of the Presidential election of 1900 on the basis of these elections. The Presidential election will, he says, be fought upon the following issues:—

The Republican party will reaffirm, with increased faith and vigour, its determination to maintain the gold standard and the monetary value of all our currency at a parity with such standard; its adhesion to the principles of protection to American industries and American labour; the upbuilding of a merchant marine and a navy sufficient to carry and protect our foreign commerce wherever our flag of trade may be unfurled; and, in general, a reaffirmation of all those principles embodied in its platform adopted in the National Convention at St. Louis in 1896, and upon which it achieved the political victory of that year.

It is equally certain that the Democratic party will readopt the Chicago platform in its entirety; involving the overthrow of the gold standard and the restoration of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1; the complete abandonment of the policy of protection and the reinauguration of the policy of free-trade; and, in a word, the reassertion of all those principles of Democratic faith and practice which, in recent years, have characterised its utterances and marked the cause of its public administration. The candidates, therefore, and the issues for 1900 may be safely regarded as already practically selected and determined.

LABOUR LEGISLATION IN FRANCE.

Mr. Walter B. Scaife surveys "A Century's Labour Legislation in France," and gives a very pleasant account of the progress of the French working class since the Great Revolution. He sums up as follows:—

What has the working man gained in a century? And it may be truthfully answered: He has passed from legal serfdom to theoretical freedom, from wretchedness to comparative comfort, from dense ignorance to the basis of knowledge, from helpless dissociation to the strength of union—in a word, from hopeless misery to hopeful progress. In spite of political confusion, communistic uprisings, bloody revolutions, and devastating invasions, the nineteenth century has effected for the masses of the nation wonderful progress in comfort, influence and intelligence. It has finally placed disabled workers on a footing with disabled soldiers. And, at the dawn of the twentieth century the Third Republic will almost, if not quite, have realised the vain promise of the First; assuring to every French citizen his property, his pay, or his pension.

OTHER ARTICLES.

The President of the Liquid Air Company, Mr. S. H. Emmens, replies to Professor Hall's attack on the utility of liquid air for motive power. Mr. Emmens points out that liquid air is merely a more intense form of compressed air, and as such will amply justify its existence. Professor Rudolph Sohm describes the new "Civil Code of Germany" which comes into operation in 1900. Professor Stanton writes on the proposed "Paris Congress of the History of Religions," Major J. H. Parker on "The National Guard Problem," and Mr. C. H. Shinn on "Literature of the Pacific Coast." Mr. George Hempl writes on the reduction of the collegiate course from four to three years, which he thinks will result in great advantages for students.

THE November number of the Art Journal contains an interesting notice of Mr. Ellis Roberts, the portrait painter, by Mr. F. Miller. Mr. Roberts's "Elsie" is reproduced as a frontispiece.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

THE North American Review for October is a good number. I have dealt elsewhere with Captain Mahan's article on the Peace Conference, with "Ian Maclaren's" "Restless Energy of the American People," with Mr. Mulhall's "Statistics of American Progress," with M. Blowitz's article on "The French Press and Dreyfus," and with Dr. Engelenburg's "View of the South African Question." There are several other articles of considerable interest.

DECLINE OF BRITISH COMMERCE.

Mr. A. Maurice Low repeats the oft-told tale of British commercial decline; but his figures and arguments reveal nothing new. Conservatism, contempt of rivalry, too much play, and the supercession of the merchant proprietor by the managing director, are the cause of England's commercial downfall. Trades unionism has nothing to do with it. Mr. Low says:—

Napoleon's taunt that the English were a nation of shop-keepers has lost its force. The English are the worst shop-keepers in the world; worse even than the Spanish. The artistic dressing of shop windows, the display of jewels, or lace, or china, grouped with a harmonious effect for colour and brought into prominence by a background of velvet or silk, which makes a retail street in any large American city a delightful study to a person of refined taste, is practically unknown in England. London's most fashionable shop-windows are "jammed"—the word is used advisedly—with expensive articles of a high order, but these are crowded into a small space, without regard to artistic effect, and as if the sole purpose was to let every passer-by know how large a stock could be found inside.

SOCIAL TENDENCIES IN AMERICA.

Dr. Potter, the Bishop of New York, writes somewhat censoriously on this subject. Dr. Potter says that the st:ady, honest qualities of Americans are becoming, if not less general, at least less honoured. The man with a fine scruple in a business or professional transaction is looked down upon:—

To-day that type of man is ordinarily referred to as slow, antiquated, a "back number," or by some other more or less polite periphrasis by which we indicate a certain remoteness and inadequacy, so far as the tasks and transactions of our modern life are concerned.

The decay of family life is the most melancholy symptom of all:—

A wise foresight will see that he is the truest friend of the Republic who strives to re-build the Home and re-create the Family. In this connection, it would be worth while for some one to gather and tabulate for us our American statistics of hotel life. The proportion of married people who, in cities and towns, live in hotels is coming to be one of the most curious and grave phenomena of our modern civilisation. The proportion of such persons who have no children, or whose children are in schools or seminaries, would also be an interesting statistic; and the plea, in such cases, that the city is no place for children—as if any mere hygienic conditions could supply the place of home love and training—would bring us face to face with the most pathetic revelation of all.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Professor J. B. Moore writes lucidly on the Alaska boundary question; but his article is anticipated by the recent modus vivendi. Mr. E. G. Bourne, Professor of History at Yale University, pleads for a trained Colonial service. He says that America lacks not only trained men, but even the knowledge that training is necessary. Mr. Henry James contributes an article on "The Present Literary Situation in France."

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

THE October number is notable to the politician for the grave doubts it expresses—as noticed elsewhere—of British policy in South Africa. Travel is excellently represented by a description of the Blue and White Niles; Old-Age relief is the theme of original proposals in Poor Law Reform; the progress of English prose is passed in rapid survey; while the November meteors impart an astronomic interest to the varied contents; and all of the articles named claim separate treatment.

WANTED: A LAW SCHOOL FOR THE EMPIRE.

A paper on the Inns of Court inquires whether they could not be turned to better purpose than they serve at present. The writer makes this proposal:—

A great school of law in the capital of the British Empire could hardly fail to attract students from all parts of the world. The increasing facility of intercourse between the Colonies and England would seem to be in itself a reason why the Inns of Court should endeavour to fill the large place which they held in past times. . . . To the law school of Bologna students in the Middle Ages came from all parts of Europe, drawn thither by the excellence of the teaching. Is there any reason why in the immediate future societies with so noble an historic past as the Inns of Court should not become the central law school of England and her colonies? The Imperial idea is not necessarily one of expanding boundaries; its surest development lies in the strengthening of the connection of England and her colonies.

THE ANGLO-INDIAN NOVEL.

A study of Anglo-Indian novelists leads to the conclusion that they have made a not unworthy contribution to the repertory of English fiction, "which is perhaps the largest and most varied that any national literature contains":—

The narrow range of plot and character that may be observed in the pure Anglo-Indian novel reflects the uniformity of a society which consists almost entirely, outside the Presidency capitals on the sea-coast, of civil and military officials . . . The whole company that play upon the exclusively Anglo-Indian stage belong to one grade of society, and the hero is invariably a military officer . . . The Indian novel belongs to the objective outdoor class; it is full of open air and activity, and the introspective psychological vein is almost entirely wanting.

THE REVIVAL OF CONNEMARA.

A paper on Connemara closes with a cheerful prospect of its development, thanks to Mr. Balfour's social policy, and especially his railways:—

For the introduction of the railway has changed the outlook of its people from the setting to the rising sun. It is no longer through the dreary sea-mists of the wild Atlantic sea-board that the western cottier strains his eyes to catch the vision of the "terrestrial paradise." . . . . The railway, which has brought the remotest west of Ireland within twelve hours' reach of England and eighteen of London, has taught its people to look eastward for the sources of wealth and the means of bettering their lot. And with the railway has come a long-desired and much needed change in the standard of the hotels and inns fhroughout the district, which is fast assimilating the conditions of touring in the west of Ireland to those which the traveller is nowadays accustomed to demand and entitled to expect.

There are three biographical studies, on Vincent de Paul, Bismarck, and the late Lord Selborne.

"WE are to be a sort of Social Clearing-house,' says Dr. Josiah Strong to Mr. J. R. Macdonald in the November Puritan, and so epitomizes the aim of his Social League, housed as it is in the United Charities Building, New York.

M. topic an a

TI

Sout

Octo

chro expr decienum alrea prep Mr. show to so of t the and pres grea The

> dipl the

Afri

effor

up t

inte

care cha who econdoe cha influence in the latest the latest term of th

ind

last

inte

with con mir soc in Pro cou boa

affor Ch the the typ

acc

THE REVUE DES DEUX MONDES.

M. BRUNETIÈRE'S review contains less that is of topical interest than usual. We have noticed elsewhere an article by M. Dastre on the Plague.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR.

There is no article dealing with the subject of the South African question in the Revue des Deux Mondes for October, but M. Charmes alludes to the subject in his Chronicles. Writing under the date September 30, he expresses the belief that war had then already been decided upon, though not yet announced. In the second number, under the date of October 14, when war had already begun, he says that the British Cabinet had prepared an ultimatum when they were anticipated by Mr. Kruger's. He is rather astonished that the Boers should have waited so long; did they, he wonders, fear to seem the aggressors? And he suggests that the action of the Transvaal was dictated, not by ambition, but by the knowledge that it would sooner or later be conquered, and that there was no more favourable time than the present. As for the war itself, M. Charmes calls it a great atrocity, committed in the name of civilisation. The fall of the Boers, he anticipates, will be the signal for complications in Africa which will give English diplomacy a difficult task. There is a hint that the British action will change the balance of power in Africa, and that it will be very necessary to make an effort to re-establish it, but M. Charmes does not follow up this idea to its logical conclusion—namely, European interference.

THE SPANISH PEOPLE.

M. Fouillée contributes to the first October number a careful study of the Spanish people and their national characteristics. He observes that the theory of Marx, who explains all the movements of history by purely economic causes and by altogether materialistic reasons, does not apply to Spain, in the history of which the character of the inhabitants has exercised a decided influence. Probably many people will differ from M. Fouillée in thinking that a splendid future lies before this nation. It is a striking fact that the population of Spain is increasing much more rapidly than that of Portugal or Italy, indeed almost as rapidly as that of Germany. The old traditional attitude of courtesy which the Spanish maintained towards strangers concealed a profound indifference. This attitude, M. Fouillée thinks, will not last, and Spain will in the future take her place in the intellectual and commercial life of modern nations.

THE ENGLISH PRIMARY SCHOOL.

M. Bonet-Maury supplies the second October number with a study of the primary school in England, which, he considers, expresses two distinctive traits of the English mind—namely, the religious sentiment and the regard for social utility. He traces the history of primary education in England from the foundation of the Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge in 1698. He is of course puzzled by the distinction between voluntary and board schools, but on the whole he is impressed by the accurate reflection which our primary school system affords of the life and the free play of the great social forces which are at work in England—the Established Church and the Dissenters, the Roman Catholic Church, the Anglican aristocracy, and the Radical democracy of the great towns. He is convinced that the variety in the types of schools leads to a most healthy emulation and competition.

THE REVUE DE PARIS.

WE have noticed elsewhere the article on "Siberia and Her Exiles." The only topical article in the Revue de Paris for October is the powerful plea for general appeasement and reconciliation contributed by the editor, M. Lavisse. In it the distinguished Academician and thinker touches skilfully on the beginnings, on the progress, and on the conclusion of the Dreyfus case. Although the writer makes a determined attempt to be impartial, it is clear that his sympathies are, on the whole, with the anti-Dreyfusards. M. Lavisse implores his fellow countrymen to forget the very words "Dreyfusard" and "anti-Dreyfusard," and he recalls the advice of the famous Chancellor who, during the days of the great wars of religion, charged his friends to remember that they were Frenchmen first, and to forget the "diabolical words 'Huguenot' and 'Papist.'"

THE SUEZ CANAL.

M. J. C. Roux undertakes to tell in several chapters the interesting, and indeed romantic, story of the Suez Canal. During the present month (November) will be celebrated the thirtieth anniversary of the Inauguration, or solemn opening, of the Canal; the event will be marked by the unveiling of a statue of M. de Lesseps. Step by step the writer traces the beginnings of the monumental work, which, conceived and carried out by a Frenchman, now proves one of the most valuable assets of the British Crown. M. Roux shows that Lesseps had many precursors; Leibnitz tried to make Louis XIV. realise the importance of the project; in 1798 General Bonaparte started out from Cairo in order to make a personal inspection of the ground; but though the piercing of the isthmus was one of his most cherished dreams, he apparently had under his hand no engineer to whom he could confide the work. Not till 1854 was M. de Lesseps really successful in obtaining the necessary concession from the then ruler of Egypt. On November 17th, 1869, the solemn inauguration of the Canal took place, among those present being the Empress Eugénie, the Emperor of Austria, Ishmael Pasha, and the Heirs Presumptive of Prussia and of Holland, while in the brilliant group not the least interesting figure was the famous Abdul el Kader. The British of Bombay sent a telegram of congratulation to Lesseps.

THE ITALIAN PEASANTRY.

M. Gastinel offers the result of careful notes taken by him on the Italian peasantry. He follows the method of the novelist rather than of the historian, and gives innumerable little anecdotes to prove the violent, irresponsible, and childishly frank character of those whom he wishes to describe. He considers that the Church has absolutely retained her influence over the Italian poor, but he declares that the superstition and irreverence which is so marked in Italy is in no sense attributable to the religious teachers of the people, but to something in their own natures. He says that the present Pope is less popular than was Pio Nono, that the poor of Rome bitterly regret the days of the Pope-king, the more so that those who were really poverty-stricken could, practically, live without working, as enormous alms were distributed to them. The Queen is popular owing to her charming manners and her sweet smile; the King, notwithstanding his many good qualities and his undoubted bravery, is disliked; the Prince of Naples is considered to have made a poor marriage, and the fact that he has no children causes much unfavourable comment.

served of a idency . The Indian uriably jective introespect colicy, an for ere-of

White

posals

rose is eteors

tents:

r they rve at

Empire

world.

nns of held in

in the

her by

in the as the Engily one

in the onclu-

on to s the ature

es.

ent.

onger that of the ought ch of look tering and inns itions ller is at de

says the f his rities A FRENCH VIEW OF DEWEY.

A French officer, who prefers to remain anonymous, gives some pages of his diary, kept during the siege of Manila. Apparently the French and the German naval officers fraternised together, the latter declaring to the former that they did not consider the conflict a serious one. He gives the following description of Admiral Dewey:—"The Admiral, though already an elderly man, looks very vigorous, he has a calm expression and pleasing features. His large mouth and the somewhat strained muscles of the cheeks give him a slightly cynical look; a big nose and a thick moustache surmount a square chin. He reminds one of an old fox who knows how to conceal his nature so well that he is given the charge of the hen-yard. Every one sings his praises, he is courteous and civil, but very circumspect, and there is no fear that he will compromise himself; he is full of promises, but no one knows better how to put off the performance of them, as Aguinaldo knows very well."

THE NOUVELLE REVUE

WITH the October 15th number of the Nouvelle Kevue begins a new series, apparently under new editorship, although Mme. Juliette Adam will still be a frequent contributor to the pages of the publication she founded exactly twenty years ago. The last number of the old series is by no means to be despised, for the October 1st contents open with a most remarkable article by Count Tolstoi on Napoleon and the Russian campaign.

TOLSTOI ON THE BURNING OF MOSCOW.

As is always the case with the famous Russian writer, he takes a point of view diametrically opposite both to that generally held by Russian and by French historians. To take but one instance of this: he points out that hitherto the historic fire of Moscow has been attributed by the French to the patriotism of Rostopchin, while the Russians have always believed that the town was actually fired by Napoleon's soldiery. Tolstoi declares that Moscow, being at the time entirely built of wood, and with practically no fire-extinguishing apparatus, naturally burnt to the ground once it was utterly abandoned by its inhabitants, and he points out that long before the French invasion there were constant fires at Moscow, which were prevented from spreading by the energetic efforts made by the inhabitants and by the police. He also offers some new views on the Great Retreat; he gives a terrible picture of the entire disorganisation of the army; differently constituted, there was no real reason why "la grande armée" should not have penetrated into the richer Russian provinces.

AT THE MOMENT OF DEATH.

Camille Flammarion, the well-known astronomer, contributes some most curious and suggestive examples of what he calls the "telepathic manifestations of the dying." He has apparently been collecting cases for a long time, and although to those who have studied the subject there is nothing particularly new about each story, they are interesting as being vouched for by people personally known to M. Flammarion. The tie of blood seems to exert quite a remarkable influence; most of the cases recorded by the French writer tell how a grandfather or grandmother, a niece or nephew, a brother or sister, appeared at the moment of death to one who, though distant, was very near and dear to them. The most striking story of all was sent to M. Flammarion by the well-known Socialist poet, Clovis Hugues.

THE NEW "NOUVELLE REVUE."

The new series of the Nowvelle Revue begins well, and is enriched with a number of engravings, seven portraits, and autograph facsimiles of the writing of Verdi, Massinet, and Meline. In future the Revue is to be edited by a group of young French thinkers and writers. They begin by showing a very extraordinary liberalism by inviting three men, Merman, Viviani, and Denys Cochin—the latter a militant Catholic—to express their views on the French situation of the moment. They are followed by what, it is to be hoped, will prove a permanent feature—an Art Causerie by the distinguished pajnter, Benjamin Constant, It is clear that politics are still to play a great part in the Nouvelle Revue. General Gallieni, to whom is confided the difficult task of organising on a French basis the island of Madagascar, offers his views on Colonial organisation. He attributes an enormous importance to what he calls political action; it would be his invariable rule not to give more power than was possible to local or native chiefs. What is really curious is that in no single sentence does he touch on the real difficulty of French colonising methods, that is, the lack of colonists.

M. Bouniols attempts the difficult task of defending the French military code. A great movement is going on at the present time in order that the military tribunals may be abolished. In Austria, in Italy, and in Germany no officer can sit on a Court Martial unless he possesses a law degree. Probably some such reform will soon take place in France.

In both her letters on foreign politics Madame Adam touches on the Transvaal; she considers that Mr. Chamberlain possesses a hypnotic power over his colleagues, and to this power she attributes many recent events.

The Catholic Quarterly.

THE Dublin Review for October has in it much which will impress non-Catholic readers. A very interesting study of Robert Aitken, Anglican Missioner, and father of the Rev. Hay Aitken, is contributed by Bishop Brownlow. The appearance of this perfervid revivalist within the pale of the Establishment was in itself a startling phenomenon. Sympathetically recalled and described by a Roman Catholic Bishop, it attracts yet more notice. Mr. D. Moncrieff O'Connor traces the renascence of Catholicism in France from the dark days of the Revolution, and notes as its chief instruments the writings of De Maistre, De Bonald, Chateaubriand, de Lamennais, Montalembert, Lacordaire. That very remarkable reconquest of France by the Roman Church is strangely illustrated by a remark in a paper on St. Cyr by the Comtesse de Courson. This famous military school was founded by Louis XIV. at the instance of Madame de Maintenon as a convent school for nobly born but penniless girls. The writer observes, "The ardent patriotism of those eighteenthcentury young girls' seems to create a link between them and the boys who now fill their places." The modern Catholic, it seems, finds the French officers to be continuators rather than interlopers. Rev. W. H. Kent reviews Brunetière's manual of French literature, now translated into English, and finds "the presence and the inspiring influence of religion in every page" of the history of French letters; even after the obscuration of the Revolution that influence is as potent as ever it was. Mr. Edmund Jackson recalls the twelve years' converts to Rome who were born of the Oxford Movement.

VIIM

the

of

in

" I

tiv

pla

ab

to

Co

cal

Ki

tha

tan

the

the

res

Ch

wh

wit

doc

the

ver

syn

in of

side

inte

goe

by sur

and aga can the

enc

sub

tion

law

from

to 1

autl

ada

the

the

illus

call

and

of :

subj

con

Ord

rece

I

Fish

favo

THE ITALIAN REVIEWS.

and

its,

rdi,

be ers.

ism

nys

heir

are

a hed

are eral

of

car,

utes

on;

wer

t is

he

ods,

the

at nay

no

es a ake

lam

Mr.

his

ent

ich

ing

her hop

list

fa

and

yet

the ark

in-ald.

cor-

by ark

his

at

ent

iter

nth-

em

ern

ua-

ews

ted

ing

of olu-

Mr.

to

MATILDE SERAO, following in the footsteps of Pierre Loti, has paid a visit to the Holy Land, and now gives to the world the benefit of her reflections thereon. A chapter of her forthcoming book—that on "Bethlehem"—appears in the Nuova Antologia (October 16th), and another on "Magdala" in Flegrea (September 20th). The style of the distinguished novelist is rather flamboyant for the subject, but her descriptions are full of the keen perceptiveness we have learnt to expect from her. The first place in the Antologia is given to an article by Professor A. de Gubernatis on a subject which has caused considerable bitterness throughout Italy-the refusal of the Vatican to allow Catholic priests to take part in the International Congress of Orientalists, held recently in Rome. Technically, the members of the Congress were the guests of King Humbert, and hence Propaganda took the view that any recognition of the gathering would have been tantamount to a tacit acknowledgment of the right of the House of Savoy to reign at the Quirinal. As a result numbers of learned ecclesiastics were forced to absent themselves. It is but one instance of the melancholy results that spring from the present deadlock between Church and State in Italy. Professor de Gubernatis, who carried on the pourparlers with Propaganda, writes with considerable irritation, and lays the blame at the door of the Jesuits, who indignantly repudiate the charge in the latest number of the Civiltà Cattolica (October 21st).

The Civiltà continues the wearisome Dreyfus controversy in an article, expical in tone, and without a word of sympathy for the sufferings of the unhappy officer, in which it seeks to justify its own attitude and that of the French Catholics. After pointing out with considerable force how impossible it was for the Pope to intervene as long as the affaire was still sub judice, it goes on to remark that the sympathy for Dreyfus shown by English Catholics is explained by the fact that, surrounded as they are by Protestants, they are timid and hesitating in rejecting accusations brought falsely against its Church. Concerning "The Perils of Americanism," it emphasises its attitude of hostility towards the advanced camp in America by an enthusiastic encomium of an exceedingly controversial book on the subject by the Abbé Delassus.

In the Rassegna Nazionale Signor Assirelli pleads in favour of the revocation of the law forbidding the exportation of works of art from Italy. He points out that the law only applies to the selling of private property in art, from which as a rule the Italian public derives no benefit. Moreover, the law was originally passed in order to give to the authorities a prior claim of purchase, and the author argues that where, as is frequently the case nowadays, the Government has no money for such purpose, the law should not be enforced. In any case he holds the law to be a grave infringement of the rights of private property.

We have received recent numbers of a new fortnightly illustrated periodical published at the Vatican press called Cosmos Catholicus. The illustrations are admirable and will Bear comparison with the illustrated magazines of any country, and the articles deal with a variety of subjects of interest to Catholics. The most recent issue contains a well-illustrated article on the Franciscan Order, and an amusing series of snap-shot views of the recent French pilgrimage to Rome.

In the Magazine of Art for November Mr. Arthur Fish has an article on the work of Mr. C. Napier Hemy.

THE LADY'S REALM.

THE principal articles in the Lady's Realm for November are Miss Isabel Savory's "Adventures in Unknown India," and Miss Sarah Tooley's account of the life and work of the Bishop of Winchester. Miss Savory describes, in the first of a series of articles, a bear shoot in the Kashmir, in which it would appear that she does not mind roughing it, and sets native life at a curiously low value.

Miss Tooley's article is chiefly interesting for the sidelights it throws on the character of Archbishop Tait, to whom the Bishop of Winchester (as Dr. Davidson) was private secretary:—

Archtishop Tait always declined to be hurried, and used to say, "The modern ideal of a bishop is a man in a chronic state of perspiration," and he had no intention of working up to that ideal. Dr. Davidson recalls one occasion when his oft-tried patience reached a climax by the Archbishop requiring him to annotate a series of visitation statistics upon flimsy foolscap while riding on horseback along the Thames Embankment. One need not add that, notwithstanding these little peculiarities of the Primate, Dr. Davidson held him in the greatest love and reverence.

An anonymous article on "The Queen's Married Granddaughters," is a series of light character-sketches of Royal women, more or less well known. In another paper "The Art of Conversation" is discussed; Mr. Oscar Browning's remarks being by far the most apt. Princess Gagarine's description of "A Flying Visit to Bokhara" is a lively impressionist sketch of that city, interspersed with many details distinctly disgusting.

Dr. Arabella Kenealy tells, and tells well, the adventures of "Charming Renée." And Renée is very charming; but she finds herself in a conventional little English mushroom town, which—rather unaccountably, it would seem—quite fails to appreciate her. However, she finds a friend at last, and we are left to await developments that promise to be interesting.

THE CHURCH QUARTERLY.

THE Church Quarterly Feview for October reflects the unsettled condition and at the same time the conservative longings of present day Anglican thought. bishops' decision on incense is declared to be "morally binding on the clergy altogether apart from the reasons on which it is based." As to the Reserved Sacrament, the reviewer is careful to say that our Lord "is ready to manifest Himself to us in His incarnate glory whenever we desire to commune with Him, apart from the special mode of His approach in the Holy Eucharist," and that we should be "very jealous of any practice," such as praying before the reserved sacrament, that may appear to ignore this readiness of His. Considerable horror is expressed at Dr. Briggs' introduction to Holy Scripture declaring that until after the exile "there is an entire absence of censure of the sin of falsehood." His inference that the Hebrews were unconscious of the sin of lying until they learned to regard it thus chiefly from the Persians, the reviewer finds to be "amusing if it were not painful." The writer of another article expresses no fear of archæological research, but considers that it has already confirmed and will still more confirm the traditional view of the Bible. A very clever paper criticises Mr. Bosanquet's theory of the State as an attempt to transfer to the organism of the State attributes which can only belong to the ideal organism of the Body of Christ. It contains many smart raps for Hegelianism. Miss Kingsley's account of the African mind is hailed as suggesting an important new ingredient in the Divinely blended lump of humanity.

SILVER POINTS AT THE CONTINENTAL GALLERY.

An exhibition of Silver Point drawings is at present taking place in the Continental Gallery. By the courtesy of the artist, Mr. Charles Sainton, we are enabled to reproduce two of the sketches. The chief interest of "The Spider's Web," although itself a charming little study, is the fact that the original has been bought by H.R.H. the Duke of York and is lent by him for the Exhibition. "A Faerie all Forlorn" is an exquisite drawing, but it is impossible to show in a half-tone reproduction the softness and delicacy of a Silver Point.

A SPIDER'S WEB.

A FAERIE ALL FORLORN.

OURS BY THE VENEZUELAN AWARD.

THE Fortnightly for November has an article by Mr. H. Whates on the Venezuelan Award, the real interest of which, however, lies in the picture which it gives of the native population of Guiana, in whose sovereignty we are now confirmed. Mr. Whates describes these natives as

They are a nomadic race. Though the various tribes, who promise in due course to be as extinct as the pure Carib, confine themselves to areas of the country well understood among themselves, they roam about as fancy dictates. Their possessions give little trouble in transit. They live in open benabs or huts. A little hacking at the forest undergrowth or at the limbs of a fallen greenheart yields poles for the framework of their dwellings, Near the creeks there are always huge palms with which they can roof over the V-shaped skeleton of a house. All they need is a slightly better shelter from sun and rain than is given by the is a signify better sucher from sun and rain than is given by the interlacing arms of the giant trees. The only furniture they want is a few hammocks of their own making, which serve alike for sitting and for sleep. The men hunt and fish. The women cultivate the cassava patch, weave the hammocks, prepare the food, and brew the intoxican. They do whatever manual work is to be done, and bear many children. Childbirth means for the father release from the toils and pleasures of the chase. He is put to bed, doctored, and overwhelmed with attentions. The woman suffers the disabilities of maternity, and the man is awarded the consideration and the honour, becoming an object of mysterious rites, while the mother returns to the cassava patch. When the tiny crop is cleared, or when the game and fish fail, a move is made elsewhere in rude corials along the rivers to some other seemingly inaccessible creek. If an overland journey has to be made, the household goods are packed, with the babies, on the backs of the women, while the males thread their way along an indiscernible trail through the forest or over the savannah, carrying their spears and bows and arrows, and scorning any menial burden. A few rude implements for the soil, a dog, or e or two tame animals perhaps, hammocks, earthenware vessels, and the like, are their only impedimenta. To the Indians beyond the Wenamu, one savannah will, doubtless, be as good as another. They will be farther removed from the mountains, where spirit gods dwell; but there are ghostly beings innumerable in Guiana. Every river, creek, and waterfall has its unseen and unknowable deity-usually of a wicked disposition, so far as any insight into Indian religious ideas enables a judgment to be formed. No man has seen into the mind of the Guiana aborigine. He guards the chambers of his soul with a stolidity not to be overcome, and keeps the very porticoes veiled and darkened. He is a man, and therefore a mysteryas great and as fascinating a mystery as his primeval home.

Mr. Whates is of opinion that concessions should be granted by the Colonial Office to a company with the object of exploiting the products of British Guiana. The objections which exist against such undertakings in Africa do not apply in this case.

froi

ver unc nar 15 typ our the are ins ac Ha the the on I eve Ma wei cer on the wh: ten pro wit the em has

ent:

stri

wro

mea

by

the

Sho

gati

ind

pala

dou

with

the

was

not

SOC

A por

7

SOME BOOKS OF THE MONTH.

(1) AN IMPRESSIONIST STUDY OF A STRIKE, BY A DUCHESS.

THE DUCHESS OF SUTHERLAND has occasionally contributed to our periodical literature, but "One Hour and the Next" is her first novel. It is a book interesting alike from the subject, and still more from its authoress. "One Hour and the Next" is not a very good title, nor do I, after reading the book, quite understand its significance. However, "what's in a name? A rose by any other name would smell as sweet." The book, by whatever name it is called, is a careful, conscientious, painstaking picture of a modern strike, with impressionist sketches of various typical figures which always come to the front in our modern industrial warfare. Duchesses who dwell in the serene heights and splendours of Dunrobin Castle are not exactly qualified to write on strikes from the inside, and it would have been interesting to have had a criticism upon "One Hour and the Next" by Miss Harkness for instance, who went through the whole of the Dockers' Strike, and saw it from the inside. Nevertheless, it is a sign of grace that a Duchess should write on strikes.

It is a favourite theory of mine that no judge should ever be allowed to pass a sentence of imprisonment until he has served a term of at least one week in one of Her Majesty's gaols; and it would be a good thing if no Duchess were allowed to attend a Drawing-room until she could certify Her Majesty that she had made a personal study on the spot of some of the great social sores which afflict the community. Those who are at the top ought to know what goes on at the bottom, and it would certainly not tend to weaken the position and the power of the House of Lords in this country if every Peer's wife had given proof, let us say, of a personal intimate acquaintance with the state of casual wards, the provision made for the aged and respectable poor, the method of disposing of illegitimate and unwanted children, the state of the unemployed, or such a subject as the Duchess of Sutherland has dealt with in the present story—the actual sufferings entailed upon an industrial community by a long-continued strike.

The story goes that before the Duchess of Sutherland wrote this book she sojourned for a time in one of the mean streets of Bradford, and was personally conducted by a Board School teacher in, out, and round about the homes of those who were suffering from the strike. She also had an opportunity of making personal investigations into the condition of the workers in a state of industrial warfare in the immediate vicinity of her own palace in Staffordshire. Anyhow, whatever the studies by which she prepared herself for this book, there is no doubt that she has seized with a quick eye, and fixed with a ready pen, a picture of the realities of life among the rank and file of the sufferers when labour and capital wage a pitched battle. That seems to me the first noticeable feature of "One Hour and the Next."

Another distinctive feature of the book is the full-length portrait which it draws of a Socialist agitator of a social rank superior to those who are usually found on a Socialist platform. The picture will probably be denounced as grossly unfair, and so, if it is regarded as a type, it would undoubtedly be. From the point of view of art the authoress would have done well to have given us at least one companion picture of a somewhat higher type than that of the man who is the most conspicuous figure in her book. He is a country gentleman of great energy and considerable ability, who began life as a Conservative, and married a beautiful girl in whom for one or two years he found complete satisfaction for his whole nature; but when after that time hereditary insanity began to develop in his idolised wife, life lost to him its meaning, existence became a torment, and to obtain some relief from the haunting memory of his disappointment he flung himself, as a diversion, into a purely destructive Socialism. There may be such a man, there may be such men; but the impression which is left by the prominence given to this central figure is an unfair one, and its unfairness is heightened by the fact that the only other Socialist of the advanced school who appears in the book is a drunken demagogue who spouts Socialism in order to earn the funds which he needs to keep him going with whiskey.

The third feature, which, perhaps, is one of the best in "One Hour and the Next," is the careful delineation of a young woman who is somewhat typical. The heroine is a young girl who is bored to death with the dulness of her own home, who is very advanced in her ideas, who considers Christianity as hopelessly out of date, and who is simply swept off her feet when she is brought into close contact with the Socialist agitator who is running the strike in her native town. The picture is a sad one, and the way in which the authoress delineates the manner in which the girl is influenced by the ideas of the social revolution and the personal fascination of the man who embodies those ideas, is very ably done. Of course we find in the end that his personality in its overwhelming attraction meant more to her than all the aspirations and schemes which she thought had bound her at first to his side. "Clad in the garb of her passionate desire, illumined by her vivid imagination, warmer feelings at this moment pushed all other facts into the background. There crept through all her being an intoxicating hope running like fire in her veins,"-which is natural and very much to be expected, especially as at that moment the good girl had no idea that the man was married.

Besides these three leading features of the book, there are several portraits very carefully and skilfully drawn. The hero, who is a common-sense Christian Socialist, Philip Assheton by name, is well done; but although he is immaculate in all things, and the very embodiment of good sense and high principle, he does not stand out as vividly as his rival, the revolutionary Socialist. Not less carefully executed is the portrait of the old schoolmaster, the heroine's father, whose life, twice broken in his youth, once by the failure of all his aspirations for a University career, and secondly by the early death of his wife, had, with the resolution of a Stoic, been devoted to the teaching of a day-school. "Patiently he toiled through the years, the wreck of his life ever before his eyes, while from his stern self-control a certain weakness grew like a parasite on his best self. With his vision

the

e is

her

be

the

an

ah,

nv

els,

ans

ood

ns,

gs

as lis-

les

oi

ith

oes

be

he

he

<sup>* &</sup>quot;One Hour and the Next." By Millicent Sutherland. Methu:n and Co., 6s.

trained to one point of view, in the earlier years of suffering, he dared not, in later years he could not, look to the right or the left." With the man self-repression became such a habit, that when his son and daughter returned from school he could not enter into their lives, and he continued to live alone, finding it impossible to make his children understand the heart that was buried beneath his habitual reserve. "Once or twice he looked into the eyes of lost hopes and lost joys. Their ghosts refused to be laid, and though he buried himself under a pressure of work, there remained in his heart a terrible

There are other characters, all carefully drawn, and many scenes showing the observant eye and a deep sympathy with the suffering poor.

It is a grey book, and the picture gallery is all etched in black and white, though it contains no purple patches, nor is there any attempt to create a thrilling or sensational

The story of the book is, briefly, as follows. In a silkdyeing district, presumably the north of Staffordshire from the dialect, the silk-dyers, who were earning 17s. a week, struck for an advance of 2s. The masters, threatened by foreign competition, formed a combination to resist the demand of their hands. If the men had been left to themselves they would probably have arranged a compromise with the masters, especially as Mr. Assheton, who had the confidence of the workpeople, was available for the purpose of mediator between capital and labour. This happy consummation was thwarted by the arrival on the scene of one Robert Lester, the Socialist agitator, a gentleman by birth and education, who flung himself into the task of embittering class feeling and prolonging the strike from the sheer necessity of finding a vent for his destructive energies and as a counterirritant to the brooding miseries of his own life. He was a man of mystery and modernity, still young, big, loose-limbed, with a smooth brown head, although a straggling grey-streaked lovelock half concealed the deep furrow across Ins brow. His philosophy of life was that there was no good nor God nor hope at all in the world. There was nothing anywhere but man's unreasonableness and despair. He was much given to rash and random talk, full of paradoxes and inconsistencies. What he wanted to see, he declared, was the gospel of discontent preached from the housetops to the slaves of

I hate to see the putrid corpse of reality decked out in fine feathers of theories. Let them see it naked in all its horror,"

Although he was heading the strike, he knew from the first that he had no chance of success. It afforded him a platform from which he could preach his gospel of discontent, and so he made the most of it; but he maintained in the most uncompromising way that there was no good in appealing to lofty ideals in stirring the masses. "Appeal to their stomachs, their passions, their instinct for vengeance." That was his idea, and his notion of conducting a Socialist agitation was thus expressed: "We want a dead level of commonplace speakers who have been taught to conthe common the control of the con speakers who have been taught to cry the same cry as loudly as possible, to deal with the same commonplace needs. At present the Socialist army, by talking with different tongues, is a Tower of Babel."

All these emphatic observations were uttered for the delectation of Agnes Stanier, the schoolmaster's daughter, who had undertaken to act as his stenographer and type-writer while the strike lasted. Agnes, who had been eating her heart out in the dull monotony of her father's home, was fascinated by the extravagance, capriciousness and eloquence of her employer. She was his clerk; she longed to be his confidante. "She thrilled with impulsive sympathy, longing to offer him what she, in the exquisite conceit of her youth, imagined would be consolation—the placing of her life's devotion at his command in the battle he was waging with such dogged determination." She longed to enlist as a recruit in the great battle which he was leading, and implored him to give her something to do for the cause. He responded by asking her to induce Philip Assheton to speak at one of his meetings. Now Philip Assheton was very much in love with Agnes Stanier, and she recoiled from the thought of having to ask him a favour. At first she refused, but Lester dawdled across to the piano and dropped into a melody of Grieg's. The girl gave a shiver of despair. She knew the victory was his, for all her senses were enthralled by his evident need of her and by the sweetness of the music. She capitulated and promised to do her best. She did not doubt for a moment that she would succeed, but she was furious at having undertaken the task.

On her way home she came upon a street fight, in which one of the strikers was engaged in pitched battle with another workman. She was carried away by the excitement of the tumult. Here was action at last. "The blood spurted from both, and the scarlet drops twinkling on waistcoats and coat-sleeves besprinkled even the muddy gutter." A policeman turned up, but not before the striker had his jaw broken by a blow from his enemy's fist. Then the crowd dispersed, and Agnes went home to her father. For some time she shrank from fulfilling her promise. She refused to consider the possibility of failure, for she believed she held Assheton in the hollow of her hand. "If I choose," she said to herself, "he would tell me he adored me. If I choose, why should he not also compromise with his absurd convictions?" a kind of logic not perhaps altogether unnatural to an innocent child of eighteen. She put it off till the last moment, but made up her mind to capture him by offering to go with him to visit the striker with a broken jaw, where he was to meet one or two of the workmen on strike.

When Assheton and Agnes reached the Challinors' house they knocked at the door and heard the sound of grumbling within, of a battering and scraping of wooden chairs pushed back upon a brick floor, and very slowly the door was shaken half open and a woman peered out. When the workmen came in Assheton urged them to accept a compromise, which was within their grasp, of a shilling advance. The men hesitated. Assheton urged them not to be afraid of Lester, but to accept what they could get. Agnes listened for a time, feeling at once the hopelessness of her mission, and was carried away by a violent feeling of wrath :-

She would speak now, cost what it might, "Cowards!" she cried passionately. "Cowards! you are just like driven cattle, one way then, and the other way now.
Why do you play false to the best leader that men ever had? Why do you try and throw Mr. Lester over, because some one else dares to tell you he's wrong? He's right, I say. The only way by which you'll ever get freedom is by fighting for it. Are you going to haul down the flag of liberty?"

One of the men guffawed, as Mrs, Challinor, throwing a couple of potatoes into the boiling water in the pot, still fixed the girl, her head thrust forward.

"Astna thay got nowt fur t' sey abart it, missus?" he asked, with a wink at his friend.

The woman rose at his challenge and walked forward. She dragged at Agnes by the arm. "Sit thay dain, Mess, sit thay dain. Dunna tak the 'ope from us, as they'n taen t' bread from our marths. Yew arena t' mither uv a family. u

0

B

b

ple lit

WI

stı

ca

M

rep

go

WO

girl

una in f

tell

a m mas

to d Up of l

J

ang

Soc

Ass

hun

:nat

I

It's folks saime as yew as torks an' dinna knoaw, and folks saime's mey as 'as fer t' knoaw and canna tork. Bu' Oi'm fur torking now, for Oi can tork to a wench better than Oi can to a mon, Oi've 'ad my schoolin' an' coortin' deys too, an' it's nowt but th' work that's brought mey ter wat Oi am, bu' yew dunna know th' best o' th' work, tin there's no work fur t' du."

She looked pitifully round, and the girl, stilled by the unexpected attack, stood doggedly silent.

ess

she

sive

site

the ttle

She

was

for ilip

ilip and n a s to girl

his.

her

ted

ra

at

ich ith

teood

on ldy

ker

ist. her

her

of

OW

uld

lso

gic

of

ide

to eet

ors

of

len

the ut.

to fa

red lev

he y a

are

W.

d?

else

vay

you

ked

ed,

ess.

aen

"Ît's theyse fancy wimses they'n gotten as maks things wuss. Oi sez ter our Dick, 'Dick, wi' scrattin' an' scrapin' Oi can du wi' seventain shullin' a wick, but Oi canna du wi' nowt. But wen Dick's art aaf th' noights an' rades they paipers and bukes loik aw day," she pointed to a heap of old newspapers and pamphlets on the bed, "and sez it's aw for t' Gran' Cause, my 'art's just welly broke. 'Wat good dun it do uz?' sez I. 'Good fur th' childer,' 'e sez, w'en they'n growd up.' But thay never wan be growd up wi'out mait nor milk, nor any thin' else, fur t' give 'em t' eat."

The pathos of the moment was gone; the cottage became a pandemonium of jarring noises. Agnes, seeing that no clay was here for her moulding, that no outburst of condemnation could be effectual, felt that her only resource was flight.

She fled, and Assheton followed. On their way home she fulfilled her mission, and asked Assheton to come to speak at one of Mr. Lester's meetings. In a flash Assheton realised the secret of her condescension in accompanying him on his visit to Challinor. The pleasure of her company had been merely given him as a little diplomatic arrangement to achieve Lester's object at the expense of her own feelings. They parted in wrath. Assheton, after thinking matters over in his own study, called upon Lester. He quarrelled with him for sending Agnes on such a mission. As Lester did not care at all for the girl, he was quite cool, and when Assheton asked angrily by what right he made a tool of Miss Stanier, by what right he forced her to work out his wild whims at the expense of all that she held dear, he replied coolly that he really did not know what Miss Stanier held dear, but he certainly considered her a very good typewriter.

As he noticed this indifference, real or feigned, Philip felt a thrill of relief, felt too a contradictory impulse to seize the man by the throat.

"She's useful to fetch and carry for you, and to do your dirty work," he said indignantly.

Lester wheeled round in his chair.

"If you came here to-night because you're in love with that girl," he said, "why don't you say so? Why don't you tell me at once that you don't wish her to fetch and carry for me as you call it, and that although your Christian convictions are unalterable, to say 'no' to her takes years of your life, that

"Stop!" said Philip, half choking with anger. "Stop, I tell you. It's bad enough that she's your slave, without making a mock of it."

Lester dropped instantly into his former nonchalance.

"For goodness' sake don't exaggerate; each man's his own aster nowadays. As for mocking, that's the last thing I want master nowadays. to do. She takes things much too seriously to make a mock of. Upon my word, it would be better if she did fetch and carry for you. I expect I shall play the devil with her."

Assheton grew white to the lips,
"Oh, don't be a fool," said Lester impatiently, catching sight of his expression. "Not in the way you think; but I play the devil with everything, I simply can't help it."

Under the magnetic influence of the agitator Assheton's anger evaporated into interest, and they began to discuss Socialism, Lester maintaining the gospel of hatred and Assheton declaring that the inanity of the aristocracythe vulgarity of the plutocracy, can never effect one hundredth part of the harm in England that the militant materialism of an ignorant democracy could. But Lester was obdurate. "Life," he said, "made people mad; it gave everything but that which made it worth living." As he spoke, Assheton divined that there was a secret behind the revolutionist's talk, which he yearned to penetrate.

Quick as lightning there crept into his wondering mind the conviction that Lester lay tortured under some unexpressed sorrow—full of faith in his own luck, he had fixed his plan of life as he had wished it before him, and had seen it wrenched in pieces by the force of circumstance. And, in agonised rebellion, he was struggling like some hunted creature that lies bound limb by limb with only its fangs left to tear—to maul—to

The strike dragged on. Lester thwarted the efforts at a compromise, and compelled the men to fight the battle on to the bitter end-and the end was bitter. Here is the Duchess's description of the consequences which follow on a protracted strike :-

For in Stoneyard itself the immoral influence of the strike was being keenly felt. Idleness had brought its attendant ills. Women who had never begged hung like habitual street mendicants round the doors of the benevolent, clamouring for help; soup tickets and blankets were doled out and greedily accepted by those who fought against the givers.

Men, honest by training, and kept honest by work, scoured the country with collecting books, and, falling a prey to drink and other enjoyments by the way, falsified their accounts at the headquarters of their lodge. An epidemic broke out, and little children died. The pawnbrokers' shelves overflowed, petty burglary and shoplifting became common. The town was con-

The masters, suffering least, looked on, holding back their proposals, unwilling to compromise. They knew that the They knew that the outcome was practically in their hands, and were embittered even in their most yielding moments by Lester's arrogance. He stalked here and there, speaking at the street corners or at the cottage fireside, stilling the murmurs of the union leaders by the sheer magnetism of his personal influence, and dropping promises without reflection, to keep up the hearts of his followers as the money came in in ever smaller amounts.

It may, however, be easily imagined that such a state of things in a provincial town of no great magnitude brought about a serious disorganisation in social affairs. The inhabitants shifted into factions, and a general feeling of uneasiness characterised the greetings in the market-place. A man looked twice at his familiar friend before daring to presume on the camaraderie of the past; and within the doors of the beer-houses that, during the slackness of trade, flourished and grew fat, the wrangles and active disputes on the question at stake were responsible for much damage of feature and furniture.

There are other characters introduced, notably Philip Assheton's devoted sister, a fat, commonplace vicar, and a quaint old creature named Nicholas, an assistant in the school, who worshipped Agnes, and, having fallen under the influence of the Salvation Army, longed and prayed for her conversion. Meanwhile Agnes became prayed for her conversion. more and more hopelessly in love with her employer. To him she was only a pretty child, an intelligent machine, or a useful ally; whereas to her he was an ideal hero, whom she worshipped, and exulted in the thought that she was the only woman to whom he poured out all his aspirations and with whom he shared all his disappointments. Lester had glimpses from time to time of how things were going, and dreaded complications. To her he talked cruelly and even brutally; but from time to time, as she expressed it, the sickening thought that she was only part of the machine, like the typewriter, to him filled her with despair. She told him once, "All these weeks I have been working for you I have grown happier and happier. I long so for activity. If you would let me help you more fully-just in a measure, myself. You don't think that because I am a woman I shall always make a mess of everything?" Whereupon Lester sent her to find a kindred spirit in a neighbouring town, a labour leader named Griffiths, who was of the proper blood-and-fire social democratic kind. Originally a working-man, he now had given up his whole time to the agitation, and when he liked was a first-rate talker. Lester suggested she had better not go on Saturday night, but she did not notice his warning, and off she went to find Griffiths. On her arrival at his house, she found him sitting at a centre table in a dimly-lighted room, full of the sickening smell of stale spirits. Flushed of cheek, swollen of lip, with heavy filmy eyes, he could barely rouse himself to receive her message. As she told him Mr. Lester wished him to come down to address the strikers, he hiccoughed and replied: "Goo' feller, Lester, goo' feller, always in a fright about somethin'. No more money down here. When's he going to send money?"

Agnes felt as if she would faint. The man became more violent. "I've talked," he said, "for their bloomin' cause till my throat's dry, and not a bob left." He drank some more, drinking to the cause of the people, damnation to the teetotalers and to the parsons, and then attempted to seize her.

"Are you Lester's lass?" he said, with a wink; diamned finer girl than we get down here. Does he keep you for the party or for your pretty eyes?"

The blood darkened her face. She clenched her hands and rushed to the door. The door-handle would not open at first, and the man in a towering rage shouted to her to go at once. At last the handle turned, and as she reached the passage a bottle, which he had hurled at her head, smashed to pieces on the door-handle. He staggered, pulled himself together with difficulty, staggered again, and, clutching at the table-cloth, slipped back heavily on the edge of the chair, and from the chair with smothered curses fell an invertebrate heap on the

Not even this, however, disillusioned Agnes Stanier of her devotion to Lester. She was ill for a week after that adventure, and she hardly had recovered before Philip Assheton attempted to plead his cause and induce her not to run such terrible risks on behalf of Lester.

"Don't you know it's all play-acting," he said-"that you are drifting in a torrent of make-believes to a Dead Sea?"-an observation not calculated to induce the lady to smile upon his suit. She replied after her wont, and Philip blazed up in wrath and told her that his earnestness and his love was the only thing that would be left real in the chaos where she would find herself when she knew Lester as the scoundrel that he was. Thereupon angry words flamed forth in answer to angry words, and she declared, "If you were the only man in the world and I the only woman, I should hate you—hate you always !

Her swimming eyes flashed back to his in stormy wrath, the renewed challenge of perpetual war. Her breath came in short, broken sobs of rage. Philip, trembling in every limb, his head in a whirl, held her arm for a moment in his strong grip; under his pent brow his kindling grey eyes looked straight into hers.
"Hate me," he cried hoarsely—"hate me till you love me!"

Then he turned from her and strode from the room

Philip Assheton succeeded in rousing the fears of Agnes's father, and after a vain appeal to the girl, John Stanier went to plead his cause with Lester, and as luck would have it the father entered the room the moment after Lester for the first time had kissed Agnes. She had been standing on a chair, delivering a Socialist harangue for practice, and as he helped her down she looked so pretty and bright that without premeditation and without intention, under a passing impulse, born of her childlike beauty and of their playful words, he kissed her :-

To her it seemed but the fulfilment of all hopes, the climax of all desires, the expression of all unspoken thoughts. He loved her—most surely he loved her. A kiss must mean so much to such a man. What need now of further control, continued struggle of self-tormenting analysis? In utter surrender she clung to him.

"I know now," she whispered, "I have wanted to know so long, dear, how I love you."

At this moment the father came into the room. The old man pleaded with passionate pathos for his daughter. Lester was cynical and harsh :-

"Typewriting," he said, "can be done by others. So can speeches. Your daughter, of course, agrees with me that she prefers obedience to your wishes to domestic broils."

She had promised to speak at the farewell meeting that was to be held to sound one note of defiance before the strike collapsed. Her father was horrified, and Lester himself recoiled with regret from allowing her to take such a step. He announced her speech, however, as an attraction, and found it did not attract-found, indeed, that the men manifested no wish to hear her.

Meantime Philip Assheton sets himself to work to snatch the shilling increase from the very jaws of defeat. The scene in which he visits the manufacturer's big house, and the company which he meets there, is sketched with considerable skill, although the tour de force, by which the manufacturer's daughter succeeds in inducing her father to grant the increase of wages as a birthday present, is somewhat strained. In the discussion in the drawing-room Mr. Assheton expounds what we may probably regard as the authoress's view of the functions of the Church:-

"The Church of the younger generation is awake, thank God for it! Why shouldn't we have a little social idealism in our religion? Development is not a one-sided affair. It's for every branch of existence—for every class. We're right to insist on the meaning of words, not on the sound of them. I'm sick to death of the obstinate orthodoxy that refuses to extend its limits, or to free itself from shams."

"But a Church attacking things radically from below, letting its pulpit theories become its every-day action, applying religion to the special rules of a factory as well as to a prayer meeting, a Church that draws the rich from their self-content, the poor from their ignorant wretchedness, and that no longer picks and chooses its virtues, that's what I want to see, and that's what's coming,

It would not be fair to the authoress to describe the The concluding chapters of the book, however, are among the best in the work, and in them the authoress touches a higher tragic note which is hardly audible in the earlier chapters. It cannot be said to come to the conventionally happy ending. only permitted to indulge a hope that things may come right, and that Agnes and Assheton may find happiness in each other now that the great desolation had come. It is a sad story, distinctly sad-sad in the note of disappointment in the girl and the blighted life of the old man, the father, of the broken career of Lester, while Assheton with his benevolent aspirations is the only person in the story whose life is not more or less spoiled. It is a sombre bit of life that is painted in "One Hour and the Next," but it is a patient, conscientious study of life as it is seen, not from the windows of Dunrobin Castle, but in the homes of the people in the midst of whom the Stafford palaces are reared.

able pres Mr. into fata which and in v Fitz as q

It v to : Milr He Kru the in a guar of th In his c

poin

His that inde ago 1 was excu narra press index and temb

are,

Th Tran Afric with its e Jame Mr. Mr. 1 gaol-All t intere eight how

Mr. These drawi one c could politic in the intere Kruge years

* "T By J. F

"T

(2) "THE TRANSVAAL FROM WITHIN." *

MR. FITZPATRICK, whose book on "The Transvaal from Within" has achieved no are " last month, is a notable man. He is not only the Secretary of the Outlanders' Council, but he is a very able man who has written a very interesting book, and who has also had more influence in bringing about the present war than any other person not in office. Mr. FitzPatrick was the man who lured Sir Alfred Milner into the course which has landed us in the present fatal struggle. The point of departure in Africa which marks the beginning of the war period was the time when Mr. FitzPatrick met Sir Alfred Milner, and pledged him to take the course which resulted in war. It is not, therefore, without reason that Mr. FitzPatrick considered himself during the negotiations as quite as indispensable, if not as important, a personage as either Sir Alfred Milner or President Kruger. His point of view was that he represented the Outlanders. It was he who was able to induce the Outlanders to accept the five years' franchise when Sir Alfred Milner proposed that as a settlement to President Kruger. He could also point out the fact that, as soon as President Kruger accepted the five years' franchise, he, on behalf of the Outlanders, protested they would not take it unless in addition to the franchise they were able to secure guarantees which effectively destroyed the independence of the South African Republic.

ke

ax

Te

ch

ed

he

SO

he

er.

an

he

at

he ter ke

an

ed,

ch

he

se.

ith

ch

er

av

he

ay

ns

od

our erv

on

to

its,

ing

ion

, a

om

ses

ng,

the

ok,

em

15 aid

are

me ess

me.

lis-

old hile

nlv

led.

our

of of bin

t of

In this book Mr. FitzPatrick expounds in 440 pages his opinion of things as they have been, things as they are, and things as they ought to be, in the Transvaal. His book is ably written, but it is simply scandalous that a book of this kind should be issued without an index. It was an excellent proposal made some time ago that no book should be allowed copyright unless it was adequately indexed, and Mr. FitzPatrick has no excuse for neglecting this indispensable addition to his narrative. Sometimes books are rushed through the press in such a hurry that it is impossible to get them indexed; but this book was privately circulated last June, and was not published for general circulation until September. With that exception it is very well put together.

The first two chapters deal with the earlier days of the Transvaal and the first thirteen years of the South African Republic. Then we have six chapters dealing with the rise of the Reform movement in Johannesburg, its evolution into a quasi-revolutionary agitation, the Jameson Raid, the arrest and trial of the Reformers, and Mr. FitzPatrick's experience when he lay in gaol, for Mr. FitzPatrick belongs to the honourable company of gaol-birds, and is free of the fellowship all over the world. All this is historical. What is of more immediate interest from a political point of view are the last eighty pages of his book, in which he describes how President Kruger failed to profit by the three years' grace given him after the Raid, and what Mr. FitzPatrick called "The Beginning of the End." These pages contain the case for the Outlanders, as drawn up by the most able of their champions. No one can read them without feeling that President Kruger could only have satisfied Mr. FitzPatrick by committing political suicide. This might have been desirable enough in the interest of the Outlanders, or even in the general interest; but it is not very surprising that President Kruger did not see things quite in this light.

"The Transvaal from Within" is a useful book, and may be commended to the perusal of all those who in their zeal against the unjust war which is now raging are inclined to idealise President Kruger and his Government. Mr. FitzPatrick's book, like everything else that is written as to the way in which the Transvaal is governed, increases my regret for the failure of the insurrection of 1895. Mr. Fitz-Patrick writes from the Johannesburg point of view, and sets forth with restrained feeling his sense of the injustice with which the Reformers of 1895 have been treated. The fact is, that although Mr. FitzPatrick is now the ardent supporter of Mr. Chamberlain, he and the Outlanders have more reason to complain of the Colonial Secretary than of any other man. Mr. FitzPatrick, like all the Reformers, makes no secret of the fact that the insurrection miscarried in Johannesburg because of the suicidal proposal to thrust the British flag upon the movemen. Mr. FitzPatrick is an enthusiastic patriot, and cannot be accused by any one of any lack of enthusiasm for the Union Jack. But he is an honest man, he was on the spot, and he has a painful recollection of the fact, bluntly admitted by Colonel Rhodes before the South African Committee, that it was the introduction of the flag question which wrecked the whole scheme. Mr. FitzPatrick's words are worth noting on this

The original Jameson plan and the arrangement between Mr. Rhodes and the Outlanders was the organisation of a revolutionary movement at Johannesburg for the purpose of setting President Kruger down and putting a new president in his place, who would govern in sympathy with the Outlanders, and who would not make the chief end of his government the perpetuation of the corruption and misgovernment which characterised the existing régime. But it was distinctly understood that the insurrection had to be a domestic affair, although it was to be supported by the Jameson troops on the jumping-off territory provided for that purpose by Mr. Chamberlain. Unfortunately, as we know from the cablegrams forwarded from Cape Town, from the agents who were in constant communication with the Colonial Office, pressure was brought to bear on Mr. Rhodes to change the simple plan for the much more ambitious design to annex the Transvaal to the British Empire by hoisting the British flag upon the revolutionary movement. The result was that the revolutionary leaders revolted, and the project came to nothing.

Another book dealing with the same subject from the same point of view, although with no pretension to provide the public with a handbook to the political problem in South Africa, is Mrs. Lionel Phillips' description tof what she suffered during the time when her husband was organising the insurrection in Johannesburg, and afterwards when he was expiating his offences in Pretoria Gaol. Mrs. Phillips writes with considerable natural vehemence and speaks her mind with uncompromising candour. For instance, she is very wroth with Dr. Jameson, and says so. Her visit to the Colonial Office also seems to have been somewhat unhappy. She told Mr. Chamberlain vehemently that they had been suffering in Africa for eighteen years of Majuba Hill, in blissful ignorance that Mr. Chamberlain more than any other living man was responsible for that policy. She has a characteristic little picture of poor Mr. Fairfield, whose flippant method of dealing with the subject naturally jarred on Mrs. Phillips. "A nice mess you have made of it," said he.

• &quot;The Transvaal from Within." A Private Record of Public Affairs. By J. P. FitzPatrick. (William Heinemann.)

† &quot;South African Recollections." By Florence Phillips. (Longmans, 7s. 6d.)

(3) MR. LECKY'S GUIDE TO HAPPINESS, ETC.*

THE ingenious author who sold edition after edition of his book by entitling it "How to be Happy though Married," might have given a wrinkle to Mr. Lecky, who cannot be congratulated upon the choice of title to his new book. "The Map of Life," as he styles it, is intended to be a guide to happiness among others, although it begins somewhat portentously by a discussion of free will. If Dr. Mortimer Grenville had not already appropriated the title "How to Make the Best of Life," that title would have suited the book, although Mr. Lecky might have objected that he wanted a more general title to cover the wider range of his dissertations.

"The Map of Life" really consists of a series of lay sermons upon everything and anything that happens to man during his life. How to be happy, says Mr. Lecky, is to have a life full of work and not to make happiness the main object of pursuit. Secondly, we should aim rather at avoiding suffering than attaining pleasure. Thirdly, we should make the most of our blessings while we have them. Mr. Lecky has not made up his mind yet whether we are happier now than were our great-grandfathers. We have lower animal spirits, and are more sensible to pain. We have abolished some of the worst forms of human suffering. But it is doubtful if we have attained a higher level of human happiness. He thinks that there is a steadily increasing tendency to judge moral questions and course of conduct mainly in the degree in which they permit human happiness. Excessive luxury and huge families will some day be looked upon as graver offences than some that are now on the penal code. Of excessive luxury Mr. Lecky speaks with great severity. It is the costly waste of the means of human happiness in the most selfish and vulgar form of competition that gives the force and almost the justification to anarchical passions which menace the whole future of our civilisation. Mr. Lecky is by no means a Calvinist, but he has some suggestions which go a long way towards establishing the doctrine of human depravity. "The amount of pure and almost spontaneous malevolence is probably far greater than we at first imagine. Of this we find evidence in the anonymous press, a large part of which is employed systematically, deliberately in fostering class and national hatreds, even circulating falsehoods to attain these ends."

We have a series of dissertations on moral compromise which should form a book by themselves. There is moral compromise in war, and under this head we note that Mr. Lecky maintains, not without justification, that the Indian Mutiny was thoroughly justified. English writers, says Mr. Lecky, must acknowledge with humiliation that if mutiny is ever justifiable, no stronger justification could be given than that of the Indian troops. Lord Roberts recently told us that the grease on the cartridges was actually composed of cow's fat and lard, which, in the opinion of Hindoos and Mussulmans, destroyed their hopes of salvation. As Mr. Lecky says, that outrage, which nearly cost us our Indian Empire, was due to sheer stupidity and obstinacy. It was simply a striking instance of the stupidity which is so often shown by British Administrators in dealing with types and creeds utterly unlike their own. The moral compromise section deals with moral compromise in the law and in politics. In the latter chapter Mr. Lecky profits by his experience as a parliamentary man. In the chapter entitled "The Statesman" he makes a reference to the Jameson Raid in terms which show the opinion which at least one member of the Unionist Party has formed of Mr. Chamberlain's contribution to morality in politics. Speaking of the Jameson Raid, Mr. Lecky, who it will be remembered is married to a Dutch lady, sets out in its worst possible light the conduct of Mr. Rhodes. The Raid. he says, was one of the most discreditable as well as one of the most mysterious events in recent Colonial history. He admits that Mr. Rhodes is a man of great genius and influence, who in the past has rendered great services to the Empire. He approves of the refusal of the Government to prosecute Mr. Rhodes or to deprive him of his Privy Councillorship. "But," says Mr. Lecky, "what can be thought of the language of a Minister who volunteered to assure the House of Commons that in all the transactions I have described, Mr. Rhodes, although he had made a gigantic mistake, a mistake as great as a statesman can make, had done nothing to reflect upon his personal honour!" Mr. Lecky goes on to say that one of the chief elements of British power is the moral weight that it has behind it; it is the conviction that British policy is honourable, that the word of its statesmen and diploma tists can be trusted, and that intrigues and deceptions are wholly alien to their nature But although Mr. Lecky does not say so, his reference to Mr. Chamberlain shows that he has some suspicion of the fact that we have changed all that. No one can read the story of the scandal of the South African Committee without realising how absurd and even hypocritical Mr. Lecky's phrases must appear in the eyes of our neighbours, especially of the Dutch of South Africa.

Mr. Lecky concludes his paper on "The Statesman" by the cheery remark that after all deductions have been made it still remains true that there is a large party in England which carries into politics a sound common sense, and which places a just and righteous policy higher than mere party interest. It is on the power and pressure of this opinion that the high character of English government must ultimately depend. Passing on to the consideration of moral compromise in the Church, Mr. Lecky says that sacerdotalism in the Anglican Church is a worse thing than in the Roman Church, for it is undisciplined and unregulated. It is difficult to believe that serious dangers do not await the Church if the unprotestantising influences that are present within it continue to extend. If the Anglican Church ceases to be a Protestant church, it will no longer remain an established

The rest of the book is devoted to a series of dissertations upon such excellent themes for the moral essayist as the management of character, of money, marriage, success, time and death. There is a fine passage concerning the blessing of sleep, and despite the dictum of Solomon, Mr. Lecky holds that it is a wise thing for men to take the full measure of it which undoctored nature demands. The sluggard whose conduct is censured by the wise man is not the man who sleeps a long time, but is the man who does not get up when he wakes, but lingers long between the sheets, wasting time in pure idleness.

cho

Unl

doe

laid

It is

con

are

cate

lies.

ago

cha

the tale

All

one

dau

B

Mr.

are exp inn

wha inst

isla

66 L

mir

But

the nec

visi

fille

gre Mu

not

Vic

larg

seer

the

the sug

the 1

the

are dru

pro oth

<sup>* &</sup>quot;The Map of Life." By W. E. H. Lecky: (Longmans.)

Some Notable Books of the Month.

THE PROPHET AS NOVELIST.

MR. RICHARD WHITEING is a modern seer who has chosen to deliver his message in the guise of a novelist. Unlike many of his predecessors and contemporaries he does not believe that his mission is fulfilled when he has laid bare the faults and shortcomings of his own generation. It is not sufficient to point out, in a fashion that will carry conviction, that the trappings of our boasted civilisation are but filthy rags. Mr. Whiteing goes further, and indi-cates the narrow path along which the way of regeneration lies. "The Island" (Grant Richards, 65.), written years ago and now republished, is, like "No. 5, John Street," a charming story told with a delicate humour, which charms the reader while it makes him wince. But the story as a tale of human life I do not propose to touch upon here. All that it is necessary to say is that the novel contains one character comparable to Tilda in Victoria, the daughter of the Governor of "The Island."

Both in "No. 5, John Street" and in "The Island" Mr. Whiteing deals with the same problem. Both novels are professedly an attempt of a Person of Quality to explain the inner working of modern life to a simple and innocent people. The point of view, however, is somewhat different. In "The Island" the Person of Quality, instead of plunging into the vortex of the bustling life of our day, tries to escape its problems by flying to a tiny island in the midst of the Pacific. He, like the hero of "Locksley Hall," longs-

To burst all links of habit—there to wander far away On from island unto island at the gateways of the day.

In doing so he follows the first impulse of the human mind when confronted with a problem that appals it. But he quickly finds that even this speck on the face of the globe, inhabited by an idyllic community, is connected, though by slender ties, to the great world outside. It is protected by the Union Jack and is occasionally visited by a man-of-war. The simple inhabitants are filled with a reverent love of the Old Country. It is their great archetype of power, wisdom and beauty of life. Multiplying our means by their own yearnings, they naturally arrive at a colossal sum of good. Hence it was not surprising that this little community, ignorant of evil, should wish to remodel itself according to English ideas. Victoria appeals to the Person of Quality: :-

"Civilise us," she pleads. "Make us like England. Give us larger things to live for. Tell us what we must do. There must be something wanting, but I cannot tell what it is. It all seems so beautiful here—the shining sun, friends to love, p. ace, the singing, the sea, the very winds in the wood! Yet I know there must be something."

THE RELIGION OF INEQUALITY.

The Person of Quality thus appealed to proceeds to suggest what this "something" is. First of all he explains the necessity of inequality :-

Look at the beautiful gradation at home—an aristocracy for the fine art of life; a middle class for the moral qualities, which are not fine art, but only helps to it; a lower for the mere drudgery outside of both art and morals. The great mark of all progressive nations is that struggle of each man to make some other do his dirty work for him, which is commonly known as aspiration for the higher life. A few live in dignity, unhaste, affluence, and wear the fine flower of manners; but, to sustain the costly show, and help them so to live, the many give up all hope of these things on their own account, sometimes forming perfect castes, who do the dirty work from father to son, as others fill the office of Earl Marshal. This self-denying section has many names. Sometimes it is called the slave class; but "working" or "lower" class, or "sons of toil," is usually preferred, as being the politer and less descriptive term. They engage in all the malodorous tasks, to the end that the others may smell sweet, and accumulate porcelain, where the conception of beautiful living is in that somewhat rudimentary

"Bettering ourselves by making others worse!" exclaims the bewildered Governor. "Well—if you choose to put it that way," replies the Person of Quality.

THE GREAT PRINCIPLE.

Then again he explains how woefully unenlightened the islanders are :-

The great principle is not as I fear you imagine—that one man's best of service ought to count like another man's best, in respect of his right to the needful things of life, but that, on the contrary, each bit of human helpfulness should be weighed in the balance, and more pulding given to those whose morsel weighs most. The nice adjustment of the quantity of pudding to the nature of the service is our economic and indeed our moral ideal. We have long since given the requisite superfluity to our governors and other men of action; now the cry is, "More pudding to the seers;" and it is one of the most exhilarating cries of the day, in its evidence of our progress in true spirituality.

Victoria indignantly protests against a doctrine which deprives "the others" of their share. "These others are brothers," she exclaims. "Only by courtesy, I think you will find," calmly replies her instructor. "Brothers in Christ Jesus,' I believe is the exact term."

A CALLING FIT FOR A GENTLEMAN.

The island Church, too, he finds to be somewhat puzzling. There is no grade upon grade each enjoying more pudding than the one below, until with the highest we reach a tableland covered with acres of this delicacy. He explains how the Church has become a "prosperous house of business with a frontage in the best thorough-

Thus has a religion of humility been saved from its earlier accidental association with low life, and become a calling fit for a gentleman, until the middle and even the upper classes have not disdained it, nor professional investors of talent considered it unworthy of their regard. All its original difficulties as a creed of morbid self-denial have been cleared away by the beautiful modern development of the symbol. Is it awkward to watch and work for the needy, day and night? Well, wash their feet at Easter, and you may wash your hands of them for the rest of the year. In my travels I have seen an Emperor and an Archbishop condescending to this exercise, one quite busy with the scented water and the other at hand with the servicete of fine linen edged with lace. 'Tis a peppercorn rent of service and of compassionate deeds; and for this what generous holdings in the good things of life in park, moorland and forest, in palaces of splendour that open to no wayfarer without an introduction, yet are often symbolled for boundless hospitality by some pretty device. The symbol! the symbol! precious contrivance for effecting a true understanding between the tastes of a gentleman and the duties of a creed. . . . But where are you in all this? I ask, where is even you beginning of better things? What note have you of a living Church, when you have not so much as a great doctrinal contest to settle the metaphysical reasons for goodness before you begin to be good?

by his chapter to the hich at med of politics.

will be t in its

e Raid.

one of

y. He d influ to the

nment

Privy

can be volunall the hough

great ng to

Lecky

nts of behind

onour-

olomaptions

h Mr erlain

e have

of the

alising hrases

ally of n " by

been rty in nmon nigher

essure

nglish

o the h is a indis-

that npro-

tinue

be a ished

serta avist

iage.

con-

m of men

ature

d by

, but

but pure THE DREAD DAY OF DIVISION.

In comparing the simple, reverent attitude of these unspoiled peoples of the Pacific with the English Sabbath, Mr. Whiteing does not respect the Sunday finery which covers our week-day rags. He says :-

O my England, my England! why cannot I speak of a thing we must honour so? why rather do I pray for strength to keep the secrets of thy Sabbaths well? Dread day of the division of classes, weekly vision of the Judgment, in its utter separation of the social sheep and goats, never one flock at any time, but now so clearly two. In this dark hour of remembrance I hear the hoarse clappers of thy meeting-houses, vainly fanning the stagnant air in cities of the spiritual dead. I see the funereal processions of the elect, wending to or from the conventicles, past groups of coster boys, who wait for the opening of the houses and expectorate on the pavement in patterns of the dawn of decorative art. It is all before me, the dingy squalor of thy miles of shuttered marts, the crying contrasts of thy Sunday finery, more hurtful to the eye than thy week-day rags.

MAIN DRAINAGE ON THE COLONIAL SYSTEM.

The Person of Quality dwells much on the necessity for expansion. He advises the Governor to annex something and somebody "for their good and yours," and thus explains the process:—

You seize one place to-day, to make good your hold on another that you seized yesterday; and to-morrow you seize one place more for the same reason. It is a process known as "inevitable expansion"; and if only you follow it out logically it leads you all round the world."

"But where's the use?"

"It employs your young men and your bolder spirits; it doubles the wealth and the luxury of your capitalists; it leaves even a few more crusts from their table for your poor; and it provides a receptacle for your overflow of destitution when the crusts give out. In earlier days when this system of main drainage on the colonial system was almost unknown Nature had periodically to step in with a Black Death or a plague to clear the heaps of human refuse away."

"It seems rather a roundabout way, after all. Why not try to make 'em happy at home?'

"Well, my friend, you cannot argue about these things, you must feel them. Empire is an acquired taste."

HUGE RIVER PIKE IN BLACK AND WHITE.

The Person of Quality had fled from London because the world seemed "out of focus." In the quiet life of the Island he sees clearly the curse from which we are suffering. It is selfishness, or, as Victoria calls it, "greediness":—

Why this frantic scraping for useless currency? How much of peace comes out of it, how much of fineness of life? What are we when all is done—when we have added the hall in the country to the mansion in town? Have we found out the faintest inner meaning of one of the pictures on the wall, of one of the books on the shelf? Malheureux! Rushing away to our daily drive for more canvases, more bindings, more horses of swiftness, more furniture, in a word, and more dinner of the talled ox. The greed makes the hurry and the wasteful, idle hurry spoils the life. The grim set of our jaws, the thinly-veiled hardness of our eyes, even at the sacred hour of rest and relaxation! Verily, we are but huge river pike in black and white.

EVERLASTING NO. I.

What is Mr. Whiteing's cure for this evil? We have it summarised in one of Victoria's vehement protests against the arguments of her instructor when he is describing the beauties of a civilisation which has given us control of one-fifth of the globe:—

"All your plans seem to begin by taking something for yourself, everlasting No. 1; 'take, take,' take,' and so your world goes round. I wonder if it would not go round as well to 'give, give, give.' Think of others first; self is sure to get its turn. How would that be, I wonder? I do so wonder sometimes! Do the hardest thing first, and get that right, I do not think things can ever come right, unless you begin by giving up. Don't you think it is just as disgusting to make as much as you honestly can, as to eat as much as you honestly can? Why do you want to stuff so? Suppose you are cleverer than the others; well, be thankful you can do something more for them. That seems the natural way. Are you sure you haven't got a twist? I only ask. Why should brains be so greedy? All the harm in the world that I ever saw or heard of comes from greediness, gobbling. Give up, give up, give up. Oh, only that makes men different from pasturing brutes!"

SNAPSHOTS OF FRENCH HISTORY.

"THE MEMOIRS OF VICTOR HUGO" (Heinemann, Ios.) are, strictly speaking, no memoirs at all. They are snapshots of French history, and of men and women who have been famous in France and in Paris. Victor Hugo had a wonderfully keen eye for the striking incident or the clever epigram which summarised a situation or gave the gist of a speech. The book is, consequently, made up of brief passages jotted down by the great Frenchman from time to time. These do not make a diary, nor are they an autobiography. They are both, or rather the concentrated essence of both, and enable the reader to understand recent French history better than many a ponderous tome.

THE EXTREMES.

The volume opens with an account of the coronation of Charles X. at Rheims in 1825. It closes with the Franco-German war—the Terrible Year, as Victor Hugo has called it. Between those two dates we have a series of pictures of infinite variety, in which Victor Hugo himself is the connecting link with the events he describes. These jottings cover an immense field. Take the following paragraphs, for instance, to be found within a few pages of each other. One describes a scene in the revolt in Santo Domingo, the other an Easter daisy growing on the site of the old Vaudeville Theatre in Paris:—

The negroes, free, victorious, drunk, mad, paid not the slightest attention to the miserable forlorn group of whites. At a short distance two of them, with their knives between their teeth, were slaughtering an ox, upon which they were kneeling, with their feet in its blood. A little further on two hideous negresses, dressed as marchionesses, covered with ribbons and pompons, their breasts bare and their heads encumbered with feathers and laces, were quarrelling over a magnificent dress of Chinese satin, which one of them had grasped with her nails while the other hung on to it with her teeth. At their feet a number of little black children were ransacking a broken trunk, from which the dress had been taken.

How different is this other vision from the real:

How many things, how many plays that failed or were applauded, how many ruined families, how many incidents, how many adventures, how many catastrophes were summed up in this flower! To all those who lived upon the crowd that was nightly summoned there, what a spectre this flower would have been had it appeared to them two years ago! What a labyrinth is destiny, and what mysterious combinations there were that led up to the advent of this enchanting little yellow sun with its white rays. It required a theatre and a conflagation, which are the gaiety and the terror of 'a city, one of the most joyous inventions of man and one of the most terrible visitations of God, bursts of laughter for thirty years and whirlwinds of flame for thirty hours to produce this Easter daisy, the delight of a gnat.

THE SEATS OF THE MIGHTY.

Louis Philippe made Victor Hugo his confidant. Some of the King's remarks on this country and its

It is But Tril

inst

The

he

the vou

carr

inst

mu

rose let suffe

H

an a weight force state these on Field I than

me

Mi

M.

din insis a En

and spea with peo with loud yet to "F

vol Re pro is a ste wh into bee wa sur

Gov

institutions as recorded by his listener are interesting. The arrangement of the seats in the English Parliament he believed had a grave effect upon the foreign policy of the country. He said :-

vonder

ht. I gin by nestly leverer

more

re you be so ard of re up.

IOS.)

snap-

have

o had r the e the up of

from

they

con-er to iny a ation

the the

Hugo

series

Hugo

he

Take

ithin

e in daisy

re in htest

short were

their

esses,

pons,

s and satin, other little

h the

were how

p in was

have rinth

t led

h its

are yous

s of

ame

t of

ant.

its

Have you seen the English Parliament? You speak from your place, standing in the midst of your own party. carried away; you say more often than not what others think instead of what you think yourself. There is a magnetic com-munication. You are subjected to it. You rise (here the King rose and imitated the gesture of an orator speaking in Parliament). The assembly ferments all round and close to you; you let yourself go. On this side somebody says, "England has suffered a gross insult"; and on that side, "with gross indignity." It is simply applause that is sought on both sides—nothing more. But this is bad; it is dangerous; it is baleful. In France our Tribune, which isolates the orator, has many advantages.

MR. PITT'S LOWER JAW.

Of English statesmen Louis Philippe considered Mr. Pitt the greatest largely, if Victor Hugo may be believed, because of the weight of his lower jaw :-

Of all the English statesmen, I have known only one who was able to withstand this influence of assemblies. He was M. Pitt. M. Pitt was a clever man, although he was very tall. He had an air of awkwardness and spoke hesitatingly. His lower jaw weighed a hundredweight, hence a certain slowness which forcibly brought prudence into his speeches. Besides, what a statesman this Pitt was! They will render justice to him one of these days, even in France! M. Pitt knew French. To carry on politics properly we must have Englishmen who know French and Frenchmen who know English.

If this be so, one of the most practical peace measures that could be adopted would be the prompt rearrangement of the House of Commons, and the selection of Ministers whose lower jaws approach the ponderous dimensions of "M. Pitt's."

AS OTHERS SEE US.

Louis Philippe, however, was not without a shrewd insight into the true inwardness of things. The following is a reminiscence of one of his early visits paid to the English capital:-

Well, when you do go-for you will go-you will see how strange it is. It resembles France in nothing. Over there are order, arrangement, symmetry, cleanliness, well mown lawns, and profound silence in the streets. The passers-by are as serious and mute as spectres. When, being French and alive, you speak in the street, these spectres look back at you and murmur, with an expressible mixture of gravity and disdain, "French people!" When I was in London I was walking arm-in-arm with my wife and sister. We were conversing, not in a too loud tone of voice, for we are well-bred persons, you know; yet all the passers-by, bourgeois and men of the people, turned to gaze at us, and we could hear them growling behind us: "French people! French people!"

HOW HISTORY IS MADE.

Perhaps the most graphic word-pictures in the whole volume are those which relate the stirring events of the Revolution of 1848. Here we have a chronicle of the progress of the Revolution written from hour to hour. It is a curious picture of how history is made and decisive steps are taken. The following is the graphic account which Victor Hugo gives of the way the Republic came into being. The Provisional Government, which had been elected by acclamation in the Chamber of Deputies, was in session at the Hôtel de Ville. The populace was surging round the building :-

Under the dictation of terrible shouts outside, Lamartine traced this phrase :-

"The Provisional Government declares that the Provisional Government of France is the Republican Government, and that the nation shall be immediately called upon to ratify the resolution of the Provisional Government and of the people of

I had this paper, this sheet smeared and blotted with ink, in my hands. It was still stamped, still palpitating, so to speak, with the fever of the moment. The words hurriedly scribbled were scarcely formed. Appelie was written appellie.

When these half-dozen lines had been written, Lamartine handed the sheet to Ledru-Rollin.

Ledru-Rollin read aloud the phrase: "The Provisional Government declares that the Provisional Government of France is the Republican Government—"
"The word 'provisional' occurs twice," he commented.
"That is so," said the others.

"One of them at least must be effaced," added Ledru-Rollin. Lemartine understood the significance of this grammatical observation, which was simply a political revolution.

"But we must await the sanction of France," he said.
"I can do without the sanction of France," cried Ledru-

Rollin, "when I have the sanction of the people."

"Of the people of Paris. But who knows at present what is the will of the people of France?" observed Lamartine.

There was an interval of silence. The noise of the multitude without sounded like the murmuring of the ocean. Ledru-Rollin

"What the people want is the Republic at once, the Republic without waiting

"The Republic without any delay?" said Lamartine, covering an objection in this interpretation of Ledru-Rollin's words.
"We are provisional," returned Ledru-Rollin, "but the Republic is not!"

M. Cremieux took the pen from Lamartine's hands, scratched out the word "provisional" at the end of the third line, and wrote beside it "actual."

"The actual Government? Very well!" said Ledru-Rollin, with a slight shrug of the shoulder.

THE ORGY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

The following picturesque incident is one which a less minute observer would have failed to record. Some food with difficulty had been brought into the building for Lamartine, but there were no knives or forks procur-

"Pshaw," said Lamartine-" one must take things as they come!"

He broke the bread, took a cutlet by the bone, and tore the meat with his teeth. When he had finished, he threw the bone into the fireplace. In this way he disposed of three cutlets, and drank two glasses of wine. "You will agree with me that this is a primitive repast," he said; "but it is an improvement on our supper last night. We had only bread and cheese among us, and we all drank water from the same chipped sugar-bowl—which didn't, it appears, the great this company the great depolaries the great prevent a newspaper this morning from denouncing the great orgy of the Provisional Government!"

THE TERRIBLE YEAR.

There is not much about Napoleon III., for of the twenty years exile there is no record. We, however, get a few interesting glimpses of the Emperor when first he returned to Paris, and during the first few months of his presidency. Especially picquant is the description of the dinner he gave after his election to which Victor Hugo was invited as an honoured and distinguished guest. The fragments are resumed when the great exile returns to Paris after the fall of the Empire. Of the siege we have a curious record. Victor Hugo chronicles impartially the doings of his little grandchild, the progress of the siege, the growing lack of provisions, and the sale of his works.

The volume closes with the scenes which were enacted at the Assembly at Bordeaux and the death of his son Charles. The last words are: "I am broken with grie. and weariness. Blessings on thee, my Charles ! "

THE ROMANCE OF A MAD KING.

ROYALTY always has a fascination for the general reader. It possesses the attraction of the unknown. This natural curiosity is greatly increased when an element of romance is to be traced in the somewhat commonplace details of the every-day lives of royal personages. These reasons amply account for the popularity of Miss Frances Gerard's strange story of the life of the mad king, Ludwig of Bavaria (Hutchinson).

He was brought up in fatal ignorance of the value of money, and his tendency to dream was accentuated by the romantic surroundings of the castle of Hohenschwangaw, where the young king spent most of his early youth. This fatal conjunction proved his undoing. His position as monarch unfortunately made it possible for him to fulfil his dreams. As dream they were beautiful—as accomplished facts they clashed too harshly with the spirit of the age. To such a conflict there could be but one ending. Yet he was by no means lacking in kingly qualities:—

Just after his accession in 1864 he was described by an Austrian writer as "the most idealistic youth whom I have ever seen. The King's majestic appearance, his beautiful countenance, his romantic air, 'a Shelley on the throne'—and his extraordinary charm of manner gave him an interest which attached the people to him more than the acts of a good king would have done."

In early life Ludwig contracted a friendship which might have saved him, but unfortunately only urged him along the course which led to destruction. When he was only fifteen he heard "Lohengrin" for the first time. He was so enchanted that he immediately began studying the music and writings of Wagner. Before he had been king a month he had sent for the musician. Wagner's influence was in a certain sense due to his mysterious connection with that mythological kingdom which had from his boyhood taken such a powerful hold of the king's imagination. The people believed Wagner to be the young king's evil genius, but not until they were ripe for revolution would Ludwig agree that Wagner should leave Munich even for a time. Was Wagner to blame? Miss Gerard does not attempt to answer the question.

The book is filled with instances of King Ludwig's eccentric actions. One or two examples will suffice to indicate their nature. His vacillating temper and strange pranks were a source of continual anxiety to his family and Ministers. At his own request he was betrothed to his cousin, the lovely Duchess Sophie Charlotte. All was ready for the wedding. Even the ladies and gentlemen of the new Queen's suite were appointed. But the marriage never took place, and no explanation was ever given. He was wont to drive at breakneck speed, generally at night, either in an open carriage or in a sleigh with four, and sometimes six horses.

The King's passion for building, Miss Gerard thinks,

has been greatly exaggerated :-

During his twenty-two years of reign he built only thee castles. Of Neuschwanstein, Mennell says: "The Castle far suppasses any other building of modern times, and is the Walhalla of artistic minds." The decoration of the rooms shows the direction of the King's mind. Room after room is full of reproductions by the best artists of the heroes and heroines of Niebelungenlied. Tannhäuser appears constantly, as is only fitting, as we are here in his country, or at least on the spot where he dwelt. The hall of mirrors beats the record of Ludwig's splendid extravagance in its gorgeous display of mirrors and gilding. In this gallery there hung thirty-three golden lustres containing—guess how many candles?—two thousand five hundred.

Then follows the story of the approach of the dread malady. The Ministers were in despair, but their brutal announcement to Ludwig of his madness and consequent deposition is inexplicable. No wonder that a few days later the distracted King and his attendant were found dead in Starnberg Lake.

THE LIFE OF A SAILOR.

MR. FRANK T. BULLEN in "The Log of a Sea-Waif" gives what is virtually a biography of himself during the first four years of his sea-life. The narrative, as a narrative, is deeply interesting, but the thought which is ever present whilst following it is one of respect and admiration for the narrator. It seems almost incredible that a mere London gamin, the cuffed and abused ship's boy, should have been able to retain his personality through it all. Especially when we remember that Mr. Bullen was alone in the world, and that he had no one to whom to look for advice or counsel, must we be astonished at the development of the street urchin into a writer of such pure style and an author of such high repute.

The book itself depicts the life and the home of the sailor by one who has every right to speak with authority on such matters. As a rule landsmen are hopelessly ignorant of all that pertains to a mariner's life. To most of us "The Log of a Sea-Waif" will come almost as a revelation. We know of no other book, with perhaps the sole exception of "Two Years Before the Mast," which can compare for a moment with Mr. Bullen's work.

Mr. Bullen's vivid pictures of the infamous manner in which the sailors were fed, and the vile compounds from which they had to obtain sustenance, is at times almost In marked contrast to this is his account of gruesome. a French ship, in which, for less cost, the men fared sumptuously. For not only did they have bread, meat, and coffee, but the changes were rung daily upon haricot beans, lentils, vermicelli, and macaroni. Compare this with the "flinty outrage" on the name of food that is called Ship's Biscuit, the bad salt pork and beef, and the watery pea soup of the British sailor! But Mr. Bullen does not dwell too much on the hardships of life afloat; rather does he prefer to describe the wonders of the deep, or the various mishaps and adventures which fell to his share. In his wanderings during the four years described he managed to see a great deal of the world, and what he saw he has most faithfully reproduced. We are hardly surprised to read his account of the almost childlike confidence and absence of care for the future which was ever manifested by his shipmates.

To most people the way in which sailors are looked after ashore will come as a surprise. There seems to be no difficulty for them to get into comfortable homes, provided they can produce their discharge from a ship. Of course the crimps and the blacklegs swarm greatly, but a seaman can if he likes keep out of their clutches. Unfortunately the temptations they offer are but too often irresistible. Of course Mr. Bullen writes of a time several years ago, and no doubt things have altered since then. When in Australia, Mr. Bullen experienced, not for the first time, a longing to see the white cliffs of England once more. He says: "Why a homeless waif should thus love his native land I do not pretend to understand; but it is a solid fact, and one that has to be reckoned with, since I do not for a moment suppose that I am any different from the ordinary run of people."

Mr. Bullen is fortunate in securing the services of Mr. Twidle as the illustrator of his work. (Smith, Elder.

s. 6d.)

Chr

the alm ende pub in the

N

" P

volu

a m whi

thei

Cl.

seri

of v

this will volue print Manuer Lite we as a thing plis par only ext lear are vid the

Sto for ron mo Sto fron

It are the

de

we

GIFT-BOOKS FOR OLD AND YOUNG.

A GUIDE TO CHRISTMAS LITERATURE.

ONTINUING the change we made last year, we again publish reviews of the Gift-Books of the season in November instead of in December. Christmas has for the last few weeks been heralded by great numbers of books, of all sorts and kinds, whose chief apology for seeing the light is that they are Gift-Books for the Christmas season. The number of these books seems to increase year by year, and it is therefore safe to assume that the practice of giving books as Christmas presents is becoming more and more popular. This being the case, it is almost a necessity to have some sort of a guide to this vast library. In the brief reviews we print below we have endeavoured, so far as space permits, to give an idea of the chief features of some of the most attractive Gift-Books published this season. A few more reviews of the same sort of books will appear next month. The chief improvement in this year's books is their illustrations, which have never before reached so high a level.

I.—GIFT-BOOKS FOR ADULTS.

Messrs. J. M. Dent and Co. have just completed their "Plutarch's Lives" (1s. 6d. net per volume) in ten volumes of their Temple Classics. The ten volumes form a most useful addition to the series of the Temple Classics, which now are numerous enough to fill a bookshelf to themselves. It would be hard to imagine a better present to give at this season of the year than a set of the Temple Clasics or else of the Temple Dramatists, which latter series is equally to be recommended, though the number of volumes issued is not yet so great. The more books of this style that Messrs. Dent publish the more anxious will the public be for them to bring out additional volumes. For neatness of production and legibility of print it would be hard to find better books.

Messrs. Nelson and Sons have issued, as the first number of their "New Century" Library of Standard Literature, Dickens's "Pickwick Papers." In this volume we have the whole of Dickens's work set in large type and as readable as the print in the best library editions—all in the space of 6½ inches by 4½ inches, and half-an-inch thick! This apparently impossible feat has been accomplished by the use of India paper, the thinnest printing paper in the world, sixteen hundred pages of which are only 1 inch thick. The price of this series, which will include the works of Dickens, Thackeray, Scott and other standard novelists, is extremely moderate—in cloth extra, gilt, 2s. 6d. net; in limp leather, 2s. 6d. net; and in leather boards, 3s. net per volume. The reading public are under a great debt to Messrs. Nelson for thus providing them with standard books which they can carry in their pocket, and which will occupy little space on already overcrowded shelves.

This year, following on his King's and his Queen's Story Books, we are indebted to Mr. Lawrence Gomme for a splendid collection of historical stories from English romantic literature, illustrating the reigns of English monarchs from Harold to Victoria. In the "Prince's Story Book" (Constable, 6s.) we find many stories taken from Lord Lytton and Sir Walter Scott's works, while extracts from the works of many other well-known authors help to make the collection altogether admirable. It is a pity that the twenty-four illustrations in the book are not on a level with the descriptions of the scenes they depict.

Mr. Clark Russell gives us much that is interesting in his new book, "The Ship: her Story" (Chatto and Windus, 6s.); but however much we may enjoy the descriptions of the gradual development of the ship—till we have the huge liner where once was the galley, and the battleship takes the place of the tireme—our pleasure is more than doubled by the fifty really beautiful drawings of Mr. Seppings Wright. With such illustrations even the worst written book must succeed, and nobody can say that Mr. Clark Russell has not done his work well.

Encouraged by the success which attended their recent Biographical Edition of Thackeray's works, Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co. are now publishing "The Haworth Edition" of "The Life and Works of the Sisters Bronte" in seven monthly volumes. Mrs. Gaskell's. "Life of Charlotte Bronte" will form volume 7, and will have an introduction and notes by Mr. Clement K. Shorter—the introductions to the six first volumes are by Mrs. Humphry Ward. A novel feature in this excellent edition is the inclusion of specially taken photographs of places described in the works. These form an additional attraction to an edition which already has much to recommend it to the public. The price per volume is 6s.

II.-GIFT-BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

"The Red Book of Animal Stories" (6s.), edited by Andrew Lang, cr. 8vo., illustrated (Longmans). For this season Mr. Lang has given us another book of animal stories; and truly wonderful stories they are, ranging from the Mastodon to the Monkey, from the Griffin to the Greyhound. Anticipating the question, "Are your stories all true?" Mr. Lang confesses in a brilliant preface that they are not all true, for the Phœnix, at any rate, is never met with in any known part of the world; but he points out the difference between the scientific animals (whose bones are now stones) and the unscientific ones, like the Sea Serpent and the Fire Drake. It is comforting to find Mr. Lang admitting after all that there may be plenty of strange animals which scientific men have not yet dissected and called by long names-those, for instance, which have been remembered and called "Dragons." "For, if there were never any Dragons, why did all sorts of nations tell stories about them?" Mr. Lang says this is not altogether a scientific book, but there is much more that is true in it than in some other books he has published. He has had the assistance of others in collecting the stories; Miss Grieve supplied the stories about Foxes; M. Dumas supplied some about Bears, but as M. Dumas had "enough imagination for 13,000 living novelists," these may not all be true; but Mrs, Lang told most of the others, and these "are as true as possible." Finally, the moral of the book is to teach children "to be kind to all sorts and conditions of animals-that will let them." "Most girls are ready to do this," we are told, "but boys are apt to be unkind to cats." Like the "Arabian Nights" of last Christmas the volume this year

527

XUM

Waif" ing the
as a iich is e dread brutal

et and redible ship's onality at Mr. one to nished iter of

of the hority lessly most t as a os the which from lmost int of fared meat, aricot with called attery s not atther r the hare.

d he
t he urdly dlike
was mes, ship. atly, hes. too of a fs of waif l to be that

Mr.

der.

is splendidly illustrated in black and white by Mr. H. J. Ford. A specimen of these illustrations is reproduced below.

"The Courteous Knight," by E. Edwardson (Nelson, 3s. 6d.), a book of tales, charmingly adapted from Spenser and Malory. Mr. Edwardson has wisely made changes and alterations so that children can understand all the words used. Such an adaptation which brings the "Faerie Queen" to the knowledge and understanding of our young people is much to be commended. The great improvement which has lately taken place in the illustration of children's books is well maintained by Mr. Robert Hope, whose sketches are quite a feature of the book.

One of the most popular publications last year was "All the World Over," and it is followed this season by "Rag, Tag, and Bobtail" (Richards, 6s.). Our little folks will find again the clever sketches of Mrs. Farmiloe, which are, we think, even superior to her last year's work. There are in all thirty pictures printed in colours. They deal, as the title suggests, with incidents in the daily life of the most juvenile of street arabs, who in the back alleys and streets of London lead a life of their own, which it must be confessed lends itself splendidly to the artist's pencil. The verses are by Winifred Parnell. The coloured plates may be had separately by those desirous of framing them (2s. 6d. each).

(Reduced illustration from coloured plate in " Rag, Tag, and Bo'tail.")

desirous of framing them (2s. 6d. each).

"Singing-Time" (Archibald Constable, 5s.). Well known songs and rhymes set to music by Arthur Somervell. Each song is headed by a drawing from the pen of Leslie Brooke. A very well got up book which will doubtless be very popular. Sometimes the exigencies of space have compelled the compilers to place the verses where they cannot be seen when the music is being played, which is an unfortunate circumstance.

This year Golliwogg and his companions are at war! Fired by the reports in the newspapers, Golliwogg determines to go to war on his own account. He at first is troubled with whom to fight, but "Sarah Jane in accents clear" solves the difficulty. After weary prepara-

(Reduced from coloured plate in " The Golliwog; at War.")

tio

dis

Flo

by

Bu

lau thi ari

Ba bo Tl bo

on for th ag

fo

to T ta A bi pa th fo

th

e

Na Pwstiji (ootili (t

tions and forced marches they engage the enemy, with disastrous results. We reproduce in miniature one of Florence K. Upton's amusing coloured illustrations. The verses are by Bertha Upton. (Longmans, 6s.)

We have received a new edition of "Helen's Babies," by John Habberton, from Grant Richards (6s.). It would make a very charming present, as it is very cleverly illustrated and well got up. Of course the mirth-provoking qualities of Helen's Babies are now well known. But if there are any who have not yet enjoyed a hearty laugh over their exploits, they should certainly obtain this edition. It is made quite unique by Eva Roos' artistic drawings, of which there are no fewer than

"Fairies, Elves and Flower-Babies" (Duckworth, 3s. 6d.), by M. Wallace-Dunlop and M. Rivett-Carnac, consists of five stories of the doings of the little Flower Babies and the mischievous elves. A most charming book. The stories are told both by picture and by pen. The little folks could hardly find a more pleasing giftbook. Not only are the illustrations clever, but the text is well written and entertaining.

"The Odds and the Evens," by L. T. Meade (Chambers, 3s. 6d.). A lively account of a battle between two families, one called "the Evens" and the other "the Odds." The former consisted of four girls ranging from ten to fifteen; the latter of three boys and two girls of about the same age. These constituted the armies on either side, and during the engagement many adventures occur, including escapades with gipsies and others. The conflict rages for a year, at the end of which time the chief com-batants, Nina and Dark Rosaleen, declare themselves to be the greatest friends. Well illustrated by Percy

"The Boys and I," by Mrs. Molesworth (Chambers, 3s. 6d.), is a story which does not belie its author's reputation. The "I" of the title is a young tomboy called Audrey, and she tells the tale herself. She and her brothers, "the Boys," are left in England by their parents, and she recounts their varied experiences at their uncle Geoff's London Louse. Mrs. Molesworth is fortunate in securing for her identitions so ingenious a pencil as that of Lewis Daumer.

"Nancy's Fancies" (Chambers), a quiet little story of child-life, by E. L. Haverfie a, does not contain anything exciting, but reads very well. The title of the last chapter is "All's well that ends well."

We have also received from Mr. Chambers, "Princess and Fairy," by Lily Martyn, profusely illustrated (216 pp.), which in the form of a story gives useful information on all sorts of subjects, and "Mabel's Prince Wonderful," by W. E. Cule (2s. 6d.). Modelled somewhat on the lines of the late Rev. C. L. Dodgson's "Through the Looking - glass." little sketches by William G. Mein very well illustrate the tale and are one of the chief features of the book.

III.-GIFT-BOOKS FOR GIRLS.

Although there is little doubt that girls prefer, or, at any rate, generally read boys' books, there are quite a number of interesting and clever books written for them.

Amongst those we have received are-

"The King's Signet," by Eliza F. Pollard (Blackie, 3s. 6d.), which tells the adventures of a Huguenot family who, after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, were driven out of their château and eventually came over to England. There is a good deal said about William of Orange, and the book finishes with a description of the Battle of the Boyne.

"A Loyal Little Maid," by Sarah Tytler (Blackie, 2s. 6d., six illustrations). The loyal little maid, Peggy Malcolm, refuses to give information concerning the hiding-place of her father, who was concerned in Mar's Rebellion, and, as a consequence, is lodged in the county Tolbooth. Here she finds a boy champion, whom later she delivers from the danger of lifelong incarceration in the Bastille. The story ends happily for all concerned. "Priscilla," by E. Everett-Green and H. Louise Bedford (Nelson, 3s. 6d.). Priscilla is the somewhat hot-tempered but good-hearted daughter of a country clergyman. He is very strict, and his two daughters have been brought up in an old-fashioned sort of way. While of quite opposite natures they are very fond of each other. Their adventures and eventual marriages are described at length—chiefly on the lines that the "course of true love seldom runs smooth." There are some half-dozen illustrations.

"Light o' the Morning" (Chambers), by L. T. Meade, recounts the experiences of an Irish girl, Nora O'Shanaghgan, called by her father "Light o' the Morning." Her family, although living in a castle of some size, are very poor. She joins her brother in England, and they live together at her uncle's. The description of the feelings and behaviour of the wild Irish girl in her "tidy" surroundings is very well drawn.
"The Unjust Steward," by Mrs. Oliphant (Chambers, 3s. 6d.), a story of the mental battles of a Scotch minister, who, owing his great friend £300, made out to his executors that the sum was only £50, and was then told that all debts under £100 were cancelled. After five years' worry the minister resolves to pay up, and finds that he does not really owe the money. The chief interest of the tale centres in the doings of his daughter tail."

(Illustration from " Fairies, Elves and Flower-Babies.")

their didly

rnell.

those

Well

rthur 1 the

hich

ncies

erses

yed,

var!

vogg

first

e in ara-

Elsie, who eventually marries the fisher-lad whose friendship with her brother chum she so strongly resented. By that time, however, he is a well-known scientist. A brightly written story with some cleverly worked-out characters. Illustrated by J. Finnemore.

IV.—GIFT-BOOKS FOR BOYS.

The supply of new books for boys continues this year unabated. It even appears that they are more numerous than ever. Most of them are stories based more or less upon historic events, but tales of adventure, of travel, of discovery and of school-life also find their place in this widely read library. These books without exception are very well got up, and each year brings improvement in their illustrations

"In the Year of Waterloo" (Nisbet, 63.), Mr. O. V. Caine gives a graphic description of the rapid series of events from the time of Napoleon's escape from Elba down to the battle in which he was finally crushed. Taking as his heroes two young British-German youths, he weaves their story through all the stirring events of that time. He touches upon the secret spying and traitorous behaviour of some and the fidelity and steadfastness of others. There is a great deal of fighting, his heroes generally defending their own skins sometimes against Napoleon's friends and sometimes, his enemies. Napoleon himself is depicted more sympathetically and in a much more favourable light than usual. Most of the important men of the time are graphically described. The final chapter describes the Battle of Waterloo. The illustrations are especially good, and are by Chris

Mr. G. A. Henty shows again that he has in no way fallen off in his power of producing striking historic We have received from Messrs. Blackie and Son three more romances from his pen. There is no doubt that Mr. Henty has rendered great service by popularising history; and even if the exploits of his young heroes are somewhat impossible, everyone must admit his skill in weaving history with story, and fact with anecdote. Mr. Henty is also the editor of a book, "Yule Tide Yarns" (6s.), which we have received from Messrs. Longmans. It contains ten stories, all more or less of a warlike description, written by writers well known to our rising generation. There are forty-five illustrations well printed and In fact, the book is exceedingly well spirited.

got up.

The three books mentioned above (published by Blackie at 6s. each) are: "Won by the Sword," "No Surrender!" and "A Roving Commission." In the firstnamed Mr. Henty continues and completes the history of the Thirty Years' War which he commenced in "The Lion of the North." The present story is, however, a quite independent narrative. His hero is the young son of a Scottish officer in the French service. Hector Campbell -such is his name-is fortunate in securing the notice of Viscount Turenne, through whose influence he is given a staff appointment and many opportunities of distinguishing himself, which opportunities Hector, needless to say, accepts with alacrity. He becomes a colonel, and by placing Cardinal Mazarin under obligations to him secures his gratitude and protection, notwithstanding which he eventually has to flee the country.

In the second book "No Surrender!" Mr. Henty gives a vivid picture of the struggle which raged between the Vendéans and the forces of the French Republic. Leigh Stansfield, the son of an English squire, is in France at the time of the rising, and throws in his lot with the Vendéans. It is of his adventures as the leader of a band of scouts that the author writes.

"A Roving Commission" breaks rather newer ground. Mr. Henty has the field pretty well to himself in his graphic and picturesque story concerning the revolt of the negroes in Hayti. Recent tragic events in that island will doubtless add to its popularity. The hero is a midshipman in the British navy at the opening, and a commander at the close. This rapid promotion is set forth in the story amid all the daring exploits and hair-breadth escapes this favourite boys' author knows so well now to portray.

"Peril and Prowess," being stories told by G. A. Henty, G. M. Fenn, A. Conan Doyle, W. W. Jacobs, D. L. Johnstone, D. Ker, Andrew Balfour, C. R. Low, &c. With eight illustrations by W. Boucher (Chambers, 5s.). Boys will naturally be delighted at being able to have, contained in one book, so many stirring tales by such favourite writers. They tell of adventure by land and sea, of Redskin and Zulu, of Thug and Slave dealer, of freezing in Alaska and broiling on the Equator ! Those who prefer short narratives to long stories will hardly find anything better than this.

"A Vanished Nation" (Nelson, 5s.). A very spirited story by Herbert Haines. "The Vanished Nation" in question are the Paraguayans, who for a long time fought the allied forces of Brazil and Argentine, only to be eventually exterminated. Their Dictator Lopez is a cruel and absolute monarch and an abject coward. word is law, and the whole nation with a misplaced fidelity obeys his slightest word. If the Paraguayans were anything like the fighters Mr. Haines represents them to be it is no wonder they held out so long.

"Fix Bay'nets!" by G. Manville Fenn (Chambers), a graphic description of the warfare that goes on with the hill tribes of Northern India. The hero, Lieutenant Bracy, is an officer of a regiment recruited from the cockney class "who look fifteen or sixteen at most when -men with narrow chests and gaunt, angular bodies, who are nevertheless the pride of their colonel's heart. During the narrative they develop into steady reliable soldiers and fine shots. A private named Gedge is rescued by Bracy and attaches himself to the officer with a doglike devotion. Most of the hairbreadth escapes and adventures so stirringly depicted are encountered by these two in company.

"The Fellow Who Won" (Nelson, 3s. 6d.). Andrew Home, who is already well known as a writer of school stories, gives us a very clever description of the boys at Barford School. It starts with the adventures of the hero, Duncan, and his friends when about fourteen years old. There is then a break, and in the second half of the tale they are all seniors. Duncan is always in hot water and scrapes, a boy named Field, who is somewhat of a villain, helping to get him into trouble.

"Mobsley's Mohicans," by Harold Avery (Nelson, 3s. 6d.). The title hardly suggests a school story, but such it is. The chief characters in the tale are two boys called Fraser and Mobsley, and the narrator. They are dubbed "Mobsley's Mohicans," owing to taking upon themselves the names of Fenimore Cooper's characters during a period of intense excitement when the trio were sent to Coventry. Illustrated by J. H. Bacon.

"Wynport College," by Frederick Harrison (Blackie, 5s.). A story of a boy brought up at home, who goes to school and generally distinguishes himself in athletics. His learning, however, is not so brilliant. There is trouble about a boat-race, in which the oars have been tampered with. The conspiracies and shady dealings of some of their schoolfellows are found out by the hero and his friends, a camera playing a conspicuous part therein. Illustrations by Harold Copping.

Hay Hich Kevi Pa Nist Nor

Sand

Suth

Bull for Clen

Earl Earl

Gral Hag for tra

Rob

Sme

Wils

Alle Bage Brac

Bur

Cast

Fitz

Will Will

BOOKS RECEIVED.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |            | •                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |            |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------|
| BIOGRAPHY, ETC.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |            | Kent, C. B. Roylance. The English Radicals: an Historical Sketch.                                                                                                                                                                                                     |            |
| Westing, Gabrielle, John Hookham Frere and His Friends, med. 8vo.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | ,          | cr. 8vo. 451 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 7/6        |
| Miéville, Sir Walter, Under Queen and Khedive, cr. 8vo. 300 pp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 10/0       | Warner, G. T. A Brief Survey of British History. cr. 8vo. 278 pp.                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 3/6        |
| (Heinemann) Sergyeenko, P. A. How Count Tolstoy Lives and Works. Translated by Isabel F. Hapgood. l. cr. 8vo. 100 pp. (Nisbet) Smith, Geo., LL.D. Twelve Pioneer Missionaries. l. cr. 8vo. 304 pp. (Nelson)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |            | MISCELLANEOUS. (Blackie and Son)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 1/6        |
| Smith, Geo., LL.D. Twelve Pioneer Missionaries. l. cr. 8vo. 304 Pp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | - 16       | Augustinus Paul Ross: a Story of the Coming Reformation or Swo                                                                                                                                                                                                        |            |
| (Neison)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 7/6        | 125 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 1/6        |
| ESSAYS, BELLES LETTRES, ETC.  Bullen F. T. The Log of a Sea-Waif: being recollections of the first                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |            | 125 pp. Simpkin Marshall Ford, H. C. Thoughts in Many Minds on Animal Life. (Collected quotations.) cap. 8vo. 60, Whitcomb Street, W.C.) Hopkins, Ellice. The Power of Womanhood, or Mothers and Sons.                                                                |            |
| Bullen F. T. The Log of a Sea-Waif; being recollections of the first four years of my sea life. l. cr. 8vo. 349 pp(Smith, Elder) Clement, Clara Erskine. Saints in Art. with 33 illustrations, cr. 8vo.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 8/6        | Cr. 8vo. 192 pp (Wells, Gardner) Macaulay, Lord. Essay on John Milton, with Notes by J. H. Flather.                                                                                                                                                                   |            |
| 428 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 5/0        | M.A. cap. 8vo. 126 pp (C. J. Clay) Reynolds, Joan Berenice. The Teaching of Geography in Switzerland                                                                                                                                                                  |            |
| Earle, Mrs. C. W. More Pot Pourri from a Surrey Garden. med. 80c-Gran Pot. Survey. Survey. Gran Mrs. Grant Bellow.Gran Mrs. Grant Bellow. Grant Gran | 7/6        | cr. 8vo. 152 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 2/6        |
| Century, 2 vols. demy 8vo. 263 pp. and 279 pp. (A. and C. Black)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 34/0       | (Brandur Co., New York)Spencer, Fredk. A Primer of French Verse. cr. 8vo. 260 pp(C. J. Clay)                                                                                                                                                                  | 50 C.      |
| Century, 2 vols, demy 8 vo. 263 pp. and 279 pp. (A. and C. Black) Haggard, H. Rider. A Farmer's Year, being his Commonplace Book for 1895. With 33 illustrations. I. cr. 8 vo. 485 pp. (Longmans) net. Heckethorn, C. W. London Souvenirs. cr. 8 vo. 384 pp(Chatto) Lees, J. A. Peaks and Pines, another Norway Book. With 33 illus-                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 7/6        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 3/0        |
| Lees, J. A. Peaks and Pines, another Norway Book. With 63 illus-                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 6/0        | NEW EDITIONS.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |            |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 6/0        | Austen, Jane. Sense and Sensibility: Illustrated by Chris, Hammond cr. 8vo. 369 pp                                                                                                                                                                                    | 6/0        |
| Marholm, Laura. The Pyschology of Woman. l. cr. 8vo. 395 pp. (Richards)Robertson, J. M. Patriotism and Empire. cr. 8vo. 308 pp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 6/0        | (Deadley Bros.) net.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 1/0        |
| (Richards)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 6/0        | Haggard, Rider. The Last Boer War. paper cr. 8vo. 244 pp. (Kegan Paul)                                                                                                                                                                                                | 1/0        |
| Smeaton, Oliphant. English Satires. cr. 8vo. 298 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 3/6        | Plutarch's Lives (Temple Classics), cap. 8vo. Vol. 1X., 222 pp.                                                                                                                                                                                                       | -          |
| Wilson, Sarah. The Komance of our Ancient Churches. With hearty                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 6/0        | Vol. X., 284 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 1/6        |
| wilson, S. Law. The Theology of Modern Literature, Med. 8vo                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |            | 8vo. 305 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 1/0        |
| FICTION.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |            | POETRY.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |            |
| Allen, Grant. Twelve Tales. med. 8vo. 350 pp (Richards) Bagot, Richard. A Roman Mystery. cr. 8vo. 312 pp. (Digby Long)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 6/0        | Bridges, Robert. Poetical Works. Vol. II. cr. 8vo. 300 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                             |            |
| Bagot, Richard. A Roman Mystery. cr. 8vo. 312 pp. (Digby Long)Braddon, Miss M. E. His Darling Sin. cr. 8vo. 347 pp.(Simpkin Marshall)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 6/0        | Chester, Morley. Songs and Sonnets. cr. 8vo. 133 pp(Stock) Lenane, J. H. The Hill of Visions. cr. 8vo. 150 pp(Stock)                                                                                                                                                  | 6/o3/6 |
| Buscin C R The Bread of Tears or 8vo see pp (I Long)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 610        | Lindsay, Lady. The Apostle of the Ardennes. cr. 8vo. 161 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 5/0        |
| Cameron, Mrs. Lovett. A Passing Fancy. cr. 8vo. 325 pp. (J. Long) Castle, Egerton. Young April. cr. 8vo. 406 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 3/6        | Matheson, Annie. Selected Poems. cr. 8vo. 154 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 2/6        |
| Cobban, J. Maclaren. An African Treasure. cr. 8vo. 330 pp. (J. Long)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 6/0        | (Chatto)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 6/0        |
| De la Pasture, Mrs. Henry. Adam Grigson. 1. cr. 8vo. 444 pp.(Smith, Elder)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 0.2        | REFERENCE BOOKS.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |            |
| Fitzgerald, G. Beresford. Beyond these Dreams. cr. 8vo. 335 pp. (Digby Long)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 6/0        | Book Prices Current. Vol. XII. 1890. dy. 8vo. 745 pp. (Stock) netEncyclopædia Biblica. Vol. I. A-D. imp. 8vo. Edited by Rev.T. K. Cheyne and J. Sutherland Black. 1143 pp. (A. and C. Black)Pitman's Shorthand and Typewriting Year Book and Diary, 1900. | 27/6       |
| Gearey, Caroline. Rural Life; Its Humour and Pathos. cr. 8vo. 259 pp. (J. Long) Hayes, W. D. Mr. Boyton, Merchant, Millionaire and King, cr. 8vo.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 6/0        | Pitman's Shorthand and Typewriting Year Book and Diary, 1900.cap 8vo. 145 pp                                                                                                                                                                                      | 1/0        |
| 266 pp (Simpkin, Marshall)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 3/6        | Thompson, Wardlaw, and Johnson, Arthur N. British Foreign Missions. 1837–1897. (Victorian Era Series.) cr. 8vo. 233 pp.                                                                                                                                               |            |
| Hichens, R., The Slave. cr. 8vo                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 6/o3/6 | (Blackie)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 2/0        |
| Hocking, Joseph. The Scarlet Woman, cr. 8vo. 411 pp. (Bowden)Howarth, Anna. Sword and Assegai. cr. 8vo. 344 pp.(Smith, Elder)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 6/2        | RELIGIOUS.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |            |
| Kevill-Davies, A. The Girl Priest. cr. 8vo. 328 pp (Hutchinson)Mason, A. E. W. The Watchers. (Arrowsmith's Christmas Annual)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 6/0        | Benson, Archbishop. Prayers. cr. 8vo. 274 pp(Isbister) Bruce, A. B. The Moral Order of the World. med. 8vo. 431 pp                                                                                                                                                    | 3/6        |
| paper cr. 8vo. 106 pp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 1/0        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 7/6        |
| Nisbet, Hume. Paths of the Dead. cr. 8vo. 308 pp (J. Long)Norris, Frank. McTeague. cr. 8vo. 443 pp (Richards)Raymond, Walter. No Soul Above Money. cr. 8vo. 366 pp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 3/66/0 | Calcutta, Bishop of, "I Believe." cr. 8vo, 93 pp (R. T. S.)Cleary, Rev. H. W. The Orange Society. med. 8vo, 457 pp(Catholic Truth Society)Innes, A. Taylor. The Trial of Jesus Christ. A Legal Monograph.                                                 | 2/6        |
| (Longmans)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 6/0        | cr. 8vo. 123 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |            |
| Roberts, Morley. The Colossus. cr. 8vo. 325 pp(Arnold) Sandemann, Mina. Charming Miss Kyrle. cr. 8vo. 303 pp. [J. Long) Savile, Frank. Beyond the Great South Wall. cr. 8vo. 302 pp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 6/0        | cr. 8vo. 123 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 2/6        |
| Steuart, John A. Wine on the Lees. cr. 8vo. 347 pp. (Hutchinson)Sutherland, Lady M. One Hour and the Next. cr. 8vo. 307 pp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 6/0        | Rachel, G. The Son of God. dy. 4to. 136 pp. (E. Hughes and Co.)Romanism in the English Church. l. cr. 8vo. 108 pp. (Ch. J. Thynne) net                                                                                                                            | 6/0        |
| Sutherland, Lady M. One Hour and the Next. cr. 8vo. 307 pp. (Methuen) Turgenev, Ivan. The Diary of a Superfluous Man and Other Stories.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 6/0        | Williamson. The Great Law. A Study of Religious Origins. med. 8vo. 43x pp                                                                                                                                                                                             | 1/0        |
| Translated by Constance Garnett. cr. 8vo. 326 pp. (Heinemann) net.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 3/0        | SOCIAL.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |            |
| Williamson, Mrs. C. N. The House by the Lock. 1. cr. 8vo. 269 pp. (Bowden)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |            | Good Citizenship. A Book of Twenty-Three Essays by Various                                                                                                                                                                                                            |            |
| Williams, N. W. Greek Peasant Stories. cr. 8vo. 347 pp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 6/0        | Authors on Social Personal and Economic Problems and Obliga-                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 6/2        |
| Williams, N. W. Greek Peasant Stories. cr. 8vo. 347 pp. (Digby Long) Woollam, Wilfred. The Parson and the Fool. 1. cr. 8vo. 247 pp. (Downey and Co.)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |            | tions. Edited by Rev. J. E. Hand. cr. 8vo. 474 pp. (George Allen) Mackay, T. History of the English Poor Law. Vol. III. 1834-1898. med. 8vo. 617 pp                                                                                                                   | /-         |
| (Downey and Co.)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 3/6        | Mys, E. Researches in the History of Economics, cr. 8vo. 343 pp.  (A. and C. Black)                                                                                                                                                                                   | 15/0       |
| HISTORICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL. Douglas, W. S. Cromwell's Scotch Campaigns, 1650-51. med. 8vo.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |            | Wahar Adna Pamin Dh D. The Crowth of Cities in the Minetannth                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 0/0        |
| 308 pp. (Stock) Fitzpatrick, J. P. The Transvaal from Within, med. 8vo. 440 pp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |            | Century. A Study in Statistics. med. 8vo. paper. 495 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 14/0       |
| a map and a man        | 10         | Triname, 25, 26, and case for riotection, cr. ovo. 3,0 pp.                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 01.        |

ound.

olt of that ro is nd a s set hairs so

Low, bers, le to s by land lave tor!

rited
" in ught be is a
His

ers), the hant the

ular nel's ady dge icer

pes by

Mr. er of the ears the ater of a son,

but boys are pon ters vere

kie, es to tics. e is been s of and rein.

XUM

LEARNING LANGUAGES BY LETTER-WRITING.

NOW that the winter is coming on and in country towns entertainments are the order of the day, I Why not offer a suggestion to their promoters. get up one, and send the proceeds to the Homes for English Governesses, in such places as Paris or Berlin? Glancing over the Report of the Home for German Governesses in London, I am much struck by the contributions to its funds sent from various German towns Town Council of Kassel-so much; Town Council of Darmstadt, and so on. Talking once to the Secretary of Miss Leigh's Home in Paris, she said, with a despairing sound in her voice: "You see, our Home cannot be self-supporting, for those who have most need of our help are not the strong ones who can fight their own way in the world, but the poor creatures without a backbone who have always to depend upon some one else." Dr. Hartman writes of a sort of instructive entertainment which has lately been initiated in Leipzig. Professor Jouffret of Marseilles gave some French recitations, grave and gay, and afterwards the audience discussed in French the subjects selected for recitation. So much interest was taken that it was proposed that the Professor should go to other towns in Germany.

MAKING MEN.

It would be interesting to know how many of our readers have heard of the course of instruction given at Ruskin Hall, or realise that Oxford, that city of learning, culture, and enchantment, invites working men and artisans to join in its advantages. An American, Mr. Vrooman, is the founder of the hall, and its warden, Mr. Dennis Hird, will gladly answer inquiries. Briefly, this hall of residence has been opened for those who have not had the advantages of higher education, that such may have an opportunity of enjoying the pleasures of broader studies in history, sociology, political economy, English literature, etc. Its aim is to promote independent thinking, and, above all, to give students that knowledge necessary for intelligent citizenship. Its founders say: "We do not intend to encourage honest toilers to leave their class and become barristers, clergymen, military officers, etc., therefore we do not provide for the study of ancient languages, theology, or law. The making and 'polishing' of 'gentlemen,' or the creation of scholars is not our object. We will satisfy our modest ambitions by helping to make men, expecting the students when they finish their studies, to remain in their respective shops, factories, farms; to raise rather than rise out of the mass of their fellow-workers." This College for working men is practical. Lessons are given in book-keeping and modern languages; but it must not be costly, so the fee for board and lodging is 10s. per week, and as this would not pay for service, the students must cook and clean. Tutor's fees are 10s. per month, but foreigners who need special English lessons have to pay a double fee. Thus £31 covers the cost of a year of the fullest intellectual life. There are no vacations, and a student may enter for one month only. Women cannot reside, but may attend lectures. It is said that some students take the afternoon, when no lectures are given, for a money-earning time, and as gardeners, or in mechanical labour, gain the needed funds. To the hall of residence is joined a correspondence department, for the promotion of systematic reading and study for those who cannot leave their daily labour; and Extension Courses at a much less cost than the usual University Extension Lectures. What would many an intelligent artisan of thirty years ago have said to this ideal scheme, which, by the way, is an old, old one in Scotland? The hurry and rush of this engrossing present life, with its tendency to superficiality in everything, makes the chance of such a "Retreat" all the more welcome.

A DUTCH AND A RUSSIAN REQUEST.

Professor Grasé writes from Amsterdam as follows:—
I send you a long list of students, boys and girls about seventeen to eighteen, and should be very glad if a lively correspondence were to spring up with this centre. English people are fairly well acquainted with France, and very often with Germany, Switzerland and B-lgium. But Holland, owing to its language and often unattractive scenery, is almost a terra incognita. Hotel-keepers and railway companies do not insert puffing advertisements in English papers, and the tourist passes our doors; so the world goes on merrily or sadly, and we play the part of lookers-on. You know what they see. We can hardly flatter ourselves that we contribute an appreciable quota to "make things hum," but our position has its advantages. There are few systems or experiments tried around us that do not come down to us, and our percentage of illiterates is fractional.

Moscow, October, 1899.

Dear Sir,—I am master at a commercial school near Moscow, and have had the unhappy idea of giving my pupils some volumes of the Review of Reviews to read. As well might have been expected, my pupils, after perusing the various articles, became very eager to know if they could partake in Learning Languages by Letter-writing, and urgently requested me, or I should say forced me to apply to Mr. Stead to help them in the matter. They are boys from sixteen to twenty years of age, having some knowledge of the French, German, and English languages, mathematics, history, geography, science, etc., and what they want is correspondence with English boys. As to plan of letters, that could be easily arranged according to the special needs of the writers.

NOTICES.

Some young Danes are still waiting for correspondents. Would any German lady living in the West of London exchange lessons with an Englishwoman?

A Dutchman interested in the State railways would like an English correspondent.

As mentioned before, many Amsterdam lads and lasses would like to exchange letters with English students. The correspondence would at least be lively and interesting just now.

The boys of a school near Moscow are also eager to correspond in English, French, or German. The professors in French Lycées for girls do not

The professors in French Lycées for girls do not generally like their pupils to discuss politics and religion, on the ground that their ideas are generally immature and may only cause friction.

As regards adults, one shilling should accompany application, age and occupation should be mentioned, and a postcard should be sent on receipt of first foreign letter. In no case can a speedy introduction be promised.

Several French professors are willing to receive English boys who know something of French. The head of the Toulouse division will arrange for any boy of sixteen pupil teacher, or preparing to teach, in the training schools under his direction. Such English boy to pay a fee of £20 and give one hour's teaching per diem. The same advantages may be obtained at Limoges or Nontron, but younger boys are taken.

52

Ph

Su

Ke

Ha

Tie

Son

Sir

Th

Sir

Wa

Ax

Kn

Suj

Son

No

Sce

Ide

1G.

san of ich, by y and ncy to uch a s :-sevenspondple are rmany, nguage ognita. puffing es our lay the hardly ota to There come oscow, some might arious ike in uested help wenty raphy, nglish anged lents.

vould asses lents.

er to not gion, ature

pplind a etter.

teen ning ay a The s or ension

899.

rman.

ndon

and glish f the

ART IN THE MAGAZINES.

Architectural Review .- Effingham House, Arundel Street.

Photogravure :- "Exchange Court, Strand," after F. L. Emanuel.

The Ivories in the Louvre and Cluny Museums. Continued. Illustrated. E. Molinier.

Celtic Illuminated Manuscripts. Illustrated. J. A. Brunn.

Art Annual.-H. VIRTUE. 2s. 6d. The Life and Work of Peter Graham. Illustrated. W. M. Gilbert.

Supplements :- "Ribbed and Paled In with Rocks Unscaleable and Roaring Waters," "Caledonia Stern and Wild," and "Sea-Worn Rocks."

Art Journal.—H. VIRTUE, 18, 6d. Nov. Engraving:—" Elsie," after Ellis Roberts. Ellis Roberts, Portrait-Painter. Illustrated. Fred. Miller. Kenmore and Taymouth Castle. Illustrated. Rev. Hugh Macmillan.

Handicraft and the Life of the Craftsman. E. F. Strange. Tiepolo, Venetian Master. Illustrated. Carew Martin. The Decorations of the Royal Societies Club. Illustrated. A. L. Baldry.

Some Rare Old Pewter. Illustrated. Continued. R. Davis

Art Journal Jubilee Series .- H. VIRTUE. 15. 6d. Part 10. Sir John Tenniel. Illustrated. Arthur à Beckett. The Sacred Island of Philæ. Illustrated. G. Montbard. Sir W. B. Richmond. Illustrated. A. Higgins. Was Mary Stuart Beautiful? Illustrated. R. Davey. W. Q. Orchardson. Illustrated. J. Stanley Little.

Axel H. Haig, Etcher of Architecture. Illustrated. C. Lewis Table Decorations. Illustrated. Miss R. C. Gill.

Knives, Spoons, and Forks. Illustrated. A. Vallance.
Supplements:—"The Beefeater," after Sir J. E. Millais;
"Hard Hit," after W. Q. Orchardson.

Artist .- Constable. 15. Oct. C. W. Bartlett and His Work. Illustrated. P. G. Konody. Some Beautiful English Pottery. Illustrated. Ightham Mote. Illustrated. A. J. I. Four Pictures by Fred. Mayor. Illustrated. Nottingham Lace. Illustrated. I. B.

Cassell's Magazine.—Nov.
Scene-Painters and Their Art. Illustrated. Frederick Dolman.

Century Magazine.-Nov. The Making of a Mural Decoration. Illustrated. Royal Cortissoz.

English Illustrated Magazine.-Oct. Cosway; the Macaroni Painter. Illustrated.

Girl's Realm .- Nov.

Some Famous Artists as Girls. Illustrated. Mrs. Sarah A. Tooley. Good Words .- Nov.

William McTaggart. Illustrated. Edward Pinnington.

Harper's Monthly Magazine.-Oct. John W. Alexander. Illustrated. Armand Dayot.

House .- "QUEEN" OFFICE. 6d. Oct. The National Art Competition. Illustrated. Napoleon in Pot. Illustrated. Bric-à-Brac.

"Empire" Furniture. Illustrated. Continued. Connoisseur. Irish Ecclesiastical Record.-Oct. Idealism and Realism in Art. Rev. M. Cronin.

Leisure Hour.-Nov.

Thomas Barker of Bath; a British Painter's Travels in the Last Century. Illustrated, E. Harrison Barker, Ludgate.-Nov.

Some Great French Painters of the Day. Illustrated. A. de Burgh.

Magazine of Art-Cassell. 18. 4d. Nov. Frontispiece:—"Pilchards," after C. Napier Henry.
The Work of C. Napier Henry. Illustrated. Arthur Fish.

Design in Linen Damask. Illustrated. G. Trobridge. The Van Dyck Exhibition at Antwerp. Illustrated. Lionel Cust.

Decorative Art at Buckingham Palace. Illustrated. F. S. Robinson.

Joan of Arc in Art. Illustrated.

The Picture Sales of the Season. Illustrated. Recent Acquisitions at Our National Museums and Galleries. Illustrated. E. F. Strange and Others.
The Cromwell Statue by W. Hamo Thornycroft. Illustrated.

Exhibition of the Arts and Crafts Central School. Illustrated. A. Vallance.

Manchester Quarterly.—Oct. Masaccio; "Hulking Tom." W. Noel Johnson.

New England Magazine.-Oct. Cyrus E. Dallin, Sculptor. Illustrated. William Howe

Nineteenth Century.—Sampson Low. 28. 6d. Nov. The Van Dyck Exhibition at Antwerp. Claude Phillips.

North American Review .- Oct.

The Picture Gallery of the Hermitage. Claude Phillips. Pall Mall Magazine.-Nov.

Suppressed Plates. Continued. Illustrated. George Somes Layard.

Pearson's Magazine.-Nov. The Art of the Age. Continued. Illustrated.

Poster.—175, Fleet Street. 6d. Oct.
Tom Browne's Art Days. Illustrated. M. Yendis. The Art of Mucha. Illustrated. W. S. Rogers. German Posters, Illustrated, F. Cutler, "Grocery" Poster Gallery, Illustrated, L. Hornby. French Posters. Illustrated.

Quarterly Review .- Oct.

Leonardo da Vinci. William Morris.

Reliquary.-Oct.

Antiquities from Palestine. Illustrated. George F. Lawrence. Notes on Benin Carvings. Illustrated. Richard Quick.

Scribner's Magazine.-Nov.

American Society and the Artist. Aline Gorren. Strand Magazine.-Nov.

A Peep into Punch, 1895-1898. Illustrated. John Holt Schooling.

Studio. - 5, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN. 18. Oct. Pietro Fragiacomo. Illustrated. Isabella M. Anderton. Sketches by Puvis de Chavannes. Illustrated. Gabriel Mourey. Gerald Moira's Stained Glass Designs. Illustrated. On the Slope of a Southern Hill (in the Pyrenees). Illustrated.

Mrs. Stanhope Forbes. Alterations and Additions in a House in Glasgow. Illustrated.

Horace Townsend.

British Decorative Art in 1899 and the Arts and Crafs Exhibition. Illustrated. A. Vallance.
Supplements:—Two Paintings after P. Fragiacomo; "The Rhine-Maidens," after Charles Robinson; "Marie," after Mrs. Stanhope Forbes.

Womanhood.-Oct. Madame Le Brun; a Great Woman Artist. Illustrated. Miss C. J. Hamilton.

Rosa Bonheur; Her Life and Work. Miss C. J. Hamilton.

LIST OF THE LEADING CONTENTS OF CURRENT PERIODICALS.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN.

American Historical Review .- MACMILLAN. 38. 6d. Oct. The Ballot and Other Forms of Voting in the Italian Communes. Arthur Maryland's Adoption of the Federal Constitution. Bernard C. Steiner.

Contemporary Opinion of the Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions. Frank
M. Anderson. The Unit Rule in National Nominating Conventions, Carl Becker.

Anglo-American Magazine .- Bream's Buildings, Chancery Lane.

1s. Oct. The Alaskan Boundary Line. With Map. David Glass.
The German-American. Edwin Ridley.
The Palisades, New York. Illustrated. Rev. Ashbel G. Vermilye.
Sir Thomas Lipton and the Cup. John R. Henchy.
A Visit to Brazil. Alden Bell.
A South American Alliance? Editor.

Antiquary .- ELLIOT STOCK. 6d. November. The Founding of St. John's College, Cambridge. Mrs. Clay Finch.
The Captive King John of France. J. J. Britton.
Burial-Grounds of the London Quakers. Illustrated. Mrs. Basil Holmes.
Ancient Kentish Settlements in the Northern and Midland Counties. T. W.

Workers in Wood. Mrs. Isabel Suart Robson. Architectural Review .- Effingham House, Arundel Street. 18. Oct.

Attainable Ideals. Continued. Illustrated, James A. Morris.
Horham Hall, Essex. Illustrated, J. C. Paget.
The Tripoil Megalitis. Concluded. Illustrated. H. S. Cowper.
The Round Church, Cambridge. Illustrated. L. N. Badenoch.
An Egyptian Palette. Illustrated. Dr. J. Leicester.
The Baptistery of St. John, Florence. Illustrated. C. G. Leland.

Badminton Magazine.-Longmans, 18. Nov. The Zebrule: a Painted Mule. Illustrated. R. B. Townshend. The Gentle Art Modernised. Harold Macfarlane. Autobiography of a Fox-Hound. Illustrated. Frederic Adye. Dames Chasseresses. Isabel Anstruther Thomson. Creatures of the Night. Illustrated. F. A. W. Bees. Grouse-Driving. Illustrated. A. Gathorne Hardy.

Bankers' Magazine.-Waterlow and Sons. 18, 6d. Nov. Rise in the Value of Money, Competition and Touting amongst Banks. The Deficiency in the Post-Office Savings Banks' Balance Sheet.

Bibliotheca Sacra. - KEGAN PAUL. 75 cents. October. Bibliotneca Sacra.—Kegan Paul., 75 cents. October.
Theodore Dwight Woolsey. With Portrait. Jacob Cooper.
Rupprecht on the Pentateuch. Samuel Colcord Bartlett.
Is Paul a Competent Witness? Edw. F. Williams.
Two German Hymns by Luther and Gerhardt; German Hymnody of the Reformation. Edwin W. Bowen.
Government and Atonement. Archibald Eugene Thomson.
Idea of Salvation as presented in the New Testament. Frank Churchill Woods.

Letters of John McLean to John Teesdale, W. Salter. The Philippine Question, Z. Swift Holbrook. America and the Far East. William Byron Forbush.

Blackwood's Magazine.—BLACKWOOD. 28. 6d. Nov. Some Maxims of Napoleon. Lieut.-Col. G. F. R. Henderson. Byron—to 1816. G. S. Street.

On Service in the Uganda Protectorate. Capt. Neill Malcolm.

A New Carriage on the Old Bath Road. Major Arthur Griffiths.

Vavau; a South Sea Arcady. Mrs. A. S. Boyd.

Siberian Adventure. The New Australian Commonwealth and the Privy Council. Harold G.

Under the Beard of Buchanan.

The Transvaal Twenty Years Ago. Gen. Sir Henry Brackenbury.

Board of Trade Journal.-Eyre and Spottiswoode. 6d. Oct. Effect of the Trade of French Guinea on the Trade of Sierra Leone and Great Britain. The Treaty Ports of Corea

Trade of Nicaragua in 18,8.

Bookman,—Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. Oct.

"The Leke of Gaube;" Poem. A. C. Swinburne.

"The Luck of Vespie Towers;" Poem. Theodore Watts-Dunton.

Mrs. M. E. Mann; a New Writer. With Portrait.

Library of Famous Literature; "Infinite Riches in Little Room." With J. A. Shorthouse; the Author of "John Inglesant." With Portrait.

Bookman .- (AMERICA). DODD, MEAD AND Co., NEW YORK. 25 cents.

Dr. Charles W. Doyle; the Author of "The Taming of the Jungle." With Portrait. George Hamlin Fitch. The First Books of the Tennysons. Illustrated. Luther S. Livingston. New York in Fiction. Illustrated. Continued. Arthur Bartlett Maurice. Notes on English Style in the Victorian Period. Dr. W. Robertson Nicoll.

Canadian Magazine. - ONTARIO PUBLISHING Co., TORONTO.

CARRAUGH MARGAZHIR.—ONTARIO FUBLISHING CO., TORON 25 cents. Oct.
In Defence of Millionaires. Prof. Adam Shortt.
Present Condition of Jamaica and Jamaicans. T. H. MacDermot. The Bahamas. Illustrated. E. B. Worthington.
The Charms of Bermuda. Illustrated. Byron Nicholson.
The People of Parliament Hill. Chas. Lewis Shaw.

Captain.-George Newnes. 6d. November Jules Verne at Home. Illustrated. Adolphe Brisson. Public School Cadet Corps. Illustrated. Arthur J. Ireland. Cassell's Magazine.-Cassell. 6d. Nov.

The Romance of Lock-Making. Illustrated. M. Randal Roberts, Some Curious Relics of Old London. Illustrated. W. W. Hutchings. Tea-Planting, Illustrated. Raymond Blathwayt, Originals, Illustrated. J. Etheridge Collett. London Night by Night. Illustrated. Continued. Famous Battleships. Illustrated. A. Sieveking.

Cassier's Magazine. -33, Bedford Street, Strand. 18. Oct. The Lake Superior Iron Ore Mines. Illustrated. Jeremiah Head and Archibald P. Head. R

Archibald P. Head.
Aluminium Manufacture in Great Britain. Illustrated. E. Ristori.
Storage Batteries versus Electric Isolated Plants. Alton D. Adams.
The Increasing Size of Steamships. Illustrated. Herbert C. Sadler.
Nickel Steet versus Mild Steel Boller Tubes. Illustrated. A. F. Yarrow.
Condensing Plants for Factory Purposes. Sir Alfred Seale Haslam.
Triple Screws for Warships. Illustrated. Rear-Adm. George W. Melville.
Compressed Air, Electricity and Steam for Mining Purposes. W. E. Compressed ... Garforth.

Century Magazine.-MACMILLAN. 18. 4d. Nov. Oliver Crowell. Illustrated. John Morley.
Verses written in a Copy of Shakespeare. James Russell Lowell.
Wagner from behind the Scenes. Illustrated. Gustave Kobbe.
My Début as a Literary Person. Mark Twain.
The Forgotten Millions. With Portraits. C. W. Eliot.
Sailing Alone around the World. Continued. Capt. Joshua Slocum.
Military Preparedness and Unpreparedness. Theodore Roosevelt.

Chambers's Journal .- 47, PATERNOSTER Row. 7d. Nov. The Decline of Oatmeal Porridge. Banking Anecdotes and Incidents. A Naturalist's Experiences on the Amazon. A. E. Pratt. The True English Death-Rate. Salmon for Food and Salmon for Sport. Augustus Grimble. The Marbles of Ireland. Poteen-Hunting in the Wild West of Ireland.

Christian Quarterly .- 73, LUDGATE HILL. 50 cents. Oct. Study of the Bible; a New Vocation. Herbert L. Willett.
Education and Missions. W. P. Aylsworth.
The Ethical Significance of the New Commandment, W. T. Moore.
Theory or Evidence—Which? Frances M. Bruner.
Ministerial Associations of the Disciples of Christ in Eastern Ohio. F. M. Green, Green.

The Strength and Weakness of Protestantism. J. M. Lowe.
William Kimbrough Pendleton. W. T. Moore.
The Proverbs of Solomon; Translation.
Childhood and Manhood; or the Law of Physical and Spiritual Development. W. T. Moore.

Church Missionary Intelligencer.—Church Missionary Society.

A Threefold View of Islam. Dr. H. U. Weitbrecht. Foreign Missions at the Church Congress. J. D. M.

Church Quarterly Review .- Spottiswoode. 6s. Oct.

Rivington on the Roman "Primacy," 430-451, The Philosopher as Patriot. Dr. Briggs's Introduction to the Study of Holy Scripture. West African Problems. The Dean of Christ Church on Hooker and the Puritans. Prof. Earle on Dante's Earthly Paradise. M s. Oliphant's Life and Letters. The Letters of R. Browning and Elizabeth Barrett Barrett. Authority and Archæology. Dean Liddell. Galton's Message and Position of the Church of England. The Decision on Incense and the "Hearing" on Reservation. Classical Review.—David Nutt. 2s. 6d. Oct.
The Ancient and Modern Vulgate of Homer. T. W. Allen.
The Minor Works of Xenophon. Concluded. Herbert Richards.

Climate,—Simpkin, Marshall. 6d. Oct.
Across Africa; Interview with F. S. Arnott. Illustrated.
A Holiday in the Japanese Alps. Illustrated. Rev. W. Weston.
Climate and Travel in Labrador. Illustrated. W. T. Grenfell.
House-Building in Tropical Africa. Illustrated. A. H. Nye.

Contemporary Review.—Isbister and Co. 2s. 6d. Nov. The British Power in South Africa. Sir Charles Warren. Glencoe, Elandslaagte, Mafeking. An Old Campaigner in South Africa. The Cause of the War. Percy A. Molteno. The Lambeth "Opinion" and its Consequences. Canon Knox Little. After the Dreyfus Case. L. Trarieux. Commercial Corruption. Sir Edward Fry. The Historical Congress at Cividale. Thomas Hodgkin. "The Silence of God." Robert Anderson. The Primæval Language. Charles Johnston. Old Crimean Days. Sir Edmund Verney. Christian Dogma and the Christian Life. Prof. A. Sabatier. The Teaching of English Law at Harvard. Prof. Dicey.

Cornhill Magazine.—Smith, Elder. 1s. Nov.

Cornhill Magazine,—SMITH, ELDER.
An Editor and Some Contributors. James Payn.
South African Reminiscences. Sir John Robinson.
George Borrow. Miss Jane H. Findlater.
A Cooking Memory. Lady Broome.
Links with the Past.
In Years of Storm and Stress. Karl Blind.
A Visit to Longwood.
Conferences on Books and Men. Urbanus Sylvan.

Critical Review.—SIMPKIN MARSHALL. 1s. 6d. Oct.

Prof. Margoliouth's The Origin of the "Original Hebrew" of Ecclesiasticus. Prof. S. Schechter.

Rev. J. Parker's The Works of Dionysius the Areopagite. Rev. David M. M'Intyre.

Prof. Campbell's Religion in Greek Literature. Dr. J. L. Salmond.

Prof. Köstlin's Christliche Ethik. Principal D. W. Simon.

Prof. Orelli's Aus Schrift und Geschichte. Prof. J. G. Tasker.

Dial.—315, Wabash Avenue, Chicago. 10 cents. Oct. 1. French Poetry and English.

Oct. 16.
The New Patriotic Impulse,
The Study of English in Germany.

With con. urice. Nicoll.

inson.

d and

ct.

row.

lville. V. E.

. M.

ETY.

Dublin Review.—Burns and Oates. 6s, Oct.
St. Cyr; a Great French Convent-School before the Revolution. Mme. La Comtesse de Courson.
The Oxford Movement. Edmund Jackson.
The Renascence of Catholicism in France. D. Moncrieff O'Connor.
Physical Science v. Matter and Form. Rev. C. Aterne.
The Abbot Tosti. Rev. Bede Camm.
Robert Aitken. Bishop Brownlow.
Ledand and the Farče Islands. A. Clarke Little.
The Making of French Literature. Rev.W. H. Kent.

Economic Review.—RIVINGTON. 38. Oct.
The Socialist Ideal. Sydney Ball.
Pioneers in Housing. Lettice Ilbert.
Economics in Russia. S. Rapoport.
The Licensing Commission. Dr. T. C. Fry.
Socialism in West Ham. Rev. U. Legge.
The New Liverpool Bye-Laws Regulating Street-Trading. H. Chaloner Dowdall.

Edinburgh Review.—Longmans. 6s. Oct.
The Blue and White Niles.
The November Meteors.
Old-Age Relief.
Some Tendencies of Prose Style.
Bismarck.
The Anglo-Indian Novelist.
The Inns of Court.
The Inter Lord Selborne as a Statesman.
Connemara.
Saint Vincent de Paul.

Great Britain and South Africa.

Educational Review.—11, LUDGATE HILL. 4d. Oct.

Some New Ethical Conceptions in Their Bearing on Education. James Sully.

Some of the First Steps in History for Young Children. Maria E. Findlay. Memory as an Element of Character. Lewis Sergeant.

The Method of Discovery. Edith Ailken.

National Education in Sicily. Irene Vespré.

Educational Review.—(AMERICA.) J. M. DENT. 18. 8d. Oct. Philosophy at Oxford. F. C. S. Schiller. Historical Development of School Reading-Books. R. R. Reeder. Minor Problems of the School Superintendent. Frank A. Fitzpatrick. A New Revival. Andrew F. West. The Harvard Reform in Entrance Requirements. Albert Bushnell Hart. Educational Journalism; an Inventory. C. W. Bardeen. Some Criticisms of the Kindergarten. Nicholas Murray Butler, Educational Times.—85, Farringdon Street. 6d. Oct. Encyclopædic Colleges. Prof. Foster Watson. A Visit to Naäs. C. S. B.

General Culture. Somerset Bateman.
 Science Teaching and Inspection. Dr. Wormell.
 The Lines of Future Progress in Secondary Education.
 Rev. G. C. Bell.

Engineering Magazine.—222, STRAND. 18. Oct.

England, America, and Germany as Allies for the Open Door. John Barrett.

The Development of German Ship-Building. Illustrated. Rudolph Haack. Standardising in Engineering Construction. Sir Benjamin C. Browne.

The Revolution in Machine-Shop Pract ex. Illustrated. Henry Roland. Works Management for the Maximum of Production. J. Slater Lewis. Electric Power in Engineering Works, Illustrated. Louis Bell.

The Outlook in the American Iron Industry. Archer Brown.

The Use of Steam in Auxiliary Machinery for War Ships. Illustrated, J. K. Robison.

Engineering Times.—2, Great Smith Street, Westminster. 6d.
October.
The History and Development of Motor Cars. Continued. Blustrated.

W. Fletcher.
Modern Locomoti e Practice of the World. Illustrated. Herbert Parker and Jas. Horsfall.

The Theory and Construction of Ball Bearings. Illustrated. W. H. Hale. The Prospects of Shipbuilding in France. Edward Conner.

English Historical Review.—Longman. 5s. Oct.
The Early History of Babylonia. Continued. Sir Henry H. Howo-th.
The Guidi and Their Relations with Florence. Continued. Miss L.
Eckenstein.
The Dutch Power in Brazil. Continued. Rev. George Edmundson.
The Transplintation to Connaught. Dr. Samuel R. Gardiner.

English Illustrated Magazine,—178, Strand. 6d. Oct.

A Plague-Stricken City in India. Illustrated. Helen C. Gordon.
Penny Toys, and All about Them. Illustrated. George A. Wade.
Leamington; a Spa in Shakspere's Country. Illustrated. Frederick Dolman.
Pig-Sticking in India. Illustrated. Major Dalbiac.
Nov.

Oatlands Park; One of Zola's Hiding-Places. Illustrated. H. C. Shelley. The Empire's Coaling Stations. Illustrated. C. de Thierry. The "New Race"; a Prehistoric People of Egypt. Illustrated. Wilfred Mark Webb.

The History of the Transvaal Crisis. Illustrated. Imperialist.

Sir Alfred Milner. With Portrait Africanus.

Paul Kruger and His Contemporaries. Illustrated. F. R. St. tham.

Mark Webb.
The History of the Transvaal Crisis. Illustrated. Imperialist.
Sir Alfred Milner. With Portrait? Africanus.
Paul Kruger and His Contemporaries. Illustrated. F. R. St tham.
Sir George Pomeroy-Colley. Illustrated. Wilfred Meynell.
Three Famous Fighting Regiments, Illustrated, George Douglas, Leading Uitlanders. Illustrated. Dr. J. C. Voigt.

Englishwoman.—8, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Nov.
The Queen of Sweden and Norway and Her Family. Illustrated. Carl Siewers.
Tea-Tasting and Tea-Rooms; Occupations for Women. Illustrated. F. M. Steels.
A Visit to the Tonga Islands. Illustrated. L. Lloyd.
Preston Hospital; an Ideal Charity. Illustrated. H. G. Archer.
Elizabeth and Agnes Strickland. Illustrated. Halboro Denham.
Englishwoman's Review.—WILLIAMS AND NORGATE. 18. Oct.

An Englishman's House is His Castle.
Not under Grace but under Law.
Women's Suffrage in Holland.
Legal Position of Women in New Zealand and South Australia.
Women in Libraries.
Bibliography on Women's Questions. Continued.

Etude.—T. PRESSER, PHILADELPHIA. 15 cents. Oct.

About Tuning. R. Braine.
Oscar Raif. With Portrait.

Music for Piano:—"Valse Lente," by M. Sieveking: "Spring Song," by V. Hollaender.

Expositor.—Hodder and Stoughton. 1s. Nov.
Love and Righteousness: a Study on the Influence of Christianity on Language. Rev. Arthur Carr.
The Evidential Value of Miracle. Prof. J. H. Bernard.
The Future of the Kingdom. Prof. R. A. Falconer.
A Criticism of the New Chronology of Paul. Prof. Benj. W. Bacon.
The Ambrosiaster and Isaac the Converted Jew. Rev. A. E. Burn.
Apocalyptic Sketches. Continued. Rev. J. Monro Gibson.
To What Tribe did Samuel belong? Rev. R. B. Girdlestone.
Did the Assyrians coin Money? C. H. W. Johns.

Expository Times.—SIMPKIN MARSHALL. 6d. Nov.
The Missionary Methods of the Apostles. Rev. John Reid.
The Name "Son of Man" and the Messianic Consciousness of Jesus. Rev.
L. A. Muirhead.
Professor Margoliouth and the "Original Hebrew" of Ecclesiasticus. Prof.
Ed. König.

Fellden's Magazine.—Temple Chambers. 18. Oct, ernors; or Control and Steadiness in Machinery. Illustrated. Prof-Robt, H. Smith. Robt. H. Smith.
Indigo. Illustrated. Lionel G. Radeliffe.
Modern Telephony. Illustrated. A. R. Bennett.
Acetylene Generators. Illustrated. Continued. Prof. Vivian B. Lewes.
The Position in China. J. Grant Birch.
Machine Tools. Illustrated. Continued. Ewart C. Amos.
The Building of the Great Central Extension to London. Illustrated. Continued.

Fireside. -- , PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 6d. Nov. Is the Condition of the Children of the Working Classes in England Satisfactory? M. H. Isabell.

Fortnightly Review .- CHAPMAN AND HALL. 28. 6d. Nov. A South African Settlement. John Donne. Arthur Symons. The Art of Flying. W. E. Garrett Fisher. Railway Communication between India and China. With Map. James Stuart.
The Menacing Comet. Ed. Vincent Heward.
The Letters of Mary Sibylla Holland. Edith Sichel.
The Venezuelan Award. H. Whates.
Unwritten Literary Laws Ouida.
Maritime Expeditions in Relation to Sea-Power. Major F. C. OrmsbyLohnson.

Johnson
The Need to Believe. Vernon Lee.
France Since 1814. Continued. Baron Pierre de Coubertin.
Transvaal Independence and England's Future. Dr. Karl Blind.
The War in South Africa. With Map.

FOPUM.-GAY AND BIRD. 18, 6d. Oct. Forum.—GAY AND BIRD. 1s. 6d. Oct.
This Year's Elections and the Presidential Election. J. C. Burrows.
The Present Outlook for Currency Reform. Chas. D. Dawes.
The Sunday Question. Dean Farrar.
Commercial Japan. Oscar P. Austin.
The Civil Code of Germany. Prof. Rudolph Sohm.
Russia, England, and the United States. A. Maurice Low.
Liquid Air; a Rejoinder. Stephen H. Emmens.
The Paris Congress of the History of Religions. Prof. T. Stanton.
The "National Guard" Problem. Major John H. Parker.
Chinese Daily Life. Joseph King Goodrich.
A Century's Labour Legislation in France. Walter B. Scaife,
The Passing of the Four-Year Period in American Colleges. Prof. George Hempl. Hempl.
Social Progress and Race Degeneration. Prof. Frank A. Fetter.
The Relation of England to the Transvaal. James G. Whiteley.
Literature of the Pacific Coast. Charles H. Shinn.

Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly.—s.1, FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK. rocents. Nov.
Finances of Our Wars. Illustrated. Continued. Lyman J. Gage. Coaching as a Sport. Illustrated. Gibson Willetts. Among the Boers. Illustrated. An Englishwoman. Stellar Bombardment; November Meteors. Illustrated. H. P. Powell Rees. The Old Folks at Home in New England. Illustrated. Clifton Johnson. Women in Dramatic Art. Adeline Stanhop-Wheatcroft.

Genealogical Magazine, -ELLIOT STOCK. 18. November. Sir Robert de Septvans. Sir Robert de Septvans.
Story of the Surname of Beatson. Continued. W. B. B.
The Arms, Seals, and Plate of Plymouth. L. Duncombe-Jewell.
The Dunbar of Hempriggs Baronetcy.
The Earldom of Menteith. Continued.

Gentleman's Magazine,-Chatto and Windus. is. Nov. French Poetry in the Nineteenth Century. Ferdinand Brunetière. The Story of the Shoe. F. G. Walters. The Felopidae Papers. G. H. Powell. The Sellers of Books. Edw. Turnbull. Wycliffe's Lutterworth. G. Clark Nuttall. Exmouth's Bombardment of Algiers. Walter Wood.

Geographical Journal.-EDWARD STANFORD. 28. October. Explorations in Patagonia. Illustrated. Dr. Francisco P. Moreno. A Trip to the Chinese Shan States. With Map. Illustrated. Fred. W. Carey. Submarine Gulliss, River Outlets, and Freshwater Escapes beneath the Sea-level. Henry Benest.

The Antarctic Climate. Henry Arctowski.

Was Australia discovered in the Sixteenth Century? Edward Heawood.

Oceanography. Sir John Muray.

Geological Magazine. - DULAU AND Co. 18, 6d. October. Henry H. Howell. With Portrait.
The Graptolite-bearing Rocks of Victoria, Australia. Illustrated. T. S. Hall.
On a New Species of Lepracanthus from the Yorkshire Coal-measures.
Illustrated. Edgar D. Wellburn.
B:itish Association; Address to Geological Section. Sir A. Geikie.

Girl's Own Paper .- 56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Nov. Pharmacy as an Employment for Girls. R. K. Spencer.
Women's Work in Sanitation and Hygiene. F. S. Davson.
Characteristic Church Towers of Bedfordshire. Illustrated. H. W. Brewer, Princesses Who may be Queens. With Portraits. Marie A. Belloc.
My Museum of Eastern Curios. Illustrated. Mrs. Brightwen, Free-Wheel Cycles. Miss N. G. Bacon.
Bread-Winning at Home. Miss Margaret Bateson.

Girl's Realm.-Hutchinson. 6d. Nov. The Queen's Toys at Kensington Palace. Illustrated. Sybil. All Sorts and Conditions of Girls. Illustrated. Marian Leslie and Others. The Gymnastic Instructor. Illustrated. Miss E. M. Symondr. Famous Horses. Illustrated. Miss Alice Corkran. The Humours of Composite Photography. Illustrated. Dorothy: Gother. Hockey for Girls. Illustrated. Lilian M. Faithfull.

Good Words,-ISBISTER. 6d. Nov. From Sea to Summit; a Drive in the Jamaican Hills. Illusquated. Phil

Aetheric Telegraphy.
The Cape Parliament. Illustrated. George Ralling.
Letters from Mrs. Southey. Illustrated. Margaret Howitt.
Some Phases of Australian City Life. W. C. Mackenzie.

Great Thoughts.—28, HUTTON STREET, FLEET STREET. 6d. Nov. The Temple and Its Literary Associations. Illustrated. Sydney Davey, Francis Marion Crawford, Novelist. Illustrated. John Logan. Ruskin Hall, Oxford. Illustrated. S. G. Hobson. Criticism in Literature and Art; a Talk with Mr. Frederick Wedmore. Raymond Blathwayt.

W. M. Thackeray. Illustrated. Editor.

Damming the Nile; a Talk with Mr. St. John Ker. Illustrated. Raymond Blathwayt.

Harmsworth Magazine.-HARMSWORTH. 3fd. Oct. Behind the Scenes at the Zoo. Illustrated. W. J. Wintle. Follies. Illustrated. Oswald Marvin.
Men as Town-Makers; Some Famous Captains of Industry. Illustrated.

Arthur Birnage.
Chinese Carriers. Illustrated. Harry C. Smart.
Strange Things in Churches. Illustrated. H. Knight.
Might-Have-Beens. Illustrated. Herbert Howard. The Port of London; the Biggest Shop in the World. Illustrated. Philip Harper's Monthly Magazine.—45, Albemarile Street. 18. Oct. The Ascent of Illimani. With Illustrations and Map. Sir Martin Conway. Washington's Homes and His Households in New York. Illustrated. Continued. Leila Herbert.

Tenting on Two Seas. Illustrated. Julian Ralph.
Seward's Proposition of April 1, 1867, for a Foreign War and a Dictatorship. Frederic Bancroft. France as affected by the Dreyfus Case. G. W. Steevens, Admiral George Dewey. Illustrated. Hon. John Barrett, Nov.

Nov.

Nov.
Boston at the Century's End. Illustrated. Sylvester Baxter.
Washington: His Homes and His Households in Philadelphia and Germantown. Illustrated. Leila Herbert.
Climbing Mount Sorata. Illustrated. Sir Martin Conway.
India's Threshold. Illustrated. Julian Ralph.
America in the Pacific and Far East. Hon. John Barrett.
Siberia. Archibald R. Colquhoun.
Cuba in Suspension. Charles M. Pepper.

Homiletic Review .-- 44, FLEET STREET. 18. 3d. Nov. Textual Criticism and Scriptural Authority. G. Frederick Wright. The Preacher in His Study. Cunningham Geikie. Method in the Biblical Study of the Monuments. Prof. J. F. McCurdy. Hebraism and Hellenism in Literature. Prof. Theo. W. Hunt.

Humanitarian.-Duckworth. 6d. Nov.

The Evil of Militarism, Prof. Hamon.
Woman and the Emotions. Prof. Mantegazza.
Rand Labour Questions and the War. W. Niddrie.
The Evolution of the Human Foot. Dr. W. Ainslie Hollis.
Alcoholism in France. Frederic Lees.
Brain Bankruptcy of Business Men. Dr. C. H. Hughes.
Alexander Pope as a Prophet. Ernest A. Green.

International .- A. T. H. Brower, Chicago. 10 cents. Oct. Chicago's New Post Office. Illustrated. F. W. Fitzpatrick. Impressions of St. Kitts. Illustrated. Lillian D. Kelsey.

The Relation of Ethics to Sociology.

The Relation of Ethics to Sociology.

The Sidgwick.

The Democracy as a Religion.

The Moral Aspect of Consumption.

The Ethics of Religious Conformity.

The Ethics of Religious Conformity.

The The The Company of The Company of Ethics.

The Peace That cometh of, Understanding; Discourse for Necessitarians.

John MacCunn. International Journal of Ethics .- Sonnenschein. 2s. 6d. Oct.

Irish Ecclesiastical Record.—24, Nassau Street, Dublin. 18. Oct.

The Existence of Evil. Cardinal Vaughan. Catholics and Freemasonry. Rev. C. M. O'Brien. Dr. Horton and the Pope. Rev. John Freeland. The Birthplace of St. Patrick. Rev. Gerald Stack.

Irish Monthly .- M. H. GILL, O'CONNELL STREET, DUBLIN. 6d. Nov. Peter Connellan; the Verses of an Irish Squire. St. Francis of Assisi. Editor. Ex Libris William Shakespeare. Rev. Joseph Darlington.

Irish Rosary.—47, LETTLE BRITAIN. 3d. Nov. The Origin of the "Salve Regina" in the Dominican Order. Our Lady of Boulogne. Illustrated. J.

Roger H An H Jour

Sketc The l The The Misce Joi

The !

Ladie

Rece St. A A : Pi The A

Shell

Elect

Ups : On th La The ! How The A Be Bish

Some A FI

Earl Fifty The The Note Expe

On F Betti Lone Mun

Annı The

Noti Lip

Zion The The Step L

The

Jewish Quarterly Review.—Macmillan. 3s. 6d. Oct.
The Original Hebrew of Ecclesiasticus. Rev. G. Margoliouth.
Roger Bacon and His Predecessors; Early English Hebraists. Dr. S. A.
Hirsch.

An Hypothesis about the Hebrew Fragments of Sirach. Prof. W. Bacher.
An Introduction to the Arabic Literature of the Jews. Continued. Prof.
Moritz Steinschneider.

Journal of the Royal Agricultural Society.—Albemarle Street. 3s. 6d. Sept.

Sketch of the Agriculture of Kent. Illustrated. Charles Whitehead.
The Maidstone Meeting, 1899. With Plan. W. Fream.
The Trials of Cream-Separators at Maidstone. Illustrated. R. M.

The Trials of Hop-Washing Machines at Maidstone. Montagu C. H. Taylor and Wm. Chambers.

Miscellaneous Implements exhibited at Maidstone. Illustrated. Bayntun Hippisley.

Journal of Education. -86, FLEET STREET, LONDON. 6d. Oct. The New Departure at South Kensington. H. Macan. Ladies as Elementary-School Teachers.

Journal of Theological Studies .- MACMILLAN. 38. Nov. Recent Research on the Origin of the Creed. Canon Sanday. St. Anselm's Argument for the Being of God. Dr. Caird. A. Practical Discourse on Some Principles of Hymn-Singing. Robert Bridges.
The Acts of the Apostles:
A Criticism of Lightfoot and Headlam. Rev. J. A. Cross.
A Plea for an Early Date. Rev. R. B. Rackham.

The Mycetozoa. Continued. Sir Edward Fry and Agnes Fry.
Shells as Ornaments, Implements, and Articles of Trade. Illustrated.
R. Lydekker. Knowledge.-326, HIGH HOLBORN. 6d. Nov.

Electricity as an Exact Science. Continued. Howard B. Little.
Ups and Downs in Our Daily Weight. Illustrated. W. W. Wagstaffe.
The Story of the Orchids. Illustrated. Continued. Rev. Alex. S. Wilson.
On the Duty of a Field Naturalist. E. A. S. E.

Ladies' Home Journal .- CURTIS, PHILADELPHIA. 10 cents. Nov. The Next Census in the United States. Clifford Howard.
The Anecdotal Side of Robert E. Lee. Illustrated. Mrs. Moses P. Handy.
How a Play is Written. Illustrated. Franklin Fyles.
The Study of Shakesp-are in Sinall Communities. Illustrated. Sir Henry

Lady's Realm.-HUTCHINSON. 6d. Nov. A Bear Shoot in Kashmir. Illustrated. Isabel Savory.
Bishop Randall Davidson of Winchester. Illustrated. Mrs. S. A. Tooley.
Some Beauties of To-day. Illustrated. Chas. P. Little.
A Flying Visit to Bokhara. Illustrated. Princess Gagarine. Earl Beauchamp. Illustrated. The Queen's Married Granddaughters. Illustrated.

Land Magazine.-149, STRAND. 18. Oct. Fifty Years' Recollections of West Yorkshire Moorlands.
The Promotion of National Thrift. Sir James Rankin.
The Stotch Pine in Normandy. W. F. Fisher.
Note on the Muzzling Orders. Sir James Sawyer.
The Depopulation of Rural Districts. A. J. Woodhouse.
Experiments on Charlock Spraying, 1899. James Hornsby.

Leisure Hour .- 56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Nov. On Reading. James Bryce.
Woolwich Arsenal. Illustrated. W. J. Gordon.
Betting. Illustrated. Symposium.
Londonderry Past and Present. Illustrated. C. H. I.
London from the Monument. Illustrated. W. B. Northrop.

Library Association Record .- HORACE MARSHALL. 28. Oct. Municipal Libraries and Their Development, Alderman J. W. Southern. Annual Meeting of the Library Association at Manchester. Illustrated.

Library Journal.-KEGAN PAUL. 28. Oct. Library-Building. F. P. Hill. The Statistical Department of the Boston Public Library. Worthington C. Ford.

Library World .- 4, Ave Maria Lane. 6d. Oct. The London Boroughs and the Public Libraries. With Map. Notification of Infectious Disease and the Public Library. W. J. Willcock. Suggestions for a Library Conference. J. B. L. S. The Library Association Conference at Manchester. Illustrated.

Lippincott's Monthly Magazine.-Lippincott, Philadelphia. is.

Zionism. I. Zangwill.
The Home of Gilbert White of Selborne. Illustrated. Mrs. John Lane. Scottish Sport and Autumn House Parties. Ignota.
The Common Insects of Autumn. Belle S. Cragin.
Stephen Decatur and the Tripolitan Fleet, 1804; the Biggest Little Fight in Naval History. George Gibbs.

London Quarterly Review .- CHARLES H. KELLY. 25. 6d. Oct. The Primrose and Darwinism. Illustrated. A Field Naturalist. Hezekish Woodward: a Puritan Educationist. Mrs. Clement Parsons. Lines of Cleavage in Christianity. James Hope Moulton. Nigeria. Prof. A. S. Geden.

Modern Oxford and Nonconformity. Hugh W. Strong.
Three Great Asiatic Reformers. Sir W. H. Rattigan.
The Mysticism of Madame Guyon. J. Rendel Harris.
The Diffusion of Modern Civilisation. Urquhart A. Forb.s.
The Theological Work of Dr. Bruce. Prof. James Denney.

Longman's Magazine,-Longmans. 6d. Nov. Lady Louisa Stuart; a Granddaughter of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu. Mrs. Lang. Pot-Herbs. Rev. John Vaughan, Ludgate. -F. V. WHITE. 6d. Oct. Miss Irene Vanbrugh. Illustrated. Rog nald Bacchus.

The Cathedral Route to the North. Illustrated. Scott Damant.
English Historical Men's Costumes for Ten Centuries. Illustrated. Helen C. Gordon.
Camden Place, Chislehurst, and the Ancient Game of Golf. Illustrated, G. Cooling.

Miss Lily Hanbury at Home. Illustrated. A. Henriques Valentine
Some Old Gardens. Illustrated. Glenavon.
Our Railways. With Diagrams. Harold Macfarlane.
Nov.

The Love Family on the Stage, Illustrated, P. H. Macenery, Impressions of Ostend, Illustrated, A. Henriques Valentine, The Australian Cricketers in England, Illustrated, E. Anthony, Albert Chevalier, Affred West, Nelson Hardy, Illustrated, Isabel Brooke-Alder.

The Cabinet in Town. Illustrated. A. Wallis Myers.

Lute. -PATEY AND WILLIS. 2d. Oct. Mr. Ernest Ford. With Portrait. Anthem: -- "Arise, O God," by F. R. Rickman.

McClure's Magazine .- 45, ALBEMARLE STREET. 10 cents. Oct. - motorie's magrazine, 45, Albemarke Street. To cents. Uct. Admiral Dewey. Illustrated. Gov. Theodore Roosevelt. With Dewey in the Mediterranean, Illustrated. Joseph I. Stickney. Scenes and Actors in the Dreyfus Trial. Illustrated. G. W. Steevens. Mark Twain, With Portrait. Samuel E. Moffett.

The Racing Yacht; Its Points and Its Paces. Illustrated. Ray Stannard Belge.

Macmillan's Magazine. - MACMILLAN. 15. Nov. London Revisited. Charles Whibley.
The State of Suzerainty. Templar.
The Outlook in France. Spencer Brodhurst.
Yourkano; a Modern Monastery and an Ancient Ruin. A. D. Godley.
The Mystery of the Mudmarks in India. Lionel James.
The Lesson of 1881. Major Pearse.

Manchester Quarterly.-27, St. Anne Street, Manchester. 6d.

Arthur O'Shaughnessy. Laurence Clay.
The Evolution of the Essay. W. V. Burgess.
Winthrop Mackworth Praed. John Mortimer.
The Abuse of Words. Arthur W. Fox.
Robin Hood. Geo. A. Shaw.
The Poetry of Lord de Tabley. Tinsley Pratt.

Medical Magazine.-62, King William Street. 15. Oct. Sanitary Science and Preventive Medicine. Sir Joseph Ewart, How Surgery became a Profession in London. D'Arcy Power. The Out-Patient Question in General. Frederick J. Smith. The Inquiry System. Douglas Dent.
Suitai lity of Patients; Inquiry in Manchester. Arnold W. V.
The Educational Value of Inquiry. G. R. Hawkins-Ambler.
Results of Inquiry in London Hospitals. Colonel Montefiore. Arnold W. W. Lea.

Mind .- WILLIAMS AND NORGATE. 38. Oct. Psychological Philosophies. Shadworth H. Hodgson, Routine Process, Gustave Spiller.
Philosophical Terminology. Continued. Dr. Ferdinand Tönnics.
The Spatial Harmony of Touch and Sight. G. M. Stratton.
Kant's Proof of the Proposition, "Mathematical Judgments are One and All Synthetical." Bruce McEwan.

Missionary Review of the World.—44, Fleet Street. 18, 3d. Oct. Arabia; the Cradle of Islam. Illustrated. Rev. S. M. Zwemer. Samuel Fisk Green. Illustrated. Continued. Dr. A. T. Pierson. The Conversion of the Nestorians to the Russian Church. Continued. Rev. Samuel G. Wilson.
Jan Hus. Continued. Illustrated. Rev. George H. Giddins.

Monist.-KEGAN PAUL. 25. 6d. Oct.

Monist,—Kegan Paul. 2s. 6d. Oct.

The Polychrome Bible. Prof. C. H. Cornill.
The Polychrome Bible. Dr. W. Henry Green,
The Bible. Dr. Paul Carus.
Psychology and the Ego. Prof. Lloyd Morgan.
The Man of Genius. Prof. G. Sergi.
A Decade of Philosophy in France. Lucien Arréat.
The Doctrine of Conservatism of Energy in Its Relation to the Elimination of Force as a Factor in the Cosmos. Chas. H. Chase.

Month,—Longman. 18. Oct.
The Stockport Conference. Rev. Sydney F. Smith.
St. Alban's Seminary, Valladolid, toos-toos. Rev. J. H. Pollen.
Poetry for Children. M. Partridge.
The Poor Man's Prospects. William E. Maude.
The Goupels in the Schoolroom. Rev. J. Rickaby. Nineteenth-Century Catholicism.

hers.

Phil

ov.

y.

ore.

nond

ted.

hilip

Oct. vay.

tor-

an-

Nov.
The London Church Congress. Rev. Sydney F. Smith.
The Relation of Theology to Devotion. Rev. G. Tyrrell.
Dante's Correspondence with Guido and Messer Cino. Edmund Garratt Dante's Correspondence.
Gardner.
English Forests. S. H. Dunn.
"No. 5, John Street," by R. Whiteing. James Britten.
The November Meteors. Rev. A. L. Coetie.

Monthly Musical Record .- Augener. 2d. Oct. Festival Reform. E. A. Baughan. Karl Ditters von Dittersdorf. J. S. S. Goethe and Great Composers. J. S. S. Song:—"Lucy," by S. Coleridge Taylor.

Nov.

The Perils of Popularity. E. A. Baughan, Frédéric Chopin. J. S. S. Johann Wilhelm Hässler. F. Peterson. Piano Duct:—"German Rounds," by M. Moszkowski.

Music .- 186, WARDOUR STREET. 2d. Oct. The Choirmaster as a Teacher. Continued. J. E. Borland. Schubert's Song Cycles. Continued. Frank Merry. The History of the Violincello. Continued. E. van Der Straeten. Song:—"Spring in My Heart," by E. Alfieri. Charles Lunn. With Portrait.

Music .- 1402, Auditorium Tower, Chicago. 25 cents. Oct.

Johanna Gadski. Illustrated. Emma D. Nuckols. How to be Musical without Practice. J. S. Smith. Eduard Schirner. With Portrait. Charlotte Teller. From Bach to Beethoven. Vincent d'Indy. The Story of the Boston Music Hall Organ. W. F. Gates. Musical Memory. J. S. van Cleve. Clarence Eddy on Music at the French Exposition.

Musical Herald .- J. Curwen. 2d. Nov. Dr. Gauntlett. With Portrait. Song in Both Notations:—" Evening," by H. C. Morris.

Musical Opinion .- 150, HOLBORN. 2d. Oct. Handel's "Hercules." Rev. J. T. Laurence. Rheinberger's Organ Works. Continued. C. J. Frost. Liszt's Songs. Rutland Boughton.

Musical Times.-Novello. 4d. Nov. John Thomas. With Portrait. The Sheffield Festival Choir; Interview with Dr. Henry Coward. With

The Training of Choirmasters. Sir G. Martin.
"The Death of Minnehaha," by S. Coleridge Taylor. A. J. J.
Anthems:—"It came upon the Midnight clear," by J. Stainer; "Where All Things were in Quiet Silence," by H. J. King.

National Review .- EDWARD ARNOLD. 28. 6d. Nov. "After." In South Africa. Evelyn Ashley.
Moral Factors in the War. Spenser Wilkinson.
The Rôle of the Roman Catholic Church in France. Urbain Gohier.
The Cosmopolitan Spirit in Literature. Leslie Stephen.
A Play-goer's Protest. Miss Godley.
American Afairs. A. Maurice Low.
German Finance. W. R. Lawson.
A Summer Trip in Alaska. W. F. Bailey.
Redistribution. C. A. Whitmore, M.P.

Natural Science.-Young J. Pentland, Edinburgh. 18. Oct. The Influence of the Nervous System in Organic Evolution. Dr. R. F. Licorish. The Fauna of the Sound. Dr. Einar Lönnberg.
Suggestions upon the Origin of the Australian Flora. Continued. Spencer Moore.

New Century Review .- 434, STRAND. 6d. October.

Sir Walter Besant on the Rewards of Literature: Symposium. Shakespoare's Sonnets as Clues to the Dramas. Cuming Walters. His Proise of Julian Hamilton, Duke of Douglas. Kineton Parkes. France and Her Future. "Liberticus." Recess Silence and Sessional Results. T. H. S. Escott. The Labour Day. Maltman Barry. Swedenborg in England. Geo. Trobridge.

The Active Defence of Our Empire. F. C. Ormsby Johnson Nov.

The Transvaal: Arms and the Men. T. H. S. Escott
The Garrick Club. Percy Fitzgerald.
The Civilising Influence of the Roman Catholic Church. Cardinal Vaughan.
The Report of the Chaplin Committee on Old Age Pensions. Thomas

Scanlon. What's in a (Chinese) Name? E. H. Parker. The Failure of Elementary Education. Arthur E. T. Newman. The Malady and Character of Dean Swift. J. A. Nicklin. The Labour Day. Maltman Barry.
The Boer Ambition. Douglas Story.
The Transvaal Question.; Two Points of View. Ratcliff Hoare and "Liberticus." New England Magazine.—5, Park Square, Boston. 25 cents. Oct. Forty Years of Musical Life in New England. Illustrated. Marth Dana Shepard. A Lady's Reading Eighty Years Ago. Ruth Huntington Sessions. Adams and North Adams. Illustrated. Clinton Q. Richmond. The First American Visit to Scrooby. Illustrated. Henry Morton Dexter. The Congregational House, Boston. Illustrated. William H. Cobb. Congregationalism in England. Illustrated. Dr. John Brown.

New Ireland Review .- Burns and Oates, 6d. Oct. Early Irish Bankers and Banking. J. Salmon. Iveragh Industries, Limited. Stephen B. Roche. Religious Songs of Connacht. Continued. Douglas Hyde.

Nineteenth Century .- Sampson Low. 25. 6d. Nov. Nineteenth Century.—Sameson Low. 2s. 6d. Nov.
After the Present War. Edward Dicey.
Native Unrest in South Africa. E. M. Green.
The Battle of Trafalgar; an Unpublished Narrative
Introduction by Admiral Sir Erasmus Ommanney.
The Future of Lord Rosebery. H. W. Massingham.
The Intellectual Future of Catholicism. W. H. Mallock.
Horticulture as a Profession for the Educated, Miss A. Goodrich Freer.
The Dalmeny Experiments; "Manuring with Brains." D. Young.
Cricket in 1802. A. C. Wootton.
Literature before Letters. Prof. Max Müller.
A Devil-Dance in Ceylon. Mrs. Corner Ohlmüs.
Charity versus Outdoor Relief. Canon Barnett.
The Remittance Man. Rev. D. Wallace Duthie.
The Plague in Oporto. A. Shadwell.
The Newspapers. Sir Wemyss Reid.

Nonconformist Musical Journal.—2), Paternoster Row. 2d. Music at Zion Congregational Church, Frome.

North American Review.—Heinemann. 25. 6d. Oct. The Peace Conference and the Moral Aspect of War. Capt. A. T. Mahan. In the Clutch of the Harpy Powers. R. M. Johnson.
A Transvaal View of the South African Question. Dr. F. V. Engelenburg. A Transvaal View of the South African Question. Dr. F. V. E The Present Literary Situation in France. Henry James. The Alaskan Boundary. Prof. J. B. Moore. Some Social Tendencies in America. Bishop Potter. A Trained Colonial Civil Service. Prof. F. C. Bourne. Five Years of American Progress. M. G. Mulhall. The Decline of British Commerce. A. Maurice Low. America and England in the East. Sir Charles W. Dilke. The Restless Energy of the American People. Ian Maclaren. The French Press and the Dreyfus Case. M. de Blowitz.

Open Court.-KEGAN PAUL. 6d. Oct. The Fatherland; the Significance of Germany for Civilisation. Dr. Paul The Religion of Frederick the Great. Illustrated. Prof. W. H. Carruth. Germany and the United States. Rev. William Weber. The Estrangement between America and Germany. Dr. P. E. Groszmann. The German in America. Dr. Paul Carus.

Organist and Choirmaster .- , Berners Street. 3d. Oct. Anthem: -" Where Shepherds watched," by W. J. Tollemache.

Outing .- International News Co. 25 cents. Oct. The Columbia; the Pride of the Ocean, Illustrated, Capt. A. J. Kenealy. Kicking a Football. Illustrated. George H. Brooke, Antigua, Guatemala, and Its Ruins. Illustrated. A. M. Beaupré.

Palestine Exploration Fund. -38, CONDUIT STREET. 28. 6d. Oct. Address at the Annual Meeting. Major-Gen. Sir C. W. Wilson. Second Report of the Excavations at Tell es-Sâfi. With Plans. Illustrated. F. T. Bilss.

A Visit to Tell Zakarlya. Major-Gen. Sir C. W. Wilson.

Notes on the Antiquities of the Books of Samuel. Col. C. R. Conder. The Ancient Standards of Measure in the East. Lieut-Gen. Sir Chas.

Pall Mall Magazine.-18, Charing Cross Road. 18. Nov. The American Stage. Illustrated. William Archer.
Lady Eleanor Butler and Miss S. Ponsonby; the Ladies of Llangollen.
Illustrated. Hon. Mrs. Armytage.
Coaching. Illustrated. H. S. D.
Birds in London. W. T. Greene.
Famous Foreign Newspapers. Illustrated. G. A. Wade.

Parents' Review.—KEGAN PAUL. 6d. Oct.

On Herbert Spencer's "Education" T. G., Rooper.
Self-Control. Dr. 'I. Laing Gordon.
Savonarola. Continued. Hilda Spearman.
The Practical Attitude of the Leisured and Educated Classes towards the Nursery. Mrs. Edw. Sieveking.
The Educational Use of Dynamics. P. G. O'Connell.

Paris Magazine. -12, Burleigh Street, Strand. 6d. Oct. The Working of the Paris Opera. Georges de Dubor.
The Churches of Paris. Continued. Augusta Latouche, Chopin in Paris. J. Lambert.

An

Big

Bil

Or

The Par

A S Tu

Ou Per St. Infl A V Ra

Ho Ne

Wi

A I Ma Ra Wi

Th

Oct. Dana

exter.

rt and 21.

er.

ahan. burg.

Paul

uth. et.

nealy. Oct.

rated. Chas.

v. ollen.

s the

Pearson's Magazine.-C. A. Pearson. 6d. Nov. Big Fruit Operations. Illustrated. E. H. Rydall. Human Storks; Stilt-Walking in the Landes. Illustrated. Mrs. Herbert Vivian. Vivian.

Shark-Hunting. Illustrated. Weatherby Chesney.

Billiard Tricks. Illustrated. Stancliffe.

The Life of a Lecturer. Illustrated. Ian Maclaren.

La Maison Paternelle. Illustrated. Mary Fermor.

Photo-Miniature. - DAWBARN AND WARD. 6d. Sept. Orthochromatic Photography. Illustrated.

Political Science Quarterly.—Oxford University Press. 3s. 6d. Sept.

Paine's Political Theories. C. E. Merriam.

Pame s Politicat neories. C. E. Merriam.
Anarchistic Crimes. Gustavo Tosti.
Bismarck's Apprenticeship. Prof. W. M. Sloane.
Government Loans to Farmers. C. F. Emerick.
City and Country Taxes. Continued. Max West.
Paul Deschanel. J. G. Brooks.
American Civil Church Law. G. J. Bayles. Positivist Review.-Wm. Reeves. 3d. Nov.

The Rejected Queen's Speech. Frederic Harrison. Patriotism of the Old Sort. Edw. Spencer Beesly. International Peace. Chas. Gaskell Higginson. Practical Teacher. -33, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Nov.

The Case for Manual Training in Schools. J. Gunn. The Royal College of Science. The Educational Conference at Berr

Public Health .- 129, SHAFTESBURY AVENUE. 18. Oct. A Scheme for the Uniform Inspection of Meat. T. Ashburton Thompson. Tuberculin and Tuberculosis among Cattle and Children. Harold Scurfield.

Public School Magazine .- 131, TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 6d. Oct. The Leys School, Cambridge. Illustrated. F. Bentham Stevens.
Hints on Football, W. D. G.
Some Early Records of Prominent Public School Athletes, Illustrated.
C. J. Lee-Warner.

Puritan .- James Bowden. 6d. Nov. Puritan.—James Bowden. 6d. Nov.

Ought Christians to go to the Theatre? Symposium.

Personal Reminiscences. Continued. Rev. Dr. J. G. Rogers.

St. George's Free Church, Edinburgh. Illustrated. Hugh Cameron.

Influential Citizenship. Rev. J. H. Jowett.

A Visit to Naseby. Illustrated. Francis John Underwood.

The Puritans. Sir Richard Tangye.

Radiant Effectiveness. A. T. Palmer.

Christianity and Public Life in America; Interview with Dr. J. Strong.

Illustrated. J. R. Macdonald.

Alms and Off-troires. Beatrice Knollys.

Dante as Puritan. Payling Wright.

Quarterly Review .- ALBEMARLE STREET. 6s. Oct. The Federation of Australia. A Place in the Country. Pitt and the Family Compact.
Matthew Prior.
Horses, Zebras, and Hybrids. Illustrated. Scott and His Pupils. New Lights on the '45. The Food of London. The Next Conclave. Note on the Peace Conference. The Empire and the Transvaal.

Quiver.—Cassell. 6d. Nov.
The Story of "Thanksgiving Day." Illustrated. Elizabeth L. Banks.
Children's Memorials. Illustrated. Arthur Fish. Railway Magazine .- 79, TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 6d. Oct.

William Moffatt, General Manager, Great North of Scotland Railway; Interview. Illustrated.

To Manchester via Ashbourne. Illustrated. D. T. Timms,
A Run on the Wool-Buyers' Special. Illustrated. A. G. Ro'ins, Manchester South Junction and Altrincham Railway. Illustrated. G. J.
Welle. Wells.

Railway Letter Stamps. Illustrated. G. W. J. Porter.
Sheffield and Its Railways. Illustrated. T. Booth.
Fireproof Constructions for Railway Buildings. Illustrated.
How the Railways deal with American Meat. Illustrated.
Whitechurch. William James; the Father of Railways. Illustrated. R. R. Dodds. The "Flying Dutchman," Great Western Railway. Illustrated. W. J.

Reliquary,-Benrose, 28, 6d. Oct. The Parish Documents of Ringmer of the Jacobean and Georgian Periods. Illustrated. W. Heneage Legge.
Westbury; an Old Parish Tale. Illustrated. S. M. Crawley-Boevey.

Review of Reviews.—(AMERICA).—13, ASTOR PLACE, NEW YORK. 25 cents. Oct.

Alfred Dreyfus; a Chronicle. W. T. Stead.

The Phebe Hearst Architectural Competition for the University of California. Illustrated. H. S. Allen.

The Work of Our Army-Supply Departments in the Philippines. J. W. Pope.
Our Diplomatic Relations with Nicaragua. Corry M. Stadden.
The New Era of Prosperity. Thomas L. James.
Dewey Day Decorations in New York. Illustrated. Ernest Knaufft.

Royal Magazine.-C. A. PEARSON. 4d. Nov. The Art of the Camera, Illustrated. Roderick Grey.
How Cyclists are attracted to Church. Illustrated. Stanley White.
How I Shot My Lions. Illustrated. H. Seton Karr.
The Gentle Art of Smiling. Illustrated. R. Duff.
Mr. Barrett; the Most Expert Swordsman in the Navy. Illustrated. J. J. Bennett.

Picture-Preaching. Illustrated. C. Montgomery M'Govern.

Saint George,—Stock. 18. Oct. Elementary Schools and National Character. H. C. Devine, The Life of the Spirit. J. C. Kenworthy. Poetic Theory. J. A. Dale.

St. Martin's-le-Grand,-GRIFFITH AND SONS. od. Oct. The Liverpool Post Office-Past and Present. Illustrated. Continu:d. F. Salisbury.

Old Age Pay Abroad. A. G. Bowie,
The Sunday Express Delivery of Letters in London. W. Howson.

Saint Nicholas.—Macmillan. 15. Nov.
A Little Girl's Glinpse of Tennyson. Illustrated. Edith M. Nicholl.
Our Miniature Navy. Illustrated. Whitman Osgood and George P. Conn.
A Bird Talk, Illustrated. John Burroughs.
The Monkeys of Amber. Illustrated, Clara E. Clement.
General Tom Thumb. Illustrated. Mary Shears Roberts,

Saint Peter's .- 37, ESSEX STREET, STRAND. 6d. Nov. Saint Peter's,—37, ESSEX STEEET, STRAND. Od. Nov.
Specialists in Fiction. Charles T. Waters.
Three in Lakeland. Illustrated. J. M. Stone.
The Holy Wells of Ireland. Illustrated. Rev. John Healy.
The True Legend of the Four Crowned Saints—"Sancti Quattro Coronati." Illustrated. Leader Scott.
The Luxury of Modern Railway Travel in America. Illustrated. Eric Scott.

School Board Gazette, -Bemrose. 1s. Oct. School Savings Banks. Prevention of Infection in Schools Local Areas of Secondary Education Authorities.
Training-Ships: Precaution against Fire.
The Care of the Feeble-Minded.
School Planning. Continued. School Music Review.-Novello. 14d. Nov.

School Music in Ireland.
School Music at the Cape. F. Farrington.
Songs in: Both Notations:—"The Empire Flag," by A. C. Mackenzie;
"The Polka," by T. Facer.

School World .- MACMILLAN. 6d. Oct. The Position and Teaching of German. E. L. Milner-Barry. The Floor of the Ocean. Sir John Murray.

The Ideal Assistant Master. Canon Fowler.
On the Teaching of English Reading. Nellie Dale.
School Hygiene. Continued. C. E. Shelly.

Science Gossip .-- 110, STRAND. 6d. Nov. Science cossist,—110, STRAND, OL, NOV.
Samuel Stevens, With Portrait, J. T. Carrington.
The Valley of the Tochi River, Illustrated, B. M. Skinner.
Foraminifera of the Tochi Valley, Illustrated, Arthur Earland, Radiography, Illustrated, James Quick,
Butterflies of the Palexarctic Region, Illustrated, H. C. Lang, Armature of Helicoid Landshells, Concluded, G. K. Gude, Scots Magazine.-Houlston. 6d. Oct.

The Scot at Home and Abroad. John Imrie.
The Fair City of Perth. D. B. A.
Laureate-Lore. Mrs. Isa Forsyth.
The Edinburgh Circulating Library. Adam S
Nov. Adam Smail. The Mathesons. Continued. Kenneth Matheson.
Northumbrian Funerals. Rev. J. Hudson.
The Bible in Scottish Ecclesiastical Polity. Norman Macleod Cail.
The "Athenian Oracle." G. W. Niven.

Th: Scottish Postal System in 1753 and 1759. Adam Smail. Scottish Geographical Magazine,—Edward Stanford. 15. 6d. Oct.

Address to the Geographical Section of the British Association, 1879. With Map. Sir John Murray. Ascent of the Biafo Glacier and Hispar Pass; Two Pioneer Ascents in the Karakoraun. Fanny Bullock Workman.

Scottish Review .- 26, PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 48. Oct. The Royal Library. J. M. Stone.
Discoveries in Western Asia. C. R. Conder.
The Ossianic Ballads. W. A. Craige.
Mr. Rudyard Kipling's Prose Writings.
The Wesdewburn Book. A. H. Millar.
Charles the Bold; a Notable Failure. Fermartine.

Scribner's Magazine.—Sampson Low. 18. Nov.
The Great November Storm of 1898. Illustrated. H. W. Ditzler.
Pictorial Photography. Illustrated. Alfred Stieglitz.
Autobiographical. Illustrated. Continued. Mrs. John Drew.
The Letters of Robert Louis Stevenson. Sidney Colvin.
The Paris of Honoré de Balzac. Illustrated. Benjamin Ellis Martin and Charlotte M. Martin.
The Formation and Control of Trusts. Arthur T. Hadley.

Strad .- 186, FLEET STREET. 2d. Nov. Antonius Stradivarius. Continued. H. Petherick. Edward Heron-Allen. With Portrait. Rev. W. Meredith-Morris. The Literature of the Violincello. Continued. E. van Der Straeten.

Strand Magazine.-GRORGE NEWNES. 6d. Nov. In Search of a Derelict. Illustrated. A. P. Buller. Bishop Creighton: Interview. Illustrated. R. de Cordova. Great Showers of Shooting Stars. Il.ustrated. Sir R. Ball. Old Puzzle Cards. Illustrated.

Sunday at Home.—56, PATERNOSTER ROW. 6d. Nov.
The Dawn of Light in Central Africa. Illustrated. Albert B. Lloyd.
At the Heart of London. Illustrated. Isabella Fyvie Mayo.
Every-Day Jewish Life in London. Holden Pite.
The Huguenot Seminary at Wellington, South Africa. Illustrated. Robert

Sunday Magazine, —Isbister. 6d. Nov. Some Great Foreign Churches. Illustrated. W. V. Taylor. The Cycle from Many Standpoints. Mrs. Hugh Price Hughes. Christians versus Non-Christians. Illustrated. Harold Macfarlanc.

Temple Bar.-MACMILLAN. 18. Nov.

Life in a Russian Monastery. A. M. Brice.
Notes from the North Country.
Thomas Otway. H. M. Sanders.
The Tuscan Temperament. M. Carmichael.
Rambles amid the Border Castles of Monmouthshire.

Temple Magazine.-Horace Marshall. 6d. Nov. Caravan Life; an Amateur Vagrant. Illustrated. Clive Holland.
The Romance of the Revised Version, Illustrated. Clive Holland.
The Adulteration of Our Daily Food. Illustrated. Chas. Hyst.-Woolf.
Miss Agnes Weston. Illustrated. Alfred E. Hanscomb.
The China Inland Mission. Illustrated. Stephen Stapleton.
The Humorous Side of a Parson's Life. Rev. C. H. Grundy.
Life on an Ocean Tramp. Illustrated. W. W. Cuthbertson.
Epworth; the Home of Methodism. Illustrated. Audrey Winter.

Theosophical Review .- 26, Charing Cross. 28. Oct. Theosophical Réview.—25, Charing Cross. 18. Oct. Agrippa of Nettesheim: a Famous Magician. Margaret S. Duncan. The Function of Quietism. Miss Hardcastle. The Troubadours. Mrs. Cooper-Oakley. Hermes the Thrice-Greatest and the Mysteries of Egypt and Phœnicia. G. R. S. Mead.
A Reply to "Comprehensiveness." Mme. de Steiger. The Latest Step in Modern Philosophy. Continued. Bertram Keightley. Ancient Peru. Continued. C. W. Leadbeater.

Travel.—Horace Marshall. 3d. Oct.
Our World's Cycling Commission. Illustrated. Continued. John Foster Fraser and Others.
The Blood-Tax on the Pyrenees. Illustrated. P. Shaw Jeffery. Round about Ragusa. Illustrated. Mrs. E. M. Lynch. A Trip to the Bermudas, Illustrated. Raymond Blathwayt. Through the Niger Delta. Harold Bindloss.

United Service Magazine. - WILLIAM CLOWES. 25. Oct. Commodore John Watson. W. Roberts,
Some of my Shipmates. Robert Lendall.
The Beginning of the Spanish Succession; Marlborough's First Campaigns, William O'Connor Morris.
The Campaign of Lewes. Henry Elliot Malden.
The Royal Garrison Artillery. "Ego."
The Volunteers as Field Artillery. Lieut. C. Holmes Wilson.

Three Empires. C. de Thierry. Lord Cromer in Egypt. J. Stuart Horner. Sevastopol Re-visited. Chersonese. me Observations on the India of the Sixties. Col. R. H. Rosser.

Werner's Magazine.—43, East 19TH STREET, New York.
25 cents. Oct. The Poetry of Science.

Wesleyan Methodist Magazine. CHARLES KELLY. 6d. Oct. St. Bartholomew the Great; the Oldest Church in London, Illustrated. E. W. Richardson. The Churchmanship of Alfred the Great. Illustrated. William H. Moseley.

Westminster Review.-F. WARNE. 25. 6d. Nov.

Westminster Review.—F. Warne. 28. 6
England and the Transval. W. J. Corbet.
Do the Contagious Diseases Acts Succeed?
The Keystone of Land Monopoly. G. F. Saunders.
Coming Contest with Monopolists. Robert Ewen.
A Trip in Northern China. Chas. E. D. Black.
Old-Age Pensions. John Trist.
Walt Whitman; the Poet of Brotherwood. J. A. MacCu Sterra Leone; the White Man's Grave. George Pringle.
The Modern Woman. Herbert Jamieson, Social Evolution. Harold Thomas.
A Note on Fielding's Amelia. Clara Thomson. J. A. MacCulloch.

Wide World Magazine. - George Newnes. 6d. In the Khalifa's Clutches. Continued. Illustrated. Chas. Neufeld. The "Holy Blood" Procession at Bruges. Illustrated. Mrs. Lily The "Holy Blood" Processon.

Bridgman.
The Le Harvest of Iowa. Illustrated. W. E. Barlow.
My Visit to the Island of the Dead in Cardigan Bay, Illustrated. M.
Dinorben Griffith.

Unknown Ugunda.

Illustrated. Lieut. R. Bright.
Illustrated. Alexander J. Svoboda. Our Adventures in Unknown Ugʻinda. Illustrated. Lieut. R. Bright. Among Kurdish Brigands in Armenia. Illustrated. Alexander J. Svoboda. The Hermits of the Sierra Morena. Illustrated. Herbert Vivian. A Missionary on the Upper Congo. Illustrated. Rev. Chas. John Dodds.

Windsor Magazine,-WARD, LOCK. 6d. Nov. Menelik and His People. Illustrated. Cleveland Moffett.
Photography as a Royal Hobby. Illustrated. A. Wallis Myers.
The Making of a Pipe. Illustrated. F. A. Tallot.
The Angler-Fish. Illustrated. Edward Step.
Hon. Lady Murray's Home of Rest for Authors and Artists; a Citadel of Hope. Illustrated. E. Leuty Collins.
Liverpool; the Shipping Centre of the World. Illustrated. Robert Machray.

Woman at Home. - Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. Nov. Viscount Peel and His Family. Illustrated. Mrs. S. A. Tooley. Emma Calvé. Illustrated. "X." Private Teaching as an Employment for Women. Marion Leslie.

Womanhood. — 5, AGAR STREET, STRAND. 6d. Oct. Girls in Our Reformatories. Illustrated. C. E. de Moleyns. The Future of Our Working Girls. Mrs. H. A. Johnson. Nov.

Women in Germany. Countess A. von Bothmer.

Young Man,—Horace Marshall. 3d. Nov.
Round St. Paul's Cathedral with Archdeacon Sinclair, Illustrated. A. Porritt. The Degeneracy of Our Drama, Edv. "Ecce Homo," J. Marshall Mather. Edw. F. Spencer.

Young Woman .- HORACE MARSHALL. 3d. Nov. How China strikes an Englishman; Interview with Mrs. Archibald Little Illustrated. Arthur Mec. A Winter Holiday in the High Alps. Illustrated. Dora M. Jones.

THE GERMAN MAGAZINES.

Aligemeine Konservative Monatsschrift.—E. Ungleich, Leipzig. 1 Mk. Oct.

The Centenary of Schiller's "Lied von der Glocke," F. W. Schubart. Kant and His Philosophy. Dr. P. Paulsen. Johann Kaspar Bluntschli in Baden. Continued. Pfarrer R. Kern. The Dining-Rooms of the North. German Lloyd. C. Franken. The Polish Question

Alte und Neue Welt .- Benziger, Einsiedeln. 50 Pf. Oct. Monkeys. Illustrated. Dr. F. Knauer, Marcus Aurelius. Dr. N. Bödige. The Dreyfus Case. Illustrated, Dr. O. Dresemann, The New German Civil Code. C. Buria. Artillery. Continued. Illustrated. M. Roda.

Daheim.-Poststrasse 9, Leipzig. 2 Mks. per qr. Oct. 7. German Antiquities. Prof. E. Heyck. Country Postal Service. A. O. Klaussmann.

Oct. 14. England and the Transvaal. A. F. Charpentier, The German Emperor's Stables. Illustrated. F. Fre herr von Dincklage. Oct. 21.

The Jubilee of the Technical High School at Berlin. Illustrated. A. Foerster.

The German Emperor's Stables. Continued. Illustrated. F. Freiherr von

Karl Ditters von Dittersdorf. Dr. J. Stinde.

Deutscher Hausschatz.-F. PUSTET, REGENSBURG. 40 Pf. Heft 1. Paris. Illustrated. Dr. J. B. Weckerle.
Thirty-Five Years in Siberia. Illustrated. T. H. Lange.
The Forty-Sixth Catholic Assembly in Germany. Illustrated. O. von Schaching.
The Modern Freshwater Aquarium. Illustrated. Dr. F. Knauer. Fra

Sci Ba Ge Un Ru Th Or Hu Ut

De

Th

D

Deutsche Revue.—Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart. 6 Mks. per qr. Oct.

Fragments from an Unpublished Diary of a Russian Princess. Louise Lüdemann.

Science and Co-operation in Natural Science Research. Prof. W. Foerster.
Bayreuth, 1875-6. Carl E. Docpler.
Germany and the United States. John T. Morgan.
Unpublished Letters of George Bancroft's. Gen. J. G. Wilson.
Russia and the Campaign of 1849.
The Influence of Artificial Light on the Sight. Dr. O. von Sicherer.
Originality. Dr. W. Kienzl.
Humanity in Hospitals. Sir W. Duckworth.
Utterances of Important Contemporaries. Louise von Kobell.
Impressions of South Africa. Bruno Beheim-Schwarzbach.

Deutsche Rundschau.-Gebrüder Paetel, Berlin. 6 Mks. per qr.

The Founding of the Deutsche Rundschau.

In the Headquarters of the Second Silesian Army (1866) under Crown Prince Frederick William of Prussia. J. von Verdy du Vernois.

On Systems. E. Zeller.
Vouthful Reminiscences. Paul Heyse.
Aphorisms by Emanuel Geibel.

The Literature of the Veda. H. Oldenberg.

A Visit to Goethe in 1808.

ct.

trated.

un H.

Lily

. M.

boda.

odds.

del of obert

A.

Little

ge.

A von

t z.

von

Deutsche Worte.-Langegasse, 15, Vienna VIII./1. 50 Krs. Sept. Socialism and the Nationality Question. Dr. C. Schitlowsky. The Labour Movement in Russia. J. Lelin.

Euphorion.—CARL FROMME, VIENNA. 4 Mks. Heft 2. Ditz Research. Max Rub-nsohn.

Opitz Research. Max Rub-nsohn.

Ronsard and Schwabe von d.: Heide. Rudolf Schlösser.

"Marlbrouk s'en vat -en Guerre." A. Kopp.

The Wallenstein of Halem and of Schiller. K. Albrecht.

Schack von Staff-idet. R. Palleske.

O. Ludwigs "Genoveva-Fragm.nte." H. Kraeger.

Friedrich Hebbel and Arnold Schloenbach. R. M. Werner.

Gartenlaube.—ERNST KEIL'S NACHE., LEIPZIG. 50 Pf. Heft 10. GAPTONIAUDO, —ERNST KELLS TACHE, LEHZIG. 50 FL. Hell 10. The Influence of the Atlantic on the Climate of Europe. Dr. H. J. Klein. The Sport Exhibition at Munich. Illustrated. B. Rauchenagger. In Strasburg a Hundred Years Ago. Dr. E. Rechert. A German-American National Holiday. Illustrated. R. Cronau. Neuburg, near Heidelberg. Illustrated. L. Werner. The Röntgen Rays in Medicine and Surgery. Dr. J. H. Baas.

Tragedies and Comedies of Superstition. H. Niebuhr, The Freudenstadt Jubilee. Illustrated. A Freihofer. Vincenz Priessnitz. With Portrait. C. Falk-nhorst. Sci.ntific Research on the Bovensee. Dr. K. Lampert, Marienburg. Illustrated. E. Wichert. Graf Gustav Adolf von Gotter. R. von Gottschall.

Gesellschaft .- J. C. C. Bruns, Minden. 75 Pf. Oct. z. The Dwellings of the Poor. Max May.

The Dwellings of the Poor. Max May.

G. Conrad as Novelist. With Portrait. H. H. Houben.

Literary Expansion in America. A. von Eude.

Catholicism and Modern Literature. Continued. E. Gystrow.

Adolf Pichler. H. Greinz.

Kunstgewerbeblatt. - Seemann and Co., Leipzig. 1 Mk. Oct. Alphons Maria Mucha. Illustrated. A. Hofmann, Decorative Art in France.

Neue Deutsche Rundschau,—S. FISCHER, BERLIN. 1 Mk. 50 Pf.

The Struggle for the State. Houston Stewart Chamberlain. Nietzsche on Wife, Love, and Marriage. Elisabeth Förster-Nietzsche. The Nobility and the People. R. Meyer. The Drama Old and New. Monty Jacobs.

Nord und Süd .- Schlesische Verlags-Amstalt, Breslau. 9 Mks Oct.

Maltre Labori. With Portrait. Justus. Europe 1898-9. Continued. Optimist. Lavater on His Meeting with Go-the at Ems, 1774. H. Funck. A Little Silesian Town Seventy Years Ago. M. Beerel. The Revolution of 1849 in Baden. K. Günther.

Stimmen aus Maria-Laach.—Herder, Freiburg, Baden 10 Mks. 80 Pf. per ann. Oct.
The Civil Code and Natural Rights. A. Lehmkuhl.
Scientific Religion and Ethics. V. Cathrein.
The First Debates on the Shorter Catechism of the Vatican Council. T. Granderath, Librari-s and Archives of the Romish Church in the First Thousand Years.

J. Hilgers.
The Sense of Sight in Eyeless Animals. Concluded. C. Wasmann.

Ueber Land und Meer. -- DRUTSCHE VERLAGS-ANSTALT, STUTTGART.
1 Mark. Heft 3.

Stilts in Les Landes. Illustrated. P. Kauffman.
Schloss Ull-rsdorf. Illustrated. Dr. M. Necker.
Adolf Pichler. Illustrated. A. Brandl.
The Balloon of Graf von Zeppelin Illustrated. G. Lavering.
The Three Romances of Frédéric Chopin. Illustrated. A. von Winterf.Jd.
The Kaiser Manœuvres of 1899. Illustrated. G. Fischer.

Ver Sacrum.-E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPZIG. 15 Mks. per ann. Heft 8. The Court Pavilion of the Vienna City Railway. Illustrated. V. S. Studies by Max Klinger: Illustrations. The New Building School at Vienna. The Reformed Academy. V. S.

Vom Fels zum Moop.—Union-Deutsche-Verlagsgesellschaft, Stuttgart. 75 Pf. Heft 3.

Villa Catena. Illustrated. R. Voss. German Coffee Plantations in German East Africa. The Van Dyck Exhibition at Antwerp. Illustrated. A. Ruhemann. Heft 4.

In Franz von Sickingen's Country. Illustrated. M. Passer. On Gout. Dr. G. Kreusner. Goethe's "Tasso" and Karl Ludwig von Knebel. Otto Harnack. Ancient Rome in Roumani.. Illustrated. J. Kraner.

Die Zeit.-Günthergasse 1, Vienna IX./3. 50 Pf. Oct. 7. The Boers and their Country. Dr. L. Lange.
The Foundations of the 19th Century. Prof. T. Ziegler.
Segantini. R. Muther.

Oct. 14.
The Boers and the English Liberals. F. W. Hirst. Katsky v. Bernstein. Prof. T. G. Masaryk. The 19th Century. Continued.
The Telediagraph. L. Silberstein.

Oct. 21. The Language Question in the Light of Catholic Moral Philosophy. Dr. O. Lecher.
Oskar Baumann. Prof. O. Lenz.

Zeitschrift für Bildende Kunst.—E. A. Seemann, Leipzig. 26 Mis., per ann. Oct. Harro Magnussen. Illustrated. M. G. Zimmermann. The Mediaval Mural Paintings at Schleswig. Baurat Hotzen.

Zeitschrift für Bücherfreunde.—Velhagen und Klasing, Leitzig.

2 Mks. August—Oct.

Artistic Book-Covers. Illustrated. Continued. W. von Zur Westen.

"Novæ Epistolae Obscurorum Virorum"; a Satire of 1849. D. E. Schwetschke.

THE FRENCH MAGAZINES.

Association Catholique. -3, Rue de L'Abbaye, Paris. 2 frs. Oct. 15.

Charity, Justice, and Property. Ch. de Ponshlère. The Congress of German Cathotics at Neisse. H. Cetty. The Clerical Reunion at Cahors. Testis.

Bibliothèque Universelle,—18, King William Street, Strand. 203. per annum. Oct.

The Philippines. Edmond Plauchut.
Dramatic Music in Russia. Michel Delines.
Zionism and the Jewish Colonies in Palestine. Ilia Grünberg.
The Sanctuaries of Asclepiades and Miraculous Healing in Greece. P. Vallette. John Knox at Geneva. F. F. Roget. France and the Dreyfus Trial. Ed. Tallichet.

: Correspondant,-14, Rue de L'Abbaye, Paris. 2 frs. 50 c. Oct. 10.

Dupont des Loges and Manteuffel. F. Klein.
The Dreyfus Case. Ch. Descotay.
The Portuguese Possessions in South Africa. Continued. Jean Darcy.

Bossuet at Meaux. Concluded. H. Druon. The Statue of the Duc d'Aumale at Chantilly. Clarisse Bader. Oct. 25.

The High Court in France. A. Lair.
The Geographical Congress at Berlin. A. de Lapparent.
Eugénie Milleret de Brou and the Sisters of the Assumption. P. ThureauDangin.

Notes on Japan. M. de Sernay. Unpublished Correspondence of Paul Fével. Edmond Biré, Renaud de Chantillon and the Decline of Christian Rule in Jerusalem. H.

Humanité Nouvelle .- 15, RUE DES SAINTS-PÈRES, PARIS. 1 fr. 25 c. Oct. 10.

The Natural History of the Jesus Legend. G. Lejeal.
Hate as a Social Force. V. Couraud.
The Formation of the Universe and the State of Matter. Concluded. L. Gustant.
The South African Question. E. Roels.
The Evolution of Modesty. Dr. Havelock Ellis.

Journal des Économistes.—14, RUE RICHELIEU, PARIS. 3 frs. 50 c. Oct. 15. The Parliamentary Work of the Chamber of Deputies, 1898-9. A. Liesse. The Monument to Schultze-Delitzsch in Berlin. A. Raffalovich. Taxation in Italy. P. A. Ghio.

Ménestrel.-2 bis, Rue Vivienne, Paris. 30 c. Oct. 1, 15, 22, 29. Jean Jacques Rousseau as a Musician. Continued. A. Pougin.

Mercure de France.—15, Rue de L'Echaudé-Saint-Germain, Paris. det.
Against the Infallibility of the Army. P. Quillard.
From Kant to Nietzsche. Continued. J. de Gaultier.
Savonarola. J. Mesnil.

Monde Moderne. -5, Rue St. Benoit, Paris. 1 fr. 60 c. Oct. mes. Illustrated. Paul Clauzel. Ninies. This rateu. Au Chize.

The Plantin Museum at Antwerp.

Illustrated. E. Monteil.

Modern Steamships. Illustrated. Daniel Bellet.

The Perfune Industry. at Crasse and Nics. Illustrated. A. M. Villon.

Optic Telgraphy. Illustrated. Jean Dara.

Studs. Illustrated. Vilostrated. Plantine de Heussey.

Nouvelle Revue.—18, King William Street, Strand. 30s. per half-year. Oct. 1.

Napoleon and the Russian Campaign. Count Tolstoi.
The North of Syria. L. de Contenson.
The Telepathic Manifestations of the Dying. C. Flammarion.
Contemporary French Society. P. Duplan.
The Colonizing Genius of France. F. Mury.
The 130th Goethe Anniversary. J. Diény.
Letters on Foreign Politics. Mine. Juliette Adam.
Oct. 15.
A Letter from Madame Juliette Adam.

Oct. 15.

A Letter from Madame Juliette Adam.
Our Political Views. Mirman, Viviani, Denys Cochin.
An Art Causerie. B. Constant.
Colonial Pacification and Colonization. General Gallieni.
The France of the East. P. B. Gheusi.
The Code of Military Justice. G. Bouniols.
Letters on Foreign Politics. Mme. Juliette Adam.

Nouvelle Revue Internationale. -23. Boulevard Poissonière, Paris. 2 frs. 50 c. Oct. 2.

The Rennes Trial. Marie L. de Rute. Review of European Politics. E. de Kératry. Women in the Poets. Octave Lacroix. Legal Tyranny. Pierre Denis.

Women in the Dreyfus Case. Maris L, de Rute, Parliamentarism. Pierre Denis. The Rush for Gold in Africa. Gen. Turr. Hintze Ribeiro. O, d'Arville.

Réforme Sociale .- 54, Rue de Seine, Paris. 1 fr. Oct. 1. The Future of the Family in France. Baron J. des Rotours. Professional Education for Women in Belgium. Mlle. Marie Du Caju.

Oct. 16.

The Decline of the Middle Classes in France.
The History of the Saints. A. Delaire.

Revue de l'Art .- 28, Rue du Mont-Thabor, Paris. 7 frs. 50 c. Oct. 10. ment to Death, Illustrated. M. Demaison.

M. Bartholomé and His Monument to Death, Illustrated, M. J. The Hötel de Ville, Paris, Illustrated, Fiérens-Gevaert, Illustrated, Fachibition at Antwerp, Illustrated, J. Durand, Van Dyck and Anguissola, Illustrated, Fournier Sarlovèze, The Fine Arts in Japan, Illustrated, F. Régamey, Revue Blanche,—1, RUE LAFFITTE, PARIS. 1 fr. Oct. 1.

The Dreyfus Affair and the Principle of Authority. J. Benda.
The Artistic Evolution of Hungary. R. Chelard.
Oct. 15.
The Industrial Problem in Russia. P. Louis.
Emile Zola's "Fécandie" C. Kaha.

The Industrial Problem in Russia. P. Emile Zola's "Fécondité." G. Kahn.

Revue Bleue .- FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 6d. Sept. 30. Théodore Mommsen. A. Guilland. The Van Dyck Exhibition at Antwerp. P. Flat.

Oct. 7.

The Soldier in the French Literature of the Eighteenth Century. C. Dejob. Judicial Reform in France. F. Dreyfus.

Alfred de Vigny and Marie Dorval. L. Séché.
Popular Poetry in Roumania. E. Schuré.
Oct. 21.

English and Boers.
Oddion Barrot. J. Ernest-Charles.
Oct. 28. The French Commune and the Press. H. The Events of the Century. J. Guillemot.

Revue des Deux Mondes, -18, King William Street, Strand.
30s. per half-year. Oct. 1.

The Spanish Nation. A. Fouillée: The Poetry of the Troubadours. A. Jeanroy.
The Grande Mademoiselle. Continued. Arvède Barine.
A Diary in Central Asia. E. Blanc.
A Revolutionary Document.
The Plague. A. Dastre. Oct. 15.

The Embassy of the Duc Decares, 1820-1821. E. Daudet.
Musical Epochs; in the Days of Antiquity. C. Bellaigue.
British Primary Schools. G. Bonet-Maury.
A Diary in Central Asia. E. Blanc.
Democracy the Decaret of Embasses.

Revue de Basses. E. Blanc.
Beyne de Basses. E. Blanc.
Beyne de Basses. E. Blanc.

Revue d'Économie Politique .-- 22, RUE SOUFFLOT, PARIS. 20 frs. per ann. Sept.
Finance and Industry in Geneva. A. Achard.
Democratic Reforms on Taxation in France. P. du Maroussem.

Revue Encyclopédique.—18, King William Street, Strand. 7s. per qr. Sept. 3o.

Revue Ency 7s. per 4.

Epinal. Illustrated. L. Descaves.
The Paire Mission in Siam. Illustrated. C. Mourey.
Oct. 7.
Oct. 7.
System. Illustrated. J. Boyer. The Centenary of the Metric System. Illustrated. A. Ebray.
Oct. 14.

The Drama. Illustrated. G. Geffroy. Scandinavia. L. Maury.

Art in Belgium. Illustrated. Octave Maus. Provençal Poets of the Reign of Terror. Illustrated. E. Rougier.

Revue Française de l'Etranger et des Colonies.—32, Rue de LA Victoire, Paris. 2 frs. Oct.

The Transvaal and the Risks of War. G. Demanche. Klondike. With Map. J. Servigny. Time and Universal Longitude. E. Cugnin. The City of Fez, Morocco. With Plan. Weisgerber.

Revue Générale.—16, Rue Treurenberg, Brussels. 12 frs. per annum. Oct.
The Federation of Catholic Associations and Circles. C. Woeste.

Ceylon, J. Lecleroq.
A Parisian Chronicle, 1802–3, A. de Ridder.
The Correspondence of Abbé Morellet.
The Reorganisation of Military Tribunals in Belgium, Ed. van Der Smissen.

Revue Internationale de Sociologie,—16, Rue Soufflot, Paris. 18 frs. per ann. Sept.
The Militarism of the Future. F. Cosentini.
Bernardin de Saint-Pierre and Feminism. E. Sambuc.

Revue pour les Jeunes Filies. -5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 1 fr. 50 c. Oct 5.

Pierre Nozière. Jeanne Violet. Deaf-Mutes. Edouard Drouot. The Germany of Goethe. Concluded. E. Tissot. Marriage among the People of Russi 1. T. Cahu. Oct. 20.

The Phantom Ship. H. Olivier.
The Chardin Centenary. R. Bouyer.
The Musical Education of Gids. Mme. Marrochetti.
The Great Telescope for the Paris Exposition of 1900. G. Colomb.

Revue du Monde Catholique, 76, Rue des Saints-Pères, Paris.
I fr. 50 c. Oct. 1.

The Protestant Peril. Abbé Cornut.
African Monarchism. Continued. Dom Besse.
Freemasonry and Liberty. Continued. F. Veuillot. Oct. 15.

The Union for Liberty. H. Reverdy. The Eternity of the Pains of Hell. J. Turmel and R. P. Fontaine. African Monarchism. Concluded. Dom. Besse. Freemasonry and Liberty. Concluded. F. Veuillot.

Revue de Paris .- 18, King William Street, Strand. 60 frs. per annum. Oct 1.

At Reims, 1825-1838. Victor Hugo. At Reims, 1825-1838. Victor Hugo.
The Suez Canal. J. Charles-Roux.
Henry von Treitschke. A. Guilland.
Notes concerning a Youth.
Notes on the Italian People. G. G'stinel,
A National Reconcillation. E. Lavisse.

Oct. 15. Unpublished Works, A. Chenier.
The Suez Canal. Continued. J Charles-Roux.
In the Philippines; the Siege of Manilla. Lieut
Transportation to Siberia. S. Dujour.

Revue Politique et Parlementaire .- 5, Rue de Mézières, Paris.

The Reform of Military Jurisdiction in France. H. Barboux.
Educational Reform. X. Torau-Bayle.
The University of Algeria. E. Larcher.
Decentralisation and Liberty in France. J. Imbart de la Tour.
Commercial Speculation in England and the Fall of Prices. A. E. Sayous.

Revue des Revues .- 12, Avenue de L'O. ERA, PARIS. 1 fr. Oct. 1. The Making of the Popular Novel. F. Loliéz.
The Popular Novel. F. Loliéz.
The Popular Novel To-day. Symposium.
King Milan of Servia. Comte de Sainte-André.
American Millionaires. Continued. L. de Norvins.
The Neo-Egyptian Literature. Illustrated. J. d'Ivray.
King Mithridate and the Invention of Serum-Therapeutics.
The Centenary of the Invertion of Fire-Pumps. Illustrated. J. de Nouvion.
Contemporary Italy. E. Tissot. Sant Post

The

Unpu

The !

Fruit

Geole

Russ

Cl

Is th The The Anti

The

Co

Leo

Mod

The

The

Petra

Japa

The Artis

N

Re

Mich V Plea

Oct. 15,
When does the Twentieth Century begin? C. Flammarion.
The New University of Brussels, E. Ferri.
The Life and Death of Prince Rudolph of Hapsburg. Illustrated. Princess Odescalchi.
Unpublished Letters of George Sand. G. d'Heylli.
The Neo-Hebraic Literature. A. Ludvipol.
The Marvels of Liquid Air and the Treatment of Cancer. Dr. Sicard.

rs. per

D.

E DE

per

Der

215

RIS.

15.

Revue Scientifique, -FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 6d.

Sept 30. The Physical Life of Our Planet. A. Klossovsky. Mckhitar de Her and His Treatise on Fevers. V. H. Torkomian.

Oct. 7. e Work of Duchenne of Boulogne. M. Brissaud. Fruit-Culture. E. Ratoin.

Geological Time. Archibald Geikie.

The Culture of the Pearl Oyster and the Formation of the Pearl.

L. Diguet.

Marine Life. Karl Brandt. Russia and the Meridian of Universal Time. C. Tondini di Quarenghi.

Surgery and the Open Air Cure. A. Poncet.
The Distribution of Rain on the Surface of the Earth. A. Souleyre.

Revue Socialiste. -78, PASSAGE CHOISEUL, PARIS. 1 fr. 50 c. Oct. The Growth of French Socialism. E. Fournière. The Far East. Paul Louis.
The Naturalisation of Algerian Jews. L. Durieu.

543

Revue Universitaire. - 5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 10 frs. per ann. Oct. 15.

Report of the Examination in History and Geography. P. Foncin.

The Teaching of Ancient Literatures in Girls' Schools. Mlle, A. Couvreur. Montaigne's Essays. E. Champion.

Revue de l'Université de Bruxelles.—37, Boulevard du Nord, Brussels, 1 fr. so c. Oct. BRUSSELS. 1 fr. 50 c.

An Elementary Lesson on Darwinism. L. Errera. The Law of Mortgage and the Interests of the Public. Prof. P. Eycken. Some Psycho-Pedagogic Experiences. Mlle. H. Morcau.

Université Catholique.-Burns and Oates. 20 frs. per ann. Oct. 15. Encyclical of Pope Leo XIII. to the Clergy of France. The Epistle to the Galatians. E. Jacquier. Alcoholism. Concluded. A. Ardiun. The Triple Alliance. Continued. Comte J. Grabinski.

THE ITALIAN MAGAZINES.

Civiltà Cattolica.-VIA DI RIPETTA 246, ROME. 25 frs. per annum. Oct. 7.

Encyclical Letter of Leo XIII. to the French Bishops.

The Concordat between the First Consul and Pius VII.

The Spurious Letters of L. Ganganelli. Oct. 21.

Anti-Clericalism and Dreyfus.
Boniface VIII. and a Dante Commentator. The Perils of Americanism Count de Gubernatis and the Jesuits.

Cosmos Catholicus.-TIPOGRAFIA VATICANA, ROME. 30 frs. per annum. Sept. 15.

Leo XIII. and Christian Classical Poetry. A. Bartolini.
The Work of Léon Harmel. J. Fraiken.
Modern and Ancient Charity. Prof. Tomassetti.
Francis of Assisi. F. Ballerini.

Flegrea.-Piazzetta Mondragone, Naples. Sept. 20. Magdala; in the Land of Jesus. Matilde Serao, J. M. de Heredia. D. de Roberto.

Oct. 5.
The Plays of François de Curel. R. Forster.

Nuova Antologia. -VIA S. VITALE 7, ROME. 46 frs. per annum.

The Orientalists in Rome. Prof. A. de Gubernatis.
Petrarch and St. Augustine. Carlo Segrè.
The Second Ruspoli Expedition into Africa. A. Rossi.
Japanese Literature. G. Passigli.

Oct. 10.

F. Carrara and the Positivist School. N. Gallo.
The Second Ruspoli Expedition into Africa. Concluded. A. Rossi.
Bethlehem. Matilde Serao.
G. Segantini and F. Palizzi. Ugo Ogetti.
The Municipality of Milan. G. Vigoni.

Rassegna Nazionale. - Via della Pace 2, Florence. 30 frs. per ann. Oct. 1.

Municipal Electors. Ugo Pesci. Finland and Russia. S. Gemma. Pico della Miravelela and the Civilta Cattolica. G. Pagani. The Idea of Social Justice. A. Premoli.

Oct. 16. The Economic Triumphs of Germany, T. M.
The Fall of the Richelieu-Pasquier Cabinet. G. Grabinski.
Slavery and Christianity in the Roman State. C. Durazzo.
The Virgin in Italian Art. S. Ricci.
Ecclesiastics and Military Service. G. Traversari.

Rivisita Internazionale.-VIA TORRE ARGENTINA 76, ROME. 30 frs. per ann. Sept. The United States Mercantile Marine. Carlo Bruno. The Eighth Centenary of the First Crusade. G. Volpe.

Rivisita Politica e Letteraria, —3, VIA MARCO MINGHETTI, ROME. 16 frs. per ann. Oct.

The French Peril. XXX. Transformations in Political Power. P. Orano. Oriental Studies in Italy. Dr. G. Chialvo.

THE SPANISH AND PORTUGUESE MAGAZINES.

Cludad de Dios .- REAL MONASTERIO DEL ESCORIAL, MADRID. 20 pesetas per annum. Oct. 5.

The Gragorian Chant; an Important Contribution to Its History. F. da Uriarte. Artistic Education and Its Value. Luis Villalba.

España Moderna. — Cuesta de Santo Domingo 16, Madrid

40 pesetas per annum. Oct. The Evolution of History. J. P. de Guzman. Santa Cruz de la Seros. V. Lamperez y Romea. Poets of America. Juan-C. Rosel.
On the Originality and Universality of a People. J. Fichte. Spanish-American Matters. Job.

O Instituto.—University of Coimbra, Portugal. 9d. Oct. The Economic Doctrines of Karl Marx. A. A. Pires de Lima. Studies in Greek History. Dr. Francesco P. Garofalo. The Origin of Villa Real. J. A. Ayres d'Azevedo.

Revista Contemporanea.—Calle de Pizareo 17, Madrid. 2 pesetas. Sept. 30. The Working Classes and Combination. M. G. Maestre. The Latin Race. Jose P. Guerrero. A Study of the Middle Ages. Ernesto Amador.

Principles on Which the Reform of Our Laws and Institutions should be Based. Manuel Duran y Bas, Minister of Justice.
Centralisation in Spanish Politics. J. S. de Toca.
Brute Force. Pelayo Vizuete.

THE DUTCH MAGAZINES.

Elsevier's Geillustreerd Maandschrift.—Luzac and Co., 46, Great Russell Street. 18. 8d. Oct.
Michael Angelo and his Work. Illustrated. A. van der Meulen.
The Van Dyck Festival at Antwerp. Illustrated. N. H. Wolf.
The Cathedrals of Northern France. Illustrated. J. B. de Gou.

Woord en Beeld,-ERVEN F BOHN, HAARLEM. 16s. per annum. October. Pleasure Resorts in Our Own Country. Illustrated. F. Smit Kleine.

De Glds .- LUZAC AND Co. 38. Oct. "Young Turkey." Prof. van den Berg.
The Great Lockout in Denmark. Margaretha Meijboom.
In Remembrance of Peter Jakob Cosijn. Dr. A. Kluyver.

Vragen des Tijds .- Luzac and Co. 18. 6d. Oct. Sexual Physiology. Dr. C. J. Wijnaendts Francken.
Admission of Female Students to the Higher Schools. B. W. Mondt.
The Use of White Phosphorus in Match-making. I. P. de Vooys.

THE SCANDINAVIAN MAGAZINES.

Kringsjaa.-Olaf Norli, Christiania. 2 kr. per quarter. Sept. 30. A Norwegian Lady in Manilla during the War. Illustrated. Astrid Naess. Carl Du Prel. With Portrait. October 15.

From Iceland. Illustrated. Gudmundur Fridjonsson. The Transvaal Crisis. With Map. R. E.

Nordisk Tidskrift.—P. A. Norsted and Sons Stockholm. 10 kr. per annum. No. 5.

Civilisation and the Tropics. N. C. Frederiksen. Another Leaf from the Life-Story of Sergel. Georg Göthe.

Ringeren. - CITY PASSAGE, CHRISTIANIA. 2 kr. per qr. Sept. 30. The South African Conflict. Illustrated. R. Besthorn. The Beginnings of Norwegian Literature, Just Bing. A Frenchman on the Dreyfus Verdict.

October 7. New Scandinavianism. J. E. Sars.
Impressions from Weimar. Gerhard Scheldrup,
The Social Problem Solved by the Yellow Man. Hans Ross.

Tilskueren.-Ernst Bojesen, Copenhagen. 12 kr. per annum. Oct. Tennyson. Niels Möller. The End of the Labour Strike. Gustave Philipsen. Popular Art. Francis Beckett.

TENNYSON'S

MEMORIAM" For a PENNY! (By Post, 1td.)

A New Number of the PENNY POETS (No. 66) has just been issued. It contains not only the whole of the "In Memoriam," but also "The May Queen," the "Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington," "The Brook," the first "Locksley Hall," "The Lord of Burleigh," "Break, Break," "Lady Clara Vere de Vere," and "The Lady of Shalott," Sixty-four Pages. Crown-8vo., in stiff wrapper. Sold by all Newsagents, or (for THERE HALPPENCE) direct from the Publisher of the "Penny Poets"—

MOWBRAY HOUSE, NORPOLK STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Price SIXPENCE, Post Free. HAS WAR BECOME IMPOSSIBLE ?

A Conversation with M. BLOCH, the Author of "The Future of War."

Chronicled by W. T. STEAD.

Royal 8vo., 52 pp., in Fancy Wrapper, and with Striking Illustrations.

THE GIST OF

(Abridged by W. T. STEAD)

Has been Published in a Shilling Cloth-Bound Volume. It is a careful abridgment, with Extracts, of "Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches, with elucidations by Thomas Carlyle."

If Christ came to Chicago!

WHAT WOULD JESUS DO?

By W. T. STEAD.

Price One Shilling (or sent by Post 1s. 3d.). Cr. 8vo., 460 pp., in Coloured Wrapper. NEW EDITION. 155th THOUSAND

GLADSTONE:

A Memorial of a Great Life.

By W. T. STEAD.

Part I. A Character Sketch. Part II. Gladstone in Contemporary Caricature. With numerous Portraits of the Great Liberal Statesman and his Family, and nearly 200 Reproductions in Miniature of the Cartoons illustrative Mr. Gladstone's Political Career.

Royal 8vo., cloth, 200 pp., bound in One Volume.

Price 2s. 6d.; Post Free, 2s. 9d.

ANNUAL INDEX TO PERIODICALS.

The Annual Index to the Contents of the British and American Perio ticals, issued in connection with the London Reciew of Reviews, supplies exhaustive classified lists of articles on every subject which has been dealt with in the periodicals of the year. It may thus be described as a series of bibliographies alphabetically arranged for convenience of reference.

I., 1890. II., 1891. VOL. VOL. VI., 1895. VC _. II., 1891. (VOL. III., out of print). VOL. VII., 1896. VOL. VIII., 1897. VOL. IV., 1893. VOL. V., 1894. VOL. IX., 1898. 10s. per Volume, post free. 5s. 6d. per Volume,

"REVIEW OF REVIEWS" OFFICE, Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

Pamphlets Relating to the War.

The Scandal of the South African Committee

A Plain Narrative for Plain Men.
PRICE SIXPENCE. BY POST, SEVENPENCE.
I.—BEFORE THE PLAN. | Part III.—AFTER THE PLAN. Part. I.-BEFORE THE PLAN.

I.—A Question of Moral Meri-dian.
II.—The Inverted Pyramid, III.—Mr. Rhodes's Position.

Part II.-THE PLAN. I.-The Loch Plan and its Expansion.

II.—The Plan Made Possible by Mr. Chamberlain. III.-The British Flag and Hurry-

I.—The South African Committee.

II.—If Mr. Chamberlain were Innocent.
III.—The Significance of the Cable-

IV.-Who Have Seen the Cable-

y.—grams? V.—The Harris Cablegrams. VI.—The "Flora" Cablegrams. England's VI.—The "Flora" Cablegrams. VII.—The Stain on England's Honour.

Up Plan. SHALL I SLAY MY BROTHER BOER?

An Appeal to the Conscience of Britain. PRICE SIXPENCE. BY POST, SEVENPENCE.

I.—A Personal Appeal.
II.—Our Dreyfus Case.
III.—A Plea for Political Perspective.

V.—A Daniel Come to Judgment.

V.—How the Present Trouble

Arose. VI.-The Story of the NegotiaVIII .- Sir William Harcourt on the Suzerainty. Mr. Morley's Arbroath IX.-Mr.

Speech.
X.—Mr. Courtney at Manchester
Xk—What War Would Mean.
XII.—How Peace may be Preserved. XIII.—A Prayer we Dare Not Pray. XIV.—What are You Going to Do?

VII.-Olive Schreiner's Appeal.

are we in the right?

AN APPEAL TO HONEST MEN.

(This is the pamphlet which was brought before the attention of the Government in Parliament.)

PRICE SIXPENCE. BY POST SEVENPENCE.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE WAR.

ONE PENNY.

(For Distribution, for Purpose of Popular Education, 5s. per 100, or £2 per 1,000, not including Carriage.)

This pamphlet, of 64 pp., uniform in size with the "Masterpiece Library," is made up from the two pamphlets, "Shall I Slay my Brother Boer?" and "Are we in the Right?"

Order of your Newsagent or from Smith's Bookstalls, or failing this send to

THE MANAGER, "REVIEW OF REVIEWS" OFFICE, MOWBRAV HOUSE, NORFOLK STREET, W.C.

HISTORY OF THE MONTH IN CARICATURE.

HISTORY OF THE MOSTER IN CARICATURE

(NOVEMBER.)

I. - GREAT BRITAIN'S "FRIENDS IN NEED AND ALLIES!"

Kladderadatsch.]

TEMPORA MUTANTUR.

1899.

1894

and

- 4m

Life.]

THE MISSION OF THE ANGLO-SAXONS.

JOHN BULL: "Well! Sam, have we civilised enough for the present?"

[New York.

[Berlin.

ı. Oct.

ot. 30.

Var.

littee E. PLAN.

Cable-

ms. egrams. ngland's

ER?

chester ean. oe Preot Pray. to Do?

rce.

R.

asternall I

or ICE,

II.-THE WAR-FOREIGN VIEWS.

Moonskine 1

[London.

A DUTCH VIEW.

Amsterdammer.]

[Holland.

HOW "MOONSHINE" WOULD HAVE IT.

FRANCE: "Sacré Angleterre, Vive Kruger!"

HOW IT REALLY IS.

FRANCE, "Ha! Ha! Ha!"
JOHN BULL: "Au! Au! Au!"

Minneapolis Tribune.]

[Americ

THE BRIT SH LION IN TROUBLE. JOHN BULL: "Look out, Jonathan, they are after my clothes!"

ica.

Kladderadatsch.

THE WAR THERMOMETER. Snow-storms with so high a temperature! How is it possible?

THE REASON OF THE COLD! Kruger and the British prisoners.

Kladderadats:h.]

THE GOLD-DIGGER.

Up till now the c pital that the "Gold-Dust and Humanity Company" has put into the business has not brought in any return!

Amsterdammer.]

JOUBERT (to John Bull): "Have you had sufficient, or would you like some more?"

Telephone.]

IS IT IN DANGER?

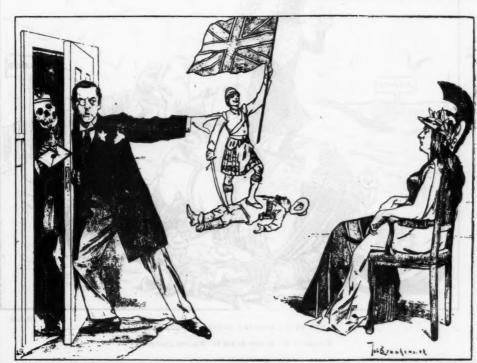

La Silhonette.]

A NEW FIVE PFENNIG STAMP! A SUGGESTION! The Kaiser is thinking of issuing a new series of stamps designed by himself.

Amsterdammer.]

BRITAIN HYPNOTISED!

[Holland.

"Quick, quick! There are visitors coming! Everything must be made beautifully clean for the reception."

KRUGER: "Ha, ha, how do you like War, you great giant?"

XUM

THE STATUE OF CROMWELL IN WESTMINSTER PALACE YARD.

By Mr. Hamo Thornycroft, R.A.

(Cast by J. W. Singer and Sons, Frome.)

de

he tra un
ne
M:
be
in ha
M:
as

stir gre an as squ

po ob Ming Jir. eve ave had fut any laid

im

he alli

sec Ch

THE PROGRESS OF THE WORLD.

LONDON, Dec. 1st, 1899.

Worse and Worse.

It seemed as if last month had brought England down to the depths of shame and humiliation, but this month has proved that there are still deeper depths into which our unhappy country is destined to be dragged by the Minister to whom she owes her African trouble. One by one, all the best traditions of English policy have been trampled under foot; but even in my gloomiest moments I never contemplated the possibility of an English Minister threatening the French Republic with a war because of the publication of some vulgar caricatures in the comic papers of Paris. That, however, we have been doomed to suffer at the hands of an evil Minister who appears to have been inflicted upon us as a punishment for our sins.

An Undignified ing illustration of the extent to which John Bull has lost the pachydermatous indifference to the gnat-stings and pin-pricks of his neighbours which was so great an element of his strength. These lampoonists and caricaturists of Paris delight in nothing so much as demonstrating their ability to make John Bull squirm, and it is the very acme of folly on the part of any responsible person in England, journalist or politician, to take the slightest notice of their witty It must, however, be admitted that obscenities. Mr. Chamberlain's latest outrage is entirely in keeping with the touchy tactics that lead the supersensitive Jingo who, as South Africa shows only too well, is ever ready to incur frightful dangers in order to avenge the sneer of a Boer or to rid himself from the haunting terror of an imaginary danger in the remote future. If the country gentlemen of England retained anything of their national self-respect, Mr. Chamberlain's speech at Leicester would have led to a demand on behalf of a great majority of the party for his immediate dismissal.

Only one degree less foolish and undignified than the way in which he "Natural Allies"! shook his fist in the face of France was the vulgar ostentation with which he paraded what he is pleased to imagine as an alliance between this country and Germany, the secular enemy of France. If it were not that Mr. Chamberlain referred in the same breath to the alliance with the United States, we might have taken more seriously his allusion to our "natural alliance" with Germany. But, as every one knows perfectly well, there is no alliance with the United States, and cannot be in the nature of things, so there is probably no alliance with Germany. Germany has courted such an alliance for many years, but both English parties have hitherto regarded the conclusion of any such arrangement as detrimental to the best interests of Great Britain. We want no entangling alliances with European Powers. Friends of all, allies of none, has been the watchword of English foreign policy, upon which both parties have acted for more than the lifetime of a generation; but if we may accept Mr. Chamberlain's latest speech as a declaration of the policy of the Government, we have decided to be allies of Germany, and such enemies of France that we are willing to threaten her with "serious consequences" if she should offend our majesty by the licence of her caricaturists!

A Novel
Casus Belli.

If things go on at this rate it will soon be necessary to put caricaturists under lock and key. Who knows how soon the German Emperor may declare war against us because Mr. Gould may some day give a ridiculous turn to his cow-horned moustache? This extension of the doctrine of lèsemajesté is very dangerous, and bodes ill for the peace of the world and the liberty of the Press. Considering the unchecked licence of our lampoonists and caricaturists, it is really too absurd for Ministers of the Crown to threaten neighbouring States with "serious consequences" merely because a Parisian artist is a little more unceremonious as well as more clever than his English confrères. Le Rire, which achieved considerable reputation in this country by the somewhat scandalous special number which it devoted to the Kaiser's visit to Jerusalem, has now issued a companion number entitled "V'là les English." Some of the illustrations are objectionable enough; some are very clever, and one or two are very powerful pictures. The one of Jeanne d'Arc at the stake, which figures as an illustration of the greatest of England's victims, haunts the memory. The caricatures are, however, quite innocent compared with those which have appeared in other papers. The picture of Ireland which I reproduce here is, as the reader can see, a very striking and powerful pictorial representation of the Irish question as it appears to the eyes of our neighbours. Of course there is much in contemporary foreign caricature at which English taste has revolted, but considering the licence which we accord to Hogarth, it is not for us to be too squeamish in our prudery.

"Pushful Joe" What has turned Mr. Chamberlain's head appears to have been his interview with the German Emperor. The Kaiser came on a family visit to the Queen, and one fine afternoon at Windsor he had a long talk with Mr. Chamberlain, who had previously been received by the German Ambassador and Count von Bülow. The lamented death of Lady Salisbury necessitated the absence of the Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary from Windsor, and Mr. Chamberlain probably made the most of his time. But that he concluded, an alliance with the Kaiser is one of which may safely be told to the horse marines. What is probable enough is that the two pushful ones got on very well together, each trying to impress the other with the excellence of the business which could be done if their respective firms could but be got to trade. The Kaiser has good reason for this, for he wants a great deal from us, whereas we want nothing from him. He had just succeeded in inducing Lord Salisbury to surrender our third interest in Samoa to Germany, in exchange for the waiving of German vetos upon various territorial adjustments in the Pacific which we have pledged ourselves not to make, and the Kaiser was no doubt only too ready to conclude any number of other bargains of the same character. To give too little and to take too much is a characteristic of the Deutscher as well as of the Dutchman. The rumour goes that in return for more or less hypothetical and > shadowy promises in relation to future adjustments of the map of Europe, we have practically handed over Asiatic Turkey to the exploitation of Germany, in proof whereof the long rivalry between English and German financiers for the construction of the railway from the Mediterranean to the Persian Gulf has been terminated by another of those graceful concessions by which Lord Salisbury makes Germany happy -for a time. Heligoland, Samoa, Asiatic Turkey, have all gone, but our equivalent is still to seek. Perhaps Mr. Chamberlain regards it as quid pro quo to be permitted to swagger about his new-found German ally but the sane, sober and serious part of the British public will fail to appreciate the advantages in a transaction which as its first-fruits has given a still looser rein to Mr. Chamberlain's ill-bridled tongue.

IRELAND: "Oh, God, to whom I have cried so long! Are you also English?"

If France went to War!

When we have nearly 100,000 of our best troops locked up in South Africa is not exactly the moment that a wise and prudent statesman would choose for shaking his unarmed fist in the face of the French Republic, even if he calculates that he can rely upon the mailed fist of the Kaiser. would, of course, be very kind of the German Emperor to protect our shores from invasion by menacing France with war should she resent Mr. Chamberlain's But the position of a protected State threats. one which Englishmen would willingly not tolerate. Of course it will be said that our navy guarantees our shores against invasion; and that no doubt is true-with limitations. But our military authorities, when pressing for the fortification of London and for an increase of the army, have always warned us that although the navy can be relied upon to cut off any French army landed upon our shores from its base in France, no fleet, no matter how powerful, can absolutely guard our coast from a sudden descent, and 100,000 French soldiers landed on our southern coast might be not exactly the visitors whom we would care to receive when the cream of our army is fighting a nightmare on the South African veldt.

The Kaiser Windsor.

The visit of the German Emperor, excepting for its sequel in Mr. Chamberlain's indiscretion, great satisfaction. The Kaiser was charming, and exerted himself to the uttermost to please everybody with whom he talked. He was simple, unassuming, full of almost boyish fun and good humour. He was over for a holiday. Whether he was shooting rabbits or pheasants-on both of which he did great execution, although he has to handle his gun with only one hand-or whether he was prowling over the old castle at Windsor, or admiring the Queen Anne architecture of the villas in the suburbs, he was equally at home. He even appears to have got on well with his uncle, the Prince of Wales, with whom he spent some days at Sandringham. He was very nice also in everything he said about the war and the losses which the army had suffered. Everything, in short, passed off admirably, if it had not been for the somewhat undignified anxiety of our Jingoes to exploit his visit as a demonstration on the side of England against her critics on the Continent.

the Transvaal.

The Emperor's visit was regarded His Sentiments with scant favour by his subjects, who gave vent to their dissatisfaction with unwonted freedom. The Emperor could afford to set this discontent at defiance, but it is doubtful whether he would be able to treat it as cava-

Photograph by

Elliott and Fry.

THE LATE MARCHIONESS OF SALISBURY.

lierly if, for instance, the question at issue were not a trip to Windsor, but one which might involve Germany in the vortex of a great war. Two reports are current as to the Emperor's attitude in relation to the war in South Africa. One is that when remonstrated with by his friends for not doing anything to support President Kruger, he replied by saying that President Kruger was very well able to hold his own, and that there is no need to consider how he should be helped until the need arises. The other story, which is very circumstantial, is to the effect that the Emperor, who is in bitter feud with the Agrarian Party of East Prussia, has by some odd association of ideas connected President Kruger with the Junkers who defeated his Canal Bill. President Kruger in his eyes is the great Agrarian of South Africa, who opposes himself to the demands of progress and civilisation, while the Junkers of East Prussia are the Oom Paul of Germany. He is, therefore, more or less, in the crusade against Agrarianism, allied with General Buller. In any case there is a general agreement that for the moment he is in

for erri-

ave

was

r of

too

the

our

and

ro-

ion

ıst-

the pe,

cti-

ed

tic

the

of

in

eof

lry ish

an

he

of

om

ra-

he

as

ed

of

ful

by rd

es

py

le.

d,

ic

ıll

ur

ill

id

d

of

es

11

of

h

sympathy with the British Government in the war which it is waging against the Transvaal Republic. How long this will last no one knows.

A Rebuff for the Kaiser. The Bill proposing to inflict sentences of penal servitude for offences against the laws regulating strikes has been summarily thrown out on the first reading by the Reichstag. The Bill had few friends, but one of them was no less a person than his Imperial Majesty the Kaiser, who thus received a second reminder that even his resolute will cannot crush all opposition in matters in which the German people take a keen interest. His first warning was over the Canal Bill, the second has come from an opposite quarter. He would certainly receive a third warning, and that more emphatic than either, if he were to attempt to realise Mr. Chamberlain's dream, and plunge the Fatherland into war in the interests of Great Britain.

Lord Rosebery.

Lord Rosebery made one notable appearance last month. Mr. Thornycroft's noble statue of the Lord Protector now stands on its pedestal keeping watch and ward over Westminster Hall. No public ceremony took place when it was unveiled. but in the evening Lord Rosebery delivered a veryeloquent speech upon the character of Cromwell. His discourse was full of eloquent passages, so full, . indeed, that it is difficult to select. But there is one passage which is very notable. Speaking of the secret of Cromwell's extraordinary power, he gave as his explanation of the mystery the fact "that he was a practical mystic, the most formidable and terrible of all combinations. A man who combines inspiration apparently derived-in my judgment really derivedfrom close communication with the supernatural and the celestial, a man who has that inspiration, and adds to it the energy of a mighty man of action, such a man as that lives in communion on a Sinai of his own, and when he pleases to come down to this world below seems armed with no less than the terrors and decrees of the Almighty Himself." It would be interesting to know if Lord Rosebery is of opinionsuggested by the words which I have italicised—that it is still possible to have access to the same supernatural source of inspiration.

Lord Rosebery made another speech last month which has caused many of Housing Question, us to heave a sigh of regret that he ever ceased to be the Chairman of the London County Council. On the 13th November he went down to Shoreditch to open the municipal buildings which have been erected by the Shoreditch Vestry. He seized the occasion to deliver one of those addresses which fill the hearer with admiration and indignation; admiration for the genius of the speaker, and indignation that such powers should not constantly be employed in the public service. The question of the housing of the working population of London is a thousandfold more urgent than the grievances of the Outlanders. There are tens of thousands of British subjects to-day who are suffering miseries from lack of decent house accommodation compared with which the worst wrongs suffered by the wellpaid workers of the Rand are trifles light as air. Lord Rosebery said nothing on this point, which was effectively handled by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, but addressed himself to the best way in which the Lords of the Slums could be dealt with. He suggested that the County Council should have power to buy land outside the County area for the purpose of erecting workmen's cities, which should have cheap and rapid railway accommodation with Central London. He asked "why so simple and obvious a relief to the overcrowded population cannot be afforded by Government and by Parliament." By way of recommending this suggestion, he said that it was not a scheme out of opposition to which any political or party capital could be made. But that is the very reason why the scheme has not been pushed, because no party has taken it up.

Why not Lord Rosebery? If Lord Rosebery would take it up and run it hard there would soon be plenty of opposition. If this enormous, unspeakable and unlooked-for boon for the inhabitants be what he says, what nobler object can he have to which to devote his energies? But instead of applying himself to what lies before him and within his power,—if he would give up his more or less dilettante existence and fling himself, heart and soul, into the great work,—Lord Rosebery devoted himself to dreaming dreams as to what might be done by a dictator:—

I declare, when I think of all this that goes on, and of the bonds of red tape in which we are swathed, I sometimes wish for a Dictator, a tyrant, who should hold office for a year, and a man of large mind, large heart, and iron will—(cries of "Cromwell")—who would see what had to be done, and who would do it. He should hold power for a year, and at the end his head should be cut off—(laughter)—for fear his existence should imperil our liberties. (Laughter.) Perhaps he would not have lost much by decapitation, as it is not at all improbable that in his year of office he would have been assassinated by some of the interests which he had attacked. (Laughter and cheers.) But

Photograph by]

itch

one

vith

the

uch

the

of

nd-

the tish

ack

vith

ell-

as

ich

er-

the

ted

and

ing

pid

He

er-

rn-

ing

out

ital

the

has

up on

his

ed-

hat

his

hat

ive

ng

ord

to

nd

ed.

ıld

d.

ho

it.

nd

ar

r.)

as

he

ts

ut

[Ellioti and Fry.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD ROSEBERY.

in any case, whether he were assassinated or whether he were decapitated, he would have had the satisfaction, if he held office only for a few months, of having done that which, I am as certain as you are, no Parliament would have accomplished in forty times the time. (Cheers.)

The Best is often the enemy of the Good, and these ideals of impossible dictators, although very interesting to read about, ought not to stand in the way of doing what is quite possible. If Lord Rosebery would set himself to work the Housing of the Working Classes question as Mr. Gladstone worked his Midlothian campaign, he would soon be able to command all the powers that any dictator could profitably use.

M Delcassé's Declaration. In France M. Delcassé, speaking on November 23rd in defence of the Foreign Office Estimates, made a very sensible speech, defending the sane and moderate foreign policy of the present administration against it assailants. M. Delcassé has now quite eclipsed the reputation of M. Hanotaux. It would be difficult to express sounder sense than is to be found in his discourse. Cobden himself could hardly have been more lucid and more explicit. He appealed to the simple good sense which would teach nations which have already vast possessions in the East to resist the temptation to make acquisitions which would add further to their burdens. It is seldom that a Foreign Minister now-adays dare publicly protest against "the madness for territorial aggrandisement." . What M. Delcassé regarded as the essential thing for France is also the essential thing for other nations, our own included. What we have to do, he said, is "less to seek fresh acquisitions of distant territories than to guard strongly what we have, to watch over the approaches thereto, and to make the best out of what we possess."

A Curious Mistake. M. Delcassé made a glowing reference to the Hague Conference, but excused himself for not offering mediation between England and the Transvaal on two grounds, one of which is true, the other quite untrue. The true reason was that Lord Salisbury had emphatically repelled any foreign intervention. The false excuse was his statement that one of the belligerents, the only one represented at the Hague, had not yet signed the act of the Conference. It is strange that the Foreign Minister of France should not be aware of the fact that Lord Pauncefote had signed the Arbitration Convention on behalf of the British Government at the end of October.

The Policy of the Open Door in China. Amid many rumours that are current in the Press as to possibilities in the Far East, one thing seems to stand out clearly—namely, that France, England, the United States, and possibly Germany, are in substantial agreement as to their future policy in China. It is defined by M. Delcassé as that of the avoidance of the onerous vagaries of those who would partition China, and an endeavour to keep China open to the free competition of the intelligence and capital of the whole world. This is the policy of the Open Door as opposed to the policy of Grab. The United States have clean hands, we have not, but it is sincerely to be hoped that the mania for partitioning China is on the wane. The policy of the Open Door will come to be more and more recognised as that which is most in the interest of all the Great Powers.

Lord Sallsbury at the Guild: all.

The blazing indiscretion of Mr. Chamberlain has quite thrown into the shade the speech delivered by the Prime Minister at the Lord Mayor's Banquet.

[Berlin.

Lustige Blätter ]

THE SAMOAN AGREEMENT.

JOHN BULL (to the Boer): "Thanks!"
VON BÜLOW: "Thanks!"

Lord Salisbury spoke, as he usually does, with moderation and good sense. He had a somewhat difficult task in endeavouring to put the best face upon the abandonment of our position in Samoa. The following in his explanation of the transaction:—

Samoa is of importance because it did constitute a subject of difference between us and a nation whose goodwill we value very highly. I do not know quite clearly why the German people and Government attached so much importance to the island of Upolu; but they did so; and we have been very glad to find a means, without in the least diminishing the rights and advantages of England, to gratify their feelings and sentiments in that respect. The agreement is a complicated one; but, roughly, it may be said that the Germans had great interests in this land, because they had invested large amounts in the cultivation of it, and had constructed a great commerce of which they were proud. The island, therefore, to them had a special value. To us islands only have a value, as a rule, in as far as they furnish good harbours; and Upolu furnished a very bad harbour. Well, under those circumstances we were glad to accept a renunciation of the treaty claims and rights of Germany in another island-the island of Tonga-where there is an admirable and unmistakable harbour. We take away the harbour, and the Germans take away the territory in which, for many reasons, they are specially interested; and I believe that we have arrived at a very remarkable phenomenon-an agreement which is pleasing and advantageous in equal degrees to both of the Powers who have signed it. But this is interesting to us particularly as an indication that at the present moment our relations with the German people are all that we could desire.

This sounds very well, but unfortunately the admirable and unmistakable harbour in Tonga is not ours to "take away." The Germans have no doubt removed their veto upon our seizing it; but if Lord Salisbury were to waive all desire to prevent my taking the Lord Mayor's chain of office, that would not give me any right to put it in my pocket. Neither does the German agreement give us any right whatever over Tonga, whose independence indeed we have guaranteed.

"We seek no territory."

Lord Salisbury's observation concerning the war in South Africa was more to our liking, and for that very eason it irritated the Jingoes. He ridiculed the notion widely prevalent on the Continent that any corrupt motive or desire to possess themselves of the gold of the Rand influenced Her Majesty's Ministers. His answer was beside the mark, for he dealt with it as if it were an imputation of personal corruption, which, of course, is absurd; but in the course of his speech he made use of a remarkable phrase, "We seek no goldfields; we seek no territory," an assurance which was naturally commented upon with approval by Lord Edmond FitzMaurice, when he spoke on Colston Day at Bristol. This led Lord Salisbury to take the very unusual course for him of writing a letter to the newspapers, in which he reproduced what he did say in order, he said, that

A WESTERN AMERICAN THEORY OF THE RELATION OF CECIL RHODES TO THE HISTORY OF THE TRANSVAAL TROUBLE.

ers who icularly elations ire. mirable ours to moved lisbury ng the ot give r does conca was t very . He tinent them-Her e the tation atever

ek no ented urice, is led se for ch he , that

; but

mark-

ECIL

people might understand that Lord Edmond Fitz-Maurice had not correctly paraphrased his remarks. Lord Salisbury's letter did not, indicate in what way Lord Edmond had misrepresented him, but it was universally regarded as an indication that the Jingoes of the War Party were sufficiently powerful to compel Lord Salisbury to repudiate the only possible interpretation that could be placed upon his words—namely, that Ministers did not intend to annex the Transvaal.

Jezebel's Surprise.

The Daily Mail, which has now achieved a circulation of over a million a day, remarked naively, "When Lord Salisbury said we sought no territory, the thoughtful amongst us asked why then are we at war?"-a suggestive observation which shows better than anything the real drift of the War Party. War for them was war for territory. They felt as Jezebel would have felt if, after the slaying of Naboth, Ahab had declared that he did not want the vineyard. Nothing will content these gentlemen but the annexation outright of the Orange Free State and the Transvaal. The flag, they say, must go up over Pretoria. It has been there before; and if it goes up again it will be regarded as a symbol of a foreign despotism imposed by the bayonet's point upon a community which will never cease to cherish devotion to its old flag. Even in Cape Town, which is a British Colony, the Cape Government minimises the display of the Union Jack to such an extent that when the British flag was unfurled above the postoffice on the arrival of the New Zealand contingent, every one marvelled at the unaccustomed apparition.

Purging the Liberal Party:

The month has done very little for progress, but one thing it has at least accomplished. It has definitely cleared up one point—namely, that the Liberal Party in this great crisis cannot count upon the support, to say nothing of the leadership, of Lord Rosebery, Sir Henry Fowler, Mr. Asquith, Sir Edward Grey, and Mr. Haldane. We are passing through a crisis which has wrought almost as much havoc among the official Liberals as the Home Rule crisis of 1886. The question of war or peace, however, is not one upon which it is possible to hold a candle to the devil. An Opposition must be one thing or the other. It cannot be both Opposition and devoted to the support of the Government. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman saw this, and cast in his lot unhesitatingly with the Party which he leads. Lord Rosebery and his friends also saw it; and they have for the time ceased to belong to the Party which they represented in office in the last Administration. It is deplorable not so much for the Party as for the men who have been tried and found wanting. Nothing is more certain than that the next General Election will be fought on the question of this war, and that there will be only two sides—one of those who apologise for the war as a great disaster and protest that they could not help themselves, while the others will denounce the war and its authors with the vehemence with which Mr. Gladstone denounced the Jingo Party in 1880. This will be the case unless even graver issues do not arise owing to the criminal folly of Mr. Chamberlain. But in any case the war with the Transvaal will mark the dividing of the ways.

The Fall Elections in America. In the United States the autumn elections show that the issue of expansion by aid of conquest is the foremost issue with the other section of our race. The result of the polling was not altogether conclusive; but it would seem to show that, with the exception of Nebraska—a State which Mr. Bryan succeeded in winning for the Democrats—the general feeling of the American voter is in favour of putting the Philippine Expedition through, even if it involved sending out more troops. At present the Americans have between 60,000 and 70,000 soldiers waging war against the insurgents under Aguinaldo, and it is by no means clear that even this great army will suffice to reduce the islands to obedience to the legatees of Spain. The Democratic campaign had as its objective, opposition to Imperialist expansion, and to the consolidation of capitalist enterprises which is going on so rapidly under the name of Trusts.

Tammany again Triumphant, One of the most notable State elections was that in Ohio, where Mayor Jones of Toledo polled 100,000 votes as a candidate who stood for the Golden Rule, and cried, "Plague on both your parties!" If his vote had been added to those cast for the Democrat, the Republican candidate would have been beaten in Mr. McKinley's own State. The other significant feature of the polls was the renewed victory of Tammany in New York City. The Mazet Committee of Inquiry has been sitting for months past, but although it turned a flood of light upon the crooked ways of Tammany and its eminent chief, Boss Croker, all its efforts failed to prevent Tammany returning its candidates. In New York State the Republicans, as usual, preponderated. In New York City the Democrats, under the leadership of Tammany Hall, carried all before them. Mr.

Croker is now in this country, for like other monarchs, crowned and uncrowned, his realm is so well organised that an occasional absence makes no difference. Before leaving New York he placed the organisation of Tammany at the disposal of the Lord Mayor of Dublin, to subscribe funds for the memorial which it is proposed to erect in Dublin, and for the purchase of the Avondale Estate as a national heir-loom.

The Capitalist Press Gag. At home the friends of peace and the representatives of all that survives of the Liberal Party have experienced a severe blow in the loss of two of the few remaining organs on the London daily press. The Daily Chronicle and the Echo have been faithful among the faithless found in defending the cause of peace and justice. But the Jingo Party is as impatient in the press as its henchmen, the representatives of disorder, are of hearing a word said on behalf of peace from the platform. Mr. Massingham with his confrères, Mr. Spender and

Photograph by]

[London Stereoscopic Co.

MR. MASSINGHAM.

Mr. Nash, have been compelled to leave the Chronicle, and Mr. W. M. Crook has had to resign the editorship of the Echo. These two journals have become apostate and may be expected to be more Ministerialist than the Ministerialists. There are plenty of rich men and women who call themselves Liberals and friends of peace, but there is not a millionaire in the crowd who believes as much in peace and Liberalism as Mr. Rhodes believes in Imperialism and conquest. When an Oriental potentate was shown over the House of Commons. he asked who were those gentlemen who sat on the Opposition side of the House. He was told that they were Her Majesty's Opposition. "Really!" he exclaimed. "In my country I should cut off all their heads." The principles of this despotic barbarian are in high favour just now on the part of our patriotic bounders, who have either forgotten or have never learned the first principles of Constitutional Government and of free discussion. It is not the well-to-do, wealthy, comfortable classes who have anything to gain by the policy of stifling free discussion. This, of course, they would admit if it was a question of putting down a newspaper by Act of Parliament. But it is possible to stifle independent criticism quite as effectively by a word of comment from a capitalist, as it is by a decree from the representatives of the nation. But who knows? Perhaps the next century will find Englishmen as false to the principles of free discussion as they are at present false to the principles of peace and fraternity.

Poets on the Warpath. It is noted as a remarkable fact that the American poets have refrained from singing the triumphs of their arms either in Cuba or in Manila.

It is very different with the poets of Britain, who have surrendered themselves to the mood of the moment with astonishing unanimity. The Poet Laureate achieved the superlative of absurdity when he deemed it fit to remind Englishmen of the stoical courage with which the Romans faced the disaster of Cannæ in order to enable us to bear up under the overwhelming blow of the capture of a thousand men at Nicholson's Nek. He afterwards indited a poem, "From the Old Land to the Young Land," which the Westminster Gazette cruelly said was built on the lines of "Said the Old Obadiah to the Young Obadiah," a favourite music-hall ditty which was more true to fact than the Poet Laureate's versified dialogue between the United States and the mother country. Rudyard Kipling, however, has maintained his title to be rega

imp

he

Abs

app

legi

ord

mu

the

the

by

poq

Sul

rai

of

Photograph by e the

d to

ected

alists.

call

ere is much es in ental

sat told lly!"

ff all potic

art of en or stitu-

It is

who

free

if it

paper

stifle word from ows? n as

are

and

that ined

their nila. who

the Poet

hen

pical

er of

the men

em,

ines

," a fact een ard be

two

[Elliott and Fry.

COLONEL F. WINGATE.

regarded as the modern Tyrtæus of the blatant imperialism now in vogue. A begging ballad which he contributed to the Daily Mail, entitled "The Absent-minded Beggar," with its jingling refrain, appealing for subscriptions to support the families, legitimate or illegitimate, of the private soldiers ordered to the Cape, has caught on at the music-halls, theatres and elsewhere. Thanks to the dexterous management of the Daily Mail they have succeeded in raising over £20,000 by selling shilling copies of the facsimiles of the poem, and putting up to auction the original manuscript and the music-hall score written by Sir Arthur Sullivan. The Daily Tel graph has devoted itself to raising funds for the same purpose, and up to the time of going to press it has collected £66,000. Besides these the Mansion House Fund for the widows and orphans made by the Transvaal War amounts to £350,000.

The End of the Khalifa. The long duel in the Soudan between the forces of Mahdism and of Britain has ended for the moment. The Khalifa, after successfully evading capture, was last month overtaken by Colonel Wingate, who had 3,700 Egyptian troops under his command, six Maxims, and a battery of artillery. The final scene was full of dignity:—

When Colonel Wingate overtook the enemy the Khalifa tried hard to outflank him on the left, but as he failed to do so, and Colonel Wirgate's fire was too hot, the Dervishes began to retire. The Khalifa, perceiving that it was impossible to get away, told his Emirs to stay with him and die. He then spread a sheepskin on the ground and sat down on it, the Emirs being grouped on his right and left hand. Shortly afterwards the Khalifa was killed, being shot through the head, heart, arm and legs. His Emirs were subsequently found lying dead beside him and his bodyguard, all of whom were also killed in front of him.

The old greybeard knew at least how to die. Osman Digna escaped once more.

D. S. SIPYAGUI.

(New Russian Minister for Internal Affairs.)

DIARY FOR NOVEMBER.

EVENTS OF THE MONTH.

r. The Commercial Congress at Phila-delphia, U.S.A., passes seven resolutions for international co-operation.

2. In the Spanish Chamber the Republicans move a vote of censure on the Captain-General of Barcelona on account of his dicrei declaring the taxpayers who refuse to pay taxes to be rebels; this is rejected by 75 votes to 53. The students of the Budapest University come forward and champion the Magyar language against the privileged position accorded to German.

3. The United States Government adopts a strong policy in regard to the "open door" in China.

The Philippine Commission makes a preliminary report to President McKinley.
4. Lord Dufferin is elected Lord Rector of Edinburgh University.

5. The trial of Major Esterhazy for embezzling £1,340 belonging to his cousin bigins in Paris.

The Russian administrative authorities grant permission to the Students of the University of St. Petersburg to open subscriptions for Major Esterhazy is sentenced by the Paris Correctional Tribunal to three years' im-prisonment, and to pay £1,340, the amount claimed.

The Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath discusses the abrogation of the Emergency Clause of the Constitution; on a dission this is rejected by 167 votes to 11.0.
Lord Kitchener returns to C iro from Khar-

The French Minister of Marine announces that negotiations for settling the frontiers of Kwan-chau-wan are at present broken off in consequence of the hostility of the Viceroy of Canton

7. State Elections take place in eleven of the States of America. Count Carsini, the Russian Ambassador, arrives at Washington after visiting the European capitals.

8. The result of the negotiations between the British and German Governments in regard to the Samoa Islands is announced in Berlin. Upolu and Savii are assigned to Germany, and the Island of Futuila to the United States, Germany renouncing all claims in favour of Great Britain in the Tonga and Savage Islands, The Tsar and Tsaritsa arrive at Potsdam on a visit to the German Emperor in the morning, and leave at night for Russia.

Major Marchand is nominated for promotion by the French Government,

The French High Court sits at the Luxembourg to try the prisoners arraigned for conspiracy to try the prisoners arraigned for conspiracy against the Republic.

10. The terms of agreement between the German Government and the British South Africa Company to carry the Cape to Cairo Railway through German territory is published in Berlin way thro

The sitting of the High Court for the trial of the alleged conspirators against the Republic is resumed; the friends of the prisoners make noisy demonstrations, noisy demonstrations.

There are scenes of great disorder in the Austrian Reichsrath, provoked by the Czech and Anti-Semite members.

11. The High Court at Paris declares itself competent to deal with the great conspiracy case.
The French George Servers.

he right court at a successful and the great conspiracy case. The French Government takes repressive measures against the Assumptionists; a reserve fund of $\lambda_{72,000}$ is found in the safe of the editorial department of La Croix newspaper.

14. The Session of the French Chamber opens at Paris; General Galliffet makes a statement on Army affairs.

Colonel Picquart addresses the French
Premier; he refuses amnesty and demands

14. There is an Imperial deadlock in Austria. The statue of Cromwell at the west front of Westminster Hall is unveiled.

The Khalifa reaches Abbah Jeloud; Lord Kitchener leaves Cairo for Khartoum. The Italian Parliament opens at Rome; the King delivers the speech from the throne in

The Queen visits Bristol, where she opens a Diamond Jubilee Convalescent Home. Her Majesty confers Knighthood on the Lord Mayor of Bristol.

The Daily Chronicle's Mafeking War Correspondent accidentally who!

spondent accidentally shot.
The Hamburg-American Liner Patria on fire in the English Channel; the passengers, 150 in number, are rescued and landed at Dover. The Viceroy reports that the extreme dryness of the weather in India is unfavourable for the winter crops, The total number of persons at present on relief works in the distressed districts is 828,000. News reaches Paris that two officers of a French post at Mon-tao having crossed the river were murdered by the Chinese.

MATAAFA, EX-KING OF SAMOA.

Fighting takes place in the Vilayet of Erzeroum between Armenians and Kurds.

confer with the French Premier and M. Monis.

The burning Atlantic Liner Patria has to be abandoned in the North Sea, her crew being landed at Cuxhaven.

18. Edward Beall, solicitor and financier, is sen-Nov. 1.

consider the control of the con-tenced to four years' penal servitude for con-spiring to defraud.

I. Déroulède is sentenced to three months' imprisonment for insulting the President of the French Republic.

Fete in honour of the Republic is held in Paris; a statue. "The Triumph of the Republic," is unveiled.

proposal by M. Bos in the French Chamber that the Government Bills on Education should be sent before a Special Committee is rejected by 33 votes.

20. The German Emperor and Empress arrive on

Colen Car Lac Offici tion

Lord

Gene

kin to. Ther bet

11. The

The

th

N 14. In a

Bi

Be

fre Arm

OK

tr 18. Ger 20. Get

s6 Lor

17. Cole

21. Cor

gu. Ger

Th

Lo

Sir

Th 24. It

25. Lo

25. TI

27. Cit

L

The German Emperor and Empress arrive on a visit to the Queen.

The Labour Bill, known as the "Penal Servitude Bill," is rejected in the German Reichstag by a sweeping majority.

The Emperor of Austria summons all the Party Leaders in the Reichsrath to confer with him on the crisis in the Constitution.

An important railway line is opened in Rulegria

Bulgaria.
The French Chamber begins the discussion of the Budget.

M. Arbain Gohier is committed for trial for his article on the Army in the Aurore.

The full text of the Anglo-German Agreement in Samoa is published by the Foreign Office.

The Conspiracy Trial in Paris concludes. Lord Salisbury is confined to his room with an attack of influenza.

attack of influenza,
The question of the French settlement at Shanghai is satisfactorily arranged on the conditions proposed by Lord Salisbury to the French Ambassador last July.
The Egyptian troops under Colonel Wingate defeat a force of Dervishes to the south of Omdurman.

Obstruction blocks all business in the Austrian Reichsrath. Sir Alfred Milner issues a Proclamation appeal

Sir Airee Miner issues a Proclamation appearing to the Dutch Colonists' loyalty. Mr. Schreiner, the Premier, endorses this appeal.

24. The jury at the London Sheriff's Court assessee exemplary damages in the cases of pissengers on board the Stella.

The Royal Theatre, Newcastle-on-Tyne, is entirely destroyed by fire, lolonel Sir F. Wingate's column comes up with the Khalifa at Om Debrikat, 170 miles south of Omdurman, and defeats him utterly; the Khalifa is killed and his whole camp 25. Colonel taken.

27. The French Chamber, by 480 to 44, agrees to the special credit of 60,000,000 frs. for the defence of the French coast and Colonies: it also passes a credit for the Embassy at the Vatican by 349 votes to 202.

28. The Italian Finance Minister makes his Budget

Statement in the Chamber at Rome.
The German Emperor and Empress leave England for Germany.
Colonel Sir F. Wingate leaves Omdurman for Catro.

The Concession for the Baghdad railway is given by the Sultan to the Deutsche Bank.
In the French Chamber Mr. Fournier calis attention to the sweating and cruelty alleged to be practised in the Bon Pasteur Convent at Nancy. M. Waldeck-Rousseau promised, as these establishments received grants of public money, that a Bill will be framed for their proper superintendence, lebate in the London School Board on Sir C. Elliot's resolution which is finally carried.

By-Election.

Debate in the French Chamber on the Government Policy; a vote of confidence in the Government is carried by a majority of 125.

17. The statue of Ferdinand de Less ps is unveiled at Port Said by the Khedive.

The Senatorial Committee on the Annesty Bill to the Senatoria following result:—
Sir Edgar Vincent (C.) ... 4,030
Mr. Allan Bright (L.) ... 3,371

Conservative majority 653

The War in South Africa.

A despatch arrives at the War Office from v. I. A despatch arrives at the War Office from Sir Georg: White which explains the cause of the disaster at Ladysmith. Bombardment of Ladysmith continues. The Governor of Natal reports the wires from Ladysmith are cut. A small convoy and escort sent out from Tuli is captured by the Boers.

the Boers

Further lists of killed and wounded before Ladysn ith are published. Telegraphic com-munication with Ladysmith still interrupted. Women and children are sent away from Stormberg Junction.

ress arrive on the " Penal the German nons all the ath to confer opened in discussion of

r trial for his

n Agreement oreign Office, cludes, oom with an ttlement at salisbury to

y. nel Wingate

ne south of

he Austrian tion app alyalty; Mr. this appeal.

ourt assess on-Tyne, is comes up 170 miles im utterly;

hole camp

frs. for the colonies

assy at the

his Budget ress leave

lurman for railway is ne Bank. rnier calls lty alleged

r Convent promised, grants of ramed for d on Sir y carried. Staff ord vacancy Exeter in with the fice from

he cause

res from vov

ured by before

hic comrrupted.

ay from

tion now believed entirely safe.

Bombardment of Ladysmith is resumed.

Lord Wolseley, at the Lord Mayor's banquet, announces the mobilisation of another divi-

Colenso shelled by the Boers and evacuated. Martial law is proclaimed in those districts of Cape Colony occupied by British troops. Ladysmith is surrounded.
 Official report from Ladysmith says the posiannounces the mobilisation of another divi-sion for South Africa.

General Smith reports Ladysmith daily bom-barded; supply of provisions ample. Mafe-king and Kimberley quiet.
There is a skrimish four miles east of Belmont between Colonel Gough's force and the Boers.
The Boers cut off the communication at Mafe-king to the South, and break up the vailway line. railway line.

The Basutos reported quieter.
The bombardment of Ladysmith continues;
the Rouxville Commando enters Aliwal North.

14. In a reconnaissance on the Colenso Road British Cavalry and Artillery drive back the Boers with loss.

15. The Medical Corps organised and equipped by Sir James Sivewright sails in the Moravia from the Albert Dock, London, Armoured train shelled near Chieveley Two trucks and one engine derailed.

16. Lord Methuen completes arrangements at Orange River to advance to the relief of Kimberley. A portion of the Ladysmith garrison makes a sortie.

17. Colesberg is occupied by the Free State troops.

18. General Hildyard announces that he checked an advance of the Boers on Estcourt.

20. General Gatacre's column reaches Queenstown.

town.

Communication with Estcourt is interrupted.

The hospital-ship Spartan lies in Durban Harbour with the wounded. The New Zealand contingent arrives at East London.

General French arrives with a force of 3,000 men at Hanover Road Station.

The Boers control the railway-line between Mooi River and Estcourt; the telegraph wires are cut between Estcourt and Pietermaritzburg. 23. Lord Methuen attacks the Boer position at Belmont, and gains a complete victory. Sir Redvers Buller has left Cape Town for

The Boers continue to shell the British camp 24. on the Mooi River. It is reported that 400 Dutch joined the Boers at Barkly, 25. Lord Methuen advances; there is a battle

as. Lord Methuen advances; there is a battle near Graspan, in which the Boer position is carried at the point of the bayonet. Communication with Estcourt is restored. It is reported that the Boers capture 350 rifles and 4,000 rounds of ammunition at Barkly.

The Boers occupy Stormberg. Reinforcements arrive. The Boers between Estcourt and Mooi River retreat.

General Gatacre occupies Bushmanshoek.

Lord Methuen's force attacks a strong Boer position on the Modder River. Lord Methuen describes it as "one of the hardest and most trying fights in the annals of the and most trying fights in the annals of the British Army."

SPEECHES.

Nov. 1. Lord Rosebery, at Edinburgh, on the War. Lord Selborne, at Dumfries, on the War. Lord George Hamilton, at Ealing, on the War. Lord Lans downe, at Sheffield, on the War. Lord Rosebery, at Edinburgh, on literary Lord Selborne, at Peebles, on the War. Lord Aberdeen, at Dundee, on Canada.

6. Mr. Michael Davitt, in South Mayo, on Irish unity.

Lord Wolseley, in London, on the War.
7. Mr. Brodrick, at Godalming, on the War.
Lord Cole idge, in London, criticises the action of the Government in African affairs, and praises the patriotism of Mr. Schreiner.
8. Mr. Bryce, in Aberdeen, condemns the Government's policy in Africa.

Sir M. Hicks-Beach, at the Mansion House, on commercial education.

Mr. F. Harrison, in London, on the Boers' nobility of character.

Mr. John Burns, at Battersea, on the War, and the sordid causes which have brought it about. Lord Rosebery, at Shoreditch, on the housing problem; the Lords of the Slums, and how to fight them. Sir M. Hicks-Beach, at Colston, on the Transvaal. Mr. Bryce, at Aberdeen, on Samoa. Mr. Wyndham, at Dover, on the conduct of the War.

Lord Rosebery, at the Queen's Hall, on Crom-

Mr. Asquith, in London, on housing and over-crowding in London and other large towns. The Duke of Devonshire on the Reserve.

Lord Kimberley, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, on the War. Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, at Manchester,

Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, at Manchester, on the War.
Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, at Manchester, on the blundering of the Government; he considers that the Ministry are entirely responsible for the War.
Mr. Wyndham, at Dover, on how the relief funds will be spent.
The German Emperor, at Kiel, on Samoa.
Lord Tweedmouth, in London, urges the rebuilding of Working Class London, and points out the evils which arise from the ground landlords' neglect of responsibility.
Mr. Bryce, at Aberdeen, on the Transvaal.
He asserts that self-ruling Colonies are only keep by friendship.

He asserts that self-ruling Colonies are only kept by friendship.

Lord Ripon, at Bolton, on the Spirit of Self-governing Colonies.

Mr. Chaplin, at Billinghay, on the War.

Mr. E. Robertson, Q.C., at Diss, on the causes and conduct of the War.

The Viceroy of India, at Jabalpur, on the

Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, at Birmingham, on Imperialism, old and new.

1. Delcassé, in the French Chamber, on foreign affairs.

Mr. Asquith, at Ashington, on South Africa and the War. Lord Rosebery, at Edinburgh, on our forces serving abroad. Mr. Chaplin, in London, on the Vaccination

Sir Edward Grey, at Alnwick, on the War in South Africa.

Mr. Ritchie, at Loughton, on public affairs.
 Lord Salisbury, at the Guildhall, on the War and the Samoa arrangement.
 Mr. Walter Long, at Diss, deprecates attack on Mr. Chamberlain's diplomacy.
 Sir H. Fowler, at Wolverhampton, on the
 Mr. Ealfour, at Dewsbury, on the War in South

Sir H. Fowler, at Wolverhampton, on the War.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson, at Workington, condemns the way the War was brought about.

Sir M. Hicks-Beach, at the Mansion House, on commercial education.

Mr. F. Harrison, in London, on the Boers' nobility of character.

Mr. B. Harrison, at Leicester, on the policy of the Imperial Government in South Africa.

Mr. Chamberlain, at Leicester, on the Success of Lord Salisbury's foreign policy.

Mr. Choamberlain, at Leicester, on the Success of Lord Salisbury's foreign policy.

Mr. Choamberlain, at Leicester, on the present good relations between America and Great Britain.

OBITUARY.

Nov. 1. Nedjib Pasha (Turkish Minister at Madrid).

Madid|. W. H. Trood (artist), 39. Major-General R. Boyle, C.B., 76. Ewanwick (woman of letters), 86.

Dr. Robinst (Paris).

Dr. Robinst (Paris).

Sir Josiah Rees (Chief Justice of Bermuda), 78.

Mr. T. Hudson Jordon, 71.

Mr. William Graham, 61.

Mr. Jacob Biight, 78.

Sir T. Newenham Deane, 71.

M. Charles de Varegny, 70.

Lieutenant-Colonel Keith-Falconer (killed at Belmont), 30.

Fräulein Ulrike von Levetrow, 94.

M. Arthur Giry (French historian), 50.

Professor F. Tiemann, 51.

Dr. Camara Pestana (Lisbon).

Dr. Moritz Busch, 78.

Mr. Alexander McDougal, 90.

Sir Richard Moon, 78.

Mr. Alexander McDougal, 60.
Sir Richard Moon, 78.
Mr. John Architald Russell, 82.
Sir William Dawson Canadal, 79.
Mr. Thomas Macknight Belfast, 70.
The Marchioness of Salisbury.
Sir Rawson W. Rawson, K.C.M.G., C.B.
Mr. Garret Hobart Vice-President of U.S.A.).

Mr. Garret Hobart (Vice-President of U.S.A.).
 Professor August Miaskowski, 61.
 Mr. T. H. Ismay Founder of the White Star Line). 63.
 Mr. T. C. Binny Trevor, 87.
 Dr. de Courcey Wheeler (Dublin), 55.
 Rev. John Chalmers (China), 76.
 Mr. Henry Yaughan, 60.
 Mr. Henry Yaughan, 60.
 Mr. Charles Coghlan.
 Mr. James A. Scott (editor Irish Times), 67.
 M. Barand (engineer of the Simplon Tunnel).
 Baron Karl F. W. von Wrangel, 87.
 Don E. Ruspoli, Prince of Poggio-Suasa (Mayor of Rome).

Other Deaths Announced.

Rev. J. Kennedy: Rev. Mgr. Maguire, R.C.; Kennedy: Rev. Mgr. Maguire, R.C.; Surgeon-Major A. Harding; General von Stiehle; Mr. Dixon Kemp; Colonel Lecomte; Dr. Henry Hicks, F.R.S.; Mr. W. Lewis

Daily Mail.]

SPECIAL BOX DESIGNED TO HOLD THE CHOCOLATE GIVEN BY H.M. QUEEN VICTORIA TO THE SOLDIERS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

CHARACTER SKETCHES.

I.-ANDREW CARNEGIE.*

ON the 1st of January, 1900, Andrew Carnegie will enter into the undisputed and unencumbered possession of a fortune variously estimated at from £25,000,000 to £40,000,000, invested in preference stock in the greatest industrial concern in America. The annual income from this investment is over two millions sterling. Even if we take it exactly at two millions, the Dunfermline boy wields a plutocratic sceptre of £5,480 a day. A fortune of forty or fifty millions sterling is a rarity even in this latter age of million-aires. The magnitude of the Carnegie fortune is, however, the least notable thing about it. There are two other characteristics which are far more notable.

The first of these is the fact that Mr. Carnegie made his pile himself. He inherited nothing in the shape of coin from his ancestors, neither did he make any money by speculative finance. He built up his fortune by honest industry, aided by exceptional good fortune. But the other feature about the Carnegie fortune, which throws everything else into the shade, is the fact that, after having made his millions, Mr. Carnegie is about to give them all away. He is now sixty-two years of age, and the rest of his life, which he had intended to devote to leisure and rest, he finds it necessary to devote to the duty of distributing his wealth. Long ago he gained no small measure of fame as the author of the aphorism—"A man who dies rich dies disgraced." Supposing Mr.

Carnegie lives to see his ninetieth year, it will take him all his time to get rid of his money. Even if he merely distributed his annual income, he would in the next twenty-eight years have fiftysix millions to dispose of, and still, at the end of that time, he would "die disgraced" with forty or fifty millions still standing to his credit. He has therefore not merely to give away his income, but has steadily to diminish his capital investment. Should he live to be ninety, and he carries out his present intentions, he may have to distribute before the year 1928 well on to eighty or ninety millions sterling.

fairly

Mr. C these him a ledge

uncle for fi

a Sce

of st godly

own

thev

was use l

to r prine

To t

Bruc

in th

such

of th

to-d insp

sent

wer

nor

whi

Sco

I

hea

loo

the

the wei

Ca

tur

neg

Fa

we

arr

bu

wr ho

wa

dis

wa

m

dr

it.

WE

CO

en

fo

m

A

fa

up

What will he do with it? That is Mr. Carnegie's Conundrum. Mr. Carnegie has his wealth entirely at his own disposal. He can do with it whatever he likes, with a freedom, not to say a license, heretofore denied to mortal man. It is a strange and dazzling phenomenon to see the Dunfermline boy come back to Scotland heretofore denied to mortal man. It is a strange and dazzling phenomenon to see the Dunfermline boy come back to Scotland with the wealth to the last penny

THE BOY IN DUNFERMLINE.

Andrew Carnegie was born in Dunfermline on November 25th, 1837. He came of good old Scotch stock, and passed his early boyhood in one of the most famous historic cities in Scotland. Mr. Carnegie's father, William Carnegie, was a master-weaver in a small way. In those days the hour of gigantic mills had not dawned, and William Carnegie was regarded as a propertied man,

ANDREW CARNEGIE.

* From the Review of Reviews Annual, 1900, 18. 166 pp —"Mr Carnegie's Conundrum: £40,000,000. What Shall I Do With It?"

fairly well to do in the world, because he owned four damask looms, and was able to employ apprentices. Mr. Carnegie has given us several glimpses of his life in these earlier days, before the pinch of poverty overtook him and he was able to pick up the rudiments of knowledge. He learned most from his mother and from his uncle. His mother taught him his letters and continued for fifty years to be the good genius of his life. She was a Scotch woman of the old type—that is to say, a woman of strong character and of vigorous understanding, a godly woman, who looked well after the order of her own household and brought up her children in the way they should go. Young Andrew Carnegie's character was moulded by his mother, and to-day as we discuss the use he will make of his gigantic fortune we shall do well to remember that that trust will be administered on principles which he acquired at his mother's knee. To this day when Mr. Carnegie looks back into the past, Bruce and Wallace stand conspicuous as aureoled heroes in the Temple of Fame; but they are neither of them such an abiding influence in his life as the third member of the triumvirate, Robert Burns. Andrew Carnegie is to-day in all essential outlines as he was fashioned and inspired before he reached his eleventh year. He grew up a little republican, embodying unconsciously the sentiments of his father's household. The landed nobles were in their eyes the hereditary enemies of the people, nor could any good be hoped from the Tory oligarchy which had left so deep and grievous a mark on recent Scottish history.

THE LAD IN PENNSYLVANIA.

In these early days the shadow of adversity hung heavily over their little household. The days of the handloom were numbered, and, as there seemed no room for them in the Old World, they would try their fortunes in This was in the year 1848. The looms were sold, the household dispersed, and William Carnegie and his wife, with Andrew and his brother, turned their faces to the Western World. The Carnegies embarked in a sailing ship, as the Pilgrim Fathers had done two hundred years before, and they were seven weeks crossing the Atlantic! When they arrived at the other side they made their way to Pittsburg, where some relatives had already settled. wrench from all the old associations and friends in Scotland was severely felt by the boy. He has told us how, when his father came back announcing that there was no more work to be had, and a family council met to discuss the selling of the looms, a sense of misery, of want and poverty, ate into his childish heart, and he made up his mind that the wolf of poverty should be driven far from their door if it lay within his power to do The spur of that bitter moment has never ceased to be felt. He very soon was able to bar the door upon the wolf, but the impetus which drove him to make the effort continued with him with undying force through life. The emigration to America was taken chiefly for his sake and for that of his brother. The old folks might have muddled through somehow in Dunfermline, but it would be better for the boys to emigrate. Thus it was that Andrew Carnegie was transplanted from the ancient city and royal borough of Dunfermline to take up his abode far from the tomb of Bruce, and make his living in the State of Pennsylvania.

HIS FIRST STEP UPWARDS.

As soon as he was twelve years of age he was put to work as bobbin-boy in the cotton factory in which his father had obtained work. He received five shillings a week.

He began work before it was light in the morning, and worked all day until after sunset, with only forty minutes intermission for dinner. But even the work of the cotton factory was not so hard as that for which he exchanged it. An old Scotchman, who knew some of the Carnegie family, took him into a factory where they made bobbins, and set him to fire a boiler and run a small steam engine which controlled the machinery. A child of thirteen, with the responsibility of running a steam engine, naturally felt that he was no longer a boy, but a man indeed. But although the work was heavy and the hours long, he was not unhappy. He had a good home, and he never ceased to cherish hope in his breast. "I was young," he said, "and had my dreams, and something within me always told me that this would not last, and that I should soon get into a better position."

Andrew Carnegie had not long to wait for his deliverance from the drudgery of firing the boiler. When only fourteen, he became telegraph boy at Pittsburg. It was, he said, a transference from darkness to light-from the desert to Paradise-and he was the happiest boy alive when he found himself amid books, newspapers, pens, ink, pencils, and writing-pad. From telegraph-boy Mr. Carnegie pushed his way upwards to become an operator. By coming to the office before the operator arrived in the morning, and practising with other boys along the lines, he was first able to read the messages and then took them by ear. His ability to read by sound led to his appointment as operator. This brought him in a salary of £5 a month, or £60 a year—a figure which, as a boy, he had fixed as the ideal standard of comfort! It was not bad for a lad-only fifteen or sixteen.

MORE AND MORE PROMOTION.

Smart, bright, wiry, active and intelligent, young Andrew Carnegie did not long remain at the telegraph One day Mr. Thomas A Scott, a superintendent of the Pennsylvania Railroad, who frequently came to the telegraph office and had noticed Carnegie's briskness, offered him the post of clerk and operator to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. In the service of that line he remained for thirteen years. He began by being telegraphic clerk and operator. He left it after having been appointed to the post of Mr. Scott, that of Super-intendent of the Pittsburg Division. It is not surprising that Mr. Scott came to regard him as his right-hand man; and when Mr. Scott became Assistant Secretary of War, he put Mr. Carnegie in charge of the military railroads and telegraphs of the Government. Carnegie was then only a young man of three or four and twenty, and it was his first experience of actual warfare. Mr. Carnegie's experience in this war intensified the abhorrence of war which has always been with him a dominating sentiment. He was very glad when, in the second year of the war, he was able to leave Washington and return to Pittsburg, and resume his duties on the Pennsylvania Railroad.

HIS BEGINNINGS IN BUSINESS.

Shortly after his return from Washington he stumbled apparently by chance—upon the inventor of the sleeping-car, with whom he formed a partnership that gave him a great lift upwards. Mr. Carnegie now began to feel that he was on the highway to wealth.

His first stroke of good luck was made when he had a little money of his own to invest, and his very first investment turned out a veritable gold mine. In the early sixties the enormous natural wealth of the Pennsylvanian oil-fields was little known. Mr. Carnegie was one of the lucky mortals who struck oil. He with some ce him merely

e next eight fifty-

is to

. and

dis-

with mil-

stand-

redit.

refore

o give come,

adily

his vest-

ld he nety.

arries

esent

he dis-

the:

ll on nety

ng. he Γhat

gie's

ım.

has rely dis-

can

hat-

vith

t to nse.

nied

an.

nge

ng

to

m-

me

nd

lth

ny

ds

n-

nd

us

d.

e end

others bought a farm for £8,000, which in one year paid in cash dividends £200,000—rather a good return upon an investment of £8,000.

Mr. Carnegie reached his thirtieth year before he was shunted from oil and railways into the industry in which he has made his millions.

HOW HE BEGAN TO TURN IRON INTO GOLD.

After his appointment as Mr. Scott's successor in the superintendence of the Pittsburg Division of the Pennsylvania Railroad, he found that the company he was serving had begun to make experiments with an iron bridge. Before that time all bridges had been made of wood. Finding the experiment successful, he saw that there was a great future for those who would manufacture material for bridge building. He therefore joined with several friends, raised £250 extra from his banker, and started the Keystone Bridge Works. The Keystone firm was successful from the start. It began by building the first great bridge for the Ohio River (which has a 300 foot span), and has never looked behind it since. Mr. Carnegie found that bridge-building paid him better than superintending railways. He no sooner felt his feet in the new enterpr s: than he resigned his position on the rail vay.

The subsequent history of Mr. Carnegie's career need not be told at great length. He was now in business for himself. He had repaid the small loans with which he had been financed at the beginning of his career, and he was free to take up any good thing that he came across. He was situated at Pittsburg, in the heart of the richest iron and coal region in the world. He kept in touch with the Old World, and it was from England in 1863 that he obtained the hint he was to turn to such good account. Thirty years ago English railways were just beginning to substitute steel for iron as the material for their metalled way. Mr. Carnegie saw that steel was the coming metal, and set to work to provide plant to anticipate the inevitable demand.

HIS PRESENT HOLDING.

He had established a reputation, he was known to be a man in whose hands everything prospered, he could command as much capital as he required. And as he had faith in the future of the country whose praises he chanted in his book "Triumphant Democracy," he acquired all the best coal and iron mines in the neighbourhood of Pittsburg. Afterwards he extended his operations and acquired the best iron-producing lands on the banks of Lake Superior, and built a railway 186 miles long, in order to bring his ore to his shops. His idea was to own everything that was necessary for the production of what he had to manufacture. In this way he has built up a veritable kingdom.

The acquisition of the best mineral deposits which can be worked at a minimum of cost is the solid foundation on which the Carnegie fortune rests. These immense resources enable him, for instance, to produce coke at about one-fifth the price that it costs to produce it in England.

HIS PROPHECY AS TO ENGLAND'S DOWNFALL.

Mr. Carnegie's diagnosis of the economic situation of Britain and the United States goes deep, and if he is right the doom of Britain is written in the tablet of Destiny with a pen of adamant. For years past we have maintained our manufacturing position by attracting to these little islands the raw material from other continents. This, in Mr. Carnegie's opinion, will no longer be possible. We are using up our coal, we are reaching the limits of our resources in ironstone, while the United States has as yet but scratched the surface of its mineral treasures. The skilled labour of the world will naturally gravitate to the place where wages are highest and dividends largest. In Greater Britain it is probable we may find vast resources which will enable the Empire to hold its own with the Republic. But if the contest is to be between the United States and the United Kingdom, in Mr. Carnegie's opinion the struggle is over—we are already beaten hopelessly beyond all chance of recovery.

"Yes," said Mr. Carnegie meditatively, "the law will become universal. No nation will permanently be able to maintain a greater population than what it can feed and support with its own products. The destiny of the old country seems to me very plain. You will be the family seat of the race. Your manufactures will go one after the other, but you will become more and more popular as the garden and pleasure-ground of the race, which will always regard Great Britain as its ancestral home. Probably you will be able to support fifteen millions, not more."

If Mr. Carnegie be right, or even if ten per cent. of his lugubrious predictions be justified, it is obvious that we, as a nation, would do well to shorten sail and prepare for the difficulties ahead. Instead of doing this we are increasing our expenditure every year and increasing our responsibilities and financial obligations, as if we were merely entering into our inheritance instead of approaching the end of our tether.

HIS CHARACTER.

Of the character of this remarkable man it is not necessary to say much, but it may be well to remark upon the youthful enthusiasm which makes this man of sixty, laden with the care of millions, as light-hearted as a boy of sixteen without a penny in his plack. I suppose it is a matter of temperament, that element of vivacity and of inexhaustible interest in the world and everything that it contains. Most men by the time they have accumulated their millions find themselves in the place of the famous doctor who had so many books on the top of his head that they crushed out his brains. Mr. Carnegie, however, moves as freely under the weight of his millions as if the solid bullion was gossamer light as air. There is a cheery self-complacency which never fails him. Mr. Carnegie is supremely satisfied with himself, and for the most part with the Republic whose triumphs he hymns in his best known book. He is not quite so satisfied now, when the news of fresh fighting in the Philippines is served up every morning and evening; but not even the apostasy of the Republican body from the traditional policy of the fathers of the Republic can permanently darken the roseate outlook of Mr. Carnegie. The contributory causes of this desirable and rare equipoise by which Mr. Carnegie is able to unite the exuberance of a boy's enthusiasm with the mature wisdom gained by a lifelong experience are

HIS ORIGINAL ENDOWMENT.

To begin with, Mr. Carnegie inherited a good constitution. He came of a splendid old Scottish stock, and was brought up on porridge and the Book of Proverbs. He honoured his father and his mother, and his days have been long according to the promise, for he eschewed all the vices of youth, and devoted himself from the first decade to helping his parents to meet the household expenses. He has never smoked, and if he is not an absolute tectotaler he is certainly extremely abstemious in the matter of alcohol. Good health, a good constitution, and good habits have all stood him in good stead. He has also been extremely successful. After the first

stru

He

vict is n

was

I

outl

abs

we

Cro

Car

" T

the sin,

ac

wei

Car

res

per mic firs

bili

sid

the

thi

of wh

wit

sin

on

we

clo

an illu

he ex

mi

see

alt

by wi

to alı

ar

to

th

struggle of his boyhood he has had singularly few reverses. He has gone on conquering and to conquer from one victory to another. Success has mellowed him, and he is much less acrimonious and disputatious to-day than he was ten years ago.

HIS OPTIMISM.

It is possible that Mr. Carnegie's cheery, pleasant outlook upon things in general is partly due to the absence of any deep religious convictions, if by religion we mean the mystical, transcendental element which Cromwell possessed in such a special manner. Mr. Carnegie is like the cattle whom Walt Whitman praised: "They do not lie awake in the dark and weep for their sins." A good digestion and an easy conscience, or at least a conscience not haunted by sense of sin, probably helped to enable Mr. Carnegie to take a cheerful view of life impossible to his ancestors who were reared in the shadow of the Calvinistic faith. Mr. Carnegie has not been burdened with the cares and responsibilities of family life until a comparatively recent period. His devotion to his mother kept him single to middle age, and it is only three or four years since he first experienced the satisfaction and faced the responsibility of parentage. To look habitually upon the bright side of things, always to take short views and to encounter the future with a cheerful confidence that the tendency is upwards and onwards, and that the law governing all things tends to the survival of the fittest and the evolution of the best-such is the comfortable philosophy with which Mr. Carnegie has confronted the world.

MR. CARNEGIE AS AUTHOR.

As a writer Mr. Carnegie has gifts which many men with greater pretensions to literature might envy. He is simple, natural, and lucid. Some of his articles, notably one on the currency question at the last General Election, were models of clear statement, of illustration, and of close argument. He has travelled all round the world, and in every latitude has been a close observer of men Blessed with a retentive memory and a quick association of ideas, his essays abound with happy illustrations and quotations. The charm of his writing is that it is so natural. Even when he deals with statistics he contrives so to represent them as to instruct rather than to bewilder. His political ideas are broadened with experience. At first he was a rather rancorous apostle of militant republicanism with a considerable taint of a sectarian bias against the Christian religion. Mr. Carnegie was never in good favour among the Orthodox, and although he has set up a kind of naval chapel in his Highland retreat, he can hardly be regarded as one of the "orthodox believers in John Knox," nor can any organised form of religious belief claim him as its own. But he has lost much of the twang of his earlier days; and he admires, although he may not envy, the unhesitating faith which stood Mr. Gladstone in such good stead. Although an idealist and an optimist, and therefore a believer in the highest sense of the word, his mind is distinctly of the secular order, nor can the closest scrutiny reveal any ecclesiastical bias or theological prejudice. In that also he is very much like Mr. Rhodes. His chosen apostles are Herbert Spencer and John Morley.

A MODERN MONTE CRISTO.

Mr. Carnegie is a shrewd Scot with a very keen eye While not for the appreciation of his fellow-creatures. afraid to express a diverse judgment in good set terms upon occasion, he is by no means unaware of the advantage of the use of the butter-boat. His enemies in America have subjected him to criticism on account of the light-hearted gaiety with which he discusses his schemes and his achievements, but they are mistaken in attributing this to a desire for réclame. Mr. Carnegie is honestly well pleased with himself, and cheerily talks of what he has done and what he proposes to do with natural interest, and who can say that he is not justified in being interested in himself. Of all the mournful spectacles in the world, surely it is one of the most pathetic when a man or a woman is no longer interested in his or her own life. And are we not all interested in the maneinto whose hands the Destinies have entrusted the task of distributing so vast a fortune?

The foregoing pages are extracted from the opening chapters of the Christmas Number of the REVIEW OF REVIEWS, which is devoted to a discussion of how Mr. Carnegie could best promote the triumph of his dieas by the distribution of his millions. The following table of contents explains the nature and scope of the study of this fascinating subject :-

PART I.—MR. ANDREW CARNEGIE.— Chapter I. The Making of the Millions; II. Mr. Carnegie as an Employer of Labour; III. The Ideals of Mr. Carnegie and Mr. Rhodes; IV. The Laird of Skibo Castle.

PART II.—HIS "GOSPEL OF WEALTH."—Chapter I. Concerning Millionaires; II. "The Gospel of Wealth"; III. The Reception of His Gospel.

PART III.—His CONUNDRUM.—Chapter I. How He will Solve It; II. The British-American United States; III. The United States of Europe; IV. "The Best Yet"; V. The Endowed Newspaper; VI. The Moral of it All.

II.-THE RIGHT HON. HARRY ESCOMBE, M.L.A., EX-PREMIER OF NATAL.

ONE of the most chivalrous acts reported during the progress of the present trouble between Great Britain and the Transvaal was the visit paid by Mr. Harry Escombe, ex-Premier of Natal, and his wife to Newcastle, at a time when this most northerly town in Natal was threatened by the Boers, and when almost every one was fleeing from it to places of greater safety. When Mr. Escombe and his wife went to Newcastle, every one was expecting an immediate attack, and the women and children, and many of the men, took the opportunity of retreating into various towns of the Colony. But Mr. Escombe, like the courageous Britisher that he is, simply walked about the semi-deserted streets and told the people that, siege or no siege, he and his wife would remain in Newcastle until all sign of trouble was at an end. It may safely be stated that the visit of Mr. Escombe and his wife has been chiefly responsible for the peaceful occupation by the Boers of a town which the British, for strategical reasons, did not care to defend.

Mr. Escombe's chivalrous act is characteristic of one of the best and bravest and ablest statesmen which Britain possesses "over the seas." With the exception of Sir Alfred Milner and Mr. Rhodes, Mr. Escombe is the leading statesman in South Africa to-day, and a few personal reminiscences ought to be of interest to English readers.

sures.

vitate

dends

v find

ld its

to be

m, in e are verv.

v will able feed

f the e the one

more race.

stral

fteen

it, of

that

and this

in-ions,

tead

ces-

the

iden

y of

is a d of it it ated

ous

ead

ver,

the

s a

ar-

ost

his

hen

up asy

the

the ses gie ith are sti-

nd

bs.

lys

red

he

old

an

us tu-

d.

rst

MR. RHODES AND MR. ESCOMBE.

There is great similarity between Mr. Rhodes and Mr. Escombe, although they are not in entire accord on South African questions, and this similarity has been further developed by the present trouble. Escombe and his wife are helping their friends at Newcastle, Mr. Rhodes is doing all that is possible to help his friends at Kimberley. But this similarity is not of to-day only, but of a lifetime. Both men are about the same age; early in life they settled in the country of their adoption; both have been Premiers of a British colony in South Africa; both have a passion for South African expansion.

There is, however, this great difference in the passion for expansion which has characterised every public action of these two statesmen. Mr. Rhodes commenced his work of expansion at the extreme northern limit of the then known South Africa, where he added a province to Mr. Es-Great Britain. combe commenced at home: he has made a great port, and thereby opened up another high-way to the north. How Mr. Escombe accomplished this great work is not known on this side of the water; in fact, it is not known to any in its entirety to any but those who have the honour of the ex-Premier's confidence.

A DREAM THAT CAME . TRUE.

After a hard struggle at the Colonial Bar, Mr. Escombe secured a nice little competency, and then determined to give himself up to public work. built a house on the Berea. The front windows overlook the magnificent har-bour at Durban. It was whilst sitting in one of these rooms, watching the various currents, that he dreamed his dreams, just as Mr. Rhodes does in his still more beautiful house near Cape Town. Mr. Escombe saw nothing but a magnificent natural harbour literally going to waste simply because the Bluff Channel was blocked to, all shipping by a shifting bar of sand which stretched from the Bluff to the Point. When Mr. Escombe began to dream his dreams of expansion the Bluff Channel was only six or seven feet deep; but he had an instinctive feeling—it was a part of his genius—that this obstacle could be removed, and that the little port could be converted into one of the best in South Africa, and that Durban, which was then nothing but a beautiful and sleepy little town, could be transformed into one of the most prosperous ports in the country. Although he knew practically nothing of the art of engineering, he knew that his dream was right, and he set as his great task in life, the accomplishment of a work which most people regarded as hopeless and ridiculous. He studied every current, he plumbed every depth, he located every rock, until every inch of the harbour and the bay was quite familiar to him. Men laughed at him for his pains; but when Mr. Escombe once gets an idea into his head, all the people in the world cannot laugh or knock it out.

THE MAKING OF DURBAN PORT.

When Mr. Escombe became Chairman of the Harbour

Board, and when he was elected to the House of Assembly in 1872, he had an opportunity of putting his dreams into practical shape. He was howled at, laughed at, sneered at, but it did not matter. best engineers who could be procured said the scheme was impracticable, impossible, worse than Utopian. To deepen such a channel from six feet five inches to twenty feet was literally the dream of a lunatic. It did not matter to Mr. Escombe. He fought the engineers, the Harbour Board, Parliament, and everybody who opposed his particular scheme. With indomitable courage, with an infinity of tolerance and patience, and with lofty and impassioned eloquence. the ex-Premier stood by his point, and he triumphed. The bar was practically removed; and the splendid port at Durban to-day, with its three hundred and fifty feet of wharfage, its long lines of ships, which find a perfectly safe anchorage almost in the streets of the town, testify to the completeness of a triumph which, as far as I know, has no parallel in the history of any single man's work.

Photograph by}

THE RIGHT HON. HARRY ESCOMBE.

THE HARBOUR.

I shall never forget, writes a South African correspondent, going over the scene of Mr. Escombe's triumph with the ex-Premier as chaperon. We took one of the tugs which ply between the river and the bay. On perfectly smooth water we rode down the channel between the long rows of big ships. There were several 6,000-tonners lying there unloading their cargoes from all parts of the world, and the wharf reminded me of a walk along the Broomielaw. In no place in the world will a scene of greater activity be seen, or a more cosmopolitan crowd of [Elliott and Fry.

Once over the bar, and free from the shelter of the Bluff, we were tossed on a terrible sea. The wind was howling and the waves were almost mountains

high

had

the whe

awf

stea

foot tow

ma

the

my

at 1

ing

our

cro

and thi

not twe (it

OVE

ha

be

do

ha

th

m

hi

hi

he

th

high; and then I had a splendid object lesson of what had been accomplished for Durban and South Africa by the removal of the sandy bar, which allowed great ships of 7,000 tonnage to ride into perfectly smooth water, where they could anchor in safety without running the awful risks of discharging their cargo in the open road-stead. The sea was so rough that I could not keep a foothold on the deck of the tug; but Mr. Escombe turned towards me, put his arm through mine (he is a great big man, who inspires confidence), and said quietly, "Stand there a minute, and you will see the complete triumph of my life's work, for which people have laughed and jeered at me for years."

I turned towards the sea, and saw a great liner steaming out of the storm towards the bar. She was a 7,000-tonner, but was being rocked about almost as much as our little tug. But she came on without hesitation, crossed the bar without the slightest trouble, and anchored far up the river.

knew sk in eople

every rock.

quite ins :

nead.

out.

bour

was

e of

had tting

tical

d at,

but

The

ould

eme

pos-

nan.

nnel

s to

ally

It

Mr.

the

our and

his

Vith

vith

and ofty

ice,

his

ed.

ally

did

ay,

and

its

ich

or-

eets

the

iph

has

ory

et,

the

as

en

we

big

ere

ld,

ie-

ter

of

he

nd

ns

۲.

"I do not wonder that you are a proud man, Mr.

Escombe," I remarked.

"They called me a crank, a faddist, a lunatic; but this speaks for itself," he replied quietly. "But I have not done yet, and will not be content until the bar is twenty-five feet deep, so that such a great vessel as yon" (it was the Union Company's mail boat, the Briton, of over 10,000 tons) "can come in as safely as the one we have just seen cross the bar."

THE PENALTY OF SUCCESS.

When this conversation took place Mr. Escombe had been in "the cold shades of opposition" for about three months. He had been defeated by people who even yet do not fully understand him.

"You know, one of your Governments fell over a beer barrel, and mine fell over the bar," Mr. Escombe remarked, with a merry twinkle in his eyes.

"But they will want you again in a few months. I will bet you a sovereign that you will be Premier again in less than twelve months," I said.

"Done," he replied promptly. "If the people of Natal want me again they must say so. I am not going out of my way to seek the office."

That is almost three years ago, and I lost my bet; but his time is coming, and Mr. Escombe is young enough and strong enough to wait until the supreme crisis in the history of the Garden Colony calls him back to the head of a strong Government.

That evening Mr. Escombe revealed some other of his characteristics—his good humour, his tolerance, his great heartedness. I was a passenger by the Briton, and we invited Mr. Escombe and his wife and family to spend the night on board. I had heard it stated in Natal that Mr. Escombe could not patiently bear opposition, and could not tolerate the expression of any views with which he did not agree. Before he left the ship on the following morning I knew that the statement was an utter fabrication.

A LONG ARGUMENT.

I hardly know how, but as we sat on the deck of the great liner, enjoying our cigars and the glories of an African summer's night, with the bar just in front of us, but still forbidding us to enter port, Mr. Escombe and I fell to discussing constitutional history. The bar was forgotten, but the incident of the afternoon taught me something of the character of Natal's greatest statesman. On the bar question we were entirely agreed, but when it came to a discussion on constitutional history we did not seem able to strike a single note of agreement. It was a dangerous experiment for a young journalist to oppose, practically on his own ground, the leader of the Natal Bar, the ex-Premier of the Colony, the Father of the Natal Port; but having taken up a certain position I was not going to recede from it, and the argument was kept up until past midnight, when Mr. Escombe and I had the deck to ourselves. In the small hours of the morning we shook hands and parted. We were to sail the next day, and I did not expect to see Mr. Escombe again. But at five o'clock there was a knock at my cabin door, and on opening it I was surprised to see the tall, stalwart, splendid figure of the ex-Premier of Natal. "We are going to finish that argument," he said, and we started afresh, and went at it again for three hours and a half, until the bugle called us to breakfast. Through the long argument Mr. Escombe had shown the grasp of a statesman, a wonderful knowledge of constitutional history, an intense love of the Homeland, an almost fatherly patience coupled with a teacher's desire to impart knowledge to one much younger than himself. As he was stepping down to the tug which was waiting for him, Mr. Escombe and I shook hands and laughed over our long argument.

HIS MASTER IN CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY.

"You have some brilliant ideas, my young friend," he said, with a sunny smile, "but they are badly regulated. I will send you the book from which I learned all I know about constitutional history," and a few days later I received at Cape Town two volumes of "Todd's Parliamentary Government in England," enclosing a letter which reveals many of Mr. Escombe's characteristics,—his instinctive charm, his power to control others, his masterly grip of any subject which he takes in hand, his kindness of heart. That letter is my most cherished possession.

I would like another paragraph to record my impressions of Mr. Escombe as he was when he came over to London as Premier of Natal to represent the Colony at the Queen's Jubilee. Mr. Escombe is not a Republican; he has no Republican leanings. He is an intensely loyal son of the Empire, but he hates Courts and Court ceremonials. His home is amongst the people. He would have made a model leader of the British democracy, and it would be worth a good deal to hear his splendid voice in the House of Commons. And, by the way, it does seem a pity that the people of England see so little of the great statesmen who have built up our Empire over the seas. But though we so seldom see or hear them, it is just as well to know something of the British pluck which is their instinct, something of the courage which they radiate in the new lands to which they go, and something of the greatness which does so much to make England great in almost every part of the world.

AT THE JUBILEE.

I shall never forget watching Mr. Escombe dress for a great Court ceremonial during the Jubilee. He held up a pair of short-legged "unmentionables," and said with withering scorn, "Fancy a big fellow like me getting into these things," and when he had "got them on," and had buckled on his little sword, he laughingly described himself as "an animated popinjay." But though he has so little respect for the outward pomps and shows of Courts, Mr. Escombe was one of the most imposing figures which took part in that great Carnival of Loyalty to the Queen of the Empire. Mr. Escombe, it is well known, could have returned to Natal as "Sir Harry," if he had cared for the honour, but he likes to be called plain Harry by his friends, and nothing evokes his scorn so much as to be called Henry. He is a splendid friend, a more splendid enemy. He was ever a fighter, and he longs for another fight, but he will not fight unless he can fight with clean hands and a good conscience.

AS LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION.

He rose to his highest heights during the long sickness of his successor, Sir Henry Binns. At that time the Natal Ministry was simply playing "Hamlet" without the Prince. Sir Henry was a direct contrast to his predecessor; he was dull and prosaic, hard-working and loyal, but he pledged his faith to the passing of a Customs Union. When he fell sick, Mr. Escombe came to the rescue of the Government, and although there were vital party questions to be settled, he fought for the State rather than for a party. If he had been the colleague of Mr. Henry Bale, Q.C., the Attorney-General and acting-Premier, he could not have rendered more loyal service to Natal, and when Sir Henry was laid to rest, it remained for Mr. Escombe to pronounce his highest eulogy in the Natal House of Assembly.

On that occasion his speech was the highest type of sympathetic Parliamentary oratory. He and Sir Henry had often crossed swords in the House and elsewhere, and there is an evidence in justification of our Parliamentary institutions when the dead Premier's noblest epitaph is written, or rather spoken, by his old "enemy," the leader of the Opposition.

A PROPHECY.

I am not inclined to put on the robe of the prophet, but I have no hesitation in saying that some time in the near future Mr. Rhodes and Mr. Escombe will meet in the far north of Rhodesia, and will shake hands and congratulate each other on the success of their schemes of expansion. They began from different ends of the Continent, but they will both get to the same point in the end. Mr. Rhodes began at the top, and Mr. Escombe at the bottom. Both men have made highways to the North, and they have expanded the great Empire. But when they meet the map of Africa will have been changed; it will be a great deal redder than it is to-day, and Mr. Rhodes will be Premier of the Cape Colony and Mr. Escombe will be Premier of Natal, and the road will be right open to the North. Thus the day dreams of two great men will be realised, and South Africa will be the greatest and the most prosperous sub-Continent in the world.

X. X.

BRITANNIA'S PICANINNY.

'(Written by special request for "Our Boys" at the Front.)

She's the smallest of the children In the dear Old Lady's shoe, And yet the lass has shown the rest The sort of thing to do; For while they have been waiting, Why, she's knocked things into shape, And shamed Miss Wacht-en-Beetje And her cousins at the Cape.

Chorus.—She's Britannia's Picaninny,
If she isn't very big!
She's a Daughter of the Empire,
So she doesn't care a fig
Tho' she's landed in the front of it—
And bound to bear the brunt of it!
The grim and grisly brunt of it!
Natal!

She's a plucky little midget
If she doesn't run to size,
And tho' she's bu: a feather-weight
She'll wipe the Transvaal's eyes.
The way she peeled her jacket
Shows the good old fighting strain;
And what Bitannia's sons have done
Natal will do again!

When they told her men were wanted,
Well, she vowed she would be first,
And rolled her Volunteers along
Before the storm should burst;
So while the Cape was wavering,
And kept her colours hid,
Natalia flung her flag aloft
And just sailed in and—"did!"

Yes, we love this Picaninny,
And will gather round her shield,
Sworn to keep her motto stainless
On the red and bloody field:
For she's left her honour's keeping
To her trusty Volunteers,
So they greet Natalia's banner
With a storm of ringing cheers.

Chorns.—She's Britannia's Picaninny,
If she isn't very big!
She's a Daughter of the Empire,
So she doesn't care a fig
Tho' she's landed in the front of it—
And bound to bear the brunt of it!
The grim and grisly brunt of it!
Natal!

-Natal Advertiser

LYNN LYSTER.

III.—CECIL J. RHODES: AN IMPRESSION BY PRINCESS RADZIWILL.

AS a pendant or postscript to the Character Sketch of Mr. Rhodes in last month's issue I publish the following interesting paper written by Princess Radziwill this summer.

PRINCESS RADZIWILL.

Princess Radziwill is a lady whom I had the pleasure of meeting during my visit to St. Petersburg in 1888. She was then virtually under sentence of banishment from Berlin by decree of Prince Bismarck, who regarded her as an enemy by no means to be despised. She was a friend of the Empress Frederick and a keen politician. She had written a novel which made no small sensation at the time, owing to the side lights which it threw upon the inside track of German politics. She belongs to the great Polish family of Radziwills, and was recognised both in St. Petersburg and Berlin not only as a lady of great personal charm, but as a political personage of no small influence. Princess Radziwill is now in South Africa, where she has had ample opportunities of observing Mr. Rhodes in his African habitat. It is of course impossible for her, a foreigner and a stranger, to realise the full sweep of Mr. Rhodes's ideals, and it is evident from her paper that she judges him, perhaps of necessity, from what may be called the dinner-table and drawing-room point of view. Nevertheless her appreciation of the great South African is interesting and suggestive.

ser

Tr

is

ac

wa

Af

ab

ah

els

loc

str

an

wh

m

CO

Be

C

pr

ye

tr

re

CO

ar

th

he

W

Ca

al

ai

CC

ba ru

th

th

th ir g

c

h

HER SKETCH OF MR. RHODES THIS SUMMER.

Princess Radziwill writes me as follows :-

As I was going to South Africa, I was asked to send you a few lines concerning the present crisis in the Transvaal and the man who, according to certain people, is the primary cause of it—Mr. Cecil Rhodes. After accepting the task, I find it now a most difficult one. It wants months and years even to come to an opinion respecting matters here, and I have only been in South Africa a few days. Moreover, some people are so absurdly prejudiced against Mr. Rhodes that they absolutely refuse to see in present events anything else but the consequence of the Jameson Raid. They cannot, and I may safely say they will not, look at things in their proper light-that is, as a struggle for equality of rights, for individual liberty and for the triumph of that wider, higher civilisation which is the only true one, and which tends to elevate the mind, to broaden the views, and to add to the material comforts and moral welfare of every human being, be he Boer or English, black or white man.

If I write that this civilisation is embodied in Mr. Cecil Rhodes, these people will not believe me, and in all probability will throw away my prose with disgust. And yet what can I say here but what I believe to be the truth-a truth which has stared at me ever since I reached those African shores and tried honestly and conscientiously to form an opinion as to country, men, and events, without having so far succeeded in taking their real estimate and measurement; because I arrived here imbued with old-world traditions and prejudices, with the mistaken idea we all have at home-that Africa can be judged from our European point of view.

"Old-world traditions and prejudices." It is intentionally I used these words. Africa is not the Old World, and our great mistake lies in the fact that we have always considered her as part of it, have mixed up in our ignorant minds the old Egyptian civilisation and the barbarity of those native wild tribes who still inhabit the regions of the Tanganyika, and who until recently ruled at Khartoum. We quite forget that Africa is still "the unknown," a new country recently discovered, that we must look upon it as such, and that we must regard the man who virtually brought to the notice of the world this dark continent as a reformer and a creator, such as Cæsar showed himself to be in Rome, and Peter the Great in Russia.

I have mentioned those two great names of history, and I do not hesitate an instant to associate them with that of the man who, in those last days of a century of incredulity, scepticism and cynicism, proved himself a genius like Cæsar, a reformer like Peter, and who certainly was as much actuated by noble motives in all he ever did, thought, hoped, fought for, and realised, as the mighty and proud Czar was, when he wrote to one of his trusty advisers those memorable words: "In a great work one must consider the ideal which is its ultimate end, and in order to reach that end, one must not hesitate even before the shedding of blood, for blood is also sometimes a footstep towards the moral elevation of a nation."

We don't shed blood nowadays. Power which, in bygone times, was reached by the force of the sword, is obtained at present through other means. The God Mammon has superseded the blade our forefathers had always hanging at their side, but because the weapon has undergone a transformation, is it a proof that it does not require any longer to be used? Empires are not conquered by mere words. In olden days they were taken by storm;

at present they must be won and bought, not only by daring and audacity, but by coolness and judgment, by the knowledge that the conquest once made must be kept and improved, and that the gold which has replaced the sword of ancient times must ultimately help the cause of progress and civilisation in teaching people to work and helping them to a better life.

The man who has realised that idea for which he was laughed at and scorned not so many years ago, the dreamer who from his youth upwards had an ideal, who, even when nobody belived in him, nursed his dream of greatness, and that not a personal one, that man may have great faults; but surely he redeems them by that divine spark of genius given to so very few, which, even when it leaps suddenly, strangely, and almost savagely upon the world as upon an unbroken horse does not frighten it, but on the contrary, leaves it, even when it disappears in the natural course of time, a future in the memory of its past.

It is that genius before which all those who have had anything to do with him bow, even when they refuse to acknowledge it, that has made Cecil Rhodes such a unique figure, not only in South Africa, but in the whole world. His enemies may attack, slander, distrust him, denounce him as a speculator, a financier, a moneyseeking and money-making man; they will never succeed in diminishing his real value and greatness. Financiers we have seen in plenty; unscrupulous money-making men we have all of us met; in this South Africa I am writing from they abound, but what of that? One scarcely hears or knows their names, whereas Cecil Rhodes's is a familiar one in the hut of the savage native, the farm of the Dutch settler, and the fireside of the English colonist. And why this-I won't say popularity, as the word could not be applied everywhere-but this notoriety? Because he has realised the biggest of problems, the using of money for a higher aim; because he has handled it as Cortes did his sword and Cæsar his legions-to give his country an empire, and to use that country's civilisation, its laws, its conceptions of welfare, its moral worth and its material power, to improve the condition, better the existence, and use the natural resources and riches of the only part of the world which until now was unknown and unexplored, and which, by a superhuman effort of will, he has succeeded in uniting with ours, not by fire or sword, nor by menaces and threats, but by the two great forces of our century of discoveries and progress-steam and electricity.

It is not possible to refuse one's admiration to this colossal work of a genius. And yet, even here, where one can only understand and realise the difficulties which he has had to surmount, and of which we cannot form an estimate in Europe-even here, where Cecil Rhodes's presence and personality is always and everywhere felt, one can also understand the hatreds he has incurred, the bitter animosities he has provoked, not only on the part of those who have had the opportunity to approach him, but also from those others who have never even seen him, but who nevertheless grudge him the immense amount of room he takes in the world. He has allowed people to see too much the disdain in which he holds them, and giving back an unjust scorn with a scorn just and severe, he has wounded those susceptibilities a less able but a more supple mind would have spared.

Here, I think, lies the great fault of this masterful intelligence. Not only is he as unsparing towards others as he is towards himself, but he allows, even more than he feels it, his mistrust and contempt of humanity to appear in everything he does or says. Not naturally

of

sh

in

at 11

a,

g

e

e

"GROOTE SCHUUR," THE HOME OF MR. RHODES ON THE SLOPE OF THE DEVIL'S PEAK.

rude, but naturally shy, he assumes a rudeness which, being foreign to his nature, becomes from this very fact more aggressive, and a disdain of the opinions, judgments, and actions of his neighbour, which is as insulting as it is irritating to those who have not studied him long enough, or carefully enough, to find out how much is real and how much is assumed in his manner. He forgets that every opinion, however false it may be, is bound to be respected if it is sincere, and that to every intelligence, however poor it is, is due a certain amount of consideration, if only that of courtesy. And in this assumption of a rudeness which is not in him he wastes time and trouble, for it is surely unnecessary to give to all the knaves and fools one meets a false opinion of one's self, and it is still more useless to sham feelings which do not exist before those who are clever enough to make the distinction between a comedy he does not even play well and the real worth of the man who, with a perversity I feel almost tempted to call feminine, tries to accredit around him a legend utterly unworthy of him and the great deeds he has performed.

No kinder man lives than Cecil Rhodes, and yet he has been called hard, even by those who sometimes, unknown to themselves, have been the recipients of his The man who has never had a selfish thought, who has opened his purse, and helped with his influence all those who have applied to him, is yet spoken of as a cruel, merciless tyrant, and much as I admire him, I do not wonder at that. He does not possess amidst all his other gifts that of sympathy, nor the art, so useful sometimes, to make people forget his greatness. To know him well is to love him, but it is only a very few who know him well, and he lets the others—the crowd who judges him, without trying to understand him-he lets that crowd too often see and feel that he considers it as beneath his notice, not even giving people the opportunity of expressing an opinion, with which perhaps he would himself agree if he would only allow them to formulate it. He is always dreaming great dreams, thinking great thoughts, expecting from others the same amount of work and of self-sacrifice he is himself capable of, and he forgets that with his genius one cannot compete, his quickness of conceptions one cannot rival, and that it is not fair, either to himself or to others, to believe or pretend it is possible to do so.

Unfortunately he has been encouraged in that false path by the, I can safely say, disgusting toadyism to which he has been subjected in those last years by people who wanted to get something out of him, or who were willing to buy an acquaintance with him by an unlimited admiration for everything he did or said, no matter how wrong it might be. Women have flattered and men have submitted to him, until it is no wonder that in his fine nature grew a profound disgust, scorn and contempt for all these parasites, and that involuntarily he came to class with them the whole of humanity.

And yet all these faults, all these mistakes of his powerful mind, do not take away an atom of his greatness. It is as real as the splendour of that mountain in the shadow of which he has built himself a home which is a dream of beauty. When I first arrived in Cape Town, I made a stupid joke, and said one found nothing else in South Africa except Mr. Rhodes and Table Mountain, and that a fiendish rivalry existed between them. Little by little the glory of the mountain and the genius of the statesman became apparent to me; they seemed to possess a connecting link which bound them to one another. The mountain is steep, and seen from afar seems a barren desert; but when one scans it, with its marvellous wealth of flowers and blossoms, its endless variety of colours, when one explores its nooks and takes in its silent and sublime beauty; when one sees it rise so calm, so still, so fair, bathed in light or obscured by clouds, towering above the vice and fret and wretchedness of earth, as a reminder of that Almighty power which gave us hands to work and minds to think, when one realises that under its shadow one can afford to forget and forgive, one wonders how it is one did not take in at once all this splendour and magnificence. So it is with Cecil Rhodes. When one sees much of him, one does not remember any longer his faults or his mistakes, or else one regards them in their true lightas the imperfections inseparable from a great mind. One sees only the immense personal power of the man, his many kindnesses, his true and genuine generosity. One realises the colossal work he has done, the noble aims he has ever pursued, the recklessness with which he has risked his life and spent his money wherever and whenever his country's welfare or greatness required it. And one marvels at the tenacity of purpose with which this extraordinary man has, since his young student days, clung to a dream which at first appeared chimerical, and which nevertheless he realised in a few short years, the dream which not only gave an empire to his country, but which civilised that empire, communicating to it some of the greatness of its founder.

Surely this is more than enough to compensate for some petty faults and small drawbacks, even to obliterate the remembrance of graver mistakes which might be easily explained if their author only wished to do so.

I must stop. I was expected to write a criticism; I am afraid I have drawn an eulogy, and I am quite sure I have not said a word about the Transvaal. Well, the Transvaal must wait until my next letter. It can afford to do so.

wee bee war tion alle thei mor in war

B num The of make tion On hold up, Kim and has resc force which from Cap able there const the part of the part of dozen by the victor 2,300 whore do no troop storm far, f disea which much the have outnot case, that This the

THE TOPIC OF THE MONTH.

THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

THE war began on October 10th, and it is now the 1st of December. We have been at war, therefore, for the space of fifty-one days, a little over seven weeks. The net result of the operations has certainly not been to justify the confident expectations with which the war was begun. At the present all the confident declarations with which the public was deceived as to the alleged indisposition or inability of the Boers to hold their own have been dissipated into thin air. Nothing is more remarkable in the progress of the war than the way in which every prediction made by the advocates of war has been falsified by the event.

THE RESULT OF SEVEN WEEKS' FIGHTING.

British troops, it is true, are in considerable numbers in Pretoria, but they are there as prisoners. The Boers have overrun one half of the colony of Natal, have compelled the British army to make a precipitate retreat from its advanced position, and have shut the whole force up in Ladysmith. On the western frontier we have only attempted to hold two positions. Mafeking has been closely shut up, and will probably surrender about Christmas. Kimberley has been for some time on half rations, and will surrender if Methuen's relieving force, which has been despatched as a kind of forlorn hope to rescue the inhabitants, fails to fight its way through the forces of the Boers. Even if he succeeds, he will only arrive in order to withdraw the inhabitants, and add fifteen thousand to the number of homeless refugees which we have on our hands at Cape Town. Commandoes from the Free State have entered the northern parts of Cape Colony, where they have been joined by considerable numbers of the Dutch population. The net result, therefore, of seven weeks' fighting is that we have got considerably the worst of it, and that the Boers are for the present moment paramount over the whole of South Africa north of the Cape Colony, with the exception of a fringe on the seaboard of Natal and Rhodesia.

THE BUTCHER'S BILL.

This result has been attained after fighting half a dozen battles, every one of which has been proclaimed by the sensational newspapers as a great and glorious victory, but which have cost us in killed and wounded 2,300, while we have lost about 1,500 missing, most of whom are safely interned at Pretoria. These casualties do not include the numbers invalided by sickness. The troops have been much exposed to severe tropical rainstorms, and have endured considerable privations. So far, fortunately, there has been no outbreak of epidemic disease, but unless this war differs very much from those which preceded it, the mortality from sickness will very much exceed the number of those who fall in battle.

THE PREPONDERANCE IN NUMBERS.

This can hardly be said to be a satisfactory showing for the opening weeks of the war. The British reverses have been due only in part to the fact that we were at first outnumbered by the Boers. For although this is the case, it is not less remarkable that in most of the actions that have been fought we outnumbered our adversaries. This was notably the case in the one real victory of all the bogus triumphs heralded in the newspapers. At Eland's Laagte we led into action from 3,500 to 4,000 men against a small force of 600 or 700 Germans, Hollanders and Boers. In the battles that were fought by Lord Methuen in his rush northward to relieve Kimberley, we outnumbered the enemy by two or three to one in the battles of Belmont and Eslin, while our preponderance in artillery was still greater. Nevertheless, although our troops displayed their customary gallantry, we have not succeeded in dispersing a single army of our intrepid and resourceful foes. The newspapers have indulged in compiling fabulous statistics as to the number of Boers who were supposed to have fallen, but there is every reason to hope that the number of those who have fallen in defence of their Fatherland is comparatively small.

GENERAL JOUBERT'S STRATEGY.

The experiment of pitting against a highly trained professional army a levée en masse of a farming population has not resulted, as many experts expected, in the con-spicuous triumph of the professional soldier. On the contrary, there is little doubt that, so far as generalship is concerned, General Joubert has displayed much better appreciation of the true tactics to be employed in such a campaign as that which is being waged than the British generals. Military strategy has as its end the winning of battles, and the compelling of your enemy to give battle under circumstances least advantageous to him and most advantageous to yourself. The salient feature of all the fighting that has gone on hitherto, both on the Natal and on the western frontiers, is that whichever side was advancing, the Boers have always had the pick of the position, and thrust upon their opponents the difficulty of the offensive. This, it may be said, was unavoidable when the Boers were acting on the defensive, resisting the hurried rush of Lord Methuen towards Kimberley, but it is equally conspicuous in northern Natal, where the Boers were advancing upon the English positions. In no case did General Joubert attack the English in a position chosen by themselves. In every case he forced them to attack him in positions which he had selected with a keen eye to their natural strength. Hence at Talana Hill, at Eland's Laagte, at Rietfontein, and at Ladysmith, the Boers occupied positions on the hill top, from which they were dislodged, when they were dislodged, by the simple and not very obvious expedient of charging in a frontal attack. In the first battle in which General Symons lost his life this was excused on the ground that it was necessary to prove to the Boers that we could capture a height as easily as they did at Majuba, but there was surely no reason for repeating the demonstration elsewhere, at a heavy cost of life, especially the life of officers.

THE FUTURE OF WAR?

It is very interesting to note how the experience of this campaign has confirmed many of the conclusions which have been set forth in a popular form by M. Bloch in his book on the future of war, published in this country under the title of "Is War Impossible?" According to M. Bloch, the war of the future will be a war of sieges. Modern arms have so enormously strengthened the defensive that

Photograph by]

GENERAL GATACRE

[Elliott and Fry.

a frontal attack will be practically impossible, and the fate of campaigns in the future will be decided, not so much by the fighting of the soldiers, as by their capacity to hold each other in check until ammunition or food gives out on one side. The fact that we were able to capture positions held by the Boers can be explained on the ground, first, that we were in great numerical superiority; secondly, that our artillery fire was immeasurably superior to theirs; and thirdly, to the fact that the Boers, contrary to the popular belief, are not so good marksmen as regular soldiers. Even as it was we had to pay very heavily for our success, especially in officers. The sharp experience of the first weeks of the war has led to the abandonment of any uniform on the part of the commanders; but the mortality has been very great, much in excess of the proportion of officers placed hors de combat in the Franco-German War. The difficulty of provisioning the comparatively small forces that are in the field in Africa will be multiplied a hundredfold in the great European war which M. Bloch believes is now economically impossible. If Ladysmith and Kimberley fall, their surrender will be enforced less by the shot and shell of the besiegers than owing to the exhaustion of their stores of ammunition or of food.

HOW LONG WILL THE WAR LAST?

Speculation is rife as to how long the Boers will be able to carry on the contest. They have laid in great stocks of ammunition, and they are able to subsist upon much poorer fare than that which our soldiers regard as indispensable to existence. It is not quite clear at present whether the despatch of a commando in the direction of Pietermaritzburg was merely a feint or whether it was due to the necessity of securing supplies. In any case it had no military importance, for as soon as the relieving column was ready to start from Pietermaritzburg the Boers drew back to positions nearer their base.

THE UPS AND DOWNS OF WAR.

The Boers have missed two great chances--first, in failing to capture General Yule's column as it struggled wearily through the muddy passes which lie between Glencoe and Ladysmith. Had they been more vigilant nothing could have saved our men from total destruction. The other chance which they missed was that of seizing the enormous depôt of military stores which were accumulated at De Aar railway junction, and which remained practically undefended for some weeks. On the other hand, in Natal our troops appear to have committed almost every conceivable tactical mistake. Instead of falling back before the superior forces of the Boers, General White allowed himself to be shut up in Ladysmith in a position in which he became more of a hostage in the hands of the enemy than an effective element of military force. The one thing which Lord Wolseley was never weary of impressing upon General White was to avoid taking up a position from which he was unable to protect his communications with his base. If Natal had been left open to the Boers and our army had been concentrated at Durban, one great source of anxiety would have been removed, and General Buller would have been free to carry out his original plan of invading the republics from Cape Colony. His advance on Pretoria would of necessity have compelled the recall of the Boer commandoes from Natal, but this of course was impossible while they had General White cooped up at Ladysmith. Political considerations are supposed to have interfered with the strategy of soldiers, but Ministers deny that they have in any way tied the hands of their generals in the field. It is more probable that the political considerations were local rather than imperial. The Natal colonists naturally deprecated the abandonment of their country to the invaders.

THE DREADED HORSE SICKNESS.

Speculating as to the future, one element that has been somewhat overlooked is the difficulty of transport which will be occasioned by the certain outbreak of horse sickness in the early months of next year. The immense numbers of horses and mules which have been collected at such great cost from all parts of the Old World and the New will suffer severely, and it is quite possible that General Buller's advance, which has now been postponed till the middle of January, may be still further postponed by the lack of transport. The long sea voyage, which varies from three to four weeks, has a bad effect upon the horses, and they are said to require at least three weeks' rest on shore before they are fit for the hard work of campaigning. The Boers are free from this difficulty. They are fighting in their own country, their horses are acclimatised, and their baggage train is very slight compared with that of General Buller. One of the correspondents spoke of "the invisible but ever-present enemy" which dogged the advance of Methuen's column. The invisibility and mobility of the Boers will be the chief difficulties with which General Buller will have to contend.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE CAPE DUTCH.

The greatest danger which threatened our position in South Africa has been averted. This is largely clear at o in the feint or supplies, soon as Pieterarer their -first, in truggled between vigilant truction. seizing h were which ks. On to have mistake. s of the it up in ore of a effective h Lord General n which with his and our t source General original Colony.

y have s from hey had cal conith the ey have he field.
his were aturally to the

as been t which f horse nmense ected at and the ole that stponed stponed , which pon the weeks of camhey are natised. th that poke of dogged ity and es with largely due to the fact that Mr. Schreiner is in office. Although considerable numbers of the Cape Dutch have joined the Republican forces, there has been no general rising throughout the Dutch districts of Cape Colony. This result has been attained by scrupulously abstaining from any attempt to compel the Cape Colonists to assist the Imperial troops in the campaign against the Transvaal, and also owing to the emphatic disclaimer issued by Sir Alfred Milner of the designs freely attributed to him by the British loyalists directed against the right of the Dutch majority to govern the Cape. It is a strange spectacle, this mustering of volunteer regiments from the Antipodes and from Canada, while the government of the Colony most interested, which lies close to the seat of war, preserves a rigid and unsympathetic neutrality. The Union Jack was never hoisted on Government buildings in Cape Town till the arrival of the New Zealand contingent, and then it only flew from the post-office.

THE FUTURE OUTLOOK.

As to the ultimate issue, that is postponed to the dim and distant future. The war may last from six to twelve months, and already the mobilisation of a second army corps, at a cost of six millions, is regarded as a necessity. In the opinion of many competent military authorities our difficulties will only begin when the commandoes have dispersed. The experience of Austria, which had to mobilise 250,000 men in order to pacify Bosnia, which lay close to her doors, and was but a small province, does not encourage very hopeful anticipations as to the speedy close of the war. After the war is over, supposing that victory crowns our arms, it is probable that we shall find our chief difficulty in reconciling the extravagant claims of the so-called loyalists with any system of government short of the military jack-boot. As a shrewd observer remarked the other day, when the war is over both Boer and Briton will have profound respect for each other, and they will probably agree to a settle-ment in which both will take it out of the Outlander, on whose behalf the whole war is supposed to have been waged.

HOW IT WOULD APPEAL TO A MARTIAN.

If a denizen from another planet were to land in this world just now, and draw up a report of what he saw going on here in England and in South Africa, one salient point of contrast could not escape his notice. Ignorant as he would necessarily be of all religious differences, he could not but be impressed by the fact that of the two contending armies one constantly appealed to some invisible person or power which they called God, while the other side, with the exception of formal Church functions, appeared to be oblivious of the existence of any such Being. This, of course, is not to say that the Boers believe in God and the Britons do not. But it is certain that on the departure of the troops from Pretoria and London, and in their respective camps, any observer from another planet must be impressed by the absence of prayer and praise on one side and its constant presence on the other. The Boers are quite dreadfully out of date. They sing the psalms of David, they read their Bibles, and they pray like Cromwell's Ironsides and Havelock's Saints. Our merry men, like whole-hearted pagans, chant the catchy lilts of the music-halls, read the newspapers, and make as little outward and visible sign of belief in the existence of a living God as if they were French Freethinkers.

WHO HAVE FORGOTTEN GOD?
Of course we shall be told that it is "all their horrid hypocrisy." We have heard that remark before. It was what the Royalists said of Cromwell, to whose sincerity Lord Rosebery paid public homage last month. For my part, I frankly confess I should feel a good deal more easy in my own mind as to the prospect of our maintaining our place in the world if our soldiers set out for the seat of war to the strains which sounded a higher note than "The Absent-Minded Beggar" of Kipling's muse and "The Soldiers of the Queen."

A TYPICAL SCENE.

Here, for instance, is a scene reported by a correspondent with the Boer commando in the Standard and Diggers' News, of October 20th, for the like of which we may search in vain in the records of our camp:—

Prior to crossing the border, the Pretoria town and district commandoes were assembled—about a mile from the line—and briefly addressed by Commandant Erasmus, who, standing on an ant-heap, tall, broad-shouldered, and with iron-grey hair, looked a veritable Boer leader. He urged his men to be of good courage, and act in a manner befitting the records of themselves and their ancestors, always placing their trust in the Almighty. In the war of Independence they had only a tithe of the men now gathered to defend their independence. They had no artillery, heavy guns, or Mausers at their disposal, and were physically much weaker than now. Even now they were weak to combat with a power like Britain, and they must remember that what strength they might derive was from the Almighty.

The veteran Commandant then communicated to the burghers

Photograph by] [Elliott and Fry. GENERAL LORD METHUEN,

the fact that he had just received news of the capture by the Republic's forces of an armoured train on the Bechuanaland railway, a couple of heavy guns, and a couple of Maxim-Nordenfelts, besides a lot of dynamite, ammunition and prisoners. The news was received with cheers.

A very impressive scene followed. A Psalm was sung, and while the crowd of armed men knelt on the ground, bareheaded, the Rev. Postma, of Pretoria, and old Hendrik Schoeman, invoked the blessing of the Lord of Battles on the task which the Republic had taken in hand, and returned thanks for the first victory given to the Republic's arms.

With our troops the cry is ever "Vengeance!" "Avenge Majuba!" and no sound of prayer or psalm appears to be heard within our lines.

THE ALLEGED ABUSE OF THE WHITE FLAG.

Accusations of the abuse of the flag of truce and of firing on ambulances are freely made on both sides, and on both sides with ample justification in the mistakes natural to men excited by battle, and not versed in the laws of war. We naturally hear most of the Boer mistakes or misdeeds of the Boers. But there are just as many stories told in the Boer camp of our misdeeds and mistakes. It is worth while noticing that Mr. Steevens, of the Daily Mail, chronicles and applauds the action of our troops at Nicholson's Nek in continuing to fire after they had hoisted the white flag. Here is the passage I refer to. After describing how the men were being shot down, he continued:—

And then—and then again, that cursed white flag! It is some sneaking consolation that for a long time the soldiers refused to heed it. Careless now of life, they were sitting up well behind their breastworks, altering their sights, aiming coolly by the half-minute together. At the nadir of their humiliation they could still sting—as that new-come Boer found who, desiring one Englishman to his bag before the end, thrust up his incautious head to see where they were, and got a bullet through it. Some of them said they lost their whole firing line; others no more than nine killed and sixteen wounded. But what matters it whether they lost one or one million? The cursed white flag was up again over a British force in South Africa. The best part of a 'thousand British soldiers, with all their arms and equipment and four mountain guns, were captured by the enemy.

Here we have a perfectly natural explanation of how it often comes about that firing continues after a flag of truce has been hoisted. If this happens with our trained troops, how much more naturally would it occur with the rude levies of the Boers.

FIRING ON THE RED CROSS.

A Manchester chemist, who served in one of the Boer ambulances at Eland's Laagte, reports and explains how it was that the English fired upon the red cross wagons in that battle:—

Our three ambulance wagons were drawn up alongside each other, near the station goods' shed, each with a red cross flying, but as there was no breeze they could not be seen at any distance. The Boers had already gone into leager on the hills about two miles away, when suddenly there appeared, on the hill opposite, a lot of British troops, with a battery of guns. Within five minutes of the battery appearing the first shot (shrapnel) was fired, and went through the shed. The next shot struck one of our mules, and took half its head away. The third shell burst close by, and part of it went bang through the wagon in which I was dressing, and was within a foot of finishing my little career. A few more shots came near us, when the Boers began to fire from the kopjes, thus revealing their position, so the battery turned their fire on to them, and left us alone, for which we were all very thankful.

Such incidents occur in every war. No one can help them. Only when we make every excuse for our own mistakes we might spare some for the Boers when they make the same blunder.

Be it remembered also that General White has reported that he was satisfied with General Joubert's explanation of the alleged abuse of the white flag by the Boers.

REFUSING QUARTER.

We are not, however, responsible for the Boers. We are responsible for our own men. And we fear that very bad work went on at Eland's Laagte. In that battle 3,500 English stormed a hill defended by a mixed force of 600 Hollanders, Germans, and Johannesburg Boers. Three hundred of the latter, who were not of the psalmsinging kind, bolted early in the fight. The brave remnant held the hill till the last, and only fled when our men in overwhelming force were upon them with the bayonet. As they ran they were charged by the Lancers, whose exploits are thus described by our own soldiers:—

A private in the 1st King's Royal Rifles writes, after the battle of Eland's Laagte, to a friend at Preston:—"I must give a word of praise to the cavalry, who performed the finishing stroke. I tell you it was a great, but a terrible, sight to see those horsemen hew their way through the Boers with their swords. Three times they rode right through the Boers, hacking, cutting, slashing. We had suffered pretty severely, and I suppose we got our backs up a bit. Anyhow, we got even with Joubert's men."

"Dear —, it's very terrible, is this war," the letter proceeds. "I saw several Boers whose heads had been cut right off by our cavalrymen's swords. It is ghastly, isn't it? But it's the plain truth. Some of the Boers had died in praying attitudes. Many, I was told by a friend in the 5th Lancers, flung down their arms as soon as they saw the flash of the lances, and clasping their hands above their heads begged for mercy. But they had shown no mercy to our men. Some day, if I am spared, I will tell you some incidents of how the Boers behaved to our men—killing and hammering our wounded as they lay on the field—and this was our revenge.

No reports of the ill-usage of our wounded by the Boers have ever been made by any of the correspondents. All the evidence is the other way. Soldiers and correspondents alike vie with each other in testifying to the kindness and consideration shown to our men captured or wounded by the foe.

" PIG-STICKING."

The story to which this Rifleman alludes may have been current in camp, and, if so, it renders the story of massacre very probable. The following passage is taken from an officer's letter, dated Ladysmith, October 26th, quoted without a word of disapproval in the Times of November 23rd. Speaking of the pursuit of the Boers after the battle of Eland's Laagte, this officer writes:—

After the enemy were driven out one of our squadrons (not mine) pursued, and got right in among them in the twilight, and the most excellent pig-sticking ensued for about ten minutes, the bag being about sixty. One of our men, seeing two Boers riding away on one horse, stuck his lance through the two, killing both with one thrust. Had it not been getting dark, we should have killed many more.

Mr. H. W. Nevinson, special war correspondent of the Daily Chronicle, in his account of the battle of Eland's Laagte, published November 20th, adds some details to the officer's narrative of the "pig-sticking." He says:—

The "Cease Fire!" had sounded several times on the summit, but the firing did not cease. I don't know why it was. Perhaps the Boers were still resisting in parts. Certainly many of our men were drunk with excitement. "Wipe out Majuba!" was a constant cry. But the Boers had gone, The remnants of them were struggling to get away in the twilight

Gua Gua hors arms esca bow dig a the l Casacte Market

Photograph by]

[the London Stereoscopic Co.

GENERAL SIR CHARLES WARREN.

In command of the Fifth Division in South Africa.

over a bit of rocky plain on our left. Then the Dragoon Guards got them, and three times went through. A Dragoon Guards corporal who was there tells me the Boers fell off their horses and rolled among the rocks, hiding their heads in their arms and calling for mercy—calling to be shot, anything to escape the stab of those terrible lances through their backs and bowels. But not many escaped. "We just gave them a good dig as they lay," were the corporal's words. Next day most of the lances were bloody.

No wonder that we learn from a Laurenço Marques telegram that among the Boers "the feeling against the Lancers is most intense."

According to the Times of Natal the Lancers imagined they were avenging the misuse of the white flag. The Times of Natal says:—

The Kafirs say that the Lancers "went through and through the Boers like water, wiping them all off." From the Kafirs' description the slaughter and wounding must have been terrific. The Boers "howled," say the Kafirs, for mercy, and never was such a killing and cutting. While the cavalry were cutting and slashing and lancing, the infantry were at work like furies with their cold steel in between the horses. The field was covered with bodies.

There were a mere handful of Boers to begin with, so that the Lancers had easy work.

THE OLD BOER AND HIS DEAD BOY.

It is sickening to read the exultation with which news of "great slaughter" is received by the public. Here is one solitary incident described in a letter from one of the bearer companies:—

"We were out looking after the wounded at night when the fight was over, when I came across an old, white-bearded Boer. He was lying behind a bit of rock supporting himself on his elbows. I was a bit wary of the old fellow at first. Some of these wounded Boers, we've found, are snakes in the grass. You go up to them with the best intentions, and the next thing you know is that the man you were going to succour is blazing at you with his gun.

"So," the letter goes on, "I kept my eye on the old chap. But

"So," the letter goes on, "I kept my eye on the old chap. But when I got near I saw that he was too far gone to raise his rifle. He was gasping hard for breath, and I saw he was not long for this world. He motioned to me that he wanted to speak, and I bent over him. He asked me to go and find his son—a boy of thirteen who had been fighting by his side when he fell

"Well, I did as he asked me," continues the writer, "and under a heap of wounded I found the poor lad, stone dead, and I carried him back to his father. Well, you know I'm not a chicken-hearted sort of a fellow. I have seen a bit of fighting in my time, and that sort of thing knocks all the soft out of a chap.

chap.
"But," this correspondent confesses, "I had to turn away when the old Boer saw his dead lad. He hugged the body to him and moaned over it, and carried on in a way that fetched a big lump in my throat. Until that very moment I never thought how horrible war is. I never wanted to see another shot fired. And when I looked round again the old Boer was dead, clasping the cold hand of his dead boy."

they

has bert's by the

We very battle force Boers. salmbrave n our h the ncers, rs: er the et give ishing to see their hackand I with ceeds. by our plain Many, arms their ll you dilling d this the lents.

tured

hown

have story ge is tober mes of Boers :-- two, k, we at of le of some ing."

s, and s, the Boers

the hy it sainly e out
The ilight

LEADING ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

VARIOUS VIEWS OF THE WAR.

(1) WHAT MR. FITZPATRICK SAYS.

THE man who, more than any other unofficial individual, may claim that he made the present disastrous war contributes to the Fortnightly Review some "Notes on the Transvaal Question." It is interesting inasmuch as Mr. Fitzpatrick bears testimony to the fact that when he arrived from the Transvaal he found everyone against war. He says he saw a great multitude of people, everybody who took an intelligent interest in public matters, and that they were all against war, because they thought that there was nothing to fight about; that time was upon our side, and generally that the idea of war was absurd. Such was, we are glad to have him admit, the sane and sensible view taken by the British public before he inoculated them with the virus of the war fever. He had made up his mind to make war, and he made it; and now, of course, he declares it to have been inevitable. But it would be interesting to ask Mr. Fitzpatrick whether there would have been any war if, last Christmas, he had taken a trip to Australia, and stayed there till the present moment. Of course he maintains that President Kruger was determined to make war; but if Mr. Fitzpatrick and the conspirators who spent so lavishly both time and money in getting up the war had simply gone to bed and stayed there, not even Mr. Fitzpatrick would pretend that they would at this moment be at war with President Kruger.

WHEN DID BOERS BEGIN TO ARM?

When we turn to the evidence which he parades as the proof of the militant designs of President Kruger, we have the old, old story, this time not quite honestly told; bu: even Mr. Fitzpatrick is compelled to admit that the preparations of the Boers did not begin till 1894-that is to say, the year in which the Outlanders first menaced the President with revolution, and that the High Commissioner began to talk about the number of rifles which the Outlanders could command. Even then President Kruger made next to no preparations, and it was not in il after the Raid that anything serious was done. In order to disguise this fact, Mr. Fitzpatrick says in the manifesto published before the Raid the Outlanders complained of the £250,000 spent on Pretoria forts, £100,000 on Johannesburg forts, etc., etc. But, in the first place, the manifesto of the Outlanders was part and parcel of the conspiracy known as the Jameson Plan; and, in the second place, even that manifesto, which was published at Christmas in 1895, never said, as Mr. Fitzpatrick disingenuously implies, that £250,000 had been spent on Pretoria forts, or £100,000 on Johannesburg forts. What the manifesto said, as Mr. Fitzpatrick knows very well, was that this sum of money was to be spent, not that it had been spent; and, as a matter of fact, it was never spent until after the Raid. Mr. Fitzpatrick has quite sufficient to be proud of in the way in which he manœuvred this country into war without stooping to such garbling as this.

BOER DAY-DREAMS.

The fact is that the Boers never armed on any scale until their independence had been threatened, and that if they had not done so, after the Loch visit in 1894 and the Jameson Plan in 1895, they would have been fools and worse. War became inevitable, not because of any conflict between British paramountcy and Boer ambitions, but because Mr. Fitzpatrick and his friends were determined to destroy Boer independence. Our high-flyers of paramountcy convinced the Boers that, in the opinion of Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Rhodes and Sir Alfred Milner, there was no room for an independent Boer State in Africa. As they were determined to maintain their independence at any cost, they naturally did everything they could to develop a sentiment of Afrikanderism; and just as Anglo-Americans talk and dream of a time when no one will be allowed to declare war in the world excepting by leave of the Englishspeaking race, so they talked and dreamed of the coming of a time when the Dutch of South Africa would be strong enough to defy any effort on the part of Downing Street to interfere with their liberty and independence. But even in their wildest dreams the Dutch of South Africa never contemplated severing their connection with the British Empire. The British flag in all their day-dreams was to be their placard against any aggression from foreign nations.

WHO WILL HAVE THE DECISIVE WORD?

Mr. Fitzpatrick touches briefly in the close of his paper upon the settlement that is to come, and he hints ominously that it would be well to wait until something can be heard from Sir Alfred Milner on the subject, and from the people who, it is suggested, are to pay for the war—the mine-owners of Johannesburg to wit. Pleasant prospect, truly. The future of the whole continent to be decided by the financiers who have settled upon the Rand solely for what they can get out of it! One thing, however, is quite certain. The Boer in the long run will have a great deal more to say as to how South Africa is to be governed than all the Outlanders put together, even with Mr. Fitzpatrick helping them.

(2) WHAT MR. SIDNEY LOW THINKS.

Mr. Sidney Low contributes to the Nineteenth Century an article on "South African Problems and Lessons" which cannot be too widely read and studied. First of all, Mr. Low thinks that it is quite certain we shall have to introduce compulsory military service in this country. He woulden force the ballot for the Militia upon everyone who had not put in a couple of years' hard service with the Volunteers. The conscript Volunteer would be expected to attend on the parade ground, in the barrack schoolroom, and on the shooting range daily, and for some hours a day. He would be under the strictest military discipline, and he would spend three weeks at least or a month in camp. Rifle-shooting, especially under military conditions, is a fine sport, and one does not see why tens of thousands of clerks and artisans might not spend their Sundays at it. "I say Sundays advisedly "-an observation which may be commended to those excellent ministers of religion from Hugh Price Hughes downwards, who have been urging us into war. It will not be exactly a pleasant outcome of their warlike activity if Sunday soldiering takes the place of Sunday church-

SOUTH AFRICA BOUND TO BE DUTCH-

That, however, is but one point of Mr. Low's paper, which is calculated to give pause to many of those who have so recklessly launched our country into war. Mr.

574

serie part gove rely For pose Fred all, they Dut say, men Sou

M

swa

real

incl

The they to muce future the Eng be i regulated from the English for the Englis weige Eng wide fath crace Unc maj Mr. who Offic adri need ship

of a in or army we depr

Low asks what is to happen after the war is over? He assumes, of course, that when it is over we shall be conquerors. But he does not like in the least the problem which will confront us after the armed resistance cause of the Boers has been beaten down. He says that we Boer shall no doubt try federation, but he reminds us that a riends colony, much more a federation, under a responsible Our government has the most absolute management of its at, in own affairs. It is very questionable whether a Colonial and Minister, a Colonial Legislature, or a Colonial electorate can be safely entrusted with the control of several ndent d to millions of coloured persons. South Africa requires urally direct Imperial as well as responsible local government. nt of and

The native question is more permanent and difficult than the Dutch question, but the Dutch question is serious enough. He says if our quarrel with the Boer party is whether South Africa in the future will be governed according to English or Dutch ideas, we can rely with much confidence on the Canadian precedent. For, as a matter of fact, Quebec is to all intents and purposes a little French nation under the British flag. The French Canadians through the ballot-box have gained all, and more than all, except it be a foreign flag, which they could have obtained through force of arms. If the Dutch in South Africa use the same weapons—that is to say, the vote of a majority under parliamentary government—they may be as successful as the French, and South Africa would be Dutch and not English after all.

-AND THEREFORE NOT COLONIALLY FREE.

Mr. Low scouts the notion that the Dutch will be swamped by immigration from this country. There is no real reason to believe that the numerical balance will incline in favour of the Saxon and against the Batavian. The English will not even settle in Canada or Australia; they don't like farming, and crowd to the towns or to the mines. As for English artisans, there is not much room at present, and there will be less room in the future, for the English working man in South Africa. All the rough manual labour will be done by natives. When the Rand has reached its maximum development, the English, including Americans and Germans, will always be in a minority. On the Rand the number of natives regularly employed increased from 47,000 in 1896 to 67,000 in 1898. In the same period the number of white employés at the mines had only increased from 7,430 to 9,476. The English who have been attracted by the gold will melt away as soon as the gold is worked out. The Dutch, under any system which allows numbers to weigh in politics, must continue to be powerful. The English immigrant is frequently a bachelor or grasswidower. The Boer marries early, and is usually the father of many children. In the competition of the cradle the Dutchman will probably beat the Englishman. Under a democratic system it is difficult to keep the majority from attaining democratic power. Therefore Mr. Low concludes that South Africa is not a country whose future can be settled by the good old Colonial Office expedients of laissez faire, or practically turning it adrift to worry out its own difficulties by itself. It will need close and careful handling by Imperial statesmanship for a good many years to come.

THE BRITISH GARRISON NEEDED.

It is to be hoped that nothing will be done in the shape of a hasty federation on unsuitable lines. To begin with, in order to guard against Dutch disaffection, the British army must be maintained—which will not be small—as we cannot disarm the Dutch settler to the extent of depriving him of his rifle, his horse and his cartridge belt. It would probably be impossible to reduce these forces below 20,000 men. "I know," says Mr. Low, "that one of the first of our soldiers thinks that for years to come it must stand at 30,000." With that number of men locked up in Africa we shall need a corresponding increase of the home battalions if the existing system is not to break down, and even that will give us no margin. A permanent increase to the army of at least 50,000 men is to be the first immediate consequence of the attempt to remedy the grievances of the Outlanders y cutting the throats of the Boers.

(3) "AN OFFICER" ASTRAY.

"An Officer," writing in the Contemporary Review on "The Government and the War," insists that the present moment gives Lord Salisbury a great opportunity to create a great army. At present, beyond our Militia and Volunteers, we can scarcely dispose of 30,000 men in Great Britain. In calculating the forces of the Boers, "An Officer" thinks that they cannot put more than 46,000 into the field. In calculating the Boer armaments, he says:—

It was not till 1892 that the Transvaal income began to exceed its expenditure. In 1894 a sum of £620,000 was spent on Public Works, War Department, and special expenditure of which the greater part was devoted to the purposes of war. In 1895 the amount was about the same. In 1896 it was nearly £1,000,000, and in each succeeding year since it has always exceeded £1,000,000.

These figures are interesting, for according to "An Officer's " calculation the Boers cannot have spent more than five and a half millions in providing themselves with arms and ammunition since 1894. How much of this went for arms and how much went for public works he does not state. But it is interesting to note that "An Officer's " figures show that nothing was spent on arms until 1894. Now 1894 was the year in which Johannesburg threatened to rebel, and when the British High Commissioner made his significant inquiry as to the number of rifles in the possession of the Outlanders. What nonsense then of "An Officer" to speak of this arming provoked by the threatened revolt, as if it had any connection whatever with the Majuba settlement, which had taken place thirteen years before! The Majuba fight occurred in 1881, and until 1894 the Boers spent nothing in armaments. After 1894, and still more after the Raid in 1895, they spend millions in the purchase of cannon and munitions of war. Yet "An Officer" is so lacking in the sense of humour as to say this was the Boer reply to Mr. Gladstone's policy of magnanimity 1

(4) AN INCONSEQUENT DIVINE.

In the same Review Dr. Guinness Rogers writes on "Liberal Imperialism and the Transvaal War." Dr. Rogers does not like the war. On the contrary, he dislikes it. But he likes Lord Rosebery, and he mourns over the stress which he has laid upon the possibility of forming a new party of Liberal Imperialists. He explains it on the ground of Lord Rosebery's close study of Chatham. He says it is a pure assumption that Imperialism means the reversal of the policy of Mr. If there is no room for both sections of Imperialists and anti-Imperialists in the Liberal Party the outlook is grave, for it means nothing less serious than the entire collapse of Liberalism at every point. The war is more of a journalists' war than of a capitalists' The newspapers have lent themselves to the fostering of passions which have tended to set up a rule of prejudice and hate. The poets have been even worse than the editors. Dr. Rogers's conclusion is singularly eclare

glish-

ming

trong

Street

But

h the eams

from paper

hints

thing

, and

r the asant

to be

the the

hing,

n will

ca is ether,

itury

st of

have ntry.

yone h the

ected

hool-

some itary

or a itary

tens

their bser-

llent

own-

ot be ty if ırch-

iper,

who

Mr.

ons

XUM

illogical. He says that the war is offensive to the moral sense and the practical judgment, but our present business is to muddle out of it. He says:—

For myself, I trace the origin of the war to the Jameson Raid, to the South African Committee by which it was succeeded, and to Mr. Chamberlain's speech on its Report in the

He can only bring himself to admit that if it could be proved that the war was started for unjust or aggressive purposes, uncompromising opposition to it might be felt to be imperative. But because the Boers are not impeccable archangels, Dr. Rogers would apparently go on fighting this war—which offends his moral sense—until one or the other can fight no longer. A strange conclusion for a preacher of religion!

(5) "THE COCK OF THE SOUTH."

The Hon. Stuart Erskine contributes "A Note of Protest" under this heading to the December Humanitarian. He lays this "serious and particular charge" at the war's door:—

During the past few months we seem to have been steadily losing sight of our old and good natured, if somewhat stupid and inartistic, friend, John Bull. And this war and Messrs. Chamberlain and Kipling are the cause of it . . Before this war was embarked on, we all believed firmly in John Bull. At least, I know that I did so. In him, as portrayed in the inevitable pages of Punch, I saw and recognised the true type—a little glorified, perhaps—of modern Anglo-Saxon manhood . . Now, however, it seems to me this dear old familiar, goodnatured blundering agriculturist is threatened with extinction. He is threatened with extinction because Mr. Kipling speaks the Cockney dialect, and because the political methods of the light of Birmingham are inconsistent with the principles and motives which govern and control a country life.

In place of Farmer John Bull we should, the writer argues, exalt "a sharp type of town-bred provincial, or, more correctly, still, the full-fledged Cockney." This would represent not merely the shifting of the economic balance from country to town, but of the political as well; the change which Messrs. Kipling and Chamberlain have signalised:—

To the aspiring initiative of these two men must certainly be attributed that present fashion we have of regarding all our national concerns from the point of view of that irresponsible individual who, from neglect of the ordinary precautions of baptism, has charitably been christened "The Man in the Street"; whilst, amidst the excruciating clamour of the Cockney dialect it is hardly to be wondered at if the comparatively more melodious and refined accents of John Bull should be drowned and neglected.

(6) AN IRISHMAN'S EXPLANATION.

Mr. D. F. Hannigan contributes to the Westminster Review for December a number of stanzas on "The Dying Century." The following represent at least one Irishman's view of the present crisis:—

See to-day proud England shedding blood as ever Not for liberty but greed and base aggression! It would seem as if her ruthless sons would never Cast aside the brutal weapons of oppression!

See the prices rise and fall while blood is flowing! See the speculator make Death fill his pocket! See the gambling politician his dice throwing, And, when his land lies bleeding, only mock it!

And no prophet's voice or poet's pen denounces
The caitiff who makes men's blood flow like water,
Who, with tigerish spring, upon a weak foe pounces,
And seeks to win a name by senseless slaughter.

Ah! were Byron living now, what satire scathing
He would pour out on the man whose crime or blunder
All South Africa in blood and tears is bathing—
He would crush the wretch with song's avenging thunder!

But we live in other times when it is treason
To give utterance to the truth, and shame the Devil!
We adopt the cut-throat's creed and call it reason,
And we prate of "Empire" when we do things evil!

(7) AFTER THE WAR?

"THE Future of South Africa" is discussed by Sir Sidney Shippard in the Nineteenth Century. His article is an interesting one if only for one thing—namely, that he also admits frankly that it is impossible to disarm the Boers. While he would of course seize and confiscate all artillery, arms, ammunition, and warlike stores, he would deprecate any attempt to disarm the Boers throughout the country, seeing that all white men may at any time require weapons in those parts of South Africa, and that all white men should be equally privileged to carry them.

The main object to be kept in view after peace has been re-established under the British Crown should be as much gentleness and conciliation of our Dutch fellowcitizens as is compatible with the safety of a British colony, and the firmness necessary for governing it properly. It will in any case be necessary to keep a strong force in the Transvaal for some time. Sir Sidney Shippard's idea is that Natal, the Orange Free State, and the Transvaal should be converted into a great colony to be called Natal, with the capital on the western slopes of the Drakensberg. This colony would be compelled to adopt free trade to the utmost extent possible, and no protective duties should be tolerated. He thinks that the advantage of this scheme is that it would give the Dutch access to the sea, and would create a political and commercial counterpoise to Cape Colony.

Sir Sidney Shippard does not seem to see that the only result of that would be to create two Dutch colonies in South Africa, who would probably find an immediate basis of union in the attempt to get rid of the restriction upon the adoption of the protective tariff. Add that the entire sum expended or to be expended upon the present war is to be a first charge upon the revenues of Cape Colony, and yet he adds that within the lifetime of many now living the Boers of Africa may become as contented and loyal as the French Canadians.

(8) THE SECRET OF BOER SUCCESS.

The Fortnightly contains a Chronicle of the War in South Africa which is illustrated with a good map showing the communications in Natal north of the Tugela. The moral to be drawn from the operations, says the writer, is the remarkable recuperative power of the Boers. The writer seems to think that the Boers have done much more than could have been expected, and asks:—

To what causes is this success due? Primarily to the sturdy character of these sturdy farmers, who can shake off defeat without any effort of will, and whose very ignorance prevents them from being subjected to the same influences which so largely affect the belligerent capacity of other troops. Filled with religious ardour as fervent as that of Cromwell's Ironsides, they have surrounded their cause with a halo of invincibility, and retain the conviction, even in defeat, that they have been called to fight under Divine sanction. If to the possession of these moral attributes be added the fact that the Transvaal Government has been secretly preparing for war for several years past, the cause of the present position in Natal will be better understood. As Lord Wolseley has recently stated, the numbers and fighting strength of the Boers are greater than was believed to be tion has h of Tri This estimates No.

skilfs advantands hope but u and broke stubb pacifi

M

Revi

wher

in (

drov

Sir 1

betw

met

stro

the

who

kille Brittende have Sir morestin such Stey then fami

Mes

war

itsel

than blood
and lain,
ing
Eng
will tean
M
"W war
beha

Afri pati who Tra Eng enth who foun

hist dow

nder under!

l! l! Sidney

e is an that he irm the cate all would ughout nd that them. ce has d be as fellow-British ing it keep a Sidney State, great vestern

d give olitical at the olonies rediate riction at the oresent Cape many tented

e com-thinks

e War d map of the ations, wer of Boers bected, sturdy defeat revents iich so Filled msides, iibility, e been sion of ansvaal d years better umbers elieved to be the case by the Commander-in-Chief before the declaration of war. The calculation of a well-informed person who has had special facilities for acquiring information puts the force of Transvaal and Free State Burghers now in the field at 60,000. This number is very much in excess of any previously published estimate of the fighting strength of the two Republics. Notable features of their system of fighting are the individual Notable features of their system of fighting are the individual mobility of the burghers, their animal instinct of locality, their skilful marksmanship, their sportsmanlike aptitude for taking advantage of cover, and their inherited love of ambush, stratagem, and subterfuge. With such material a commander can never hope to gain decisive victories, to make and destroy empires; but under certain conditions of fighting the Boers have no equals, and even after their collective power of resistance has been broken down, Sir Redvers Buller must be prepared for a stubborn guerilla opposition before the country can be finally pacified and brought under British subjugation.

(9) BOERS AS FOES IN 1848.

Mr. G. H. Berkeley contributes to the Fortnightly Review "A Reminiscence of the Boer War in 1848," when the British under Sir Harry Smith met the Boers in open battle for the first time at Boomplatz, and drove them from their positions after three hours' fighting. Sir Harry Smith's proclamation annexing all the country between the Vaal and Orange Rivers to England was met by the resistance of the Boers, who, a thousand strong, assembled at Boomplatz to await the attack of the British, who numbered 800 and 250 Griquas, and who had with them three guns. The Boers lost 49 men killed and a proportionate number of wounded, and the British 54 men killed and wounded. This engagement ended the war. The Boer tactics fifty years ago seem to have differed little from those they employ to-day, and Sir Harry Smith declared that he had never seen "a more rapid, fierce, and well-directed fire." It is interesting to find among the Boer Protestants of that time such names as Pretorius, Kruger, Kock, Botha, and Steyn, while one of the British officers who distinguished themselves was a Colonel Buller, a member of the same family as the Commander in the present war.

(10) FOREIGN OPINION ON THE WAR.

The writer of the Chronique in the November Messenger of Europe traces at some length the history of our relations with the Transvaal, and says that in this war the greed and arrogance of England has overreached itself, for victory over the Boers will not be less fatal than defeat. He says: "The first culprits in these bloody events are the English settlers in Johannesburg, and their English accomplices, headed by Mr. Chamberlain, are now risking their popularity and perhaps wrecking the Ministry. The defeat of the Boers will bring England no glory, and the history of the British nation will gain no new splendour by this transit from the nineteenth to the twentieth century."

M. L. Z. Slominski, writing in the same review upon "War and the Idea of Peace," refers incidentally to the war in South Africa, which, he says, is being waged on behalf of the definite national interest of an Imperial Africa, with which the freedom of the Boers is incompatible. England now wars no longer except against those whom she can attack without risk. The attack on the Transvaal has a very definite object, and must bring England immense profits, and from this point of view the enthusiasm which "patriots" direct against the Boers who stand across their path has a sound, practical foundation.

In the Russkoe Bogatstvo M. Juzhakof reviews the history of South Africa from the time of its discovery down to the present day, but beyond a general expression of sympathy with the Boers he does not touch on the questions raised by the present war.

The Kusski Muisl devotes only a page and a half of its foreign chronicle to the South African conflict. The writer says that while many of the requirements of the British Government were reasonable, the refusal to listen to any terms, and the determination to provoke a war, have placed England entirely in the wrong and turned a peaceful difference into a war of violence and greed.

OUR BAD BARGAIN IN SAMOA,

No one can deny the loyalty of Blackwood to the Ministerial Party-a loyalty so great that it has this month apparently discarded the services of its brilliant contributor, Mr. Frederick Greenwood, in order to make room for some commonplace scribe who is prepared to argue through thick and thin that the present unnecessary war is an absolute necessity. This fact adds to the significance of the article contributed to the current number by Mr. Basil Thompson, entitled "The Samoa Agreement in Plain English." Mr. Thompson was in 1890 charged with a mission to assure the Tongan Government in the most positive terms that their independence would never be taken away by England without their free assent. He naturally feels very sore on hearing the assertion made that in exchange for Samoa we have received Tonga from Germany. Tonga was not German to give. Under the fear of German aggression the Tongans might have been driven to seek the protection of England; but with this fear removed for ever, they will never consent to surrender any part of the independence in which they take so passionate a pride. In Samoa British subjects own 36,000 acres of land. In Tonga they do not own one. According to Mr. Thompson's summing up of the result of Lord Salisbury's diplomacy in the Pacific we have paid Samoa to Germany as blackmail because she has put on the squeeze when we were tied up in the

A Russian Hero-Monk.

"THE Nearest Village to the North Pole" is Mr. A. M. Brice's way of describing, in Macmillan's for November, the settlement of Samoyads in Nova Zembla. After telling of the wretched lot of these people, and the terrible climate, the writer continues:—

Yet even here you find, as all over the vast Russian Empire, the sturdy simple heroism of the Russian monk.

For the Apostle of the Nova Zemblans is not only a giant in physical strength; he is, and has to be, a hero to overlook the awful desolation of the life. Good Father John, with his flowing hair and great beard, his deep chest and gentle voice, is a volunteer, and so far back as 1887 came here to help these uncivilised savages to lose their fear of those numerous evil spirits which they believe beset their path. Health failed him once, and that once he returned to the Russian monastery which had trained him; but home-sickness for Nova Zembla and its handful of inconsidered savages proved the worst disease; and with the breaking up of the ice he came back. Great is Father John, for he has a wonderful way with these people: he can bear a strong hand at any work that they can do; he can use a strong voice for them when the Government steamer comes each year; and, chief of all, did he not voyage out into the awful Kara Sea, where ice piles on ice and wildly drives hither and thither as foam flies before the wind, and did he not there, on a lonely island, defy and dare and splinter into a thousand pieces that huge solitary shaft of granite, the most sacred of Samoyad gods, who kept watch and ward over all the rein leer and gave them increase, and then, even then, returned with all his company safe and unharmed?

ENGLISH AND DUTCH IN THE PAST.

An extremely interesting, but for Englishmen somewhat painful, article is contributed by Mrs. Green to the Nineteenth Century under this heading. She brings out very clearly the fact that for nearly two hundred years we treated Holland very much 'as we are treating the Dutch of to-day. The analogy, indeed, between the disputes of the seventeenth century and those of the nineteenth century in another continent is very close. Even under James I. the Dutch complained of piratical raids made by Englishmen upon the Dutch possessions. To end the Dutch difficulty James conceived the scheme of annexing Holland and proposing to divide her territory between France and England. "Let them leave off," he said, "this vainglorious thirsting for the title of a free State, which no people are worthy of that cannot stand by themselves."

CROMWELL'S DESIGNS ON HOLLAND.

After James had passed and Charles had his head cut off, the same idea of annexing Holland fascinated Oliver Cromwell :-

The English had neither considered nor appreciated the stubbern love of country and of liberty that marked the new Holland. They held to the good old idea of a petty people of shopkeepers. Covetous plans of spoliation revived. Cromwell, with his head full of schemes of incorporation for Scotland, Ireland, Holland, proposed to the Dutch in 1651 to form a more intimate and strict alliance. Faciamus eos in unam gentem, explained Thurloe, deep in the confidence of Cromwell. The spirit of the burghers rose at the hint of danger to their national freedom. "The alliance proposed," answered De Witt, "between a small State like ours and a great State like England would mean our political extinction." With insolent and threatening words the ambassador returned to England and the Navigation Act was passed.

THE QUESTION OF PARAMOUNTCY THEN.

Then having failed to persuade the Dutch to unite with us, war began with the avowed object of incorporating Holland into the English monarchy. Dunkirk was the Delagoa Bay of the situation, and from this Cromwell hoped to shut Holland in, destroy her outlet to the sea, and break her commerce and her means of life. It is extremely curious to find the same false prophecies made in the seventeenth century as those which drove our people into war with the Boers. For it was commonly believed that the Dutch, eager to fill their pockets, would not fight. Cromwell thought that the war would be short, and the Hollanders easy to settle down with in peace afterwards. All the grievances of fifty years were then gathered by the English in one black list. The Dutch sent embassies to treat in the very spirit of Kruger, " All, all, all except the freedom of my country." The Parliament of England answered that "the extraordinary preparation of men-of-war, and the instructions given to your commanders at sea, give much cause to believe that the Lord States-General have an intention by force to usurp the known rights of England in the seas. Parliament must endeavour to secure reparation for the wrong already suffered, and security that the like be not attempted for the future."

EVEN CROMWELL BAFFLED.

So for the paramountcy of the seas the English Commonwealth went to war with Holland. Mrs. Green says:—

After a year's war the English proposed to extinguish the Provinces as an independent State; and absorb Holland into England has one people and commonwealth:" no alliance, they explained, but "the making of two sovereign States one, under one supreme power." High in spirit and courage, they believed themselves strong enough to enforce any demands they chose to make. But they had not reckoned with the temper of Holland. The Dutch answer was given in the battle of the Texel. "O Lord," prayed the elder Tromp, struck down by a bullet, "be merciful to me and Thy poor people." The fleet had lost over 6,000 men, but not a man in the States would hear of the extinction of his country. They refused Cromwell's next proposal for an alliance to divide the world with them, the whole of Asia for the Dutch, all America to the English, with Protestant missionaries following their conquering fleets to spread the faith of Jesus. They refused to desert their Danish allies at his bidding, and prepared to fight to the last man. This two years' war had exhausted their treasure and injured their commerce more than the eighty years of maritime war with Spain; loaded the people with an unexampled debt, closed their fisheries, interrupted trade, till 3,000 houses lay vacant in Amsterdam alone. They were unshaken by calamity. The fury of their patriotism bore down the English; and in view of Dutch doggedness Cromwell had to be content with a secret engagement, for the weakening of the Dutch State, that the House of Orange should for ever be excluded from power. The English, De Witt said, as Dutch ministers might have said a hundred years later, were always interfering in their domestic concerns, a policy it was extremely difficult to parry.

A TALE OF HEROISM AGAINST PERFIDY.

The rest of the story must be read in Mrs. Green's own pages. It is very unpleasant, but of fascinating and tragic interest. It would seem that we have been as we have been in dealing with the Hollanders in Europe as we have been in dealing with their descendants in Africa. Mrs. Green says that our throwing over the Dutch and adopting the cause of the Belgians was regarded by the Dutch with horror, and by Europe with astonishment:—

England was under special pledges to Holland, and a change in mood entitles a State, no more than a man, to cast aside deliberate undertakings and solemn pledges. In any case the Dutch have never forgotten or forgiven this amazing interposition. It rankles in their hearts as a perfidious betrayal. Without accepting Alison's lurid condemnation of Britain's conduct at the time, every impartial observer must feel how difficult it is to make the British policies of 1795, 1815 and 1830 consistent on any principle save that of British interests alone. For these interests the Dutch people were thrown aside at one time and the Dutch sovereign at another.

The whole history of Holland, as told by Mrs. Green, is one terrible tale of indomitable heroism against overwhelming forces—not against England alone, but against England united to France. It shows of what stuff the men are whom we are fighting in South Africa. They are true sons of William the Third, the idolised hero of our Orangemen, who said, "I may fail, but I shall fight every ditch, and die in the last one."

Blackwood's Magazine.

Blackwood's is hardly up to its usual form. We miss the pens both of Mr. Greenwood and of Sir Herbert Maxwell. The article on the Samoan agreement is noticed elsewhere. The war articles are very common-place. There is a review of Lady Betty Balfour's "History of Lord Lytton's Indian Administration." Lieutenant-Colonel Powell, in his paper "The Invisibility of the Soldier," says it is of paramount importance to make the soldier as invisible as possible by clothing him from head to foot in garments as like the country in which he is campaigning as possible. Mrs. A. S. Boyd describes her visit to Colombo, and a "landsman" gives a pleasant paper telling of his cruise with the Mediterranean fleet. The other articles do not call for particular attention.

GUNNERY TERMS EXPLAINED.

A GUIDE FOR THE AMATEUR STRATEGIST.

MAJOR-GENERAL MAURICE contributes to the Nineteenth Century for December an article on "Terms Used in Modern Gunnery," in which he gives a very lucid explanation of the technical expressions of the artillerist. At any other time General Maurice's article would belong to the specialist class and would call for no special note, but in view of the bewildering technicalities with which our war despatches are sometimes filled, it will be useful to quote his explanations for the benefit of the amateur strategist.

THE USE OF FUSES.

The distinction between the "time-fuse" and the "percussion fuse" is one not always understood. The percussion fuse is mechanically contrived so that when the shell strikes any object sufficiently to stop it, the shell is exploded by the impact. Its use therefore presents no difficulty to half-trained gunners. The "time fuse" is a much more delicate instrument:—

It contains a composition which burns at a fixed rate, and the amount of composition placed ready to burn being indicated by figures outside the case of the fuse, it is possible for the gunner, who "sets" the fuse before it is put into the gun, so to regulate it that it will explode the shell after it has travelled for a certain number of seconds or parts of seconds through the air. Tables have by careful experiment been made out which enable us to know how many parts of seconds a fuse should be adjusted to burn in order that when the shell is fired at a given range the fuse should cause it to explode at a given height over the enemy, and a given distance in front of him.

SHELLS AND SHRAPNEL.

"Plugged shell" is the modern substitute for the "solid shot" of the past, When it is desirable in preference to bursting a shell to make it strike as a solid whole, then the bursting composition is extracted, and in order that the shell may be even and heavy as before, it is plugged with some material that would not burst it.

Shrapnel in its original form was invented by a General Shrapnel, who during the Peninsular War invented a form in which it was applicable to the spherical shells

Before Shrapnel invented his shell, which was loaded with a number of large bullets, intended to scatter among the troops at which it was aimed, the "common" form of shell was charged with almass of powder, and it had two effects. It broke up into such large fragments that these, retaining most of the velocity remaining in the shell at the moment it opened, and having a certain fresh force imparted to them by the charge within the shell, struck with great effect against any solid bodies with which they came in contact and materially damaged them. These shells were thus very destructive to the carriages on which guns are carried in the field, and even, if they hit it fairly, damaging, though not so often, to the gun itself. They were particularly effective against buildings, earthworks, and against walls in which it was desirable to make a hole or breach. They also, from the large quantity of powder within them, produced a body of flame which tended to create violent conflagrations wherever they struck any bodies easily ignited.

Shrapnel as adapted to the modern rifled gun has been used to fill our ammunition wagons since the Franco-German war, which proved that artillery fire is three times more effective when directed against considerable bodies of cavalry and infantry than it is against artillery:—

Again, the experience of 1870 led to the conclusion that, when properly used, artillery silenced other artillery more easily by directing its fire upon the gunners than when it was aimed against the guns or waggons.

"CANISTER."

For defensive purpose every battery has a limited quantity of case, formerly known as canister. Of case General Maurice says:—

This was and is a great defensive weapon of artillery. The case or canister very soon breaks to pieces after leaving the muzzle of the gun, scattering the bullets it contains in a great cone of dispersion. It is thus only effective for short ranges against bodies of either cavalry or infantry actually closing on to the guns to attack them; but at these close ranges it literally sweeps over all the ground in front of the guns, and is appalling in its destructive power.

CREUSOT AND KRUPP.

A "Creusot gun" is a gun constructed by the great French firm of Schneider and Co., and made at their works either at Creusot or Havre. Krupp guns are all made at Essen. The Maxim-Nordenfelt is an Anglo-Swedish invention which essentially consists in its simplest form in firing mechanically the ordinary infantry bullet at a very rapid rate. The howitzer at the beginning of the century was used to fire shells of large diameter, for at that time guns were chiefly used for firing solid shot. In order to reduce the weight of the howitzer it was made very short, and as this would have caused a great recoil, it was only fired at high angles, and the shells dropped on the enemy from above. When shells were adopted for ordinary field guns howitzers gradually dropped out of use. But their use revived with the invention of high explosives, such as lyddite and melenite, the main constituent of which is pieric acid.

THE BOER AND BRITISH RIFLE.

General Maurice concludes his article with a description of the Lee-Metford rifle used by the British troops. The Lee-Enfield differs from the Boer Mauser in the following respect:

While the Lee-Enfield has a magazine which is inserted underneath the body through the trigger-guard and secured by a catch, and is provided with what is called a "cut-off" to prevent the cartridges from rising, so that it can be used as a simple breech-loader for single firing till the magazine, which contains ten cartridges, is ordered to be used, the Mauser, on the other hand, has a magazine which, though not absolutely fixed, is only intended to be taken off for cleaning. It does not need a "cut-off" to use as a single loader. The magazine contains five cartridges, but whereas the cartridges for the Lee-Enfield have, when the magazine is charged, to be each put in separately, the magazine of the Mauser is filled at once by placing against the face of the magazine a set of five cartridgesheld in a clip which falls off when the cartridges have been inserted in the magazine. Thus if each weapon were at the beginning of a fight empty, the Mauser would permit of more rapid fire because it could be loaded five cartridge as a time while the Lee-Enfield would take cartridge by cartridge as long to load as a single breech-loader. On the other hand, the times when a very rapid discharge of fire is desirable are not numerous, and for these the Lee-Enfield has ten cartridges ready against the Mauser's five.

MISS ELLEN THORNEYCROFT FOWLER tells her interviewer in the Young Woman for December that she began to write almost as soon as she could do anything at all. Her earliest published work consisted of poems and short stories. "Isabel Carnaby," her first serious novel, was, she says, due to the suggestion of Dr. Robertson Nicoll, who asked her to write a novel which would do justice to English Nonconformity. She writes chiefly in the country. "The town life," she says, "makes you think; the country gives you time to work out your thoughts."

on.

urage, they nands they

e temper of ttle of the down by a

The fleet

ates would

Cromwell's

them, the glish, with s to spread

h allies at This two

ured their war with

bt, closed vacant in

ity. The h a secret

, that the m power. have said

domestic en's own ing and been as rope as n Africa.

tch and d by the

ment :-

a change

ast aside

case the interposi-

Without onduct at

t it is to istent on or these time and

Green,

st over-against tuff the hero of all fight

Ve miss Herbert nent is mmon-tenant-

of the

make

m from hich he leasant

n fleet.

RUSSIAN RAILWAY POLICY IN ASIA.

MR. R. E. C. LONG, who has spent the first six months of this year in Russia, contributes to the Fortnightly Review an interesting and well-informed article upon Russian railway policy in Asia. His paper is an attempt to enable us for the time being to look at the problem through Russian eyes. The ideal of an Indo-European railway running for the greater part through Russian territory, which would bring the Afghan border within a week's journey of Moscow, has been postponed for a time; but it has not been abandoned.

RUSSIAN ANGLOPHOBIA.

The question whether or not the realisation of the scheme can be held over depends upon what Russia thinks England will do. Mr. Long says:—

The fundamental fact of the situation is that of late years Russia has been much more frightened of English schemes than England has ever been of Russian.

Of all the dreads afflicting Russian alarmists there is none more ineradicable than the belief that England is about to extend her Indian railway through Beluchistan to the Persian Gulf, with the ultimate aim of joining Germany in Asia Minor, connecting the Indo-European system, and thus cutting Russia off for ever from the Ind an Asia. This would irretrievably ruin the commercial prospects of the Central Asian route. "As the ultimate preservation for Russia of a port on the Persian Gulf has become an informal Monroe doctrine in St. Petersburg, the north-westward extension of the Indian railway system by England which is believed to be imminent would be regarded in Russian circles as an irretrievable injury to their influence in Asia." To avert this disaster, Russia can either acquire a Persian port at once and connect it by rail with the Caspian, or she can construct a Central Asian railway, connecting the Trans-Caspian system with Central railways of Russia. The difficulties in the way of the Persian scheme seem to Mr. Long to be almost insuperable.

SCHEME OF A CENTRAL ASIAN RAILWAY.

Therefore it is probable the Russians will carry out the a ternative scheme of connecting the Central Asian railways with the Central European system. Prince Hilkoff, when visiting Tashkend, declared that this would be accom-plished in the near future. To carry it out would however involve an expenditure of 90,000,000 roubles. Many broad rivers would have to be bridged, and there would be considerable difficulty in supplying some parts of the line with water. From the easternmost point of the Ryazan-Ural Railway to Tcherdjui on the frontier of Bokhara, is a distance of 1710 versts. Of this only 275 have been surveyed. If the line were constructed a short branch line of 16 versts would connect the main Trunk Railway with Khiva. If the railway were made it could not be worked on less than an annual loss of £400,000 a year, although there might be some saving in the cost of the transport of troops. Hence from a financial point of view the line would not pay, but the scheme if carried out would exert a tremendous influence on the balance of power of Asia, and bring the Russian armies within striking distance of the Persian, Afghan, and Chinese frontiers, a few days after leaving Moscow. There is also to be borne in mind that the construction of a railway through at present waste land could lead to great developments, for the natural resources of the territory are great. Mr. Long thinks, "It is not unreasonable to expect that the direct connection of European Russia with her Central Asian connections would result in such an increase of trade as would wipe out any initial deficit, and yield a considerable result."

The Russians, however, imagine that if the Central Railway were constructed, it would enable them to gain a market for their manufactures in India, but they are haunted by a dread that it might have the opposite effect of enabling English goods to capture the Central Asian markets through India. Mr. Long himself rather favours the construction of the line on the ground that it would facilitate inter-communication between Russians and English, and so remove gross prejudices and misrepresentations employed by panic-mongers on both sides to damage the interests they profess to defend.

RUSSIA AND JAPAN.

A WAR CLOUD IN THE FAR EAST.

MR. HOLT S. HALLETT has discerned the battle from afar, and the result of his prescience appears in the December number of the Nineteenth Century. Japan is threatened, he says, by the "Russian Ogre." The struggle over Korea, with the large increases in the Russian army and fleet, and the endeavours, diplomatically backed, of Russian subjects to secure leaseholds of three Korean harbours, have given the Japanese serious matter for thought. The Japanese are not a nation renowned for serious thinking, and so far the Russian Ogre seems to have done them good.

THE HUNGER OF THE OGRE.

But the Russian Ogre is not only determined to control Korea, but also to possess it, and the results would be so bad for Japan and for us that we ought to make Japan go to war to prevent it. And Japan has her own inducement to go to war. Forwith Korea in Russia's hands, its splendid harbours turned into so many outlets for attack on Japan and on its neighbouring great markets in China, and the Russian armies recruited from the fifteen million stalwart and hardy inhabitants of Korea, the safety of the whole of Eastern Asia would be imperilled, and the future trade and the future life of Japan would be dependent on the will of the Tsar. Japan, with her comparatively weak fleet and finances, might well dread coming to blows with such an antagonist as Russia; but, as the past has proved, she is a plucky little nation, not afraid of her bigger neighbours, full of energy and enterprise.

AN ALLIANCE WITH JAPAN.

To prevent this disaster, which Mr. Hallett thinks is imminent, we ought to join Japan in resisting Russia's advance. To do this we must ally ourselves with Japan:—

fa

la

or ch Po To

th

in

K

an

An alliance with a Power capable of putting a strong fleet and a well-equipped, well-trained, well-officered, and well-provided army of 530,000 men on a war footing in a few days, and with magnificent harbours near to the seat of war, would be an enormous advantage in case war was forced upon us in the Far East by Russia's advance on Pekin or by her attempted occupation of Korea.

A LONG SPOON FOR PIE-CRUST.

Japan cannot trust Russia because "Russian treaties are pie-crust," says Mr. Hallett, and he proceeds to devise a long enough spoon to deal with it. This is nothing less than the partition of the Russian Empire! To share in the plunder he invokes the Triple Alliance. They should set on Russia and "ruin" her "far from homogeneous Empire," which has been built on the spoils of other States. There are more "far from homogeneous Empires" in the world than Russia, and if Mr. Hallett's Christian principles were to be generally adopted, we might not be the last to suffer.

Of course this is the veriest twaddle of politics. But if such an article were to appear about England in a serious Russian periodical, what would our Jingo alarmists say?

THE VOICE OF THE HOOLIGAN.

ntral

gain

are ffect

sian

ours

ould

and

pre-

s to

from

the n is

The

the iplo-

olds

nese ot a the itrol

e so n go

nent

into aring

from

, the

dent

weak

such

is a ll of

s is sia's

with

and ided

with

e an

Far occu-

ties

s to

is is ire!

nce.

poils

eous

ett's

we

But

n a

ngo

THE Contemporary for December contains a remarkable article by Mr. Robert Buchanan, in which he launches his bolts against the ferocious and contemptible Jingoism of the time which inspires Mr. Rudyard Kipling and supplies material for the vapouring of the Vellow Press. Ever since "the criminal crusade of the Crimean War," says Mr. Buchanan, the enthusiasm of humanity has been gradually dying away to be replaced by a spirit of blind and animal brutality, tempered by panic and cowardice, and debased by bragging.

HOOLIGAN IMPERIALISM.

Here is the picture which Mr. Buchanan contrasts with the "Gospel of humanity as expressed in the language of poets like Wordsworth and Shelley, and in the deeds of men like Wilberforce and Mazzini":—

The Aristocracy, impoverished by its own idleness and luxury, rushes wildly to join the Middle-class in speculations which necessitate new conquests of territory and constant acts of aggression. The Mob, promised a merry time by the governing classes, just as the old Roman mob was deluded by bread and pageants—panem et circenses—dances merrily to patriotic Wartunes, while that modern monstrosity and anachronism, the Conservative Working Man, exchanges his birthright of freedom and free thought for a pat on the head from any little rump-fed lord that steps his way and spouts the platitudes of Cockney patriotism. The Established Church, deprived of the conscience which accompanied honest belief, supports nearly every infamy of the moment in the name of the Christianity which it has long ago shifted quietly overboard. There is an universal scramble for plunder, for excitement, for amusement, for speculation, and above it all the flag of a Hooligan Imperialism is raised, with the proclamation that it is the sole mission of Anglo-Saxon England, forgetful of the task of keeping its own drains in order, to expand and extend its boundaries indefinitely, and, again in the name of the Christianity it has practically abandoned, to conquer and inherit the Earth.

The political life based on this is equally rotten. Since Mr. Gladstone's death we possess no politician, with the single exception of Mr. Morley, who demands for the discussion of public affairs any conscientious and unselfish sanction whatever:—

We possess instead a thousand pertinacious counsellors, cynics like Lord Salisbury or trimmers like Lord Rosebery, for whom no one in his heart of hearts feels the slightest respect. Our fashionable Society is admittedly so rotten, root and branch, that not even the Queen's commanding influence can impart to it the faintest suggestion of purity or even decency. As for our popular Literature, it has been in many of its manifestations long past praying for; it has run to seed in fiction of the baser sort, seldom or never with all its cleverness touching the quick of human conscience; but its most extraordinary feature at this moment is the exaltation to a position of almost unexampled popularity of a writer who in his single person adumbrates, I think, all that is most deplorable, all that is most retrograde and savage, in the restless and uninstructed Hooliganism of the time.

THE HERO OF HOOLIGANISM.

It is needless to say that this Hooligan bard is Mr. Rudyard Kipling. Encouraged by the journalistic praise lavished on the fragments of verse with which he had ornamented his prose effusions, Mr. Kipling decided to challenge criticism as "the approved and authoritative Poet of the British Empire." He set himself to sing Tommy Atkins, and the hero—in no way, Mr. Buchanan thinks, resembling the real soldier—is a drunken, swearing, coarse-minded Hooligan for whom, nevertheless, our sympathy is earnestly entreated. Against Mr. Kipling's ideal of the swaggering and filthy-minded butcher scarcely a word of protest has been raised:—

Are we to assume, then, that there are no refined gentlemen among our officers, and no honest, self-respecting human beings

among their men? Is the life of a soldier, abroad as at home, a succession of savage escapades, bestial amusements, fuddlings, tipplings, and intrigues with other men's wives, redeemed from time to time by acts of brute courage and of sang froid in the presence of dangers? Is the spirit of Gordon quite forgotten, in the service over which he shed the glory of his illustrious name? If this is really the case, there is surely very little in the Anglo-Saxon military prestige which offers us any security for the storny times to come. That Englishmen are brave and capable of brave deeds is a truism of which we need no longer to be assured; but bravery and brave deeds are not national possessions—they are the prerogative of the militant classes all over the earth. Englishmen in times past were not merely brave, they could be noble and magnanimous; their courage was not only that of the bulldog, but of the patriot, the hero, and even the philanthropist: they had not yet begun to mingle the idea of a national Imperialism with the political game of Brag. I am not contending for one moment that the spirit which inspired them then has altogether departed; I am sure, on the contrary, that it is living yet, and living most strongly and influentially in the heart of the Army itself; but if this is admitted and believed, it is certain that the Tommy Atkins of Mr. Rudyard Kipling deserves drumming out of all decent barracks as a monstrosity and a rogue.

barracks as a monstrosity and a rogue.

The truth is, however, that these lamentable productions were concocted, not for sane men or self-respecting soldiers, not even for those who are merely ignorant and uninstructed, but for the "mean whites" of our eastern civilisation, the idle and loafing Men in the Street, and for such women, the well-drest Doll Tearsheets of our cities, as shriek at their heels. Mr. Kipling's very vocabulary is a purely Cockney vocabulary, even his Irishmen speaking a dialect which would cause amazement in the Emerald Isle, but is familiar enough in Seven Dials.

Here is Mr. Buchanan's view of the new Imperialism the Hooligan Imperialism of which Lord Rosebery is the self-appointed prophet:—

I write neither as a Banjo-Imperialist nor as a Little Englander, but simply as a citizen of a great Nation, who loves his country and would gladly see it honoured and respected wherever the English tongue is spoken. It will scarcely be denied, indeed it is frankly admitted by all parties, that the Hooligan spirit of Patriotism, the fierce and quasi-savage militant spirit as expressed in many London newspapers and in such literature as the writings of Mr. Kipling, has measurably lowered the affection and respect once felt for us among European nations.

THE TRUE IMPERIALISM.

The ideal of true Imperialism, which would neither bully and grab with Lord Rosebery in Africa, and cringe with him before Russia, still exists, and Mr. Buchanan thinks it has still a chance:—

True Imperialism should be strong, but the strength should be that of Justice, of Wisdom, of brotherly love and sympathy; for the power which is bred of a mere multitude equipped with the engines of slaughter will, in the long run, avail nothing against the eternal Law which determines that the righteous only shall inherit the earth. We are a People still, though we seem for the time being to be forgetting the conditions on which we received our charter, and deep in the heart of England survives the sentiment of a world-wide nationality, as expressed in the passionate lines of a modern poet.

"Hands across the Sea!
Feet on British ground!
The Motherhood means Brotherhood the whole world round!
From the parent root,
Sap, and stem, and fruit
Grow the same, or soil or name.—
Hands across the Sea!"

There sounds the true Imperial feeling, which will survive, I think, long after the repulsive school of Patriotism which I have called (for want of a better name) the Hooligan school, is silent and forgotten. Let me at least hope that it may be so—that Englishmen, after their present wild orgy of militant savagery, may become clothed and in their right minds. There is time to pause yet, although they are already paying the penalty, in blood, in tears, in shame.

ART AND MYSTERY OF THE CONCESSIONAIRE.

AN instructive if not edifying disclosure of the methods of the concessionaire is given in the November Forum by Mr. Charles Denby, Junr., late Secretary of the Chinese Legation, whose diplomatic antecedents suggest rare facilities for knowing the truth. He writes on Chinese Railroad and Mining Concessions, about which so much has been heard of late. The craft of securing these coveted boons he traces through several stages.

THE ADVANCE AGENT.

The usual procedure begins, he says, thus :-

There first comes to Peking the advance agent, the typical concession-hunter, to look over the ground and find out what China has to give away that can be taken up by a public company and secure the support of the share-buying public abroad. . . . Experience has proved that these advance agents need not be gentlemen of the highest education or refinement; but they do need to be endowed with a certain instinct for diplomacy in its lower forms; and they must be, above all, shrewd and persistent, of indomitable perseverance, and with a faculty for making friends. Scruples as to methods are with them superfluous; but a willingness and an ability in the application of "palm oil" are indispensable. They must also be men of their word toward those who work with them. . . On such terms as these have offices in China been secured, promotions obtained, enterprises authorised, for hundreds of years; and the foreign promoter must, as his initial step, give his adherence thereto. The method of procedure of the advance agent is to make the acquaintance of the mandarins of Peking; securing here and there an ally and a friend. Then, at some favourable moment, he lays his project before the proper department of the government, relying on the support of his friends to secure it favourable consideration.

THE NEXT NEGOTIATOR.

Once the concession has been secured in general terms and the Chinese Government is fast-bound, then, says the writer, the original concession-hunter had better disappear:

So, after the first promoter comes a man of a different class—a corporation lawyer, a banker of irreproachable character, or an engineer whose standing commands respect. His hazds are uncontaminated by the preliminary negotiations, he is uninfluenced by the friendships and alliances of his predecessor, and he is bound by his own construction of a contract only.

DIPLOMATIC PRESSURE.

When he has adjusted the terms of the contract and made sure of its acceptance by the Chinese Government, then comes "the third and most critical stage" of the process—the floating of the concession on some money market. The last stage—"the actual putting into operation"—has, says Mr. Denby, been reached in the case of not a single concession. Even the third stage is far from final. The contract veils its obtainments under apparent yieldings and advantages to the Chinese Government, or contains impossible conditions. These are eliminated in the course of subsequent negotiation, in which the concessionaire is generally supported by the diplomacy of his own or an allied nationality. The concession is steadily modified to suit his purposes of the designs of the Power behind him. So gradually and astutely is the naked act of appropriation shuffled through.

Mr. Denby quotes from our Blue Book on China to show that in the matter of railway concessions the English come out top, having obtained nine concessions and a total of 2,800 miles of railway, as against three concessions to Russia, covering only 1,530 miles.

"CHRISTIAN ETHICS."

Small wonder that Mr. Denby is constrained to observe:

The effects of this concession-hunting have been harmful to the governments engaged in it. There have been jealousy and ill-will over rights granted to others, greed and rapacity in demanding rights for themselves. Foreign ministers have resorted to stratagems which have distinctly sunk the standing of foreign governments in the eyes of the Chinese. Solemn declarations of friendship in treaties with China have been regarded as meaningless protestations; while pledges to furnish assistance in time of trouble have been cynically disavowed. Christianity has suffered also. The Chinese churches have had the edifying spectacle of their missionary leaders promoting loans, scheming for mining grants, selling their influence to syndicates. Thoughtful Chinese cannot fail to contrast the doctrines of Christianity with the practice of Christian nations; and they will be led to the conclusion that the Confucian maxim, the negative form of which the missionaries are so fond of decrying, "Do not unto others what you do not wish them to do unto you," has commanded more respect from the followers of Confucius than the Golden Rule has from the nations which proclaim their allegiance to Christ.

A POSSIBLE NEMESIS.

The economic danger involved in "opening up China" is very forcibly put in the same number of the Forum by Mr. J. P. Young. He asks, "Will Chinese development benefit the Western World?" The usual expectation is that once the Chinese are brought face to face with the products of Western civilisation they will purchase eagerly. Mr. Young argues that China is populated almost up to the point of affording only a bare subsistence to its inhabitants, leaving no surplus of produce to exchange for foreign goods, so long as the people only till the soil and work the mines. Beside this bar to their "consumptive ability" Mr. Young puts their intense conservatism and fixity of social habit. We accept "the assumption that conspicuous wastefulness is beneficial": the Chinese have a much more frugal standard of life. They do not desire Western luxuries. Mr. Young makes a most effective appeal to the habits of the Chinese in American cities. Right in the midst of the most progressive civilisation, the Chinese adhere rigidly to their distinctive manner of life, while at the same time quite ready to profit by ministering to Western extravagance. He Enough have been cited to establish the proposition that the Chinese are very handy, and that they may be depended upon, if encouraged to do so, to employ their talents in ministering to the highly artificial wants of others, while at the same time they may refuse to be drawn into the vortex of the system of conspicuous wastefulness. If this probability is looked squarely in the face, it will be seen that it is pregnant with mischief for the workers of the Western world, who, whether for good or evil, have aspirations which continually impel them to raise their standard of conspicuous consumption to a higher point.

His conclusion from this combination of Chinese adaptability and immobility is sombre:—

The effect of the opening and awakening will probably be to bring disaster upon Western industrialism, unless a barrier can be interposed to the competition of a race whose most striking characteristic is the entire absence of those desires and aspirations which Americans and Europeans strive to gratify. This notable peculiarity, at this stage of the world's development, may give the Chinese an overwhelming advantage in the struggle for existence, and compet the Western working classes to abandon their ideals.

THE Sunday Magazine has a somewhat ambiguous entry in its December table of contents. A paper on the Bible is announced as "The Greatest of Books. Illustrated by the Author. By Harold Macfarlane."

secr junititle that total 100, the wort and day men wom Mr. will

JU 46

AFT

three Japa to A raw posit

If should preser warni at 10 is a p

Th

labo

ance

Imn

not e labou wage remai the ( grega over, They bandi are sl super a seri increa highly Japan and g

Br Chinilearn labour for the One is the labour

itself

man t

secret

upon labour labour union, who h

"THE YELLOW PERIL" NOT SO ALARMING:

AFTER EXPERIENCE OF CHEAP CHINESE LABOUR.

It is a distinctly reassuring article which the late secretary of the Chinese Legation, Mr. Charles Denby, junior, contributes to the September Forum under the title of "Cotton Spinning at Shanghai." He reports that there are now five large mills at Shanghai with a total of 177,000 spindles, with an expected addition of 100,000. Messrs. Arnhold, Karberg and Co.'s mill, the Soy Che, is the most active and best managed: it is worth 700,000 dols., and is fitted with the electric light and every other up-to-date appliance. It runs two shifts, day and night, 22½ hours in all, and employs 2,200 Chinese, men women and children. The pickers are mostly women, and are fatally handicapped by the bound foot. Mr. Denby hopes that the demands of the cotton mill will lead to the abolition of this cruel practice.

A PARADISE OF LAISSEZ FAIRE.

"There are no laws in China concerning hours of labour, the employment of children, or Sunday observance." What a paradise for the votary of laisses faire! Immense quantities of cotton are produced in China, and three to five million dollars' worth of it are usually taken by Japan. But it is said to be inferior both to Indian and to American cotton. With cheap labour and plenty of raw material at hand, China might seem to be in a position to make Lancashire tremble. Mr. Denby says:—

If Chinese labour—of which there is an enormous supply—should prove generally effective, and remain as cheap as it is at present, the outcry against the "yellow peril" is indeed a warning to which the Western world should give heed. Labour at 10 cents a day of twelve working hours, without a day of rest, is a prospect appalling to the hardiest competitor.

BUT THERE ARE SAFEGUARDS.

The safeguard against it lies in two circumstances: (1) it is not effective, it having been estimated that three good Chinese labourers are about equal to one foreigner; and (2) although the wage standard must always be below that of the West, it cannot remain as cheap as it is now. It is, however, difficult to consider the Chinese labourer in his individual capacity. He is too gregarious for that, and too much subject to leadership. Moreover, as a class, the Chinese are lazy and disposed to shirk. They are hard to control, averse to being driven, and fond of banding together. They steal, if not carefully watched; they are slipshod and inaccurate; and they require constant foreign supervision to maintain the standard of their work. The last is a serious matter; for the average cost of Chinese labour is largely increased when, to the pay-roll, is added the cost of a number of highly-paid foreign supervisors. In this respect the mills of Japan have the advantage; because the Japanese organise better, and get on without the foreign foreman.

LABOUR LEADERS OF A NEW KIND.

British workmen will be interested to note that even in China, with wages at 2½d. a day, labour has already learned the power of combination, and that the Chinese labour leader is more difficult than his English brother for the employer to get at. Mr. Denby proceeds:—

One of the most serious difficulties involved in Chinese labour is the fact to which I have already alluded; namely, that the labourers, so to speak, go in "gangs; "each gang subjecting itself to some one leader or controller. It is usually through this man that they have secured their job. They look up to him, and secretly hand over to him part of their pay. They practically look upon him as their employer. They will obey him; and, at his command, they will leave work or demand more wages—just as labouring men do in other countries, at the behest of a tradeunion. The leader is often unknown to the foreign employer, who has no means of getting at him.

THE WAGE-RATE RISING.

The writer goes on to show that even the cheapness of the local labour is likely to disappear with its improved efficiency: in China, as elsewhere, the rule holds—labour that costs little is not worth much. Mr. Denby says:—

Whether or not these defects can be remedied, the future alone can tell. Education, closer association with foreigners, and the extension of the system of piece-work may make a different and more effective man of the Chinese labourer; but, on the other hand, such general advancement will cause the low wage-rate to disappes. Except in the case of coolie labour, the Chinese in America do not work for less than their competitors of other races; and a similar condition is sure to develop in China. As yet, not more than ten or twelve thousand Chinese are employed in the mills of Shanghai; but even this comparatively insignificant demand for operatives has increased the wage-rate to a noticeable degree. When the employment of hundreds of thousands of labourers will be needed to aid in the construction of the proposed railroads, and in the manifold industries which will spring up as a result of the railroads, the wages will probably rise out of all proportion to their worth. It is too early, however, for America to take serious alarm at this Asiatic danger. For decades to come superiority of organisation, greater abundance of capital, greater intelligence on the part of the working men, and greater genius for invention will keep the mills of America ahead of this rivalry; and perhaps, in years to come, the problem will have so changed its nature that the danger point will never be reached.

What will possibly weigh more with the capitalist than these general considerations is the fact that "there is not a mill in Shanghai whose stock cannot be purchased today at a discount of from 50 to 10 per cent." Nevertheless Mr. Denby thinks the outlook distinctly hopeful for the development of this industry. If it failed, he would regard all hope for other Chinese manufacture as vain.

CURIOUS MARRIAGE CUSTOMS.

"THE People of the Philippines" is the subject of a very interesting paper in the September Forum. It is written by a Filipino, Ramon Reyes Lala by name. He recounts some strange peculiarities of a tribe half-Malay and half-Negrito. He says:—

They have an equally curious legal custom. If any one is accused of a serious crime, he and his accuser are led to a deep pond, and both are made to dive together. The one who can keep his head under the longest is believed to have told the truth,

They evidently believe that "truth is at the bottom of a deep well." The Negritos, who are the aborigines, are, he says, "the smallest people on the face of the earth." They average about 4 feet 8 inches in height. Their colour is dark brown. "They are thin, spindle-legged, little fellows, with flattish noses, thick lips, and frizzled black hair." The writer goes on:—

Their marriage customs are peculiar. The young man who seeks a bride first obtains the favour of her parents and then pursues her, catching her in his arms. She breaks loose and runs, and does not yield until he has caught her several times. Finally, he leads her in triumph to her home. Here her father drags the youth up a ladder to the floor of their hut. The mother drags up the maiden. They are then made to kneel; and the father pours over them a cocoanut-shellful of water. He then bumps their heads together; and the ceremony is completed. They spend their honeymoon in the depths of the mountains, and for five days and nights are lost to sight, after which they come back to every-day life.

There is another marriage custom which is worth describing. Instead of the youth and maiden being dragged up the hutladder, they are made to climb two saplings that grow near each other. Then an elder of the group grasps the saplings and draws them together until the heads of the young couple touch, with a kis-, or a bump, according to the force used. This makes them man and wife.

ful to y and ty in have nding olemn been trnish

wed.

e had toting ce to t the ions; ucian fond them the n the fina "

frum frent ation
the ferly.
up to
the ange land

and that nese y do most rican ssive ctive ly to ptive

at the ipon, ering time em of arely ef for od or their

He

be to r can iking tions table

give e for ndon uous

the

THE INDISCRETION OF "DIPLOMATICUS."

"DIPLOMATICUS" is a writer to whose intelligence and information I have frequently paid tribute in these pages. His articles in the Fortnightly have frequently contained exclusive information on matters of international policy. Although sometimes his information is ingenious, pieced out by speculation or clever guessing, he has acquired a certain repute which it was very indiscreet of him to injure as he has done in the current number of the Fortnightly in the article entitled "Count Mouraview's Indiscretion." He has written several pages intended to make a sensation suggesting, rather than asserting, that Count Mouraview has been intriguing in Spain and in France in order to bring about European intervention in the Transvaal. There is not a word of truth in this, and we do not need to go further than "Diplomaticus's" own article in order to discover that this is so. The only basis upon which he builds his house of cards is a statement, which I give in his own words, as follows:—

Count Mouraview confined himself to sounding the Spanish and French Governments, and he explained the tentative and garrulous nature of his inquiries by declaring in both cases that they were made on his own initiative and without instructions from the Emperor. The important point is that the overtures were made, that the Spanish and French Governments were asked by the Russian Foreign Minister, and that without the slightest ambiguity, how they would view a scheme of European intervention for preventing war in South Africa, or, if that were not possible, for preserving the status quo in that region.

That is all that "Diplomaticus" has to tell us, and upon this he builds up a monstrous superstructure which he calls Count Mouraview's scheme. But Count Mouraview had no scheme. Granting everything that "Diplomaticus" says in the passage quoted, what does it amount to? Simply this: that the Russian Foreign Minister, being in conversation with the Spanish Foreign Minister and M. Delcassé, asked them, as it was his bounden duty to do, what line they would take if any attempt were made to intervene in South Africa. Every one has been asking that question ever since the war began, and before. If any Foreign Minister in Europe has not informed himself as to the attitude which every other Government would take up if any such intervention were proposed, he is not worth his salt, and would deserve to be cathiered to-morrow. To ask for information as to what your neighbour will do under certain circumstances is a very different thing from proposing to do the same thing yourself, or to incite your neighbour to take such a course. Every one knows that the one danger of intervention in the Transvaal came from Germany, not from Russia or from France. Would not "Diplomaticus" himself be the first to brand Count Mouraview as a fool or worse if, when he had the opportunity of talking matters over in a friendly way with M. Delcassé, he did not inform himself as to the line which his friend would take should such intervention be mooted. M. Delcassé, we know, is in principle in favour of such intervention, for he has said so in the Chamber, but excused himself from intervening on the ground that England objected, which was true; but, he added, that England had never signed the Arbitration Convention, which is not true, and was an extraordinary blunder to be made by such a clever I have no means of knowing what Count Mouraview said or did not say. But even accepting the account given by "Diplomaticus" as accurate, anyone with ordinary common sense who is not driven to death by the necessity of turning out sensational copy must see that it amounts to nothing. Hence the article entitled

"Count Mouraview's Indiscretion" is in reality a sepulchral monument reared over the dead and buried discretion of "Diplomaticus."

THE PIOUS FOUNDRESS IN THE LIBRARY. MRS. JOHN RYLANDS' GIFT TO MANCHESTER.

In the Leisure Hour of December the Rev. S. G. Green gives an interesting account of Mrs. Rylands' gift to Manchester—the John Rylands Library—by which Mrs. Rylands seeks to perpetuate the name of her husband in that city. The Library was inaugurated on October 6th last, but the formation of the collection of books dates back to 1889. The writer says:—

Nothing could be more appropriate as a memorial to the late Mr. Rylands, for all through his life he had been a lover of books; and although the career to which he had devoted himself gave him but little opportunity for study, his keenest sympathies were always with students, especially students of Theology, which to him was truly the Queen of the Sciences.

AN ARCHITECTURAL GLORY.

The structure prepared by Mrs. Rylands for the reception of the books has occupied nine years in erection, and by common consent it stands as one of the architectural glories of Manchester.

The convenience of readers is everywhere consulted. Twentyfour spacious recesses afford every facility for quiet study; large apartments with open shelves contain books of reference of all kinds; while the choicer treasures of the Library are contained in separate rooms—the "Bible Room," the "Aldine Room," the "Room of Early Printed Books," and the "Map Room."

THE ALTHORP COLLECTION.

The collection of books was begun by Mrs. Rylands as soon as her plan was formed, and has been continued without intermission from about the year #1889. At first the theological element predominated; large purchases were made of the most helpful works in this department, ancient and modern; the scope, however, was gradually enlarged, and thousands of volumes in different departments of literature had already been collected, when in 1892 the celebrated Althorp Collection, chiefly formed by the second Earl Spencer, was known to be obtainable. Mrs. Rylands at once secured it, and thus became possessed of what was perhaps the noblest private collection of books in Great Britain. Some 40,000 volumes were acquired by this one purchase, and the whole collection now consists of about 60,000 volumes.

To the bibliophile, the great collection of early printed books, Latin and other Bibles, the Caxtons, etc., will be among the most interesting of the treasures of the Library, and for them special rooms have been set apart. The art of bookbinding is also well illustrated, and there is an attractive collection of manuscripts and autographs.

GRANGERISED BOOKS.

With regard to the books for the student, it may be stated there is an abundant supply, great stress being laid on Theology, Philosophy, and History. Not the least important is the collection of County Histories, the books of Travel, Natural History, English Literature, and other departments too numerous to mention. A feature of special interest should not be overlooked:—

Many of the books are grangerised, and whatever may be said of the process itself from a literary point of view it cannot be denied that it provides a quite unique and often valuable method of illustration.

Briefly, this peculiar process consists in the collection of portraits, landscapes, and other engravings, with facsimiles of documents, literary extracts, etc., bearing on the topic of the work to bind up with the several volumes. The name is derived from the practice of certain book-lovers in the last century, who thus illustrated Granger's "Biographical History of England."

ty a sepulnd buried

BRARY. STER.

Rev. S. G. lands' gift rary - by name of augurated collection to the late a lover of d devoted is keenest tudents of ciences.

eception of y common of Man-

Twentydy; large nce of all contained Room," Room."

is as soon out interneological the most ern; the isands of ady been ollection, wn to be became ection of acquired onsists of printed tc., will of the t apart. ed, and ts and may be being ot the ies, the erature, on. A be said nnot be method tion of niles of

of the derived y, who

NEGRO SLAVERY IN AMERICA.

MR. D. E. TOBIAS, who describes himself as a coloured minister in the American Church, contributes to the Nineteenth Century a terrible picture of the injuries to which the negro race is subjected in the Southern States of the American Union. Mr. Tobias does not enter into the details of particular cases of outrages against negroes; his article is merely a general catalogue of the injuries and degradation suffered by the black man at the hands of the white. He asks the question, "Are the coloured people of America free?" and answers emphatically in the negative; indeed, he gives strong reasons for believing that they are in a position of degraded slavery, in no one respect better than that which they endured before the Civil War.

THE CONVICT LEASE SYSTEM.

Of this slavery the system of leasing convicts out to contractors is one of the worst features. When the Southern slave-holders were defeated in the field, they determined to devise a new system of bondage :-

Scores and thousands of ex-slaves were arrested and convicted on any sort of flimsy charges, and farmed out to the highest bidders for human flesh. By reason of this new form of slavery, hundreds and thousands of black men and women have never known that they were emancipated.

The excuse for this was that the Northern soldiers destroyed the Southern prisons and that the Southerners were too poor to rebuild them. Prisoners are worked in coal and iron mines, in saw-mills, on wheat, cotton and corn-farms, and in building railways, etc. :-

The great shame and disgrace of the Southern method of dealing with prisoners is that all ages and sexes work side by side during the day and occupy the same compartments at night. Hence immorality abounds in convict camps, and the death-rate is simply enormous! Women and young girls are in regular association with men and boys, and for failing to comply with some frivolous rule of the white "bosses" they are whipped in the most nule manner in the presence of men and boys. The guards are generally poor "white" men armed with Winchester convict who may attempt to escape. Women and girls have been known to wear men's clothes and to take their places side by side with men in coal and iron mines or in ditches of any kind. A day's work is often from sixteen to twenty hours in duration, rain or shine. Food is very poor, and clothes are scant. Prisoners of both sexes are given their raw food, which they must cook as best they can on little fires on the ground, with the ball and chain about their weary limbs. Prisoners often wear their clothes until they drop off them. Prisoners are whipped with leather straps, getting from fifteen to fifty lashes, or as many as the white "bosses" choose to give them. As a result of the commingling of men and women in the camps, thousands of coloured children have been born and brought up and schooled in the grossest crimes.

Mr. Tobias asserts that immense fortunes have been made by speculators in hiring out and sub-hiring prisoners.

SLAVERY IN POLITICS.

Only for a short time after emancipation did the negroes vote in peace. But the right was long ago taken away by the violence and terrorism of the whites:

When the negroes had the power to vote, they voted for all measures granting civil advantages to the poor whites as well as to themselves, and all citizens had full representation before the law, which has never been the case under the white man's rule. In reality, there has never been such a thing as "negro rule" in the South. The white man has always ruled the South. Racial antagonism exists in all Southern institutions, whether they are called Christian institutions or not. It makes no difference, the race feul is just the same. In lecture-halls, white churches, Young People's Society of Christian Endeavourers, in Young Men's Christian Associations, and such places, the "colour" line is rigidly drawn.

SOCIAL DEGRADATION.

The negro pays for universities and libraries, but the white man alone reaps the benefit. He is swindled by the railway companies, and is not allowed to sit down in a railway restaurant :-

Here is another just grievance the black man has:
"Jim Crow cars," with inscriptions over the doors, "For coloured people only." These "Jim Crows" are dirty, miserable carriages, too intolerable for any decent human being to even enter; so also are the filthy "waiting-rooms," which are scarcely ever swept.

THE LYNCHING ATROCITIES.

The two chief arguments employed by the defenders of lynching are, firstly, that the laws do not protect the whites, and that they are badly administered; and, second, that lynching takes place in most cases for offences against women, whom the Americans will not allow the humiliation of appearing in court. Mr. Tobias replies, if this is so, why do not those who make the laws reform them, and administer them to suit themselves? Sufficient protection for women is all folly when hundreds of men can be found in a few minutes to murder a negro.

As to the "humiliation" pretext, Mr. Tobias says:

It is no humiliation for thousands of white women and children to come out of church Sunday morning, and go miles in the afternoon by train to see a human being roasted alive at the stake !
Oh! no. They can stand and see white men make fires and put a negro into it. White women can see the poor negro burn to death, they can watch the flames eat his flesh away from his bones; and they can see white men mutilate a negro's body with knives, and go practically wild scrambling to get a piece of the negro's flesh to take home as a souvenir of the occasion, and to teach other negroes what to expect if they dare kill a white man for any offence. The leading Southern newspapers give full details of all sorts of crimes which white men commit upon negroes to teach them that they must be kept in their places; and these papers go into the best Southern homes and are read by old and young.

Add to this, that during the present year more than a hundred negroes have been lynched on the following pretexts and charges :-

Self-defence, race prejudice, stock-poisoning, talking too much, murder, larceny, barn-burning, suspected robbery, writing an insulting letter to a white man, insulting a white man, horse stealing, incendiarism, attempted murder, malpractice, to suppress evidence in court, for giving evidence in court, rioting, etc.; and of this number six or eight were coloured women. This does not show that lynching in the South is for but one offence.

The Revue de l'Art.

THOSE who are interested in the work of Giovanni Segantini, the painter of the Engadine, will be glad to read the appreciative notice of the artist and his work which the well-known critic, M. Robert de La Sizeranne, has contributed to the November number of the Revue de PArt. Another important article is that by E. Babelon on the collection of cameos, etc., which M. Oscar Pauvert has presented to the Cabinet des Médailles. An exhibition of the work of Jean Baptiste Siméon Chardin has been organised in connection with the bicentenary celebration of the artist's birth, and the Revue contains an interesting study of this artist's work written by M. Louis de Fourcaud.

CROMWELL AND THE PURITANS.

By JOHN MORLEY.

MR. MORLEY continues in the Century Magazine his admirable historical study of Oliver Cromwell. The second instalment fills some thirty pages, and, like the former, is admirably illustrated by portraits, reproductions of famous pictures and old prints. The second instalment brings the story down to the outbreak of the Civil War, and deals at some length with the execution of Strafford and the outbreak of the Irish Rebellion. The following is the most notable passage descriptive of the most central figure in the great drama:

Firm in his belief in direct communion with God, a sovereign Power unseen; hearkening for the Divine voice, his steps guided by the Divine hand, yet he moved full in the world and in the life of the world. Of books, as we have seen, he knew little. Of the yet more invigorating education of responsible contact with large affairs, he had as yet had none. Into men and the ways of men, he had enjoyed no opportunity of seeing far. Destined to be the most famous soldier of his time, he had completed two-thirds of his allotted span, and yet he had never drilled a troop, or seen a movement in a fight, or the leaguer of a stronghold or a town. He was both carrious and desires hoth extiget and swife; both tender and cau ious and daring; both patient and swift; both tender and fierce; both sober and yet willing to face tremendous risks; both cool in head and yet with a flame of passion in his heart. His exterior rough and unpolished, and with an odd turn for rustic buffooneries, he had the quality of directing a steady, penetrating gaze into the centre of a thing. Nature had endowed him with a power of keeping his own counsel that was sometimes to pass for dissimulation; a keen eye for adjusting means to ends that was often taken for craft; and a high-hearted insistence on determined ends that by those who love to think the worst was counted as guilty ambition. The foundation of the whole was a temperament of energy, vigour, resolution. Cromwell was one of the men who are born to force great causes to the proof.

"PURITANISM CAME FROM THE DEEPS."

Not less interesting is Mr. Morley's brilliant description of Puritanism. 'Religion struck the keynote of the age. Passion and logic, the two great working elements of th: Revolutionary change, carried men along at different rates according to their natural composition, and dropped them at different stages. Puritanism in the time of Cromwell was the left wing of Protestantism, and in its turn it threw out an extreme left with a hundred branches of its own. Only by steps did the new principles of poleration and the Free Church find a place even in the two most capacious understandings of the time-in the majestic reason of Milton and the vigorous and penetrating practical perceptions of Cromwell :-

The Puritans of the Cromwellian time were forced into a brave and energetic conflict against misgovernment in church and state. But it is to the honour of Puritanism in all its phases that it strove with unending constancy, by the same effort to pierce inward to those very roots of "human frailty and corruption" which are always the true cause of the worst mischiefs of an unregenerate world. Puritanism came from the deeps. It was, like Stoicism, monasticism, Jansenism, even Mohammedanism, a manifestation of elements in human nature that are indestructible. An ascetic and unworldly way of thinking about life, a rigorous moral strictness, the subjugation of sense and appetite, a coldness to every element in worship and ordinance external to the believer's own soul, a dogma unyielding as cast-iron—all these things satisfy moods and sensibilities in man that are often silent and fleeting, are easily drowned in reaction, but are readily responsive to the awakening

CALVINISM.

Calvin shaped the mould in which the bronze of Puritanism was cast. Calvin had conquered a more than pontifical ascendency in the Protestant world. When Cromwell was born, that influence was still at its height :

Nothing less than to create in man a new nature was his farreaching aim, to regenerate character, to simplify and consolidate religious faith. His scheme comprehended a doctrine that went to the very root of man's relations with the scheme of universal things; a church order as closely compacted as that of Rome; a system of moral discipline as concise and as imperative as the code of Napoleon.

Calvinism, Mr. Morley summarises in a sentence, and says :- " On this black granite of fate, Predestination and Foreknowledge absolute, the strongest of the Protestant fortresses all over the world were founded. It might have been anticipated that fatalism so unflinching would have driven men headlong into desperation and recklessness or unclean living " :-

On the contrary, Calvinism exalted its votaries to a pitch of heroic moral energy that has never been surpassed; and men who were bound to suppose themselves moving in chains inexorably riveted, along a track ordained by a despotic and unseen Will before time began, have yet exhibited an active courage, a resolute endurance, a cheerful self-restraint, an exulting self-sacrifice, that men count among the highest glories of the human conscience.

THE ESSENCE OF CROMWELL'S THOUGHT.

Mr. Morley then discusses and leaves unanswered the various explanations of the strange secret. that Cromwell established himself on the solid rock of Calvinistic faith. The substitution of the Bible for the church was the essence of Cromwell's whole intellectual being. Of dogma he rarely speaks. Religion to him is not dogma, but communion with a Being apart from dogma. Cromwell's God was the Lord of Hosts of the Old Testament. But Mr. Morley believes that while Calvinism inspired incomparable energy, concentration, and resolution, Arminianism covered a wider range of human nature, sounded more abiding depths, and comprehended better all the varied conditions of human life.

Of the Scotch Covenanters, Mr. Morley says it is in the National Covenant of 1638 that we find ourselves at the heart and central fire of militant Puritanism of the seventeenth century.

THE IRISH MASSACRES.

I must pass rapidly over the rest of Mr. Morley's interesting pages. Speaking of the Long Parliament, he says it was made up of the very flower of the English gentry and the educated laity. It was essentially an aristocratic and not a popular House. Cromwell and Hampden counted no fewer than seventeen relations and connections among its members.

Of the trial of Strafford, Mr. Morley says it cannot be settled on questions of legality. The game was a terrible one, with fierce stakes. My head or thy head: this was the whole issue-not law, but my head or thy head. It was Strafford's head that fell.

Speaking of the Irish Insurrection, Mr. Morley says, there is no question that, even without exaggeration, it is the most barbarous and inhuman chapter that stains the domestic history of the kingdom. The latest serious estimate puts the number of Protestants slain in cold blood at five and twenty thousand. Sir William Petty calculates that the number of Irish who perished in the eleven years during which the Protestants avenged the massacre upon the Catholics exceeded half a million. Then with the attempt to seize the five members, Mr. Morley comes down to the eve of the Civil War. The temper of the time, he says, was hard, men were ready to settle truth by blows, and life, as in the Middle Ages, was still held cheap.

kee hero Can as a spir fierd the the Ho Wa serv war God We are of h the choi

and

on t 0

of th

war

and ther

T

feud

T " Sy phot pron blan Dee Th wher storie Princ

which

she a stream her h Quee Alix havin pock the C Pri at Ba the sh a sho Mrs. all ki balls, and c of the novel thems when cheris first p mood was. keepe time 1 Ev delig

THE TEMPER OF THE TLAES.

its

ar-

n-ne of

of

ve

 $\mathbf{nd}$

nd

nt

ve ve ss

of

en

ns

nd

ve in es

ie

of

al

is

n

d

n

1-

n

t

e

n

The Cavalier was hot, unruly, scornful, with all the feudal readiness for bloodshed. The Roundhead was keen, stubborn, dogged, sustained by the thought of the heroes of the Old Testament, who avenged upon Canaanite and Amalekite the cause of Jehovah. Here, as always, we perceive that men lived and fought in the spirit of the Old Testament, and not of the New. A less fierce instance of the high and manly temper in which the best men entered upon the struggle is to be found in the words used by Sir William Waller to the brave Hopton. "God, who is the searcher of my heart," wrote Waller, "knows with what a sad sense I go upon this service and with what a perfect hatred I detest this war without an enemy; but I look upon it as sent by God, and that is enough to silence all passion in me. We are both upon the stage, and must act such parts as are assigned to us in this tragedy. Let us do it in a way of honour and without personal animosities." To men of the mild and reflecting temper of Chillingworth the choice was no more cheerful than between publicans and sinners on the one side, and scribesand Pharisees on the other.

On the whole the contest in England was stained by few of the barbarities that usually mark a civil war, especially war with a religious colour upon it. But cruelty, brutality, and squalor are the essence of all war, and here, too, there was much rough work and some atrocity.

THE TSARITSA'S GIRLHOOD.

THE Girl's Realm for December has a sketch by "Sybil" of the girlhood of the Empress of Russia. The photograph of Her Majesty as a baby shows marked promise of force of character, and bears a singular resemblance to the latest portrait. The following gossip of Deeside may be selected for citation here:—

The great delight of her girlhood were the visits to Balmoral, where she would scour the hills on her mountain pony. Many stories have I heard in the Highlands about the fearless riding of Princess Alix. One morning she was riding in a strong wind, which carried her hat literally over the hills and far away, and she arrived at the keeper's house in the forest with her hair streaming down her back and a pocket handkerchief tied over her head. The keeper's wife was terribly concerned to see the Queen's grand-daughter arriving in such a plight, but Princess Alix enjoyed the fun. She borrowed a comb and hairpins, and having reduced her straying locks to order, again assumed the pocket handkerchief for head-gear and in it galloped home to the Castle.

Princess Alix and her sisters visited freely amongst the cottages at Balmoral, and had many adventures in their rambles about the shores of the Dee. Their great delight was a village shop a short distance from the Castle kept by an old lady named Mrs. Symonds. This ancient worthy had her shop stocked with all kinds of oddments such as children delight in—fishing tackle, balls, tam-o'shanter caps—and furthermore she sold sweetmeats and cakes. The shop has been for many years the rendezvous of the Queen's juvenile visitors, and it is to many of them a novel delight to be able to go and make little purchases for themselves without form and ceremony. The Empress of Russia, when she visited Balmoral after her marriage, showed that she cherished a loving recollection of her old haunts, for the very first place which she visited on the morning after her arrival was the shop. She brought the Tzır with her quite in a girlish mood to see, as she said, if Mrs. Symonds would know who he was. She also went one afternoon and took tea with the keeper's wife in the house in the wood, and talked about the time when she had come riding there without her hat.

Even when she was sixteen the future Empress "took delight in reading books on philosophy and sociology."

MR. BALFOUR ON THE RED RITUALISTS.

"How Ritualists Harm the Church" is the title of a paper by Mr. Arthur J. Balfour in the November number of the North American Review. It is mainly a reproduction by request of the editor of the substance of Mr. Balfour's speech on the subject in the House of Commons. The writer gives this preface to his remarks:—

It has ever been the boast of the Church of England that it is comprehensive. But a comprehensive Church means a Church which permits wide differences of opinion within its limits, and such differences can hardly exist without occasionally leading to internal dissensions. It is to the antagonism between the High Church party and the Low that, in the past, disensions have been chiefly due. The parties themselves date back, by an unbroken succession, to the Reformation controversies; and though, doubtless, each has undergone important modifications in the course of three centuries of development, yet their continuity remains; and, as in the time of Queen Elizabeth, they judge the ecclesiastical system, which both accept, by widely different theological standards. Where divergences of this magnitude exist, the materials for inflammatory controversy are ready to hand. It must happen from time to time that the peculiar tenets of one school are, by a few of its members, exaggerated and pressed to their extreme consequences; and, when this occurs, suspicion and resentment are inevitably bred in the other. There then arises one of the "crises" which from time to time distu b the peace of the Church.

Through one of these "crises" we are passing at the present moment. A section (I believe a relatively small one) of the High Church clergy seem bent on proving their "catholicity," by imitating as much of Roman ritual, and absorbing as much of the Roman doctrine, as is compatible with remaining in a communion which the Church of Rome has declared to be schismatic. The results are what might have been anticipated by any one at all acquainted with the ecclesiastical history of Great Britain. Protestant feeling is violently aroused. Religious controversy ceases for a time to be the concern chiefly of theologians; it overflows abundantly into the newspapers; it attains a rank growth on platforms and at mass meetings. Like everything else which deeply stirs the public mind, it finds its echo in Parliament.

WHY NOT SCOTCHIFY THE CHURCH?

Mr. Balfour re-emphasises his specific for the trouble. He says:—

I am one of those who have always desired to see greater spiritual autonomy given to the English Church. It may be that, being a Scotchman, living in Scotland, and seeing how the Established Church of Scotland is constituted, and how it works, I am prejudiced in favour of giving to the sister Established Church those liberties which the Scottish Established Church enjoys.

THE ONE HOPE LEFT.

But he professes once more his inability to take a very sanguine view of the future of the controversy. He

If there be a hope—and there is a hope—for the future of the Established Church of this country, it lies, and, in my opinion, can only lie, in the firm determination of all men who are sincerely loyal to the worship, the ritual, and the doctrines of the Church of England, to unite, even though there be important differences dividing them upon other subjects, in the resolve that neither by one set of extremists nor by the other shall this great Church be torn asunder.

Cornhill for December is full of readable matter, none of which imposes a severe tax on the attention or memory. The reminiscences of Sir John Robinson, ex-Premier of Natal, claim separate notice, as do those of a leader-writer. Zélia de Ladeveze gives a graphic story-like sketch of love-making in the Cevennes. Mr. Cornish, on the ways of eagles, requires a separate paragraph.

HOW TO HELP THE AGED POOR:

A NEW SCHEME BY THE "EDINBURGH."

"OLD AGE RELIEF" is the subject of a thoughtful discussion in the Edinburgh Review. The writer criticises the recommendations of Mr. Chaplin's Committee, and suggests that, in place of the experts asked for to estimate the cost they would involve, there should be appointed "a mixed Committee of prophets and students of human nature." He holds that parliaments should confer no right to pension enforceable in the law courts. He sees that "the results of any large step taken by the Cabinet will be as far-reaching in the way of finance as in that of industrial economy." He would rather develop along the lines of the existing Poor Law. He makes the somewhat astounding announcement that "there are few deserving old persons in the workhouses, except those who are there by reason of unwillingness, or physical or mental inability to live outside." He makes two suggestions—one simple, the other ambitious. He says:—

The simplest plan, and possibly the most effective, would be to enact that whenever outdoor relief was given to any person over sixty-five years of age it should not in future be less than 5s. a week, that it should be given for long terms, subject to revision, and that the receipt of it should not involve any civil disqualification. A large subsidy would have to be made by the central exchequer to local rates to aid in meeting the additional cost imposed by such legislation. If this were done, and if a special committee of guardians (with some co-optative members) were constituted in each district to deal with the old age cases, and if workhouse classification were pushed forward, the primary necessities of the case would probably be met, although the sentiment of the more ambitious reformers would not be satisfied. We shall conclude by suggesting an alternative, and perhaps a teleter, method.

UTILISE EXISTING CHARITIES.

In addition to what may be called the elementary relief given under the Poor Law, there has always been a large secondary relief, derived partly from voluntary and partly from endowed charity. The income derived from endowed charity and applicable to old-age relief in almshouses or by way of pensions now exceeds £600,000 a year in England and Wales, and a good deal more money, now more or less ill-applied in dole charities, might be converted to the same excellent use. Almshouses and charitable pensions thus solve the problem of existence for many deserving old persons. But these resources, like those of secondary education, are scattered over the country in a quite haphazard way, dependent on the chances of history. One old city has more charities than are good for it, while, in a district hard by, a new and poor suburb of a manufacturing town has nothing at all. This system might be strengthened, and the gaps in it be filled up by public aid, much as the old elementary education system was strengthened, and the gaps in it filled up.

"A BOARD OF RELIEF."

In every Union district, for instance, a new Board of Relief might be constituted by secondary election from existing representative bodies, somewhat in the manner suggested by the Select Committee with regard to the Pension Authority which they propose. Parliament might then vote an annual grant of, say, two millions, to be divided among these boards in proportion to population, and to be applied by them, within certain lines as to mode, but with a wide discretion, in relief of the necessitous deserving o'd and infi m persons in each district. In order that relief might not overlap, the new boards should be in touch with the Guardians, and with trustees of charities and with charity organisation societies, and, in fact, form a centre of all relief of this kind in each district, as in France do the "Bureaux de Bienfaisance." The boards would both give pensions directly, and have power to make grants in aid of new or insufficiently endowed almhouses, infirmaries, nursing associations, and similar institutions. Inasmuch as they would largely relieve the poor rates, their funds might be supplemented by a share in those rates.

"DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC RELIEF."

At the same time, if it were desired to make reform at the centre correspond with reform at the circumference, the Poor-Law side of the much enlarged and overburdened Local Government Board might be amalgamated with the Charity Commission into a single and distinct Parliamentary department of Public Relief, destined to devote specialised energy to the supervision of the education of "Poor-Law children," the treatment of ablebodied vagrancy and incapacity, and the better care of the deserving old and infirm.

"PUT CHARITY IN PLACE OF OUT-RELIEF."

CANON BARNETT'S ADVICE TO NEW GUARDIANS.

THE Warden of Toynbee Hall is much impressed with the change that recent legislation has effected in the personnel of London Boards of Guardians. "Men and women who have only a residential qualification now sit in the places of substantial ratepayers." In one practical direction the change is most marked, as regards outdoor relief. "The new Guardians are almost unanimous in its advocacy; there are many old Guardians who feel that the giving of out-relief corrupts both the sense of justice and the power of self-help." These tendencies lead the Canon, in the Nineteenth Century for November, to put the case of "Charity versus outdoor relief."

WHAT WHITECHAPEL GUARDIANS HAVE DONE.

He puts squarely before the novices in Poor Law administration the solid facts of Whitechapel experience. He wins attention by announcing that "the Whitechapel Guardians have by abolition saved £7,000 a year," which means the saving of a rate of fivepence in the pound. Soon after 1873—

the Guardians would not give out-relief, but they spent, and are spending, large sums of money in improving indoor relief. They have appointed a complete_medical staff—medical superintendent, assistants, clinical clerks, and nurses—making the infirmary by its brightness and by its completeness equal to a hospital. They have reformed the workhouse, substituting for degrading labour work at various trades, with the aim of making the place more like a school of industry. They have willingly spent money on the young; they have sent some to training homes, some they have put on farms, and some they have emigrated to the colonies. They are now building scattered cottages at Grays, where the children may have their health and welfare secured by good houses and friendly supervision, while they reap the pleasure and advantage of mixing in the daily life of a busy community. They have thus shown their consideration for the needs of the poor, a consideration which has been gratefully recognised, and they have at the same time ceased out-relief.

REAL "CHARITY."

The effect of this cessation of out-relief has been to bring more method into charity, and at the same time to increase its volume. . . . The Whitechapel Guardians having clearly defined their province, having fixed as a rock the principle of "no out-relief," the charitable people, Jews and Christians, knew where they were. They knew, that is to say, that they were responsible for the relief of all those poor neighbours who for their own good ought to be helped outside the workhouse or infirmary. The Jews with their Charity Board of Guardians, the Christians by means of the Charity Organisation Society, rapidly increased and organised their resources. A pension fund was formed and 7s. a week secured to old people who had fought well in life's battle. Widows were started in some remunerative work, men were provided with tools, and the sick were kept through illness or convalescence. The money used for these refreshing purposes was often the same money which had formerly gone in depressing doles, or it was readily given by new givers who welcomed the promise of a method which would secure to every one thoug press than incre accor

Boar and a Boar more admi

could neces if dra

in its

in a

Buthat, pensid Georgessit keepi Guard impost the puand the control of the co

BA Unite to the surve last fi was incre

If t will births great

" In partly prices On the dollar " M prodig

The in an inc

Mir gold, o of silv one that sort of help, indoor or outdoor, which after kindly thought seemed best for the case. The money given under this pressure, and with this hope, was probably larger in amount than that given in old days, but the striking feature was not the increase of the amount, but the friendliness and thought which accompanied each gift.

t the

Poor-

vern-ission

ublic

on of ablef the

EF."

with

1 the

and

w sit ctical

tdoor

us in that stice

d the o put

Law

ence.

napel

hich

ound.

and relief.

perin-

the l to a ng for aking

lingly

ining

have ttered

h and while ly life

idera-

been eased

more

efined

ou'-

where nsible

own

mary.

stians

eased

d and life's

. men

llness

shing

one in

who

every

IS.

PENSIONS FOR AGED LONDONERS.

The consequences are stated to be gratifying. "The Board has offered day by day an object-lesson in justice and kindness, not without its effect on many minds, and a Board's effect on conceptions of social duty is often more important than its direct action." The writer admits that what has been in Whitechapel may not be everywhere—more particularly as regards pensions:—

I know that there are districts in which, for instance, charity could not supply pensions, and where out-relief is at present necessary. I myself, therefore, favour universal pensions, which, if drawn from money compulsorily paid, would not be controlled in its administration by any official, and so be grudgingly given in a way to lower the respect of recipients. Every one would receive his pension as of right.

But failing such provision of universal pensions, I believe that, at any rate in London, energetic good-will could secure pensions as it has availed to secure them in Whitechapel, St. George's, Stepney, Paddington, Oxford, and elsewhere. Necessity is the mother of invention, and if the obligation of keeping the old out of the workhouse were by the action of the Guardians thrown on people of good-will, it would not be impossible out of the wealth of London to collect enough for the purpose. The Jewish community has recognised the duty, and the Christian community would not be behind.

FIVE YEARS OF AMERICAN PROGRESS.

BASING his article on the Statistical Abstract of the United States for 1898, Mr. M. G. Mulhall contributes to the North American Keview for October an interesting survey of the progress made by the United States in the last five years.

(1) POPULATION.

"The estimated number of inhabitants in June, 1898, was 74,389,000, against 66,826,000 in 1824, and the increase was accounted for in this way":—

| Immigrants .     |  | 1,397,000 |
|------------------|--|-----------|
| Natural increase |  | 6,166,000 |
|                  |  |           |

Total. . . . 7,563,000

If this rate of increase be continued the census of 1900 will show 77,300,000 inhabitants. The increase of births over deaths was 17'4 per thousand, which shows a great decline.

(2) TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

"Import trade has fallen off 30 per cent. in five years, partly owing to changes in the tariff, partly to a fall of prices, partly to the development of home manufactures. On the other hand, exports have risen by 400 million

"Manufacturing industry appears to have grown prodigiously, the consumption of raw material showing an increase all round of about 50 per cent. in five years."

Hardware industries have developed astonishingly. The increase in the output of steel in the five years has been no less than 78 per cent.

(3) MINING.

Mining shows a great increase in the production of gold, copper, and petroleum, and a decline in the output of silver. "The latest returns of mineral production are for the year 1897, which compare with those of 1893 as follows ":-

| Coal, tons         |   | 162,200,000 |       | 1897.      |
|--------------------|---|-------------|-------|------------|
| Pig iron, tons .   | • | 7,100,000   |       | 9,700,000  |
|                    |   |             | ***   |            |
| Silver, ounces .   |   | 60,000,000  | 0 0 0 | 54,000,000 |
| Gold, ,, .         |   | 1,740,000   |    | 2,770,000  |
| Petrolcum, barrels |   | 48,400,000  |       | 60,600,000 |

(4) AGRICULTURE.

"Agricultural interests are prosperous as regards tillage, the area under grain having risen 10 million acres since 1893, but pastoral farming seems to have suffered, the number of live-stock falling 25 millions, the value being 6 million dollars less."

(5) FINANCES.

Finances were deranged by the heavy fall of import dues and expenditure resulting from war with Spain. In 1898 there was a deficit of 103 million dollars, and the public debt has risen in the five years' period 250 million dollars. Money in circulation has risen 241 millions of dollars.

(6) RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING.

Railways appear to have sustained a serious check, the rate of construction being only half what it was twenty years ago, while the gross receipts fell eightythree million of dollars, and the net profits twenty-one millions.

"The tonnage of port entries has risen 30 per cent., but this has been entirely in ships carrying foreign flags. The merchant shipping of the United States shows a steady decline."

(7) EDUCATION.

"Public instruction made very satisfactory progress in the last four years recorded (1893-97), the average daily attendance of school-children having risen 13½ per cent., while the increase of population in the same period was only 9 per cent. The average attendance in 1897 was 48 per cent. of the population of school age, as compared with 45 per cent. in 1893, viz. :—

"This shows that the schoolmaster is making himself felt more and more every year, expenditure increasing in almost the same ratio as the number of schoolchildren: it amounted in 1897 to 187,300,000 dollars, being an average of 1870 dollars per pupil, or 10 cents higher than the average for 1893. The schools have 403,000 teachers, that is, one for twenty-five pupils."

A Colossal Eagle.

An interesting paper by Mr. C. J. Cornish in the December Cornhill treats of eagles and their prey. It begins with this fact:—

There is at the present moment at the Natural History Museum a model of the skull of an eagle so gigantic that the imagination can scarcely fit it into the life of this planet at all, The whole head is larger than that of an ox, and the beak resembles a pair of hydraulic shears. Unlike most of the giant beasts, this eagle, which inhabited Patagonia, appears from its remains to have differed little in form from the existing species. Its size alone distinguishes it. The quills of the feathers which bore this awful raptor through the air must have been as thick as a walking-stick, and the webs as wide as oar-blades. It could have killed and torn to pieces creatures as large as a bison, and whirled up into the sky and dropped upon the rocks the gigantic carapaced animals of prehistoric Patagonia as easily as a modern eagle of California does the land tortoises on which it feeds.

DIFFERENT ESTIMATES OF THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

(1) PROFESSOR HOLLAND.

THIS is a somewhat pompous and not very good-natured article in the Fortnightly, by a pedant of international law, who months after date describes, more or less unsympathetically, what was done by the Peace Conference at the Hague. It takes a man to be a Chichele professor of international law in the University of Oxford to imagine that it is necessary solemnly to announce, as the first of the many reflections suggested by the proceedings of the Conference, that they were obviously far removed from the realisation of the dreams which have pictured a United States of Europe, with central executive able to enforce obedience to its decrees by means of an international army and navy. It would be interesting to know who ever dreamed that the Peace Conference, or that any member of the Peace Conference, would be so demented as to propose any such thing. The fact is that a good many people who ought to know better have persistently and foolishly confounded the ultimate goal towards which the human race is moving with the practical, sensible, and timely suggestion made by the Emperor that one short step should be taken in that direction. It is curious also to note that men who from their position should be the first to welcome and promote every effort to extend the domain of international law, are not ashamed to display the grudging and malicious glee with which all efforts to realise that ideal are impeded by the selfishness and distrust of the governments. Professor Holland is really almost as bad as those ministers of the Prince of Peace who exult in the lighting-up of the flames of war in South Africa.

(2) CAPTAIN MAHAN.

Captain Mahan contributes to the North American Review for October a useful and suggestive paper on "The Peace Conference and the Moral Aspect of War." Captain Mahan was the naval delegate of the United States at the Hague. He chiefly took part in the naval discussions, but was a philosophical critic of all that was done by his colleagues in the other sections. Captain Mahan is by no means an enthusiastic zealot for arbitration, for he places the International Conscience above everything. He says that no evil that war brings could equal the moral declension which a nation inflicts upon itself and upon mankind by deliberate acquiescence in a wrong which it recognises and might right. But the principal conclusions which the discussions on arbitration produced upon his mind were, first, that compulsory arbitration will never be generally accepted until the world is sufficiently advanced to establish an international army, charged with imposing the decrees of the International Powers upon the recalcitrant State. Secondly, that the consciences of the nations are awake to the wickedness of unnecessary war, and are disposed, as 1 general rule, to seek first the counterpoise of an impartial judge to correct the bias of national self-will. He points out the impossibility of nations submitting themselves to a tribunal the general principles of which have not been crystallised into a code. The Conference, although it facilitated future recourse to arbitration, has refrained from any engagement binding States to have recourse to this tribunal. Captain Mahan refers to the American war with Spain as an instance of a case in which the national conscience felt itself bound to achieve results which could never have been obtained by arbitration. His final conclusion is :-

It is permissible most earnestly to hope that, in disputes between independent States, arbitration may find a way to reconcile peace with fidelity to conscience, in the case of both; but if, when friendly suggestion has done its best, the conviction of conscience remains unshaken, war is better than disobedience—better than acquiescence in recognised wrong. The great danger of undiscriminating advocacy of arbitration, which threatens even the cause it seeks to maintain, is that it may lead men to tamper with equity, to compromise with unrighteousness, soothing their conscience with the belief that war is so entirely wrong that beside it no other tolerated evil is wrong. Witness Armenia and witness Crete. War has been avoided; but what of the national consciences that beheld such iniquity, and withheld the hand?

(3) "IN THE CLUTCH OF"-FOLLY.

Captain Mahan's paper is followed by another, "In the Clutch of the Harpy Powers," by a person called R. M. Johnston, who seems to combine in equal proportions ignorance of facts and imbecility of judgment. It is not necessary to quote more than the first sentence of his article to justify this judgment:—

It is a striking fact that, whereas endless months have been fruitlessly consumed in attempts to negotiate an Arbitration Treaty with our loudly proclaimed friend Great Britain, a few short weeks have sufficed us to take unto our bosom all the Harpy Powers of Europe, by a Convention that necessitates the sacrifice, on the altar of international brotherhood, of the long cherished traditions of our foreign policy. That Convention must be unhesitatingly denounced as a piece of egregious folly; and it cannot be supposed for one moment that the Senate of the United States, whose ratification is fortunately necessary to make good the signatures of our Commissioners, will endorse their action.

This simply will suffice, for "the force of folly could no further go."

For the Unmarried and Lonely.

IF nothing else, the Wedding-Ring Circle has proved conclusively that there exist in all parts of the world lonely women and men who seek correspondence on mutually interesting subjects. The goal of honourable friendship between the sexes being marriage, the title "Wedding Ring" has been chosen, for it is the unmarried who appear to be lonely. It is suggested in the December Round-About that names and addresses of lonely spinsters and bachelors, widows and widowers, should be sent to the Conductor, Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, W.C., in order that before Christmas Day a specimen copy of the Monthly Post-Bag may be privately posted, so that those who seek other interests in their lives than they now possess may avail themselves of the opportunity afforded by joining the Wedding-Ring Circle. The annual subscription is one guinea, payable on admission to the Circle, it being understood that the twelve months starts on payment.

Over five hundred women and men of all ages have joined, and the Circle has been the means of introducing many thoughtful members to each other, some of whom have married, while others enjoy correspondence from all parts of the world; for not only are lonely people to be found in our crowded cities and rural villages, but in lands across the seas, to all of whom the opportunity afforded has been most helpful. It is an education itself to correspond with members of the opposite sex, and those interested in the scheme can show their goodwill by sending in the names and addresses of people whom they know to be lonely. Round-About will be posted in a closed, plain envelope, and the recipient need have no knowledge from what source it has arrived.

XUM

s'd wS clinth

st

p ar

the

th

ca

rin

gro

wit

Kr

hol

Th

suc

whi

desi

to t

few

they dust

raise

(

THE SWARM THAT FAILED.

THE Nineteenth Century for December contains a fascinating paper, by Prince Kropotkin, on "Meteorites and Comets," which does a great deal to compensate us for the failure of our celestial fireworks expected last month.

METEORITES AS MESSENGERS.

Meteorites, as Humboldt pointed out, are the only medium with which the inhabitants of the earth are brought into direct intercourse with interplanetary, and since their relationship to comets has been established, with interstellar space. They have, therefore, a fascination for the ordinary man's mind which nothing terrestrial can have :—

Clusters of those little bodies, out of which both meteorite swarms and comets are composed—perhaps, vapours which sudenly pass from the gaseous state into the solid state, as Daubrée was inclined to think—circulate in the infinite space in which the Sun, with all the planets attached to it, is moving. When such clusters meet our solar system in their wanderings, they enter it in virtue of the attraction exercised upon them by the Sun, and they describe round our luminary a parabolic curve which carries them away, after this short visit, back to the unfathomable interstellar regions. We take notice of them during this short passage, and as the cluster approaches the Sun, and while it flies round it at a tremendous speed, and becomes luminous in this part of its course, we catch a glimpse of it, either in the shape of a small nebulosity which is only visible through the telescope, or under the aspect of an elegant, tailed comet in which men see the announcement of coming misfortunes.

SHORT DISTANCE AND LONG DISTANCE METEORS.

These we may describe as long distance meteorites. The short distance meteorites are those forming a permanent part of the solar system, and are much more modest in their idea of space and time:—

The investigations which were made with a special ardour after 1833 had firmly established the fact that the tiny meteorites are grouped into rings of different density, which revolve round the sun, and some of which intersect, or pass very close by, the orbit of the Earth.

The solar meteorites make up in speed, however, what they lack in endurance, for they move in space at a speed which is only attained by comets.

TWISTING THE LEONIDS' TAIL.

When a comet having wandered into our system is captured by solar attraction, it shows at once a tendency to segregate, and split up into several comets or into rings of meteorites which tend in turn to break up into groups, and such a process is even now taking place with the absentee Leonids of November 15th. Prince Kropotkin twists the Leonids' tail with a vengeance, and holds up to ridicule their efforts to overwhelm the earth. The largest meteorite that ever fell to earth weighed no more than eighteen tons, while the tenuity of comets is such that they might easily be carried in a sack:—

Our aerial surroundings, and the extremely rarefied gases which undoubtedly spread far beyond what may be properly describee as the Earth's atmosphere, are a far better protection of the Earth than might have been imagined at first sight. As to the small meteorites, they certainly reach the Earth in formidable numbers; it has been calculated that every year no fewer than 146,000 millions of them enter our atmosphere, where they continue to float in the shape of vapours or microscopical dust. But if all that dust were evenly distributed over the whole surface of the globe, it would take a hundred thousand years to raise that surface by one single inch.

NO DANGER FROM COMETS.

Though the earth has more than once passed through the tail of a comet, the chances of a collision with the head are extremely small, and if such a collision took place its effect upon the life of our globe would hardly be noticed, while the passage of the earth through a swarm of Biela meteorites would make at most a slight change in the weather.

THE MORAL OF METEORS.

The average meteorite, from the time of its entry into our atmosphere, lives a short but brilliant life of a few seconds. Like those who look out for it on earth, it passes quickly into dust. It seems to differ from its human admirers only in its incapacity to do a little harm before it dies:—

Coming as it does from cosmical space, and endowed with a tremendous velocity of about twenty-eight miles per second (to which the velocity of the Earth itself must be added if our planet and the meteorite fly in opposite directions), its considerable kinetic energy is spent in compressing the gases which it meets as soon as it reaches the utmost limits of our atmosphere. The gases become incandescent and so much raise the temperature of the stone that the surface of an aërolith becomes glazed, while the tiny meteorite is entirely vaporised before it reaches the surface of the Earth. Nothing but vapours added to our atmosphere, or some cosmical dust, such as has been collected by Nordenskjöld on the virgin snows of Spitzbergen, remains after the most brilliant display of shooting stars.

An Incident of the Hero of Majuba.

SIR JOHN ROBINSON, late Premier of Natal, in the South African reminiscences which he communicates to Cornhill for December, relates a singular incident in the life of General Colley, who fell at Majuba Hill. It was in 1875, when Lord (then Sir Garnet) Wolseley was dispatched as special Administrator, with a brilliant Staff, to perform the difficult task of persuading the Natal colonists to surrender most of their constitutional rights and descend to the level of a Crown Colony. On the second reading of the Bill brought for this purpose into the Natal Assembly, Colonel Colley was to speak. The writer goes on:—

As chief of the staff he would, it had been understood, deliver the principal speech in support of the measure. Alike popular and respected, he was the cynosure of every eye. If not sympathetic his audience was manifestly appreciative, and his leading opponents greeted his rising with cordial cheers. He was carefully prepared with copious notes for his undertaking. No one doubted that he would do his best, by argument and moderation, to make his chief's mission a success. Amid profound attention the began his speech. In calm and measured tones the great strategist and accomplished soldier opened up his theme. For three or four minutes all went well, and then he hesitated, paused, looked at his notes and then at his auditors with that look of deprecation which in a public speaker means so much. A friendly and encouraging note of applause went round the tables. Again the gallant officer seemed to pursue his thoughts vainly through the air. Again he rubbed his brow as though to dispel the mist that had obscured his memory, and then, murmuring gently, "Mr. Speaker, excuse me, I cannot proceed," he sat down, and, with his head resting the his heads reserved in glocomy silence as the debate recommendation. on his hands, remained in gloomy silence as the debate proceeded. Members cheered as warmly as though the arrested speech had closed with a well-rounded peroration, but there was in the mind of every listener the keenest sense of regret and sympathy. I thought at the time, and still think, that Colonel Colley's collapse of memory and effort on that occasion was due to the distaste with which he, a high-minded Irishman, had undertaken a duty so repugnant to his instincts, and probably to his convictions. This misadventure on his part only served, I think, to enhance the respect and esteem in which he was held in Natal.

lience great which y lead sness, tirely itness what withsputes

ay to both;

iction

"In called oport. It is been tration a few all the tes the e long rention folly; of the ary to ndorse uld no

proved world ce on urable e title arried ember insters

ent to W.C., copy of
to that in they rtunity
The mission
months

s have ducing f whom from all to be but in ortunity n itself ex, and oodwill whom sted in nave no

THE AMERICAN MOTOR-MAN.

"IAN MACLAREN" contributes to the North American Review for October a very amusing picture of what he calls "The Restless Energy of the American People." Mr. Watson's article is somewhat exaggerated, and it is probable that few of those Americans whom he intends to flatter will recognise their portraits in the noisy bits of human machinery who Mr. Watson thinks make up the American people. The American, Mr. Watson thinks, lives only to make money; he does not read, or travel, "he has no voice in the State," he has no amusements, and no rest. The only thing he does seem to have, if we believe Mr. Watson, is dyspepsia and unlimited aptitude for locomotion.

THE AMERICAN MERCHANT.

Take the American merchant for example, says Mr. Watson :-

While an English merchant saunters down to his office between nine and ten, a New York man rises at half-past six in his suburb and is busy at work at eight o'clock. The Englishman takes off an hour during the day for luncheon at his club, while the American eats his meal in fifteen minutes. The Englishman spends more than another hour at afternoon tea, and gossip with friends, and sauntering about between his club and his office, while the American packs every minute with work. The very walk of an English merchant, slow, dignified, self-satisfied, and that of the American, rapid, eager, anxiousthe one looking as if time were of no importance nor circumstances, and the other as if the loss of a minute might mean ruin-are the visible indices to the character of the nations, It is only yesterday that elevators were introduced into English city buildings, and there are many London offices to which you still have to make an Alpine ascent of four stairs; but a New Yorker regards a stair as a survival of barbarism, and hardly knows how to use it. The higher buildings have several sets of elevators, like the four tracks which railways lay down to work the swift and slow traffic.

"Don't go in there," my friend said, with whom I was going to lunch at a club on the top floor of a many-storied New York building. "That's an accommodation elevator—stops, you know, at every station. This is the express for the top floor."

"Would it have made much difference?" I said.

"Very nearly a minute," as if the loss of the minute would have thrown us back for the rest of the day.

No man goes slow if he has the chance of going fast, no man stops to talk if he can talk walking, no man walks if he can ride in a trolley-car, no one goes in a trolley-car if he can get a convenient steam-car, and by-and-by no one will go in a steam-car if he can be shot through a pneumatic tube. No one writes with his own hand if he can dictate to a stenographer, no one dictates if he can telegraph, no one telegraphs if he can telephone, and by-and-by when the spirit of American invention has brought wireless telegraphy into thorough condition, a man will simply sit with his mouth at one hole and his ear at another, and do Lusiness with the ends of the earth in a few seconds, which the same machine will copy and preserve in letter-books and ledgers. It is the American's regret that at present he can do nothing with his feet while he is listening at the telephone, but, doubtless, some employment will be found for them in the coming age.

ON THE CARS.

His travelling exploits are not less remarkable :-

Suppose he lands at 6 a.m., he will find breakfast ready in a hotel, and half a dozen men eating as if their lives depended upon finishing by 6.15 a.m. Before seven he will have disposed of a pile of letters, dictating answers to a typist attached to the hotel, he will have telegraphed in all directions, and made half a dozen appointments in the town by telephone. Within the forencon he will finish his business and depart for some neighbouring town, lunching on the cars. The second town he will dispose of in the afternoon, and that evening go on board the sleeper to travel 400 miles to a third town, where he is going to negotiate a contract at 8 o'clock next morning. If you sympathise with him, and wonder how flesh and blood can stand the speed, he accepts your sympathy as a compliment, and assures you that he never sleeps so well as on the cars. He never seems to be out of sorts or out of temper: he is always thoroughly alive and quite goodnatured. Sometimes he may seem for a moment annoyed, when he cannot telegraph as often as he wants along the line, or when the train is not on time, that he may make a connection. Nothing would wound him so deeply as to "get left," and he can only affect to be unconscious when some one declares that he is "no slouch, and that there are no flies on him."

HIS RECREATION.

When he does condescend to look at the world around him, he shows his contempt for it by wasting as little time as possible in the process :--

It is now several years ago that a tall, thin, alert man followed his card into my study with such rapidity that I had barely time to read it before my visitor was in the room.

"My name is Elijah K. Higgins, and I am a busy man. You are also busy and have no time to fool away. Four days is all I can give to the United Kingdom, and I wished to shake hands with you. Good-bye, I am off to Drumtochty."

I calculate that Mr. Higgins spent thirty seconds in my study, and left the room so swiftly that I overtook him only at the front door. When I asked him if he knew where Drumtochty was, "Guess I do!" he said. "Got the route in my pocket, northwest from Perth, N.B."

Another of Mr. Watson's friends expressed himself as "They may say what they like about Jerusalem, but it is a back number. As I am a white man, there's not a trolley-car nor a daily newspaper in the whole place. What Jerusalem wants is a few hustlers from the West. I guess they would show the old place a razzle-dazzle," and my American friend looked fir away, as if he saw already the new companies and industries, and speculations of his compatriots in the city of David.

There is nothing, in fact, says Mr. Watson, that the Americans do not possess except political purity, and nothing which they cannot do except rest.

The Earth Onion.

Вотн the Geographical Journal and the Scottish Geographical Magazine for October publish Sir John Murray's presidential address on oceanography, delivered to the Geographical section of the British Association. These figures are worth noting :-

The areas marked out by the contour lines of depth are now estimated as follows :-

Between the shore and roo fms., 7,000,000 sq. geo. m. (or 7% of the sea-bed)

" 100 ", 1000 ", 10,000,000 ", " (or 10% ", ")

" 1000 ", 22,000,000 ", " (or 21% ", ") Over 3000 fathoms, 3000 ,, 57,000,000 ,, ,, (or 55% 7,000,000 ,, ,, (or 776

> 103,000,000 sq geo. m. roo per cent.

From these results it appears that considerably more than half of the sea-floor lies at a depth exceeding 2000 fathoms, or over two geographical miles.

A good deal of geology is packed up in the following paragraph and its homely comparisons:

When we regard our globe with the mind's eye, it appears at the present time to be formed of concentric spheres, very like, and still very unlike, the successive coats of an onion. Within is situated the vast nucleus or centrosphere; surrounding this is what may be called the tektosphere, a shell of materials in a state bordering on fusion, upon which rests and creeps the lithos here. Then follow hydrosphere and atmosphere, with the included biosphere. To the interaction of these six geospheres, through energy derived from internal and external sources, may be referred all the existing superficial phenomena of the planet.

as h Alle realis doing No n suppr whate

D

ha

and sea

sup

mo

free

fai

am kne

tha

lab

stru

con

It s wro

" lo

wor

phra

H

the

of h

of n

self-

with artis

P

H

G

As uneq tages like ( set h

GRANT ALLEN.

AN APPRECIATION. BY RICHARD LE GALLIENNE.

ONE of the best articles in the Fortnightly for December is Mr. Le Gallienne's appreciation of Mr. Grant Allen, which is based on an intimate friendship of several years. Grant Allen died at a moment when we had most need of him, and at the saddest time for himself. He lived to see not the fulfilment of the civilised ideals for which he had battled so long, but the overwhelming triumph of all the reactionary ideals which he hated and feared.

A DISAPPOINTED IDEALIST.

A democrat, he lived to see democracy once more in the dust, and every form of tyranny and snobbery firmer than ever in their seats; a clear-seer and far-thinker, he lived to see every form of superstition re-enthroned, and England seriously dreaming once more of Rome; a citizen of the world, he lived to see race-hatred revived with mediæval fury, and narrow patriotism once more dividing nations; a man of peace, he lived to see civil freedom threatened by a militarism insolent and cruel as the world has ever known.

For, first of all things, he was an idealist and a man of faith :-

He thought of the world as composed of human beings amenable to reason, ductible to ideals. Being himself a nature singularly adaptable to the influence of right thinking, he imagined that the rest of the world was like him. Of course he knew, but in his utopianism he hardly remembered sufficiently, that the influence of ideas on humanity is exceedingly slow and laborious and indeed superficial. To see the right was with him to do it. To see the wrong in his own nature was at least to struggle to set it right. His, in fact, was a nature singularly conformable to moral ideas. But average human nature is not. It sees the right, but its warm life-forces compel it to do the wrong. As Grant Allen once wittily said of a friend, humanity "longs to be a saint, but it loves to be a sinner."

Grant Allen had a really enviable faculty of provoking the world to throw stones. He was like a great speaker. However unruly his audience, he had but to raise a finger of audacious phrase, and, whatever happened afterwards, he was heard.

HIS FAVOURITE MOTTO.

He was one of those men whom Providence creates for the especial purpose of differing on every conceivable subject with their fellow-countrymen. And the measure of his hopes was the measure of his disappointment. Personally he was one of the most delightful and best of men :-

avel

im.

epts

ever

orts

hen

hen ion.

l he

that und ittle

wed

time

You

all I ands

udy,

ront

was,

orth-

f as

ack

or a ts is

the fur

the

and tish ohn

ered

tion.

now

a-bed)

** )

than is, or wing

ars at

like,

ithin

his is state

luded rough

y be

His favourite motto was "Self-development is greater than self-sacrifice;" but when one remembers the deliberate way in which he sacrificed all his literary and scientific dreams to the domestic ideal, and preached constantly in his stories that a man with a wife and children must be husband or father first and artist afterwards—one realised that when his abstract theories were put to the human test, Grant Allen considered first the human need in the situation and last of all his theories. Moralist as he was, he was far indeed from being a doctrinaire. Grant Allen was too great to tell lies, even white lies. He never realised the necessity. He could compromise to the extent of doing brilliantly the work he hated, but more he would not do. No necessity, no torture, would have persuaded him to deny, or suppress, the truth that was in him. He might write of something else, but whenever he was obliged to write of vital matters, whatever it cost him, he told the truth.

HIS CAPACITY FOR WORK.

As a literary workman Grant Allen was probably unequalled. His capacity for working under disadvantages was superhuman. He could concentrate his mind like Gladstone, and no interruption or disturbance would set him off his theme:—

In the mere mechanical—but how important—matter of "turning out" his "copy" he was quite amazing. Any one who has stayed in his house will remember how his type-writer could be heard as you crossed the hall, punctually beginning to click at nine every morning, and, if you eavesdropped, you would seldom note a pause in its rapid clicking. I don't think that Grant Allen can even once in his life have "stopped for a word." Interruptions made no difference. I have known him stop in the middle of a sentence at the sound of the luncheon gong, and then, having found on repairing to the dining-room that the gong was a little premature, go back to his type-writer and-finish the sentence and begin another.

AS POPULARIZER OF SCIENCE.

Of his services in popularising science, Mr. Le Gallienne says :---

He made science clear, he made it simple, he made it interesting, he made it positively romantic; for he was more even than an apt exponent, he was no little of a poet, and those who see nothing in such books as his "Evolutionist at Large," "Colin Clout's Calendar," "Vignettes from Nature," "Moortand Idylls," but clear statement and luminous exposition, do scant justice to a rare literary gift exercising itself not merely with expository skill, but also artistically, upon difficult new material. More than clearness of statement was needed. Some of the dullest of writers are as clear as they are dry. Grant Allen's individual clearness came of imagination, as his charm came of an illustrative fancy, and a gay humanity applied to subjects usually immured from traffic with such frivolous qualities. Thus he not only made knowledge delightful to know, but delightful to read. In short, he gave us something like literary equivalents of his subjects.

AS TALKER.

He was one of those instructive writers who write best when they think least about it. It was not natural for him to work self-consciously. His style was colloquial and effective. Of his conversation Mr. Le Gallienne says:—

What an amazing talker he was! No pose-talk, but talk easily born of his knowledge and love of the subject that at the moment occupied him. No more brilliant generaliser can ever have lived. Present him with the most unexpected fact, or the most complex set of circumstances (as it might seem to you), and he had his theory in an instant, and was making it as clear, by the aid of his marvellously copious and exact vocabulary, as though he had drawn it on the air. And bright things by the score all the way! His gift of stating the most intricate matter impromptu in a few simple words, and of pouring out the most varied and profound learning as though he were telling a fairy tale, can hardly have been equalled, and certainly can never have been surpassed.

"COMPLETELY EMANCIPATED."

Grant Allen suffered much from critics, or would have suffered much if he had attached to them the importance they attribute to themselves. He was fiercely attacked for his opinions; but he never faltered or hesitated to speak his mind. The "Woman Who Did" announced an aggressive new rule. It was taken as a challenge, and the furious attacks which it provoked are the best measure of its success:—

He was the most completely "emancipated" of any recent English mind expressing itself in literature. I never observed a trace of that succumbing to the inherited habits of thought and feeling which even the most "advanced" thinkers have developed towards the close of life. He was entirely devoid of any form of "superstition." His reason was, to the last, master of the house of life. Perhaps he saw a little too clearly, for, as his most famous protigie writes:—

"They see not clearliest Who see all things clear."

A LADY AS TIGER HUNTER.

LION HUNTER is a rôle which in a figurative sense is often attributed to ladies; but the story of a lady who has distinguished herself as literally a tiger hunter and tiger killer still awakens a sensation of novelty. Isabel Savory, in the December Lady's Realm, reproduces the narrative of a friend, Miss Grahame, to whose rifle at least three tigers fell. It was in a Deccan jungle, with the temperature 104° in the shade, where Miss Grahame and two gentlemen friends went a-shooting. She says:—

(By permission of the "Lady's Realm.")

I wore a long thin coat and knickerbockers of green shikar material, a spine-pad sewn inside the coat and another hooked outside, a huge pith helmet with a wet rag inside on my head, and a pair of dogskin gloves with half the fingers cut off, which enabled one to hold the burning barrels.

"MY FIRST TIGER."

The three hunters perched on trees while the beaters set about beating up the prey. At last the tiger appeared, "a picture of fearful beauty." He halted ten yards from the Captain's tree. The Captain fired and hit him in the back. Then Miss Grahame and the Captain both fired, and missed. The lady goes on:—

This was too much. In one moment, like a flash, he darted round, galloped at the tree, sprang about half-way up, and then swarmed up the rest as quickly and easily as possible. Shall I ever know such a fearful moment in my whole life again? To see that vast and terrible body flying up the tree, more quickly than any cat; to see my poor friend jumping on to his feet, both barrels fired, and helpless! His hand was on the edge of the machdin, and the tiger's mouth, closing upon it, tore his finger all down the back of it to the bone . . . But at the same instant the tiger's back, as he clasped the trunk of the tree, presented a difficult but not impossible shot. I had one barrel left. It was about eighty yards. I fired, and have never thanked Heaven so fervently as when I saw the tiger drop at once to the ground. But, with nine catlike lives, he was not dead; he walked off and disappeared . . . We dared not look for him then and there, dying and savage, in such dangerous ground. But next morning we found him cold and stiff. He was a magnificent male tiger, very large and heavy, with enormous paws and moustache—a splendid "great cat."

"MISS SAHIB" AND "STRIPES" FACE TO FACE

The next adventure described was with a man-eating tiger. The natives were surprised to see "Miss Sahib" preparing to join in the hunt. Ten minutes after the beat began, "Stripes" emerged, going at a great pace through the underwood. She fired twice. The first shot certainly failed. "He galloped off, roaring with unusual grandeur." The three hunters came down from their tree perches, and finding traces of blood, concluded that the tiger was badly hit and would be dead in half an hour. So they had tiffin and then followed his track. She proceeds:—

Again we followed the fresh pugs (footmarks), and were stealing in line through the trees and grass when our hearts stood still. There was a spring, with a hideous roar; bounding through the cover with open mouth, his tail lashing his sides, his whole fur bristling, dashed the tiger straight upon us. Heavens! what a sight for our unprepared eyes! I could see nothing, owing to the beast's tremendous speed, but a shadowy form, with two large lamps of fire fixed on me with an unmeaning stare as it literally flew at me. Such was the vision of a moment. The trees were so thick I dared not shoot till he was close, for I had time, even then, to recollect that everything depended upon keeping cool and killing him if possible. I fired straight at his chest. On he came. Again I fired, without moving at all; and then instinctively, almost miraculously, I darted to the left as the tiger himself sprang past me—so close that I found his blood splashed over my gun barrels afterwards. Captain F—had fired two shots sideways, one of which missed altogether, and the other only knocked out the tiger's canine teeth. It was an awful escape. In fact, it was the nearest shave I have ever had of my life. To cut a long story short, we found my tiger next morning, dead. If there is any episode in my life to which I look back with a special thrill, it is that; if I have one trophy now which I care about, it is his skin.

The third tiger was shot dead on the spot by Miss Grahame from her perch on the tree. Yet there are mortals who still, smile at the suggestion of womensoldiers! A company of Miss Grahames would probably be an acceptable addition to any force of sharpshooters.

THE Woman at Home, which is generally strong in portraits, is for December almost an album of notables. Its first forty-six pages are taken up with a gallery of portraits of contributors with a beading of eulogy. The paper of most serious interest is Mrs. Tooley's sketch of the Duke of Westminster and his family, in which again portraits—some remarkably beautiful—play a great part.

I Rev Fra diffi ordi last Fra of t now M that set back pare whic abov cash pana to ] asce are i O of p grou Allia Amo the S deple

the w (1) of mo
(2) bach
the C
the C Fren (3) generand

subse

is qui

there

the r

the unfor hand gener (4) certain seem is alm a par The of the production of the connection of the conn

paren their which But a turer family this childr tion o comfo

WANTED-MORE BABIES!

In the second September number of the Nouvelle Revue, M. F. Martin considers at some length what is to France the vital question of repopulation. It is now difficult to realise that early in the seventeenth century the French were famed on the Continent for their extraordinarily large families. But this state of things did not last very long, and one hundred years later a princess of France put on record that, whereas in old days families of twenty-two to twenty-five children were quite usual, now five resis at most were the rule.

now five or six at most were the rule.

M. Martin quotes with some irony the various remedies that have been proposed during the last few years. One set of reformers would fain impose heavy taxes on bachelors, while rendering easier the fiscal lot of the parents of considerable families. Another suggestion which is constantly put forward is brushed aside by M. Martin—namely, that each successive child over and above a certain minimum should mean a lump sum in cash to the happy parents. An even more visionary panacea is the conversion of the French nation en bloc to Protestantism, or even Judaism, as it has been ascertained that both Protestants and Jews in France are more fecund than the rest of the people.

One very practical step has been taken by a number of prominent Frenchmen drawn from diverse political groups and social circles—the formation of the National Alliance for the Increase of the Population of France. Among the members are Prince Henry of Orleans and the Socialist Deputy, M. Sembat. This society particularly deplores the increasing number of bachelors. In 1851 there were 914,788 bachelors in France, while in 1886 the number had increased to 1,543,662. The society on the whole approves the following remedies:—

(1) The grant of a double electoral vote to the fathers of more than two children.

(2) The withdrawal of certain political rights from bachelors. This is not a new idea, for in October, 1795, the Convention passed a vote excluding bachelors from the Conseil des Anciens, which then answered to the French Senate.

(3) The re-establishment of a bastardy law. It is not generally known that this law was abolished by Napoleon, and the effect has been to encourage illegitimacy and subsequent prostitution. The absence of a bastardy law is quite contrary to French feeling, and is undoubtedly the reason why French juries so constantly acquit unfortunate girls when they take the law into their own hands and revenge themselves, by means of vitriol generally, on their seducers.

(4) A modification of the succession law. This is certainly the most practical of all, though it may not seem so to English people. The depopulation of France is almost entirely owing to the rigid rules which prevent a parent from disposing of his property as he pleases. The society seeks to modify these rules in the direction of the English system, which has certainly worked to produce large families. And it is remarkable in this connection to note that the lowest class of French parents, who have absolutely no property to divide at their death, invariably have enormous families-a fact which is full of terrible augury for the future of the nation. But as things are a great French landowner or manufacturer has all his interests set against having a large family. At the same time it must be remembered that this French system of equal division among all the children has brought about a remarkably wide distribution of wealth, and has markedly raised the standard of

A FRENCHWOMAN IN BURMAH.

A FRENCHWOMAN who explores in the Far East is, as Mme. Isabelle Massieu says, somewhat rare, and the impressions of Burmah and the Shan States which she contributes to the second September number of the Revue des Deux Mondes have an added interest on that account. Moreover Mme. Massieu, it is easy to see, is a thoroughly patriotic Frenchwoman. Southern Burmah in its climate and the richness of its soil reminds her of the French colony of Cochin-China, northern Burmah is like Tong-king, though somewhat drier and even more sparsely populated, while the Shan States in their tropical fertility recall France's possession of Upper Laos. It is pleasant in view of her patriotism to note her appreciation of the English hosts whom she encountered on her travels. "I return," she says, "my heartiest thanks to the English, our tefrible rivals in the East, but the most perfect hosts that a traveller could dream of. They have the genius of hospitality and of giving practical help."

Mme. Massieu arrived in Burmah in November, 1896. At Rangoon, though in point of picturesqueness it is not to be compared with Saigon, she was much struck by the evidences of commercial activity to be met with on every side, but she was still more impressed with the Sway Dagon Pagoda, the finest and holiest in Indo-China, which possesses eight hairs of Buddha. This temple seems to resemble our mediæval cathedrals, in that it is used as a sort of general meeting-place, apart from its religious purpose, where people even smoke, attend to their toilet, and transact business. Everywhere in the building figures of lions and lionesses occur. This is due to an old tradition that a Burmese prince was once abandoned in his infancy and was succoured and nourished by a lioness, who, when her nursling grew up and returned to his country, died of a broken heart. At Mandalay our traveller found many memories of Myndoon, the great monarch, who, if he had lived, would probably have prevented the British annexation. Myndoon was an enlightened potentate, who loved to discuss philosophical and religious topics, and who could not remain satisfied with the Buddhist theory of continual transmigrations through more or less noble animals to Nirvana. When his wife died, he insisted on her body being buried, not burned according to the custom of the country.

Has the conquest of the country benefited the Burmans? asks Mme. Massieu, and the conclusion is that at any rate it has not pleased them. It is the old story of the conquering people bringing to the conquered all sorts of conveniences of civilisation which they did not at all want. The Burmese lack perseverance and tenacity. They are a light-hearted, lazy people, fond of power, yet unable to exercise it rationally. Education of a kind is generally diffused, but, at any rate in Upper Burmah, it has to be neglected for political reasons by the British officials. The Catholic Mission has the education of the girls almost entirely in its hands. The Burmese women are described as charming, naturally well-bred, and brought up with a freedom which they do not abuse. No fewer than four English officials have married Burmese, but such unions are severely discouraged by the Government.

Mme. Massieu does not disguise the difficulties with which the English have had to contend in Burmah—notably dacoity. Altogether we have accomplished in Burmah, she thinks, a work of which we may well be

XUM

n the fired, darted then hall I

? To uickly , both of the finger same e, pre-anked to the d; he or him round. was a eating ahib " beat rough tainly granr tree

at the hour.

She were hearts inding sides, on us.

ald see adowy ith an vision till he ything ble. I fired, barrels ys, one out the yas the y story aere is special about, Miss e are omenobably oters.

ong in tables. lery of The tch of again part. THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE "OVER-MAN."

THE Monist for July has two full papers on Friedrich Nietzsche and his teachings. Dr. Goebel and Mr. Antrim point out in the first that as Schopenhauer expressed in his pessimism the dejection and disappointment of the German people after the failure of the revolutionary movements of 1848, so the expansion of life and the enlarged self-consciousness of the individual which has attended the victorious career of the German Empire makes Nietzsche's the dominant philosophy of the last decade. Dr. Paul Carus, treating of the system under the title of Immorality as a philosophic principle, quotes Professor Wenley's humorous saying, "German professors when they die go to Oxford," and anticipates for Nietzsche a vogue in the English-speaking world such as Schopenhauer has now and Hegel had recently.

THE HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY IN EPIGRAM.

He quotes in illustration of Nietzsche's favourite assertion of the impossibility of knowing "objective truth" his singularly daring resume of the history of philosophy in the following sentences, headed "How the 'True World' finally became a Fable" :-

The true world attainable by the wise, the pious, and the virtuous man-he lives in it, he embodies it.

(Oldest form of the idea relatively rational, simple and conneing. Transcription of the proposition, "I, Plato, am the

2. The true world unattainable at present, but promised to the wise, the pious, and the virtuous man (to the sinner who repents).

(Progress of the idea: it becomes more refined, more insidious, more incomprehensible - it becomes feminine, it becomes Christian).

3. The true world unattainable, undemonstrable, and unable to be promised; but, even as conceived, a comfort, an obligation, and an imperative. (The old sun still, but shining only through mist and scepticism; the idea become sublime, pale, northerly, Koenigs-

The true world-unattainable? At any rate unattained. And being unattained also unknown. Consequently also neither comforting, saving, nor obligatory: what obligation could anything unknown lay upon us?
(Gray morning. First yawning of reason. Cock-crowing of Positivism.)

5. The "true world "-an idea neither good for anything, nor even obligatory any longer, - an idea become useless and superfluous; consequently a refuted idea: let us do away with it! (Full day; breakfast; return of bon sens and cheerfulness;

Plato blushing for shame; infernal noise of all free intellects.) 6. We have done away with the true world: what world is left? perhaps the seeming? . . . But no; in doing away with the true, we have also done away with the seeming world!

(Noon; the moment of the shortest shadow; end of the longest error; climax of mankind: Incipit Zarathustra!)

NIETZSCHE BETTER THAN HIS CREED.

Dr. Carus finds in the old Nominalistic School the father of Nietzsche's philosophy. Nietzsche developed into an Immoralist, says the writer, "by way of reaction against the influence of Schopenhauer in combination with 'he traditional Christianity." Nietzsche, as is well known, 'knows nothing of self-control; would allow the self-blindly to assert itself after the fashion of animal instincts; is the philosopher of instinct": and runs full tilt accordingly against religion, morals, science, ideals of every kind. The quintessence of his philosophy is the Over-Man (Ubermensch), a word of Goethe's, used to denote the strong self, uncontrolled, realising itself as it will, most nearly exemplified in modern times by Napoleon. Yet it is interesting to find that Nietzsche's own life was no embodiment of these wild doctrines. Dr. Carus sees in his philosophy really "a protest against himself":

Himself a model of virtue, he made himself the advocate of vice, and gloried in it. He encouraged the robber to rob, but he himself was honesty incarnate; he incited the people to rebel against authority of all kinds, but he himself was a "model child" in the nursery, a "model scholar" in school, and a "model soldier" while serving in the German army. His teachers as well as the officers of his regiment find not words enough to praise Nietzsche's obedience. . . . If there was a flaw in Nietzsche's moral character, it was goody-goodiness; and his philosophy is a protest against the principles of his own nature. While boldly calling himself "the first immoralist," justifying even licence itself and defending the coarsest lust, his own life was as pure as that of a virgin, and he shrunk back in disgust from moral filth whenever he met with it in practical life.

NIETZSCHE ON MARRIAGE.

It is also instructive to note his teaching on marriage :-Thou shalt build beyond thyself. But first thou must be built thyself square in body and soul. Thou shalt not only propagate thyself but propagate thyself upwards! Therefore the garden of marriage may help thee

Thou shalt create a higher body, a prime motor, a wheel of self-rolling,-thou shalt create a creator.

Marriage: thus I call the will of two to create that one which is more than they who created it. I call marriage reverence unto each other as unto those who will such a will.

Let this be the significance and the truth of thy marriage. DYNAMITE FOR THE DISINHERITED.

Dr. Carus remarks that :-

Nietzsche is the philosopher of protest, and, strange to say, while he himself is aristocratic in his instincts, he appeals most powerfully to the masses of the people. . . . Nietzsche's disciples are not among the aristocrats, not among the scholars, not among the men of genius. His followers are among the people who believe in hatred and hail him as a prophet of the great deluge. His greatest admirers are anarchists, sometimes also socialists, and above all those geniuses who have failed to find recognition. Nietzsche's thought will prove veritable dynamite if it should happen to reach the masses of mankind, the disinherited, the uneducated, the proletariat.

WHY REVERT?

From Dr. Carus' many criticisms of this erratic philosopher, one shrewd remark may be quoted :-

Nietzsche forgets that the present social order originated from that general free-for-all fight which he commends, and if we begin at the start we should naturally run through the same or a similar course of development to the same or very similar conditions. Will it not be better to go on improving than to revert to the primitive state of savagery?

The article contains several portraits of the philosopher and a facsimile of an autograph poem.

THE exposure of the tricks of Indian jugglers by Mr. Charles Bertram is one of the most notable features of the Strand Christmas number. Mr. Bertram has studied Indian jugglery on the spot, and has been acknowledged by the jugglers themselves to be a superior in their own The tricks referred to are three - the mangotree trick, the basket trick and the rope trick. The last named, in which a boy disappears into space climbing up a loose rope flung into the air, he has never seen: nor has he seen any one who has seen it. The growth of the mango-tree is explained by the surreptitious introduction of slips of the mango-tree in different stages of growth. The basket trick—the piercing of a basket with a sword in which a boy has been hidden-is explained by the boy so disposing his limbs as to avoid the sword-thrusts, and concealing himself in the sides of the basket. Not hypnotism, but simple sleight of hand is the secret.

WHA THE

transit painte vention the ab Christi testime see Cl religion Anothe go by t burgh . The fa within, falls fr But, sa though seem to clusions its civili cludes ti within. The conven

but no higher ment t were to of Emp treatise exception reveals prosper macy o was the centurie was no Empero

They though a wars whi history o governm portion e social, an houses, sloth or s Yet ' æsthetic trative." custom " off like ( stiffened barbaria Roman 1 and the Rome wa not dest The cont and the the close

The m ness or de the Empi Roman ( WHAT CAUSED THE FALL OF ANCIENT ROME?

POPULAR CONCLUSIONS REVISED.

THE bright lights and deep shadows in which the transition from the ancient to the modern world has been painted are yielding to more neutral tints. The conventional idea that classic civilisation was sinking into the abyss of utter unbelief when it was laid hold of by the Christian faith has been dissipated by the indisputable testimony of the Inscriptions; and we are now taught to see Christianity carried along on the crest of a wave of religious revival which rolled throughout the Pagan world. Another hoary platitude of historical moralists must now go by the board, according to a recent article in the Edinburgh Review on the Fall of the Western Roman Empire. The familiar view is, of course, that "the Empire decayed within, and fell before the barbarians as a rotten tree falls from its own utter rottenness in a passing squall." But, says the writer, though recent writers take this view, recent research does not seem to justify it. Recent research suggests very different conclusions—that the Empire was, in the main, a sound and healthy State until the barbarians attacked it, and that even at the last its civilisation and political order possessed a vitality which precludes the notion of a protracted organic decay commencing from within.

The writer then traverses the pet assertions of the conventionalist. There was, he grants, literary decay, but not intellectual. Oratory languished because a higher judicial standard preferred matter-of-fact argument to Ciceronian irrelevancies; and Roman minds were too much absorbed in the practical administration of Empire to run to literary seed. Their splendid legal treatises show no intellectual decline. In spite of local exceptions, Mommsen's survey of the whole Empire reveals no physical retrogression, but a general prosperity and populousness. The alleged supremacy of the army only led to anarchy when there was the pressure of barbarian invasion. During the two centuries and a half before the barbarians came there was not only prosperity but good government. The Emperors were "nearly all able administrators":—

They mounted the throne one after another in due series, though according to no Act of Succession, and the two civil wars which arose were brief and limited in area. Never in the listory of mankind has so long a peace and so continuous a government blessed so many lands. Never has so large a portion of the globe been permanently opened to commercial, social, and intellectual intercourse with so few barriers of custom houses, language, or political frontiers. The result was not sloth or stagnation.

Yet "its temperament was neither literary, nor asthetic nor scientific; it was merely legal and administrative." The reviewer suggests that "the cake of custom" was forming, and that if Rome had been shut off like China from the rest of mankind Rome might have stiffened into what China was seventy years ago. The barbarians triumphed in battle not by the decay of the Roman legionary, but by reason of their greater numbers and their immense strength in cavalry. Even when Rome was vanquished the barbarians could not and would not destroy the massive framework of Roman society. The continuity was preserved between the ancient Roman and the modern world. The reviewer thus epitomises at the close:—

The meaning of all this is plain. It was not internal weakness or decay, but the long storm of barbarians which wrecked the Empire in the west. Evils of many kinds distracted the Roman Government and the citizens of Rome before the wreck was complete; but those evils arose out of the external storm, and neither the one nor the other were sufficient to sap the soundness of the inner life of the Empire. Even the political structure, first reared by Augustus, and repaired by Diocletian, was still powerful upon men's minds, and the fabric of habit in which men had lived was still fit to shelter them. It was able to protect the new nations of the south, the kingdoms of Spain and France, the cities and principalities of Italy, as they rose into life; and its direct influence and its traditions and the magic of its fame and name were potent through the Middle Age. Now it has gone. The title of Roman Emperor, long a mere shadowy title, the mere reflexion of a name, vanished from Europe when this century opened, and, as the same century closes, vigorous Teutonic thinkers are wondering whether the Latin civilisation itself, in France and Spain and Italy, has not at last reached the end of its development. At such a moment it is not ill to struggle even through difficult historical details to catch an accurate glimpse of how that civilisation passed from the Roman Empire to that modern world which is before us.

THROUGH SIBERIA.

THE Annales de Géographie for July contains an interesting article by M. Sylvain Lévi, describing a journey from Nagasaki to Moscow, overland through Siberia. M. Lévi says that Russian influence has already penetrated to Japan; that the servants at Nagasaki speak Russian; and the village of Masa opposite is a Russian colony. From Nagasaki M. Lévi touched the Corean coast at Fousan and Gensan, and then on to Vladivostok, where the port of commerce was crowded with ships. The growth of German trade in the Far East is shown by the nationalities of the vessels visiting Vladivostok in 1896. Out of 183 steamers and sailing ships, 50 were Russian, 49 German, 28 English, and only one French. The settlement of the Far East of Siberia recalls the Far West of America. In 1868, Vladivostok had only 516 inhabitants; at the date of the last census the population was 28,896, of which about 9,000 are Chinese, Japanese and Coreans. From Vladivostok M. Lévi travelled by rail to Khabarovsk, a distance of 715 kilometres, covered in forty hours. Khabarovsk has some 13,000 inhabitants, and boasts a museum, and zoological and ethnographical collections of first-class interest. After this M. Lévi went up the Amur on one of its 120 steamers. The steamers, he says, are comfortable; but water is doled out parsimoniously, an official declaring that "Europeans by washing themselves developed a repugnant odour of the skin from which Siberians were free." Blagovietchchensk lives by gold mining, fraud, and crime, mostly carried on by escaped convicts; but has a library, five banks, and a good theatre. "All Siberia has the gold fever; it is like a vast California." At Strietensk M. Lévi had to leave the steamer and travel some 1,100 kilometres westward on a tarantass, the Russian cart constructed to realise "the maximum of stability with the minimum of comfort.' From Krasnovarsk M. Lévi travelled by rail to Moscow, a distance of 4,092 versts, in seven days, paying only 150 francs first class. M. Lévi says: "Russia in Europe and Russia in Asia are henceforth but one. There is no more Ural; the mountainous barrier which on our maps divides the ancient continent has become a line of union. For 10,000 kilometres from the frontier of Central Asia to the Sea of Japan, the Russian can travel without speaking any language but his own." On the political aspect of the Asiatic problem M. Levi scarcely touches. But his opinions are plain when he says: "The Middle Kingdom will soon see entire provinces absorbed in the domain of the Tsar."

111.7-

XUM

vocate of rob, but e to rebel "model l, and a ny. His not words as a flaw rus sees as a flaw ; and his in nature. justifying s own life in disgust fe.

te thyself thee! wheel of one which ence unto iage.

te to say, beals most is disciples blars, not the people the great imes also d to find dynamite kind, the erratic ated from and if we same or a y similar ig than to losopher

s by Mr. atures of s studied wledged heir own mangok. The o space
he has seen it.

by the o-tree in boy has sing his

ing him-

it simple

THE GAIN TO ROME FROM MODERN SCIENCE.

MR. W. H. MALLOCK contributes a distinctly loud article to the November Nineteenth Century on "The Intellectual Future of Catholicism," He seems to speak of himself at the close as of "one who is not a Catholic." Possibly this article may represent the blare of trumpets with which he announces his approach to the gates of the Vatican. He mentions at the outset the contrasted crises of the human intellect, when Christian theology vanquished the secular thought of antiquity, and when the secular science of modern times vanquished Christian theology. Mr. Mallock actually indulges in the word-play of giving as the watchwords of these two crises: of the first the far-famed cry of Julian, "Thou hast conquered, O Galileo!" Seemingly a third crisis is at hand—the victory of evolution.

THE BASIS OF PROTESTANTISM ANNIHILATED.

Mr. Mallock has made a discovery which impresses him greatly, to the effect that the cosmic and historical sciences do not leave Protestantism a leg to stand upon. In his own words:—

Let me sum up in as few words as possible what science is heading to do in the directions that have just been indicated, firstly with regard to the Bible, and secondly with regard to Christian doctrine. It tends to annihilate completely, in the eyes of every thinking man, the two great principles which are the foundation of what is called Reformed Christianity. The first of these is the principle that the Bible contains in itself a clear indication of what Christian doctrine is, and is also its own warranty that everything which it says is true; the second is the principle that, if any further guide is required, we shall find it in the beliefs and practices of Christ's earliest followers, the fundamental assumption of every school of Protestantism being that its own creed is that of the first Christians, given back to the light by the removal of the superstructures of Rome.

THE THREE WITNESSES.

Mr. Mallock calls in support of this pronouncement the testimony of "Protestant" witnesses so diverse as Canon Gore, Dean Farrar, and Professor Harnack. The scientific study of the story of the Old and New Testaments is admitted to reveal in both a mixture of truth and error; and the same scientific principles applied to the history of dogma show "that the content of orthodoxy was only very gradually arrived at by the orthodox."

THE REAL CHRISTIAN ORGANISM.

Mr. Mallock makes use of these conclusions in Chapter III., of which the captions are sufficient indication: "Emergence of the necessity for some living infallible authority. Rome alone can make any successful claim to this. Absurdity of all Protestant theories." This is an argument which may or may not be true: it certainly is not new, except perhaps to Mr. Mallock, whose elation at its discovery is scarcely otherwise explicable.

Chapter IV. represents "the Roman Church conceived of as a serio-spiritual organism developed in accordance with the laws of all organic evolution." Mr. Mallock appeals to Mr. Herbert Spencer's philosophy, and proceeds :-

We have before us in the Church of Rome an organism whose history corresponds in the minutest way with the process of organic evolution as modern science reveals it to us, while Protestantism will appear as an organism so low down in the scale that its evolution seems hardly to have yet begun. It is almost structureless: it is made up of heterogeneous, yet similar parts: it has no single brain by which the whole body is guided, and new sects are born from it by the simple process of fassion. The Church of Rome, on the contrary, by a process of continuous growth has developed, through the differentiation of parts, an increasingly conscious unity, and a single organ of thought and historic memory, constantly able to explain and to re-state doctrine, and to attest as though from personal experience, the facts of its earliest history.

PLATO, ARISTOTLE, SPENCER.

Mr. Mallock thus states his philosophic forecast :-

Just as Rome has absorbed Platonism in the Fourth Gospel, and in the doctrine of the Trinity, and has absorbed Aristotelianism in the doctrine of Christ's real presence in the Eucharist, so we may naturally expect that it will, in its theory of its own nature, absorb some day the main ideas of that evolutionary philosophy which many people imagine destined to accomplish its destruction; and may find in the Spencerian philosophy a basis for its own authority, like that with which Aristotle supplied it for its doctrine of transubstantiation.

The personal attitude of the writer is apparently given in these closing words :-

If one who is not a Catholic may venture to give such an opinion, it appears to me that, the credibility of any religion being granted, the intellectual prospects of Christianity were never more reassuring than they are as now represented by the prospects of the Church of Rome, under the pressure of historical criticism and the philosophy of organic evolution.

NINETEENTH CENTURY CHRISTIANITY.

REAL OR SHAM?

In the Month for August "A Layman," writing on "Nineteenth Century Christianity," raises the question of how far the modern man who claims first of all to be a Christian really deserves the name. The question, he points out, is really not to be answere! by considering the performances of men, but by determining the standard of morals and life which they set up for their own guidance. The "Layman" declares that in England, at any rate, the standard of Christianity is too low, whatever the ratio between the standard and the performance may For as a nation we dislike cant, and to avoid an obvious inability to act up to the level of Christianity as formulated by Christ we bring down the level of Christianity to suit our own performances. By this ingenious process, the writer fails to observe, we avoid not the being of hypocrites, but the being exposed as hypocrites. For assuredly to consciously pervert the gospel which we profess to be guided by is not less hypocritical than to consciously disregard it.

The writer asks what is the least that is implied by the word "Christian" and answers out of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, "a professor of the religion of Christ," declaring that according to this standard the average man is a Christian. For-it is not essential to act up to this profession; to be a professor only, is to be a Christian; and herein Dr. Johnson is right, because the moment you allow that falling short of you profession is to be a disqualification, you disqualify everyone; all fall short.

The writer's object is to define a standard of Christian profession and not a standard of Christian morals. He declares that the casuistry with which professing Christians rid themselves of the obligations imposed by Christ's teaching is a Christian characteristic, and is not an avowed characteristic of any other religion. In private life, in business, in politics, the teachings of Christ are not only disobeyed, but flouted even as an ideal to be looked to:—

Whatever may have been the case in the past, it is clear that to-day the word "Christian" is not confined to those who are professors of the religion of Christ; it avowedly includes many who do not so profess, and even some who dispute that such profession can be genuine, because they maintain that the religion of Christ, as defined by Christ and by His immediate followers, is incompatible with nineteenth century civilisation.

be besthe of Ser adra Ser year nar

you

con

exe

froi

pro

Ma

who

S

am

With pen as I awa extr £80 as : Service the bear title

M

Con

com

gove

mile

distr

men

unde

and

before incul Cuman is interested to the charmal lacking education outra pave writin

forgiv

fearfu

At

have had had himse surrou

A WORTHLESS KING.

It is greatly to the honour of the Royal caste that among the reigning sovereigns of Europe only one can be regarded as utterly unworthy of the high position bestowed on him by destiny. M. Malet contributes to the Revne de Paris a terrible indictment of King Milan of Servia. Unfortunately he succeeded, at the early age of fourteen, a really admirable ruler, Prince Michael Obrenowitz, who was massacred on June 10th, 1868. "That day," says the writer significantly, "stands out in Servian history as a day doubly cursed, for on it an admirable sovereign disappeared and Servia fell into the hands of Milan." During the first four years of his reign, Servia was very fairly ruled by a Regency, and three years after he was Prince Regnant in fact as well as in name. Milan married, at the age of twenty, the beautiful young Russian girl, Natalie Kechko, to whom his horrible conduct has been one of the reasons why King Milan is execrated by all those familiar with his life.

Seven years after his marriage Milan changed his title from Prince to that of King; six years later he himself pronounced the dissolution of his marriage, and in the March of 1889 he abdicated in favour of his only child, who was proclaimed King under the title of Alexander I. Within two years, however, he was back again in Servia, penniless and determined to make himself as disagreeable as possible. The Regency gave him £40,000, and he went away promising never to return again. A year later he extracted from the unfortunate Servian Government £80,000, renouncing in exchange all his rights, not only as a member of the royal house, but also those of a Servian subject. In 1893 he patched up some kind of reconciliation with his long-suffering wife; a year later he broke his word and came back to Belgrade. He then managed to persuade his son to allow him to assume the title of King-father. During the last two years he has become Commander-in-Chief of the Servian army!

M. Malet in one paragraph shows to what straits a Continental ruler can reduce a kingdom. During the comparatively short space of time King Milan actually governed Servia—that is, seventeen years—four hundred miles of railway and the annexation of the Nisch district is all that he can point to in the way of achievement. He was defeated in each of the three wars he undertook, and he created a public debt of two hundred and fifty-five thousand million francs, and this although before his accession Servia was without this modern incubus.

Curiously enough, this roi faintant is a very intelligent man; he possesses wonderful powers of assimilation; he is interested in all that concerns the progress of modern science, and his manners are considered to be quite charming. No one knows Servia better than he does himself; but he is one of those men who are completely lacking in moral sense; his conscience has never been educated. Although his conduct to his wife has been outrageous, he has again and again made attempts to pave the way to a reconciliation, but while actually writing her the most touching letters imploring her forgiveness, he was inditing others in which he gave a fearful account of her supposed unkindness and cruelty.

fearful account of her supposed unkindness and cruelty.

At one time the present King Alexander seemed to have a splendid and happy future opening before him; he had been very carefully brought up by his mother, he was popular with his people, and all would have gone well had not his father immediately considered how he could exploit this situation to his own benefit. He put himself into communication with the young king and surrounded him with creatures of his own who assured their youthful sovereign that his crown was in peril, and that a strong Radical party wished to upset the dynasty. King Milan then arrived in Servia and became the guide, philosopher and friend of the unfortunate lad, who was thus unable to distinguish his friends from his worst foes. The very existence of King Milan is, M. Malet thinks, at this present moment a danger for the whole of Europe.

CHIVALRY AMONG ANIMALS.

DR. WOODS HUTCHINSON contributes to the Contemporary Keview of December a very interesting paper entitled "Animal Chivalry." He maintains that animals have a very distinct and high sense of duty, and a keen sense of shame at failure to live up to it. In this paper he describes the attitude of animals towards the young or the defenceless females of their own and other species, towards ladies and towards men. He says it is only a very morose and ill-tempered dog who will seriously attack young kittens, although they will worry every full-grown cat without mercy. The custom of defending younger or weaker members of their own species is widely spread throughout Catch a little pig, and the the animal kingdom. moment its squeal of distress is heard the whole herd of fifty or sixty full-grown pigs will charge down upon you, bristles up, tusks gnashing, and fierce, barking war-cry ringing. If you drop the little pig and it ceases to squeal, the herd will stop, suddenly stare about them in a dazed and puzzled manner, and then work off their excitement by fighting each other. On the plains the cry of the calf will bring every horned animal within three-quarters of a mile down upon you fighting mad.

Animals, says Dr. Hutchinson, have never yet succeeded in absolutely steeling their heart against the cry of infantile distress; man alone has reached this pinnacle of virtue. As for politeness to ladies, animals carry this to an extraordinary extent:—

No self-respecting dog will bite a female, except in the extremest need of self-defence; though I am sorry to say that the lady herself, as a rule, has no scruple whatever about punishing, to the full extent of her power, any individual of the opposite sex that happens to be inferior to her in size or strength. And indeed, like the woman in the crowded bus, she is inclined to demand her privileges as rights. A vixenish female will make more trouble in a pack of hounds than any three of the sterner sex, for whenever dissatisfied she hasn't the slightest reserve about speaking out at once, and, as her cause is extremely likely to be championed, upon general principles, by some chivalrous male, a free fight is frequently the result. So strong is this unwillingness to "strike a female" that it really becomes a most annoying obstacle in attempting to clear a neighbourhood of wolves, as few male dogs will attack a shewolf, or in some cases even follow her trail.

Dr. Hutchinson says the same kind of thing is noticed among horses. Savage farm-horses that cannot be worked alongside of any other horse, on account of their temper, may safely be yoked alongside of a mare. Mares, on the other hand, will attack either horse or mare without the slightest hesitation, but no scrious or retaliatory resistance is offered by the horse.

~~~~~~~

THE two chief features of Longman's for December are a study of British wild fruits by the Rev. John Vaughan, M.A., and I. A. Taylor's sketch of the varying views taken of Danton's character, which he gathers under the heading "The Evolution of a Reputation." The final verdict of history he does not venture to anticipate, but he considers the theory which held Danton to be a monster exceptional and colossal is renounced as untenable.

ospel,

an of

and

s own ionary nplish sophy e supgiven

ligion never prostorical

g on estion to be on, he dering ndard own nd, at atever may id an ianity vel of this avoid ed as t the t less

by the ason's hrist," erage

ecause

istian He stians eachyowed ife, in to:ur that ho are many h proeligion

owers,

A NATIONAL CHURCH FOR INDIA.

UNDER this heading Mr. Alfred Nundy in the October Contemporary supports the resolutions passed by the Quinquennial Conference of the Church Missionary Society at Allahabad, last December, in favour of a selfsupporting, self-governing and independent Church in India, free from European control. Such a Church, the assembled missionaries proposed, should be "governed by its own synods, under an Indian Episcopate, and in communion with the Church of England."

This arrangement would involve a severance of the present tie between Church and State; and "not a voice would be lifted in India in support of the maintenance of the connection." The first step necessary would be "the release of the Church Missionary Society and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel from the thraldom of the present Bishops." Separation of the spheres between the various denominational societies the writer feels to be no longer possible. The Christian population is increasing at the rate of 25 per cent. every ten years. The Sectarianism of the West is unintelligible in the East. A SCHEME OF COMPROMISE.

Mr. Nundy outlines a way by which the new national Church might come into being :-

There is, as a matter of fact, amongst the different sects working in India no serious difference of opinion so far as the essential dogmas of Christianity are concerned. Whatever difference there is has reference chiefly to the question of Episcopal ordination, of Church government, and of mode of worship, matters by no means difficult of adjustment. It may be conceded at once that no union is possible, so far as the adherents of the Church of England are concerned, unless it is on a basis of Episcopal ordination of priests and deacons. Will the Nonconformists consent to this? Why not? So far as the Indian Christians are concerned, it would be by no means difficult to persuade them that an ordination of their ministers at the hands of a bishop and two or three presbyters would be at least as good as at the hands of a number of Nonconformist ministers. If the alternative is presented to them of union coupled with the Episcopal ordination of ministers, or not at all, there can be no doubt which alternative they will accept.

Then, as to Church government, as a matter of fact, in India there is not much difference between the Episcopal Church and the various Nonconformist bodies. The one has over its head a bishop, who exercises a general supervision over its affairs; the others have officers who perform a similar function, but are called by another name-generally secretaries of the society to which they belong; whilst the American Methodists, who are, perhaps, destined to take a more prominent part in the evangel-isation of India than any other denomination, are subject to the control of a bishop just as much as the members of the Established Church of England. But happily there are points of agreement to be found in India which are absent in England. The Nonconformist bodies have conferences or synods composed of ministers and laymen to regulate the affairs of their respective Churches, and the Episcopal Church is not far behind them so far as the Indian Christians are concerned.

URGENTLY NEEDED AND FEASIBLE.

Mr. Nundy claims to have established two distinct facts: the one bearing on the necessity, even the urgency, for a speedy union of the various denominations working in India; the other, that such a union is not outside the range of Indian Church politics. The best qualified authorities, whose theological opinions are most divergent, are at one in this, that if a serious and honest attempt is made to bring about a union it will be attended with success, and India may one day be blessed with having a National Church of its own, and the present dissensions and heartburnings and jealousies be a thing of the past.

The first step that has to be taken is for the Church Missionary Society to give a hearty response to the appeal of the Quinquennial Conference "to face at once and anew the important question of the policy of the formation of an Independent Indian Church," and "to confer with the directors of the large missionary societies in order that some united policy may be adopted with reference to the questions of self-support and independence of the Indian Churches."

It would, after all, be a bit of a joke if our reunion problem were to be first solved in India.

VIENNA HOSPITAL SCANDALS.

"THE Hospital where the Plague Broke Out" is the title which Miss C. O'Conor-Eccles gives to her exposure in the October Nineteenth Century of the Allgemeines Krankenhaus, Vienna. It is a miserable picture which she draws, and for which the fame of Vienna as a unique centre of scientific medicine ill prepares one. She pronounces the condition of nursing in Vienna to be simply a scandal :-

The nurses in the vast Allgemeines Krankenhaus, with few exceptions, are recruited from the lowest class of domestic servant, women who, because of incapacity, increasing years, or doubtful character, find it difficult to get a situation elsewhere, Many look as if they had been accustomed to field work. They come in for a time to suit their own convenience, fulfil or neglect their duties as the case may be, and when anything better offers drift out again. Training, properly so called, they get little, except in the obstetric wards. Whatever they learn, they pick up in haphazard fashion.

They eke out their miserable pay (£1 a month) by levying blackmail on their patients, and "in Austria all patients are paying patients."

The difference between Austrian and English methods is put thus concisely :-

With us, a hospital is primarily considered as an institution where the sick are to be carefully treated, and, if possible, cured of their disorders. Secondarily, it is a medical school.

In Vienna, on the other hand, hospitals are looked on primarily as medical schools and quite incidentally in any other light.

THE PERILS OF STATE ENDOWMENT.

Advocates of the State taking over our hospitals will heed these words :-

Vienna, as a school of medicine, is almost as much in advance of us as it is behind us in humanity and consideration for those treated. The conviction is forced on one that, so far as regards the public interest, a State subvention does harm, since it places hospital authorities beyond the control of public opinion . . .

While in Vienna all the scientific instruments have been brought to the utmost perfection, the appliances for the comfort and convenience of the patients are of the most primitive kind. The result is, however, that the poor dread and detest the hospitals. They only enter one under pressure of extreme pain and misery, and with dismal forebodings that they will never come out alive.

For the sanctities of feminine reserve there is simply not the smallest regard shown. The patients in the obstetric ward were exposed in the most callous and brutal manner. "Elsewhere we saw women disrobing, and my guide told me they were examined in batches like so many animals." The dying are disturbed in their extremity to be made the subject of tutorial demonstration or of students' inspection.

WHAT MIGHT BE DONE.

The writer closes with this suggestion :-

If any medical association in Vienna would cast aside traditions and send over eight or ten competent and educated young women of the governess class to train in a first-class London hospital, and then allow them, on the completion of their course, to re-organise nursing in the Austrian capital, it would be doing a good work for humanity. The Emperor, who is so interested in all that concerns the welfare of his people, would probably approve if the project were set before him, and might be prepared to assist with funds.

Mäd sugg Max July, of H at lea and poem Hund Sans may who many the fo by an centu lines than Cui extrac

D

num

wort

liter

haue

on t

preser deeply first I Bhart lation. on to Greek Thus remark who fl Roman poet a and a

of Bh

But 1

subjec

to be

HOL MISS Hour Carrara supplie alike." Latin marble transfor marble Christia severe causesthe Carr pendent his shoul The from 21 the nun

governm

built fell

"A YOUTH LOVED A MAIDEN." THE ORIGIN OF HEINE'S POEM.

s of licy

port ion

title

the

en-ws,

e of

the

:--

few estic

or or ere.

hey

flect

ttle,

pick

by all

ods

tion

ured

on

in

will ance

hose laces

been nfort

itive t the pain

ever

nply

the

and

ing,

ches

heir

tion

aside

ated

class n of who

and

In addition to three articles on Goethe, the August number of the Deutsche Rundschau has several noteworthy papers. There is an interesting, account from the literary remains of Carl Hebler, of a visit to Schopenhauer, and Heinrich Weber contributes a critical article on the origin of Heine's poem, "Ein Jüngling liebt ein Mädchen." This article on Heine's poem has been suggested by one entitled "Coincidences," which Professor Max Müller contributed to the Fortnightly Review of July, 1898. The Professor was struck with the similarity of Heine's poem with a poem in Sanskrit which existed at least twelve hundred years ago. The author of the poem in question is one Bhartrihari, who died about 650 A.D., and the four lines which seem the counterpart of Heine's poem are to be found in the second verse of "The Hundred on Moral Philosophy." As Heine was no Sanskrit scholar, Professor Müller suggests that the poet may have heard of the lines through his friend Schlegel, who was a student of Sanskrit, and who "opened to him many metrical secrets." Mr. A. A. Bevan, in a letter in the following Fortnightly, draws attention to some lines by an Arabian poet who flourished early in the seventh century, and shows that the resemblance between the lines of the Indian and the Arabian poet is much greater than the resemblance of either to Heine.

Curiously enough, Herr Weber had already noticed the extraordinary similarity between Heine's poem and that of Bhartrihari, and in 1883 wrote an essay on the subject. But he thinks it may be worth while to go into the subject again, as Professor Max Müller's article is likely to be widely read. He says that in the early part of the present century the German poets and others became deeply interested in Oriental literature, and one of the first Indian poets to be brought to light was this same Bhartrihari, whose works Heine may have read in translation. To add to the complication, Herr Weber goes on to show that the same "motive" appears in an ancient Greek poem by Moschos, and in an ode by Horace. Thus the same poetical "motive" has been treated in remarkably similar fashion by an ancient Greek poet who flourished in the third century before Christ, a Roman almost contemporary with Christ, an Arabian poet and an Indian poet both of the seventh century, and a German poet of the nineteenth century.

HOME OF THE WORLD'S SCULPTURE-STUFF.

MISS HELEN ZIMMERN contributes to the Leisure Hour for September a bright paper on the quarries of Carrara. The rugged Apuan Alps have, it appears, supplied marble "since all time, historic and prehistoric alike." The very name Carrara comes from a mediæval Latin word for "quarry." During Roman times the marble output was most plentiful when Augustus was transforming Rome from brick to marble. Later, these marble mines were worked by convicts, many of them Christians. Sentence to these mines was thought a severe punishment. Whether from this or from other causes—the Carrara men are noted to this day for their proudly independent character, and from early times a hatred of all forms of government was ingrained in their hearts. . . . Fine, tall, strongbuilt fellows they were, well clad, well shod, each carrying over his shoulder, Highland fashion, a plaid or shawl.

The quarrymen number 5,000. Their wages range from 2½ to 5 francs a day. But until recently, in spite of the numerous accidents, no benevolent institution or insurance system existed. Artists of a socialistic turn will, however, be glad to know that the great marble quarries are under municipal ownership:—

The different quarries are divided according to their owners and the quality of the marble. Tenure is held on similar conditions to those that prevailed in the Cornish tin-bounds. Every man who thinks he has discovered a new vein may stake in his claim. The community of Carrara, to whom the mountains belong, accord it to him free of charge, but he, in return, must bind himself to work this piece of ground for a given length of time, and to employ a given number of men annually. If therefore he has miscalculated, his is the loss,

Of the town of Carrara the writer says :-

A notable thirteenth-century cathedral, built in the Tuscan style, is of course one mass of marble within and without; this boasts some good architectural features. Well conducted technical and communal schools, in handsome edifices, and well attended, attest to the progressive tastes of the Carrarese.

Nothing impressed me more with their inborn love of art than a stroll through the narrow, precipitous, and tortuous slums of the town where live the quarrymen and squarers. As in the better quarters, here too there is hardly a house without some little bit of sculpture over its doorway: a Madonna enthroned or in glory, a saint, some biblical scene. Works of real artistic merit are often seen on the poorest dwellings. . . The place is just a teeming hive of studios and sawmills. Of the latter there were some seventy-five in active work during my visit, employing some three thousand workmen. With few exceptions they are run by water-power.

Of studios where real artistic work is done Carrara can show more than one hundred. Here the marble is worked up into statues, ornaments, bas-reliefs, and what not besides. This is done on the spot, not only because labour is cheap here, but also because the Carrara people are beyond question the finest marble workers in the world.

The London Season, 1899.

"ONLOOKER," in a recent number of Blackwood, thus picturesquely epitomizes his impressions of the last London season:—

The swarming season of this gay great world is again over, its few differential marks being these, apparently. It was shorter than usual, with a further development of the "snappy" tendency observable in later times. It was more crowded, naturally; a little noisier of course, a little fussier of course, and as it will be increasingly till there comes again the sharpest check known in those glittering circles-war. A great incoming flight from the United States, with more friendliness and more flag, enhanced, enlivened, and enriched the swarm. A reviving interest in the racecourse is reported, a somewhat dwindled interest in the River. The charm of the arts, but particularly the dramatic art, was still acknowledged; though the taste for Opera was evidently forced and spurious. For a spectacle of "hollow hearts that wear a mask" there was no better standpoint than the stalls of Covent Garden in 1899 with your face to the audience. Upon the whole, fashionable marriage supplied the greater amount of fluttering excitement this year, perhaps; on the other hand, manicure showed signs of becoming a serious preoccupation. In dining—the ever superlative function of social life in England, and not a bad one either—a certain evolutionary change appears, and is not unlikely to spread. Revolutionary it might also be called, since it is a return to often enough to suggest the beginning of a vogue. And as a vogue it may pass; yet out of the words "multitude," "money," "convenience," substantial reason for the practice may be grubbed. Of dancing there seems to have been more than the recent average, which, according to many anxious mothers, has been painfully low. In a season of kelatant fashionable marriage, such an average naturally tends to rectifi-cation. But dress I—there we come to the most notable thing

A LADY'S VISIT TO MANILLA DURING THE WAR.

Kringsjaa (September 30) contains an interesting article by Astrid Naess, describing her sojourn in Manilla during the war. The steamer on which she had taken passage was bringing a cargo of cement from Glasgow, but no sooner had it got within sight of its destination than it was ordered by the American Admiral to make itself scarce at once, with cement, passengers and all. The captain was beside himself with rage over his fool's errand; but the Americans were unmoved by his signalled entreaties. There was no help for it; back he had to go. Astrid Naess, however, being a Norwegian with no small share of the Norse importunity and determination, was not to be easily vanquished, and, being a lady, had no mind to be summarily disposed of like so much cement. She had come to see Manila, and Manilla she would see. Fortunately, the steamer had with it the mails from Iloilo, and, after an excited conference, it was decided that they should signal that they had British letters to deliver. Back came the reply:

"COME WITHIN HAIL."

This order was at once complied with. An American officer now came on board, but brought with him the strictest orders from the Admiral, requiring the steamer's departure without delay with cargo and passengers; only the mails might pass. Astrid Naess, however, was the possessor of a letter of recommendation to Commodore Dewey, and did not lose hope. Another passenger, an Englishman, whose home was in Manilla, sent a letter to the British Admiral on board the Immortalit!. He awaited the answer in great suspense. Himself married to a Spanish lady and having nephews in the Spanish consul-General at Singapore, partly through the Governor-General at Iloilo, with Spanish telegrams, official despatches and documents from the Government at Madrid to Conde Augustino, Governor-General of Manilla.

"A D-D SOFT-HEARTED LIEUTENANT!"

After half-an-hour's suspense, the Admiral's adjutant boarded the vessel. The Admiral regretted that, in view of the dangers of war and possible bombardment, he could not allow any ladies on shore. All foreign and American ladies had been sent to Hong-Kong. He could make no exception. He could not undertake the responsibility of looking after ladies under the present circumstances. Then a bright idea struck Astrid Naess. As the others withdrew, she confided to the adjutant with due solemnity the fact that, smuggled into the mail-bags the steamer had brought, were important official telegrams and despatches from the Spanish Government at Madrid to the authorities at Manilla. Her strong American sympathies had forbidden her silence regarding these. The adjutant was startled, and her reiterated request that she must herself see the Admiral in order to make other communications was at once complied with, the officer himself expressing his warmest thanks to the lady for the information she had given. Then only were the mails confiscated together with the luggage of the hapless Englishman, and Astrid Naess was forthwith escorted on board the Admiral's ship. Dewey was at first very angry that his officer had acted against orders, but presently his anger gave way to his natural geniality, and what was left of it found vent in the dry, half-humorous grumble : "Ah, you are good for nothing in war, you damned, soft-hearted lieutenant, that cannot even withstand a woman's

CE QUE LA FEMME VEUT, DIEU VEUT!

The victory, then, was the lady's. Not only did she receive permission to land, but the gallant Admiral gave her two of his own officers to escort her on board the British warship, Immortalité, which lay midway between the American station, Cavite, and the entrance to Manilla. All the neutral foreign warships lay here, reaching far out into the bay. There were two French, several Germans, Austrians also, Italians, and Japanese. The steamer which had come to bring cement to Manilla, but had only left a lady, was vanishing beyond the horizon, when they boarded the Immortalité, and the adjutant assured her that now, indeed, at Manilla they would have to keep her.

The article describes interestingly, and with many illustrations, life in Manilla, and the character and customs of the natives. The Filipinos are smaller than other Asiatic races, but of stronger constitution and extremely well-proportioned. There is a bold, brave, hearty boyishness about them which they keep even into old age, as they do their jet-black hair. They are chivalrous to their women, who are almost, with exception, very good-looking. The ladies of Manilla, we learn, have a curious fashion. They drive along the Corso in the most brilliant ball-costumes, decollete, wearing no hat, and glittering with jewels on head, throat, and arms—a fashion followed even by the foreigners, who, however, were now conspicuous by their absence, having fled to Japan and China as soon as war was declared.

THE DRESS OF THE FILIPINOS.

The national dress of the women is very picturesque—always low-necked, showing off the lovely throat and bust, and the lower portion consisting of a richly embroidered, long-trained, silk skirt. Even the poorer Filipino flaunts a richly-embroidered silk scarf, flowing sleeves, and a sweeping train. It is a costume worn by the very washerwomen at their work, and by the marketwomen, and is undeniably as picturesque as it is troublesome. A heavy cigar in the mouth detracts from the charms of the fair sex, but adds a touch of the humorous. The male Filipino is simpler in attire, and is generally dressed in white from head to foot, with a hat made of cocoanut fibre or bamboo. Farther inland, where two-thirds of the natives are as uncivilised as those in the wilds of Africa, he is content to wear only the hat.

A Strange Specimen of Cockney Humour.

A RECENT writer in Blackwood chats pleasantly about London, and ends his study with a chapter on Cockney humour. He complains that the real thing never gets into books, only a conventional travesty of it. On the plea of fearing to offend civilised taste he gives only one specimen, and bids us listen for the rest to the talk of costers, cabmen, flower-girls, and the like. He tells us, however, one of its features, not to say two:—

The most remarkable characteristic of Cockney humour is that it is absolutely unscrupulous. It has no reservations. Everything which comes within its horizon is a subject, an occasion for jest. Now that—like it or dislike it—is a distinction. You do not find it in modern literature. There follows in the distinguished absence of scruple the quality of brutality. It consists merely in ignoring the horrible or tragic side of a funny situation. Everybody knows the old story of the Cockney laughing after a fire. "'Jump, yes silly fool,' I says; 'me and my mite's got a blanket!' An''e did jump, and there warn't no blanket, and 'e broke his — neck. Laugh? I 'aven't laughed so much," etc. A thousand apologies if the old story jars on your refinement. But I maintain that the contrast of expectation and the event is really humorous, and the brutality which can laugh is surely innocent.

alle evil
Z the cone
Vie who Chr

Reg

I

his

He And the his perition school

Jev

mo

wit

con

per to s or i

> Jew equ force beli Pal tob bee

way

Jew Jew Pos con

but

men

but

MR. ZANGWILL ON ZIONISM.

In the Contemporary Review, Mr. I. Zangwill gives his account of Zionism. Its object is, he says, to alleviate what Heine called the Judenschmerz—the twofold evil—external of persecution, internal of isolation.

Zionism is not spontaneous combustion; it is the flame of the hammered explosive...Dr. Herzl's paper-state was conceived in a panic, under an outburst of Jew-hatred in Vienna. But, looking at the whole situation in cold blood, who can say that there is no basis for his despair of Christendom?

How remedy the Judenschmerz? There are four possibilities, and four only: (1) National Regeneration; (2) Religious Regeneration; (3) disappearance; (4) no remedy.

NOT RELIGIOUS IN ORIGIN.

Zionism aims at the first, though it does not exclude the second :--

Dr. Herzl does not pretend to more than political Judaism. He is of the moderns, modern—an engine-driver, not a Mahdi. And with him is associated Max Nordau, whose polemic against the stock religious ideas may be read in any of his works. But it is certain that the success, even the partial success, of his project would promote a religious revival among the Jews, perhaps even in the world at large; and thus National Regeneration would mean Religious Regeneration too, and the Judenschmers would be undermined from both ends.

WHAT THE JEWISH COLONIAL TRUST WANTS.

Dr. Herzl has already secured one-eighth of the two millions sterling which is the capital required by "The Jewish Colonial Trust" for the following purposes:—

First, to obtain political concessions from the Sultan tantamount to a legal recognition of Israel's settling in Palestine, with something akin to local government; secondly, to obtain commercial concessions for railroads, harbours, etc., that may perhaps be sold at a profit; thirdly, to purchase land; fourthly, to subsidise poor immigrants in establishing agricultural colonies or factories.

He would guarantee the Sultan—" apart from any sums in cash—the growth of a prosperous modern community at the heart of the world, an intermediary between East and West, which will push out railroads to India and Bagdad, and regenerate Turkey as well as Israel."

COMMERCIAL OR AGRICULTURAL?

But Mr. Zangwill points out many difficulties in the way. On developing the Jew as an agriculturist, he says:—

It is a waste of force to yoke a winged creature to the plough: and if twenty centuries of artificial selection have made of the Jew an organising and impatient brain, one must await the equally slow processes of reversion to the rural temperament by force of the new life in the open air. . . It is impossible to believe that the Jewish commercial genius should fail even in Palestine. Already several factories are running profitably; a tobacco plantation has been established, mulberry trees have been planted for the rearing of silkworms, the tolerable cognac and claret of the colonies are selling in Europe, Palestine could export not only the cruciform flowers, the mother-of-pearl mementoes, and the olivewood carvings of the holy bazaars, but also olive and sesame oil, soap, conserved fruits, sweets, perfumes, etc. The Turkish rule may be corrupt, but the fewish Trust could farm the taxes.

RIVAL SCHEMES OF COLONISATION.

Mr. Zangwill thinks the resettlement of Palestine possible only on Herzlian and heroic lines. He considers alternative proposals:—

For mere colonisation, minus a political idea, go anywhere but to Palestine. Why not solve the Russo-Jewish question in Russia itself? It is the most practicable theatre, perhaps the only possible one. Siberia is understood to contain enormous tracts of fertile land. The American soil still offers the advantages enumerated by Major Noah. Canada, like the States, has the blessing of Anglo-Saxon administration. Cyprus, where a beginning has been made, is near Palestine, and has the romantic association of having been placed under the British flag by a Jewish Prime Minister. In a privately published German pamphlet—to which I am permitted to refer—by the celebrated Orientalist, Dr. Paul Haupt, of John Hopkins University, strong reasons are alleged for selecting the district between the Euphrates and the Tigris, the richest land of antiquity. "Whoever succeeds in planting a firm foot in the heart of Western Asia, between the Mediterranean, Black, Caspian, and Persian Seas, will win the prize in the partition of the Earth." The Biblical flavour of "the blessed word Mesopotamia" makes the country indeed almost as appealing as Palestine, into which its population, if prosperous, would ultimately overflow.

Mr. Zangwill, in conclusion, thinks that the chances are even if both Dr. Herzl's and Dr. Haupt's schemes should fail, "the Jew in semi-barbarous countries will, with the gradual advance of civilisation, be relieved of his unjust burdens, and that when emancipated politically, he will either disappear or undergo a religious regeneration."

Superstitions about "the City."

Blackwood recently contained a breezy chat about London by an anonymous contributor, who finds its chief attraction in the fact that London is, to him, "the great meeting-place of the humours of the uncivilised North." Of the City he asserts with emphasis the utter stupidity:—

Stupidity-yes: I maintain that the City is of all things stupid. Its want of commonly intelligent observation is illustrated by the fact that no City man ever contradicts the popular fallacies concerning it. There is the idea that in the City men walk swiftly about, with set, anxious faces. They do no such thing. There are more aimless, indifferent loafers in the streets of the City than in any other part of London, the Strand itself not excepted. If a man of dramatic sense were to walk swiftly, with a set face, he would be obstructed by a larger mass of semistationary and purposeless humanity than anywhere else. The City is not the busy place it is supposed to be. The busier part of the community plays dominoes in restaurants, the less busy converses with hats back-tilted and hands in pockets: the idle part looks wearily at goods it obviously does not intend to buy in shop-windows. Inside the offices strangers are made to wait half-an-hour and (if they are poor) given a curt five minutes, but this is merely a pretence to impress them: friends are welcome as a change from the newspaper, and held in lengthy conversa-tions. But City men go on believing that everybody else there is busy to distraction. Another fallacy about the City is that is busy to distraction. Another fallacy about the City is that an almost preternatural intelligence is required to thrive there. This also is vanity. City men are not intelligent, and even if you cannot expect people to admit this of themselves, they would admit it, if they were not stupid, of one another.

The Trade Unionist.

It is with regret we chronicle the death of the Trade Unionist. The October issue was its thirteenth and last. The editor made his farewell in these dignified words:—

We started out to create a demand for a high-class Trade Union magazine, which we knew full well was a most difficult task, and we have failed. The standard raised was a lofty one, and we determined to maintain it to the end at all costs. This, we venture to think, we can successfully claim to have done. . . . Though profit never entered into our plan, something like a balance of expenditure and income is necessary to justify our existence. This there has not been, and so we pass away.

The magazine was, in fact, "too good to live"; but its promoters have reason to look back on their venture with an honourable pride.

d she gave d the tween

nilla. ar out

mans, eamer l only

they

d her

her.

many

and

than

and orave,

into nival-

, very ive a most

and shion

now

and

lue-

and em-

oorer

wing

rn by rket-

uble-

the 1

rous.

erally

de of two-

antly

apter

thing

of it.

gives

o the

He

ur is tions.

t, an

There

ty of ole or story

ol,' I

, and

e old ntrast

tality

A GERMAN ESTIMATE OF AMERICANS.

An excellent article on the Germans and the Americans is contributed by Hugo Münsterberg to the Atlantic Monthly for September. It is excellent both in tone and in aim. It is one of those irenicons which do much to redeem the customary fire-eating proclivities of the periodical press. The writer sees plainly enough that there is a mutual antipathy between the two peoples, and he sets himself to remove the misunderstandings on which the antipathy is based. He first describes the miserable travesties or caricatures which do duty in Germany for Americans and in America for Germans. He finds a partial explanation in the non-representative character of Germans in America and of Americans in Germany. The former, he says, lose their national idealism in a shrewd, material practicalism.

AMERICANS "IDEALISTS THROUGH AND THROUGH."

He selects certain prejudices for remark:-

Take, for instance, the traditional German opinion that the Americans have no idealism, but are selfish realists. The belief that Americans have no spark of idealism in their souls has done more harm to the relations of Continental nations with the United States than any protective tariff or any commercial competition; it has surrounded every act of America with a fringe of selfishness and meanness by which even the most harmless action becomes repugnant to sound feelings, and by which the most guileless man is made a prey to the newspapers of Europe . . . I think this attitude is utterly groundless. More than that, I think the true American is an idealist through and through. I perceive, to be sure, that his idealism is often loose and lax and Ineffective, but it remains idealism, nevertheless, and he deceives himself when he poses as a realist, like his English cousin The American is not greedy for money; if he were he would not give away his wealth with such a liberal hand... The American runs after money primarily for the pleasure of the

It is a shrewd distinction the writer makes when he says, "The German paper is the tutor of the public, the American paper is its servant."

PHILOSOPHIC APOLOGY FOR MONARCHY.

Having essayed the task of showing that it is one-sided and unfair for the Germans to maintain that the Americans have no idealism, the writer goes on to show that it is equally so for Americans to maintain that Germans have no sense of freedom. He even tries to justify the monarchy as a stage of government higher than a republic. He argues that "educated Germans at home feel that it is with the monarchy as with the Church." Low motives for adhering to the Church disappear before an enlightened scepticism, but a higher reason justifies adhesion to the Church :-

The Church can thus stand for the lowest and for the highest, and those who are in the middle, and have not yet reached the last stage, may well think that the highest is below their level. Just this manifoldness of stages, we maintain, characterises the forms of States. To be sure, the mob is monarchical from low motives, and those who hold, with the logic of the eighteenth century, that the business of the State must be in the hands of man whom the majority has selected, certainly represent a higher moral stratum than those who support the throne from selfishness and laziness and cowardice. But again a higher standpoint is possible.

"HISTORICAL THINKING."

Seen from an historical point of view, the State becomes a system of teleological relations, in which, not causes and effects, but duties and ideals are at work, and where, not the products of intellectual calculation, but the symbols of historical emotions are the centres acknowledged. The belief in monarchy means the belief in symbols which characterises historical thinking as over against naturalistic thinking. And a monarch as the historical symbol of the emotional ideals of a nation, wholly outside of the field of political struggles and elections, needs that symbolic protection against reproach which appears, seen from a purely materialistic point of view, as a ridiculous punishment of lese-majesté.

The writer looks forward to America getting beyond the naturalistic theory of government which survives from the eighteenth century. "A heroic revival is at hand," as witness the response to imperialism.

THE KAISER A MODEL MONARCH.

From this abstract region the writer passes to deal with the concrete realities of the governments compared, and gives the palm to Kaiser over President :-

The one living American whose personality most closely resembles that of the Emperor William is the brilliant young Governor of New York, whom many Americans hail as the future President. The Germans feel in the same way: if Germany were to become a republic, the people would shudder at the thought of having one of the parliamentary leaders of to-day or an average general become President, but they would elect the present Emperor with enthusiasm as the first President; he is the most interesting, energetic, talented, industrious, and conscientious personality of our public life. Those, however, who maintain that the Emperor is an autocrat do not understand how closely the German monarchy, not only through the constitutional and parliamentary limitations imposed upon it, but still more in its inner forces, is identical with the national will. I do not care to discuss here whether the Spanish war was necessary, whether the annexation of the Philippines was desirable, or whether Alger was a good minister; I know only that the German Emperor would not have been able to retain a minister for a year against unanimous public opinion, or to make war and to create colonies when but a short time before the public soul had revolted against the idea of war and aggressive annexation. A President with such vast powers, parties in the grasp of bosses, city administrations under the whip of spoilsmen, the economic world under the tyranny of trusts, and all together under the autocracy of the yellow-press editors - No, I love and admire America, but Germany really seems to me freer.

All this is wholesome reading for our American cousins and indirectly for ourselves. The writer goes on to trace the general mediocrity of American talent and lack of pre-eminent genius to the absence of the requisite institutions: "There is no social premium provided by the public institutions on ideal greatness." He concludes by confessing that in Germany the institution overshadows the individual, in America the individual oversets the institution. Germany needs to become more democratic, but America needs to become more aristocratic.

A Bibliography of Geography.

THE eighth volume of the "Annual Bibliography of Geography," issued in connection with the Annales de Géographie, and edited by L. Raveneau, has just been published. The present volume covers the year 1898, while previous bibliographies cover the years 1891-7. Evidently the geographers are aware of the value of indexing, for their subject is better cared for in this sense than almost any other.

THE Windsor for December fairly bristles with celebrities. The contributors include Flora Annie Steel, Sarah Grand, Marie Corelli, Harry Furniss, Bret Harte, and Guy Boothby. Cleveland Moffett tells anew the wonderful story of M. Tissot's life. Charles E. Norton Cleveland Moffett tells anew the gives a biographical sketch, rather curt and frigid, of Rudyard Kipling. Mr. Frank Orwell recalls the dreadful disaster in Samoa of "six battleships wrecked in one night."

XUM

a d n

th

ha

ar th

th

po

as thi

tio

ide

Ou

thi

ela

189 froi

12 yea of t

vea

incr

tion

I

is p

Zea

"Co

with effec

NEW ZEALAND EXPERIMENTS.

OF all our colonial laboratories perhaps New Zealand is the one whose political and social experiments have attracted the most attention. Many of the political conflicts of the home country will doubtless be waged for some years to come around the alleged success or failure of New Zealand expedients.

A Possible Explanation.

In the Contemporary for October Sir Robert Stout discusses the possible origin of the socialistic trend of colonial legislation. He says-

ds

en

h-

nd

es

at

d,

ly

ng

he

if

er

ld

nd

nd he

it, al

ar

as

ly

a

ke

he

ve

he

n,

er

ve

ns

ce

of

te

es

r-

r-

re

0-

of de en

8,

7. of iis

th

el,

e,

he

on

of ul

ne

It has to be remembered that in starting a new colony there is no co-operation amongst the immigrants. The Government is their co-operative association, and it is some time before private associations or companies can be formed. Individual effort can do little without co-operation, and the early immigrants were not capitalists. The Government must perforce do many things that in older countries are left to private enterprise. And as the government of the colony is in the hands of the people of the colony there necessarily is developed this feeling of the power, the wisdom, and the benevolence of the association called Government. And bit by bit its power has extended until the Government has come to occupy a position and importance entirely disproportionate to the position occupied by Governments in the opinion of people in other countries.

RELIGIOUS EQUALITY: A SUCCESS.

The experiment of separating Church and State is one which the writer evidently considers a proved success.

No one says that our University system has weakened the power of the Churches over their own church members, or that we are less touched with religious emotion than our kin across the seas. We have erected magnificent church buildings, we have quite an army of ecclesiastics, and our Church organisations are active, strong, and zealous. And the State has gained by the separation of Church from State, for we have relegated theological discussions to the Churches. They are outside of politics. May it not be necessary to strengthen the affection of the people for the State, so that the perennial struggle in older lands between Churches and the State may cease? The colonists, as has been said, are being trained to look to the State for most things which they require. This may be a phase of our evolution. The time was when the Church loomed largest in the ideas and imaginations of the people. With us the State holds that position. Humanity, it has been said, cannot get on without institutions. Is the State to take the place of the Church? If it is to do so, it must become altruistic and dispense favours.

LABOUR LAWS, STILL DOUBTFUL.

On the result of New Zealand labour laws the writer thinks judgment cannot be passed till many years have elapsed. He says :-

Some Jeremiahs have pointed out to us that, whilst from 1886 to 1891 the number of our factories increased by 308, from 1891 to 1896 the increase was only 205. To appreciate these figures it has to be remembered, first, that our population increased from 1886 to 1891 by 8°33 per cent., and from 1891 to 1896 by 12°24 per cent. The period from 1886 to 1891 was called "the years of depression." The labour laws began to be made more drastic in 1891. The increase in employment and in the value of the productions of our factories was less in the prosperous years than in the years of depression . . . Our trade has increased, though it has not made great strides, but the increases in the exports have come from pastoral and agricultural operations, and these are little affected by labour laws.

WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE, DISAPPOINTING

In the National Review a much less guarded conclusion is presented by the Hon. J. MacGregor, member of the New Zealand Upper House. He devotes his attention to "Compulsory Arbitration at Work." He begins, however, with the statement that the hopes cherished of the elevating effect of the feminine franchise have not been fulfilled:—

The most striking characteristic of our Parliament is its complete subservience to the will of a masterful leader; in point of ability, education, and experience it has sadly declined, whilst the general tone of political life is much lower that it ever was before. Never before in the history of the Colony could politica have been so correctly described as organised selfishness and corruption.

COMPULSORY ARBITRATION-A WARNING.

Compulsory conciliation and arbitration have been, he argues, similarly disappointing. No responsible man, he says, could on the strength of New Zealand experience commend the adoption of a similar system elsewhere. Mr. Reeves hoped that most disputes would be settled by the Boards of Conciliation, and that the Arbitration Court would be only rarely called in. The actual result is that of thirty-one disputes referred to Conciliation Boards, twenty-three have been pushed further into the Arbitration Court. The system has already become almost entirely one of compulsory arbitration, with a useless appendage of Conciliation Boards. The writer alleges the existence of a growing feeling that even an occasional strike would be preferable to everlasting disputes, and there is undoubtedly less good feeling now between employer and employed than existed before the Act." He concludes with the remark that the New Zealand system is to other countries a beacon of warning of danger, and not a pattern to be imitated.

R. L. STEVENSON WITH FATHER DAMIEN.

THE letters of the late novelist which appear in the October Scribner describe his visit to the leper settlement at Molokai in 1889. He went in one boat with certain of the Sisters. He was nearly overcome by the sight of the lepers that went in another boat. He writes:—

My horror of the horrible is about my weakest point; but the moral loveliness at my elbow blotted all else out; and when I found that one of them was crying, poor soul, quietly under her veil, I cried a little myself; then I felt as right as a trivet, only a little crushed to be there so uselessly. I thought it was a sin and a shame she should feel unhappy; I turned round to her, and said something like this: "Ladies, God Himself is here to give you welcome. I'm sure it is good for me to be beside you; I hope it will be blessed to me; I thank you for myself and the good you do me." It seemed to cheer her up.

After returning, he writes :-

I can only say that the sight of so much courage, cheerfulness and devotion, strung me too high to mind the infinite pity and horror of the sights. . . . I have seen sights that cannot be told, and heard stories that cannot be repeated: yet I never admired my poor race so much, nor (strange as it may seem) loved life more than in the settlement. A horror of moral beauty broods over the place.

Of the Father himself he says :-

Of old Damien, whose weaknesses and worse perhaps I heard fully, I think only the more. It was a European peasant a dirty, bigotted, untruthful, unwise, tricky, but superb with generosity, residual candour and fundamental good-humour a convince him he had done wrong (it might take hours of insult) and he would undo what he had done and like his corrector better. A man, with all the grime and paltriness of mankind, but a saint and hero all the more for that.

AMONG the many maps of Africa which are appearing may be mentioned one in the December Sunday at Home, which shows a phase of the African question often lost sight of. It is a missionary map of the continent. The districts served by a society are marked with its initials. No fewer than forty-six societies are at work. Yet perhaps the most impressive thing about the map is the vast space unbroken by missionary initial of any kind.

TWO POEMS BY BROWNING.

"THE TWO POETS OF CROISIC."

FROM Boston we have in Poet Lore an interesting magazine devoted to the study of literature. It was started in 1889 as a monthly, with Browning, Shakespeare, and Comparative Literature as special subjects. About two years ago the monthly became "a quarterly magazine of letters," but in its pages considerable attention is still paid to the study of Browning and Shakespeare. In the September number Mr. Herbert Ernest Cushman has a paper on Browning's "Two Poets of Croisic" and the French enthusiasms of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries as satirised in the poem. It is an interesting psychological study of the French people and Browning's satire. Mr. Cushman thus characterises the subject of the poem:—

During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries when the two poets of Croisic lived, that ancient régime of France was peculiarly adapted to bring into lurid light the enthusiasms of which humanity is capable. The Court of Louis XIII. was the beginning, the Court of Louis XIV. the maturity, and the Court of Louis XV. the ending of the dignified, good-mannered, and most courtly Court of European monarchy. The two poets of Croific lived in a society in which order, suitability, and politeness were the ruling ideas, impersonated by the adults and taught to the children. Never has politeness turned casuistry into its service to such a degree and elaborated its manners for such studied effects. There is no place nor time where we should less expect enthusiasms than the time and society that became enthusiastic over René Gentilhomme and Paul Desforges Maillard. Consequently the enthusiasms stand out the more

It was the eighteenth century—when French Society was most supremely ordered, and the individuals thereof apparently in perfect self-control—that there appeared that age of enthusiasm called the sentimental period, which later, among the common people, had its counterpart in the French Revolution. It was this polite crowd that affected now to admire the country, now to return to nature; now it was a delight in simplicity. The queen had a village for herself at the Trianon, where, as some one says, "dressed in a frock of white cambric muslin, and a gauze neck handkerchief, and with a white straw hat," she fished in the lake and saw her cows milked. What, suppose you, did the individual Frenchman or Frenchwoman care about muslin, cows, fish, and simplicity? Then there arose enthusiasms for village people, for the sentiment of tenderness, for the feeling of natural affection. Then polite society turned to religions, to considering the soul. It practised trying to be human. These were some of the many enthusiasms of that society of which "The Two Poets" is a criticism. It was the most polite society in the world, but as a society it was capable of enthusiasm that in extent and intensity have scarcely been equalled.

The French enthusiasm, as the subject under criticism of Browning in this poem, is a social enthusiasm. A social body is an organic being with less than human traits, caprice, sense of responsibility, etc. The satire involved here is directed at civilisation, in which such enthusiasms could be very frequent, for such a civilisation is a reversion to savagery. Yet such hypnotic enthusiasms are perfectly natural to the French mind because of its tendency to isolate the present moment from its associations.

"A TOCCATA OF GALUPPI'S."

Readers of Browning will remember among the Dramatic Lyrics "A Toccata of Galuppi's." Baldassare Galuppi was an Italian composer (1706-1785), and those interested in early Italian opera will find a very able bibliographical study (in French) of Galuppi's many dramatic works in No. 3 of the Rivista Musicale Italiana.

M. Alfred Wotquenne, librarian of the Brussels Conservatoire, who contributes the article, gives a chronological list of the works, and as their number is very large (running to about 100) an alphabetical arrangement of them is added for convenience of reference. An interesting chapter relates to Galuppi and his operas in London, but it is partly to Browning, perhaps, that the maestro owes his place among the immortals in music.

HOW SHAKESPEARE MADE HIS MONEY.

AN interesting essay on Mr. Sidney Lee's Life of Shakespeare in a recent number of the Church Quarterly touches on an aspect of the dramatist's career which is not often made prominent. We are accustomed to think of poets and poverty as closely associated ideas, but it seems that the greatest poet of them all made a fortune by his profession. But not, be it observed, chiefly by his poetry. What the reviewer says is this:—

The question is sometimes asked, "How was Shakespeare able to afford such large outlays as the Stratford records imply?"

The adherents of the Baconian theory have even found here a mystery insoluble except on the hypothesis that he was receiving large sums of money from a wealthy patron in return for secret services, such as lending his name to cloak that patron's dramatic activities. Therefore Mr. Lee does a useful piece of work when he draws up a statement of Shakespeare's probable income in 1599, just before he became part-owner of the Globe Theatre (pp. 196-204). As playwright, at the current rates of remuneration (from £6 to £11 for a new play, about £4 for revising an old play, and certain extras in the way of benefits), he was probably earning about £20 a year. As actor his receipts would be much larger, probably about £110 a year, making £130 in all; and since the purchasing power of money in Elizabeth's reign was about eight times what it is now, such an income would be equivalent to some £1,000 at the present day. In addition, it must be remembered that in the Earl of Southampton he had a munificent patron and friend, who on one occasion, according to tradition, gave him a large sum of money in order to complete a purchase. After 1599, when the Globe Theatre was built, his income must have been considerably larger, since he held in it a part-share, which may have brought him in anything from £200 to £400, besides his salary as an actor. He also held a small share in the Blackfriars Theatre, while the rates of remuneration of dramatists rose considerably under James I. Altogether, Mr. Lee estimates that during the latter part of his life he was earning above £600 a year in money of the period, equivalent to about $5,000 now. With such an income he was well able to make the investments in landed property in Stratford to which the town records bear witness. At his death he left, as his will shows, £350 in money, with a considerable amount of real estate, purchased at short intervals in the years 1599 to 1611—the years, be it noted, in which he was also producing the finest works of his dramatic genius.

William Shakespeare in receipt of a comfortable income, equal in our money to £5,000 a year, will not, we fear, appeal to the people's imagination like the thought of the young poacher of popular tradition; still less when it is remembered that he made his wealth principally as a shareholder in theatres, in a minor degree as an actor, least of all as a writer. Economists will perhaps note with amusement the respective "rewards" given to Ability and to Capital. As capitalist Shakespeare makes from ten to twenty times as much as he draws from his services as supreme world-poet!

REV. DR. FITCHETT, interviewed in the Young Man, advises all clever young men of good character to make their way to Australia. Australia offers them, he says, "a perfect climate, easier social conditions than England has, and open doors to every vocation in life." "Education is as all-embracing and about as costless as the atmosphere."

IN "Scaness, feels small Cattelearn bring between from selve exceptolera desire and t

mean

stren

S

Are again the st youth young union now. youth not w confus meeti and th to fine for ins made " Kar to be would into a consci the tl forgot necess each o thing friend

Twe called Ottese compr efforts Ibsen of me Scand from 1 as an as its vianisi Germa the di Germa that S Herr (his fol will an advant

SCANDINAVIANISM IN DENMARK.

By HERR JOHAN OTTESEN.

nsergical large

nt of sting

, but

Life

urch

areer

med

deas,

de a niefly

peare

ply?"

ere a iving

secret

matic

when

me in eatre

nera-

g an

pro-

all;

reign

vould .

ition,

had rding

plete built,

ld in

from eld a

s of

es I.

of his

eriod.

e was leath

rable

years

also table

not, the still ealth

egree

rds "

rake-

s he

Man,

make

has,

on is iere.

will -

In Tilskueren for June, Herr Johan Ottesen writes on "Scandinavianism," which feeling of neighbourly friendliness, he tells us, is very strong in Denmark. Denmark feels herself so weak and so exposed to danger that the smallest sign of sympathy from the other side the Cattegat is hailed with delight; and should she one day learn that Herrar Raon and Douglas had succeeded in bringing about the conclusion of a Neutral Alliance between the three countries without agitation or challenge from any side, the Dannebrog flags would "of themselves" fly aloft on every flagstaff in Denmark, with the exception perhaps of those of Store Strandstraedes and Ostergade, where the word "neutrality" cannot be tolerated. So what is wanted in Denmark is not the desire for such an alliance but a belief in its possibility, and the aim of Herr Ottesen's paper is to discover some means whereby such a belief might be fostered and strengthened and fructified.

THE QUESTION OF STUDENT AGITATION.

Are they to commence their great student-agitations again? These, in their day, were not without value, for the students—at any rate in the forties—meant really the youth of the nations. The students were then the only young ones who possessed the feeling of liberty and unionism and the power of organisation. It is otherwise now. One has thought of great meetings of the youth of all classes. But Herr Ottesen's fancy does not welcome suggestion. It would lead only to formless confusion. Where would be the unity of such a mass meeting? Were they to have Socialists among themand this would have to be-it would be difficult, indeed, to find any links of sympathy, any points of union between, for instance, the elegant students of Lund (Sweden), who made a hash of the labour strike, and the young Danish "Karl Marx" Socialists. If Vilhelm Beck's people were to be with them—and, of course, they would be—here would be a new split. The great meeting would dissolve into a number of smaller ones, and unity-the Northern consciousness of the oneness that should exist between the three sister countries-would die a speedy death, forgotten in small dissensions. These meetings were necessary once to introduce, so to speak, the countries to each other. Now the introduction is effected, and something else is necessary to bring about a warmer feeling, a friendly and thorough understanding.

THE YOUNG NORSE PARTY.

Twenty-four years ago the last great student-meeting called forth from Henrik Ibsen a famous poem. Herr Ottesen commends to each young Norseman the right comprehension of this work as a commencement to his efforts for the Scandinavianism of his country. In it Ibsen stamps the youth of 1875 as "the spectres of men and times that have died," and the student-Scandinavianism as "a phantom of history formed from the incense of phrases." This he does not say as an enemy to the unity of the North, but rather as its avowed champion. He compares Scandinavianism with the young men's movements in Italy and Germany, which carried out their project, and he says, the difference is only this—young Italy and young Germany, they "willed their dream." The moral is that Scandinavians have not willed in earnest. But Herr Ottesen thinks Ibsen a little hard on Ploug and his followers. The Scandinavians lack, not the strong will and energy of Italy and Germany, but many of the advantages which lay ready to hand in both these countries. So that the Scandinavians of that day could not in their wildest dreams have hoped for so stronglyrooted a unionism as Cavour and Bismarck succeeded in planting in their countries. True, the people of Upland, Tröndelagen, and Jutland are more nearly akin than those of East Prussia and Bavaria, Piedmont and Sicily, Normandy and Provence; but Germany—to keep to Germany as an instance—had its common literary language, a wide circle of university-cultured and literary people who made use of this pen-language, and, by and by, made it their speech. Briefly, Germany had a great Upper Class, fairly cultured, fairly intelligent and interested in all German subjects. It was the great international tie between Germany's many small nations. Nor is this the only advantage which Germany has had over the three northern countries.

It is necessary then, Herr Ottesen thinks, that Denmark should endeavour to get some of these advantages for herself. The first foreign language she teaches her children in the schools at present is German; and the German language is a good and useful one to know. But to know German is apt to foster a perverted notion that the Germanic world consists of Germany and a small hanger-on called Denmark. Might one not, while opening for the children an outlook to the south, open one also to the north?

Municipal Prizes for Beautiful House-fronts.

How to develop beautiful streets is a problem touched on in a cheering paper on the æsthetic improvement of city life, which Mr. C. M. Robinson contributes to the Atlantic Monthly for June. He tells of a number of societies for promoting civic beauty. The New York Municipal Art Society has the motto: "To make us love our city, we must make our city lovely." He reports that "the park acreage of Greater New York, authorised by public liberality, exceeds that of Greater London or of Paris, and is four times that of Berlin." There is, it appears, a growing demand in the Empire City for the submission of the plans for public works of all kinds to the Art Commissions. The writer points out that it really pays to have streets that look well. He adds :-

An extraordinary development of the idea, as it will seem to most Americans, is to be found in Bruss. Is, and more recently in Paris. These cities are offering prizes for the most beautiful house-fronts. The American Architect says that in Paris the municipal council lately opened a new street, and announced that a jury would be appointed to consider the houses erected on it. Owners of the four houses judged most beautiful were to be entitled to a remission of one half the frontage tax, while the architects who designed the structures were to receive premiums of one thousand francs each. Our increasing leisure class, which is not hampered by landed estates, is sure to gather where there is most that is fair.

THE Christmas number of the Temple Magazine contains excellent reading. What will probably most attract the general reader is Sir Henry Irving's "Christmas Memories." He recounts many humorous incidents-of accidents that ruined the Christmas dinner, yet heightened the fun around the table, and so forth, but closes with a moving story of how one poor actor was helped by another at Christmastime to warm underwear-that impecunious player being apparently none other than Sir Henry in the days before his fame began. Sir Wyke Bayliss discusses "What Christ Was Like," and offers samples of early Christian art. Mr. J. K. Starley tells how we got our modern bicycle, and Louis Wain is interviewed about his famous artistic sympathies with cats.

STORIES FROM THE MAGAZINES.

FOR good stories the magazine reader instinctively turns to Cornhill, and he is rarely disappointed.

UNCONSCIOUS JOURNALISM.

This month the caption, "the leading article," covers many incidents, new and old, about leader-writers, their emergencies and their triumphs. Here is a tale to show that not only empires can be made "in a fit of absence of mind":

A leader-writer on an important daily newspaper in the provinces was directed by his editor one afternoon to write on a certain subject, the understanding being that his article should be forthcoming not later than midnight. Before sitting down to his work he came across convivial companions, and the party "twined vine-leaves in their hair." What happened afterwards our journalist could not recall when he awoke in the morning with a painful head and a feeling of remorse. On opening the paper his jaw dropped. He found the subject he had undertaken to write upon the evening before treated in a very masterly fashion. On arriving at the office in order to apologise for his omission, he inquired of a sub-editor who wrote the article. "Why, you wrote it yourself," was the reply. "Did I? Oh, '"Why, you wrote it yourself," was the reply. "Did I? Oh, yes, to be sure; of course I did," rejoined the journalist in a dazed way. He subsequently learned that he had gone back to the office after parting with his boon companions, sat in his usual chair, and turned out his "copy" with his usual facility.

MR. MORLEY'S INTERRUPTED "LEADER."

How a communication from a great political leader interrupted but did not dislocate the composition of another kind of "leader" is told in the following paragraph :-

Mr. John Morley, who was a journalist before he became a Cabinet Minister, delighted the journalists at a Press Club dinner in London a few years ago by making the following auto-biographical confession: "It was whilst I was writing a leading article for a certain periodical that I received a letter from an illustrious statesman, who was then forming a government, offering me a post in his Cabinet. Gentlemen," continued Mr. Morley, "so strong in me was the journalistic instinct that, after accepting the illustrious statesman's offer, I went back and finished that leading article? And I can assure you," he added, when the applause which greeted this statement had died away, "that neither the grammar nor the style of the latter half of the article fell short of my usual standard."

"FORT FUNK."

Rarely has the popular wit hit on a more concise or caustic paradox of a place-name than in a case mentioned by Sir John Robinson in the South African reminiscences which he contributes to the December Cornhill. He is speaking of the old days in Natal, when armed natives were about and panics of a native rising were frequent. He first tells of an alarm raised of two "impis" marching straight on Maritzburg, which turned out to be two droves of harmless cattle. Then he goes on :-

A similar false alarm visited a country settlement on the high road from Durban. The white inhabitants all mustered together and spent the night in throwing up an enclosure—or laager—of sods and branches, within which they meant to hold their own, with their families, against the expected foe. The attack never came, but "Fort Funk," as it was derisively christened, remained, a memorial of troubled times, for many a day. The hastily reared "bastion" is now a bushy mound, crowned by a summer-house!

"Fort Funk" might well pass into a proverb. A whole world of satire and of history is summed up in that pair of contradictory alliteratives.

EXAMINATION HUMOURS.

"The Mirth of School Inspection" is the title Mr. G. Stanley Ellis gives to his cluster of examination stories in Good Words for December. Here are a few of the answers he has culled :-

"A professor" is "a gentleman that generally plays at balls." How true it is that an M.P. is "a gentleman who tries to make laws"! "A negro is a man what eats missionaries." A school board is-and this remark seems to merit "How true!" on the margin as much as any phrase in a lady's novel from the circulating library—"a place where people talk about education to make you vote for them."

An inspector in orders was trying to make a class form words. "Now," he said, "I am a man. What kind of a man am I?" He wanted to extract the compound noun "clergyman."

" A short man, sir."

"Yes, yes," said he, a little huffed. No one likes to be called short man. especially when he is short. "That is, I am not a a short man, especially when he is short. "That is, I am not a particularly tall man. But that is not quite the kind of word I want. Can any one else try?"

"Little man, sir."

"Well, that's about equal to short, isn't it? Try again."

" Ugly little man, sir.

Another inspector once said, "Now you've told me all about the Ancient Britons. What do you know about Modern Britons? Who knows anything about the Duke of Wellington?"
An intelligent little boy put up his hand.
"What do you know about him?"

"Please, sir, father gets his beer there."

COWING THE KAFFIRS.

In his article in the Fortnightly, "A Reminiscence of the Boer War in 1848," which I have noticed elsewhere, Mr. G. H. Berkeley gives the following anecdote of the famous Sir Harry Smith, whose wife gave her name to Ladysmith, now besieged by the Boers :-

It was during a negotiation with the Kaffirs in the east of the colony. Some native chiefs had shown a tendency to rebel. Sir Harry summoned them to a conference with him, at which he determined to urge them into submission. He arranged a speech about the greatness of England. At a proper place he was to touch the spring of a galvanic battery which was connected with some kegs of gunpowder placed under a waggon on a neighbouring hill, and which, it was hoped, would be blown to pieces. Sir Harry commenced his speech. The crisis to pieces. Sir Harry commenced his speech. The crisis arrived. The connection was made; but, unfortunately, the The crisis waggon was too well built to explode, and was only tilted on end. But notwithstanding the failure of the carefully rehearsed drama, the interview did not come to an end without a real theatrical performance. After the set speech was ended, one of the chiefs ventured to express a doubt of the intentions of the British. This was too much for Sir Harry. Carried away by a fit of rage, he drew his sword, and, presenting it at the naked breast of the savage, he swore he would run him through if he did not there and then take an oath of obedience to the Government. The assembled chiefs were cowed by the unwonted out-break. One after another they subscribed the required submission, and Sir Harry's wrath averted a Kaffir war.

THE Christmas number of the Lady's Realm has much in it that is attractive. It owes a great deal to the camera, and shows how important the debt can be. Mr. Robert Johnson's paper on Baron von Meyer and his work contains some fine specimens of the photographer's art who makes female beauty his exclusive speciality. As a foil to these portraits of royal and aristocratic women, Florence Burnley offers photographs of "fashion and beauty in far-off lands," notably of Bheel and Tamil and Chinese women. The Bheel women show a straight and well-built figure. amateur photographers, notably the Duchess of Bedford, the Countess of Minto, Mrs. Lawley, and Miss Chaplin, are sketched, with pleasing products of their art, by Evelyn Wills. Mrs. Grahame's adventures with tigers claim separate notice. In the gallery of "Our Colonial Governors at Home" appears a sketch of Viscount Gormanston, the Governor of Tasmania, and his wife.

7 tair of ! the THE T sust Nai that Mr. exac Berl host

diffi

says nose assis of th Berl gove of E utilis over ceale Inste supp natu ment whole new

extra Vic gandis exertic instead fleet, sudder opines sea-po fresh, Englis and m want o home

The tinent Deuts ask w Minist he we betwee

The Zeitun moder in keep French highest " whet cannot coward the bes bours.

THE REVIEWS REVIEWED.

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

THE National Review of this month is very entertaining reading. It reached me the day after the delivery of Mr. Chamberlain's wicked and ridiculous speech on the alliance with Germany and the United States.

THE GERMAN MENACE TO ENGLISH NAVAL SUPREMACY. This fact added a certain piquancy to reading the sustained and angry denunciation by the editor of the National Review of the folly of those persons who imagine that we could depend upon German support. Wherever Mr. Maxse turns his gaze he sees evidence pointing in an exactly opposite direction. Whether it is in Samoa or in Berlin, wherever he turns he sees evidence of German hostility and German determination to exploit our difficulties for the benefit of the Fatherland. As he says, it looks as if Great Britain is paying through the nose for an article which will not be delivered—the assistance of Germany. The calm, unprejudiced basis of the Bismarckian epoch is declared by the ministerial Berliner Post as the desideratum of the present German government. An entente with Russia was the diapason of Bismarck's policy. He says that the Emperor is utilising the great wave of Anglophobia, now passing over Germany, to create a fleet with the hardly con-cealed object of threatening our naval superiority. Instead of indulging in senseless dithyrambics over the support which we can count upon receiving from our natural allies the Germans, he would warn the Government that before proposing to increase our army our whole naval policy should be renewed in the light of the new German programme. He quotes the following extract in support of this view :-

Vice-Admiral Werner, one of the most active naval propagandists in Germany—who has been publicly thanked for his exertions by the Emperor—admits that thirty-one battleships instead of the proposed forty would be sufficient, as the English fleet, being divided, is in an unfavourable position to meet a sudden German attack. "We could," the gallant Admiral opines, "select our own time and attack them with our whole sea-power, with everything ready for action, with our crews fresh, our bunkers filled, and our machinery perfect. The English, on the other hand, might have to face bad weather, and might, therefore, sustain damage to their machinery, while want of coal would soon compel them to send part of their ships home to take in fresh supplies."

The editor asks, who is the prize mad dog of the Continental Press? He suggests that the editor of the Deutsche Zeitung deserves the prize. But if he were to ask who was the prize mad dog of English Cabinet Ministers there is little doubt as to the person to whom he would award the prize, judging by the contrast between his editorial and Mr. Chamberlain's speeches.

The National Review is wroth with the Deutsche Zeitung, but on reconsideration it might possibly moderate the rancour of its own tongue. For it is hardly in keeping with the dignity of a monthly review to describe French newspapers as street-walkers on sale to the highest bidder, as "vile rags," and to say of the French "whether they are going mad or are merely rotten we cannot say," and then to refer to the "caddish and cowardly displays in French journals." This is hardly the best way of cultivating good relations with our neighbours. But the National does not confine its vituperative epithets to the French or the Germans. Referring to Spain, which is described as the "sick man of Western Europe," we are treated to a philippic against "the incompetence, corruption, and rottenness of the Madrid Government." These epithets may be deserved, but it is difficult to see what accrues to the world from controversies carried on in this intemperate fashion.

A PLEA FOR A JAPANESE ALLIANCE.

A writer who signs himself "Ignotus," and who deserves to remain unknown, writes an article entitled, "The Coming Storm in the Far East." His idea is that we must form an alliance with Japan which would take the shape of an understanding on the following lines:—

In the first place, each Power would undertake to assist the other with its whole force in the event of the other Power being attacked by a coalition of Powers. Each would have single-handed to face any one Power, and the alliance would only become operative if other armies or navies came into the field. In the second place, the territorial status quo in China would be upheld by both Powers, and the maintenance of the "open door" would be insisted upon in existing spheres of influence. In the third place, the pledge of support already given to China by Lord Salisbury on behalf of England would be given by the Japanese Government on behalf of Japan. Finally, a naval and military convention would be concluded between the two allies, the minimum force to be maintained by each in the Far East defined, and the dockyards and coaling-stations of each thrown open to the other in time of war. It will be observed that the understanding or alliance would be defensive and conservative, not offensive and aggressive.

THE SAMOAN SETTLEMENT.

The editor of the National Review thinks that we have got much the worst of the Samoan settlement. He says:—

Great Britain habitually comes off second best in her dealings with Germany, and we can see from the various railway and telegraph arrangements to which Mr. Rhodes has been induced to assent, that "the fault of the Dutch," if it is a fault, consists as ever "in giving too little and asking too much." They have a positive genius for getting something sub-stantial from the other side in exchange for something which either has no value or which does not belong to them. This process is admirably exemplified in the Samoan agreement, whereby we surrender our share of a group of islands in which we had great and growing interests, and where we had contracted sacred obligations to the natives who had stood by us in the recent disturbances which were provoked by the German Consul. Our faithful allies will be now at the mercy of their enemies, and we can have no illusions as to the treatment they will receive, for German treatment of natives is a by-word. As a set-off, Germany foregoes her "rights" in Tonga, which were practically nil, relinquishes some little bits of islands which will be no use to us or do not belong to her, rectifies a boundary in West Africa, probably to bring us into conflict with somebody else, and agrees to recognise our status in Zanzibar when other

THE ITALIAN POLICY OF THE VATICAN.

Mr. Richard Bagot, who is described as an English Roman Catholic, publishes an article entitled "The Vatican at Work." The author remarks that Mr. Stead is supposed to favour the restoration of the temporal power of the Pope. Considering that I have written a book for the express purpose of condemning the papal aspiration for a restoration of the temporal power as a t balls."

60

o make school on the ne circuation to words.

oe called im not a word I in." all about Britons?

ence of sewhere, dote of er name st of the to rebel. at which ranged a place he was conaggon on be blown he crisis tely, the tilted on rehearsed out a real ad, one of ons of the away by the naked ugh if he e Governnted out-

ired sub-nas much al to the can be. eyer and ne photoexclusive oyal and otographs of Bheel el women ome lady

Colonial Viscount is wife.

Bedford,

Chaplin,

r art, by ith tigers

temptation of the Devil, this is rather strong. The utmost that I have ever said in this direction was that the refusal to allow the Pope to take part in the Peace Conference afforded me for the first time with some semblance of an argument in favour of the Pope's contention that temporal sovereignty was necessary for the execution of his mission. But I was careful to point out temporal sovereignty over the island of Caprera would be much better for all purposes than any attempt to make him sovereign of Rome. This, however, by the way. Mr. Bagot, although an English Roman Catholic, entertains the strongest opinion as to the exceeding impolicy, not to say criminality, of the policy of the Vatican in forbidding Italian Catholics to take any part in Italian politics.

The Vatican, in short, aimed at inoculating the administration of the hated Italian nation with the microbe of infidelity, of official peculation, and of social and political corruption. Thirty millions of Catholics were to be left to the care of a government which, according to the calculation of the Vatican, could only be composed of Freemasons, Atheists, and political adventurers. In order that the Roman Curia might revenge itself upon those who had deprived it of its temporal authority and worldly emoluments, a Catholic nation was to be sacrificed, and an infallible Pontiff, professing to be the representative of Christ and the successor of him to whom was confided the care of Christ's followers, gave his official sanction to the nefarious design by the issue of the decree that Catholics were to take no part in the elections to the Italian Parliament.

Mr. Bagot thinks that the dream of the Vatican is to destroy the Italian kingdom, and to place Italy under the dual control of France and Austria, who would administer the civil government and restore the Papal dominions in the Pope's name and interest.

A PLEA FOR A SYMBOLICAL SIGN LANGUAGE.

The Chinese Minister, Sir Chihchen Lofengluh, contributes an article on the evolution of a tendency to adopt symbols as the universal written language of the world. The Chinese language is a symbolical language, as opposed to a phonetical or alphabetical language. He maintains that we are moving in the Chinese direction, and sums up his conclusions as follows :-

The world is in want of a universal written language. assert that Europeans are beginning to supply this want by symbols used as abbreviations; they are feeling their way towards a symbolic language, which is bound to be formed some day. Sounds, then, must be altogether discarded, or some day. Sounds, then, must be altogether discarded, or rather the attempt to represent sounds by writing. Sounds alter from day to day, dialects degenerate into patois, and nations are kept apart, instead of being drawn together, by such a means of writing. Codify your symbols and invent fresh ones, using some as determinatives, or key symbols, and so complete your parsigraphy. For whether you know it or not, or wish it or not, you are drifting towards a universal language, in obedience to the law of evolution.

OTHER ARTICLES.

The war is dealt with as part of "The Chronicle of Greater Britain." Another paper on a subject of the day deals with "The Transports and the Troops." There are literary articles on John Donne and Walter Bagehot, and the usual Chronicle of the month in America. Lady Rayleigh describes the position of "The Pupil Teacher in Rural Schools," and C. B. Luffmann describes "A Winter's Camp in Gippsland." Sir H. Meysey Thompson, describing what should be done after the war, lays down three central and guiding principles :- a direct representative of the Queen, as the supreme authority in South Africa, including Rhodesia; one military force at the disposal of that representative, and equal rights for all white subjects of the Queen, whatever race they may be sprung from.

THE AUSTRALASIAN REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

THE history of the month in the October number gives the reason "Why we fight." Australians are convinced that "the crisis involves far more than the interests and rights of the Uitlanders. England is challenged in her South African Empire. Her ability and her title to hold it are assailed." The writer remarks on the way "the wickets are falling fast" on "the political green" in Australasia; in other words the many Ministerial overthrows actual or impending in the Colonies. The Australian cricketers in the Homeland still furnish a topic of absorbing interest. Ferhaps the widest attention should be given to a study of Newer Australian Verse Writers. The author, Mr. A. G. Stephens, sees all the signs and portents pointing to the new Australian nation being a highly poetical one. "Everybody" is "writing verses." He also remarks on the dominance of Irish blood in the poetry of the Antipodes. He says, "In the domain of Australian verse the Irish parents seem to recur more frequently than either English or Scotch." The poets selected are Victor J. Daley, Will H. Ogilvie, Roderic Quinn, Arthur A. D. Bayldon, Chris. Brennan, James Hebblethwaite, Arthur H. Adams, and Edwin J. Brady.

THE REVUE DES REVUES.

THE Revue des Revues for November 15th is a very interesting number, the principal article being that in which M. Victor Charbonnel gives his many reasons for believing in "The Mussulman Origin of the Jesuits." Bound up with his article he gives a short sketch of Loyola, whom his evident dislike of the Jesuits does not prevent him from recognising as a great man.

Another article more specially interesting to English is that upon "Popular Universities in France and Abroad," giving some account of the aims of the popular university recently founded in Paris in the heart of the working quarter. Incidentally a generous tribute is paid to such institutions as the Birkbeck, the Regent Street, and even the Battersea Polytechnic. Where we are criticised it is fair criticism.

M. Raoul Debert penetrates the private life of "Les Dames Romantiques," and rakes out quite an extraordinary quantity of scandals in consequence. "Les Dames Romantiques" are Mme. de Souza, Mme. de Salm, and other celebrities of the Restoration period of French history. These ladies are all interesting, if a trifle unconventional.

M. Frederic Passy writes "Against War," an article which is chiefly a summary of M. Bloch's recent pamphlets. Several interesting letters are published dealing with the question of the flood of more or less mischievous contents, poured out from the French press and read greedily and indiscriminately by the lower classes. Most interesting of all, perhaps, for the English, will be the article "A Stay at Aldershot," in which Captain de Malleray examines our military system in detail, and does not find it very good. His criticisms of our volunteer system might well call for a little attention on our part.

THE distinction of the December number of Cassell's is its four Rembrandt photogravures. The subjects are, W. B. Wollen's "21st Lancers at Omdurman," Lilian Cheviot's "Kittens," Wehrschmidt's "Down among the Dead Men," and Harold Knight's "Ships Ashore."

T avei Buc Dr. Dr. and of th The noth

M

Ame

appa and mon mun by M Prin have savir and Th expen canva outing that t

afford

vacati regard of the differe

valual

Do Italy, eman in Ita Europ even i or a d consid men e regim pionee presen studen

Unfo themse hostilit as we h in their humori convinc book o and up absolute

Age L which years to hav decoru twice 1 childisl twelve,

Miss

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

gives

nced

her hold

the

" in

The

topic

tion

erse

signs

ing a

He

etry

alian

than

ictor

. D.

rthur

very

at in s for uits."

not sh is oad," ersity

king

such

even

ed it

"Les

xtra-

e. de od of

if a rticle

ecent

ished

less

press

lower the " in

litary

His

for a ssell's are, Lilian

g the

THE Contemporary for December is hardly up to average interest. I have noticed elsewhere Mr. Buchanan's impeachment of "Hooligan Imperialism," Dr. Woods Hutchinson's paper on "Animal Chivalry," Dr. Guinness Rogers' analysis of "Liberal Imperialism," and the severe criticism on the military unpreparedness of the Government contributed by an anonymous writer. The other articles are eight in number, but contain nothing of striking or topical interest.

MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT IN AMERICA.

Mr. J. W. Martin has an article on "The Trend in American Cities," which he says is marked by two facts apparently irreconcilable—the continuance of corruption, and a movement towards the municipal ownership of monopolies. Mr. Martin gives some pleasant details of municipal reform in Boston which have been carried out by Major Quincy in the course of the last three years. Printing, electrical work, and building and repairing have been undertaken by the city with the result of great saving, while baths, public gymnasia, summer music, and Sunday concerts have been established:—

The Boys' Camp, maintained for seven weeks in 1898 at the expense of the city, provided 831 poor lads with five days under canvas at an average cost of 73. 6d. a head. This year similar outing opportunities for girls are proposed, and the Mayor urges that the "expense is so moderate as to make it easily possible to afford a week's outing of the character to every boy of school age in the city who would not otherwise be able to enjoy a vacation outside the city limits. Such a camp should be regarded merely as an extension of the system of public education of the young, and as affording an opportunity for giving a different kind of instruction and training—but one no less valuable, perhaps—from that which is given in the schoolroom.

WOMEN IN ITALY.

Dora Melegari describes the position of women in Italy, and the efforts which are being made for their emancipation. Feminism so far has made little progress in Italy in comparison with its triumphs in Northern Europe, and towns exist in Southern Italy where women even now cannot go out of doors without a male escort or a duenna. In Northern Italy emancipation has made considerable progress; but all through the peninsula the men exceed the women in number, and the absence of a regiment of unattached spinsters who would act as pioneers has hitherto kept the movement back. At the present moment in Italy there are barely 140 female students in the twenty universities:—

Unfortunately for the cause of women, it is among women themselves that it meets with the least sympathy and the greatest hostility. The men laugh, scoff, are sceptical; but in general, as we have seen, they are not disposed to do anything that comes in their way to ameliorate the lot of the other sex. The two humorists of journalism, Gandolin and Vomba, are actually convinced femininists. When an Italian woman writes a clever book or paints a good picture she will be praised, encouraged, and upheld by men, but rarely by women, who are, besides, absolutely careless of the good opinion of their own sex.

THE AGE LIMIT FOR WOMEN.

Miss Clara E. Collet, writing on the subject of "The Age Limit for Women," discusses the immense change which has taken place in the last century. A hundred years ago little girls of six and eight were expected to have formed characters and ideas of conduct and decorum which are not found nowadays in children of twice that age. In one hundred years the age of childish irresponsibility has been raised from six to twelve, and in the extra six years thus granted imagination and individuality have been left free to develop themselves:-

During the last twenty years another change has taken place. The duties of the young person have altered. Formerly at the age of eighteen, in the young person's fiction, she was expected to relieve her invalid mother of household cares and brighten her aged father's declining years. But mothers in 1899 refuse to become decrepit and take to the sofa merely because their daughters are grown up, and fathers only require to be amused occasionally in the evening. The new mother may be considerably over thirty-five, bordering on fifty perhaps, but she neither feels aged nor looks it, and is rather inclined to look beyond her home for full scope for her powers when thus set free from maternal cares.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. Phil Robinson, writing on "Balmy November," gives some interesting details of wild life in the beginning of winter. The Countess Martinengo-Cesaresco contributes an article on "A Prose Source of the Classics," from which may be caught some pleasant glimpses of the social life of Rome in the days of Cicero. Mr. I. Kendel Harris has an article entitled "A New Gospel and Some New Apocalypses." The manufacture of Apocalypses continued right down through the Middle Ages; "they were the religious novels of early Christianity, and if Charles Sheldon and Olive Schreiner had been living in those days, they would undoubtedly have composed apocalyptic literature." Emma Marie Caillard has a somewhat abstract paper on "The Venture of Faith." Mr. S. Baring Gould describes the traditional function of the prophet was to elevate religion out of barren formality, while that of the priest was to discipline and discipline that religion has progressed.

Christmas in Court and Alley.

YULE-TIDE is going to be a sombre season to many this year. Not alone will the wives and children of "the gentleman in khaki, ordered South," miss much that should make Christmas a bright and joyous time; there is a great danger that the stream of benevolence flowing cut for the sick and wounded, for the wives and children of the dead, in camp and battle, will be swelled at the expense of others just as needy, but who are not at the moment so picturesquely prominent. For several years the kindness of readers of the REVIEW OF REVIEWS has helped the children of the Walworth courts and alleys to many Christmas joys. We want this Christmas to print itself deep on the minds of these little folk-the men and women of to-morrow—as a time of peace, goodwill. And not only these children, but also the little folk shut up within workhouse walls must have their share. We want toys, books, games; we want clothes and boots, and coals and Christmas dinners, or better still, the money to purchase these good things. Readers of the REVIEW OF REVIEWS this summer largely helped to send 300 of these lads and lassies for a fortnight's country or sea-air-for this our warmest thanks are due. We want to give about 800 or 1,000 this one day of sunshine in the winter. Will you help?—F. HERBERT STEAD (Warden), Browning Settlement, York Street, Walworth, S.E.

MUNICIPAL HERALDRY is dealt with in the December Royal by Mr. J. Holt Schooling under the rather derogatory heading "Trade Marks of Our Towns." Mr. Herbert Vivian sketches the troops of some very small European states as "Armies that Do not Mean to Fight."

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

THE Nineteenth Century for December is a good number, and contains two articles of interest on South Africa, a review of Anglo-Dutch relations in the past by Mrs. J. R. Green, a paper by Prince Kropotkin on "Comets and Meteorites," one by Mr. D. E. Tobias on the position of negroes in America, an article on "Terms Used in Modern Gunnery," by Major-General Maurice, and one by Mr. Holt S. Hallett on "The War Cloud in the Far East," all of which are dealt with among the leading articles.

CROMWELL AS DESPOT.

There are seven other articles, the most interesting of which is Mr. J. Horace Round's on "Cromwell and the Electorate," in which Mr. Round attempts to prove that Cromwell, though a great man, was a greater despot even than Charles I.:—

The rule of Cromwell meant the enforcement of a certain system, religious, moral, and political, whether the country liked it or whether it did not. While we own his mighty sway, let us not forget that he ruled by the sword, that he purged alike the electorate and the Commons of those who dared to oppose his will. He reached at last the inevitable point: for him the enemies of Cromwell had become the enemies of God.

Mr. Round compares Cromwell with President Kruger. They were both "Old Testament heroes" and their very methods were the same:—

When Calamy, the Nonconformist, once said to Cromwell, "'Tis.against the voice of the nation; there will be nine in ten against you," Oliver replied, "'Very well, but what if I should disarm the nine, and put a sword in the tenth man's hand? Would not that do the business?" Even so did the despot of Pretoria, we are told on high authority, meet the appeals of an Utilander deputation by that quite conclusive reply: "I have the guns, you have not." Ah! but Cromwell, his champions will exclaim, was fighting for a righteous cause. But so, says Mr. Kruger, are the Boers. And righteousness, we know, was in each case what they happened to consider right.

AUSTRIA FIN DE SIÈCLE.

Francis Count Lützow contributes a survey of "Austria at the End of the Century," but it cannot be said that his article, with the exception of a severe condemnation of Count Goluchowski, whose views he describes as narrow and bigoted, contains anything new. Austria, says Count Lützow, must base her position in Europe on the Slav majority of the population:—

The small and historically distinct Slav countries that form a part of the Austrian Empire well know that it is to the fact that they belong to that large and powerful country that they owe the preservation of their distinct nationality and language. They therefore believe as firmly in the necessity of the existence of the Austrian Empire as Palacky did half a century ago; many, it is true, think that the parliamentary institutions should be modified in a manner not dissimilar from that which I have outlined above. Austria governed by a German minority may be feeble, but with a government that is thoroughly trusted by the Slav majority of the population, Austria would be one of the most powerful, perhaps the most powerful, country in Europe.

POLITICS FOR CHURCHMEN.

The Rev. Anthony C. Deane contributes a short and dull dialogue on "The Churchman's Politics" between "Urbanus, a London Curate," and "Rusticus, a Country Vicar." Urbanus has discovered that the only means of securing spiritual liberty for the Church lies in some form of Disestablishment, to which Rusticus points out that that would be bad for the pockets of the country clergy. But even Rusticus believes in the principle of Disestablishment—that is, when the people are educated in Church matters. But, he says:—

To teach—I cannot say it too emphatically—that is our duty for the present. And it is a duty which I fear we have ceased to fulfii. To forget our polemics, to forego fancy services, if only because we have got to convince the average Englishman that we are not Papists in disguise; to be stern, as the Tractarians were stern, in disciplining our own lives—that, I think, would be a wiser course than to play into the hands of our enemies by clamouring for Disestablishment.

Urbanus seems to get the best of the argument, as Rusticus goes off suddenly to bed. Probably most people will do the same after reading his drowsy dialogue.

PLAGIARISM.

Mr. E. F. Benson discusses "Plagiarism," and attempts to define what a literary man may steal. His judgment seems to be that the successful adoption and improvement of a theme or style justifies itself. All literary culture, as opposed to inborn talent, is the result of unconscious plagiarism. Mr. Benson says:—

To attempt to steal a style from another is a crime of the most serious import, but its successful accomplishment is luckily a difficult matter—it is stealing in broad day. On the other hand, our duty and our pleasure alike bid us to study, and by healthy study to assimilate the splendid meal which, among other things, sixpenny editions, one of our latter-day advantages, afford us. Then if we practise, so to speak, and every one practises, for life in itself is an art, to be learned from the contemplation of noble lives, we shall get, by assimilation of our food, not a plagiarised imitation of our original, but a manner which, but for it, could never have been ours. The painter will legitimately, necessarily soak himself in masterpieces, the sculptor in Greek statues, not that he may give us a reminiscence of Pheidias, but something which, without Pheidias, could not have been produced.

HOME LIFE IN INDIA.

The Hon. J. D. Rees, C.I.E., gives a very pleasant picture of "A Hindu Home," but his article, though it deserves to be read for its sympathy and insight, is rather hard to quote from. But here is a picture of the recreation of a Hindu family of high rank, which does not suffer by isolation:—

Then the sun went down, and we wandered round the house, visiting the bathing ghat, in which the little girls swim like mermaids (not that I saw them), and the deep well, alongside which the family pepper, lately collected from the family vines, is drying. Then the daughters, with much laughter, balanced themselves in a swing, consisting of a split bamboo into the end of which was inserted a cross piece for a seat. When it grew darker and every one had duly saluted the god of fire, the girls sat upon the floor and played games with tamarind seeds, hundreds of which are deftly and rapidly picked up while one seed, thrown by the same hand, ascended and again descended, and was caught before it touched the polished floor. I am quite sure Nausicaa's games were much like these, that her garments resembled those of these Eastern girls, that the courtyard of her father's palace was very much like that of my host, for gourds and cucumbers grown upon an elevated framework look exceedingly like vines. The musicians came and played again, and the two sisters sang with extreme earnestness, in shrill voices and well-modulated cadences, the words they did not understand, beating time by gently clapping the palms of their hands, as they sat enveloped in cloth of gold tissue, which swept the spotless floor.

OTHER ARTICLES.

The only other article is a review by Mr. Sidney Colvin of Mr. Stephen Phillips's Tragedy of "Paolo and Francesca." Sir T. Wemyss Reid contributes his second review of "The Newspapers." Sir Wemyss Reid has been in Egypt and Italy, and the inevitable Jingoism of the Englishman Abroad seems to have coloured his meditations.

for No dim hav "C" N Gal arti

The

to I

the

and

B histo the expectation advantagement of the characteristic permitted and the control of the characteristic permitted and the charac

past. come reason hand the wand come of old Buon

M

Beau

dom

stree irrregion to The to ha of th prince and more of Pa induc curved vast of successions point consider the return shopk along which

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

THE Fortnightly for December resembles the Contemporary in being pleasantly free from premature plans for that settlement of South Africa which since the November reviews appeared has receded into such a dim futurity. In other respects it is a good number. I have dealt elsewhere with Diplomaticus's article on "Count Muravieff's 'Indiscretions,' "with Mr. Fitzpatrick's "Notes on the Transvaal Question," with Mr. Le Gallienne's appreciation of Grant Allen, and with the articles on "The Lessons of the Peace Conference" and "Russian Railway Policy in Asia." In addition to these there are several other articles of considerable interest. The number begins with a reply by Mr. Herbert Spencer to Professor Ward's misrepresentation of his views; but the article is wholly devoted to corrections, and quotations and counter quotations, and need not be quoted.

FRANCE SINCE 1814.

Baron Pierre de Coubertin concludes his review of the history of France since 1814, the moral of which is that the French people must abandon their faith in radical expedients in government, that revolutions and sudden changes are always fruitless, and that even when they seem destined to bring about improvements and confer advantages the far-off counterblow is ominous. It seems certain that Liberty and the Republic have taken permanent root in the national soil:—

The Republic has lived, thanks to the wisdom of that universal suffrage which has withstood all the assaults made by a vanquished minority in the name of the great memories of the past. In order to attain its perfect form, it will have to overcome yet other difficulties. Curiously enough, there is every reason to believe that, being as it is under pain of death at the hands of Socialism, it will have to make up its mind to destroy the work of centralisation accomplished by the First Republic, and confirmed so solemnly by Napoleon I. When that day comes it will not only have restored the true historical tradition of old France, it will have broken once and for ever with Buonapartism.

ARCHITECTURE AND MATHEMATICS.

Mr. Julian Moore has a paper on "A Lost Principle of Beauty in Architecture," in which he pleads against the dominance of mathematical regularity in the building of streets and houses. He gives an interesting list of the irregularities purposely practised by the old architects for the purpose of giving a charm to their buildings. The modern critic of decorative art, he says, would seem to have never learnt anything in his life but the definitions of the first book of Euclid. In street reconstruction this principle of artistic irregularity is even more important; and Mr. Moore thinks our own unassuming Strand is far more pleasant than any of the pompous, straight streets of Paris and America. We should induce some of our public representatives to prevent the beautiful curves in our old streets from being Haussmannised into mere vast clutes, as are the French and American boulevards. The success in every way of our chief new thoroughfares, Shaftesbury Avenue and Charing Cross Road, shows that absolute srtaightness is not needed in a modern street, even from the point of view which must always, I admit, be of first consideration—commercial success and practical utility. These thoroughfares make most natural and rhythmic companions to Piccadilly and Regent Street; and neither produce on the stroller the effect of mental lassitude and a desire to return home—that most undesirable of all desires from the shopkeepers' point of view—that any one feels after walking along one of the Paris be ulevards. Can any one imagine a walk which for its distance is more fatiguing than from bottom to top of the Champs Elysées? The eye has nothing to rest on except the great Arch, which, for two-thirds of the distance, is out of easy range of the eye, and therefore an object of strain to it, till one has nearly reached the top.

A FAMOUS PREACHER.

Mr. T. H. Escott makes the sermons of the Rev. F. W. Robertson, recently published, the text of an essay on the personality of the famous preacher. The nature of Robertson's character is best shown in his portrait, and I quote Mr. Escott's description:—

It is a superbly intellectual brow and forehead. The lines of close and constant thought are scored in every lineament of the face. But the expression is not merely that of a thinker: it is also that of a born leader of men, of one fitted equally for the task whether the leadership were moral or physical, an attack upon a redoubt, bristling with cannon and steel, or a resistance to the forces of social and religiou: corruption, banded in a corrupt age against gravity and truth. The scorn of the mean, of the false, of the low, lighting up the whole countenance, is that which so often illuminated in pulpit, on platform, and in private talk, the features of Arthur Penrhyn Stanley. The serenity of soul, betokened by the quiet eye, recalls in his happiest moments the tranquillity that Jowett always seemed to have at his command. Such in personal appearance was the thinker and teacher whose place, if the judgment of foreigners anticipate the verdict of a native posterity, has long since been fixed in the history of European thought during the present and expiring century.

ENGLAND'S DARKEST HOUR.

Mr. Sidney Low in "The Darkest Hour for England" describes the condition of England in 1797, when to our international troubles was added the appalling news of the mutinies at Spithead and the Nore, when the Bank of England was only saved by an Order in Council suspending cash payments, when Ireland was on the brink of rebellion, and the whole military and naval resources of Central and Western Europe were at the disposal of France. It is for the purpose of holding up to ridicule the extravagances which the present trifling war has produced that Mr. Low's article was written. The vapouring over skirmishes as great victories, he says, is only less ridiculous than the ludicrous vehemence with which the public congratulates itself on its calmness when it happens to lose a few hundred men. The Anglo-Saxon, says Mr. Low, is very much the reverse of Carlyle's grim inarticulate man:—

He is always admiring himself publicly and drawing attention to his own valour, his high spirit, his unconquerable resolution, the nobility of his bearing, his fine spirit in adversity, above all, the magnificent figure he must necessarily cut in the eyes of other and inferior peoples. If he wins a victory, though it be over practically unarmed savages, he talks of it in terms which would be rather exaggerated if applied to Austerlitz or Waterloo; if he incurs some trivial reverse, he pats himself on the back, and calls upon the world to marvel at his constancy, because he does not immediately give way to a cowardly despair.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. F. G. Aflalo reviews the books on sport of all kinds published in 1899. Professor F. W. Maitland replies to Canon MacColl's historical arguments on the Ritualist controversy, which appeared in the October number of the Fortnightly. A few pages are devoted to Mr. Hamilton Aïdé's magic drama, "A Gleam in the Darkness," which in a French translation was played in England this year by Sarah Bernhardt. Miss Fiona Macleod concludes her strange allegory, "The Divine Adventure."

urch

eased es, if iman fracnink, emies

, as ople

mpts nent roverary t of most ily a nand, althy ings,

d us.
r life
r oble rised could sarily
s, not sant gh it it, is f the does nouse, a like agside vines, anced to the grew rls sat

rown aught sicaa's those palace mbers vines.

ulated

idney

econd has sm of d his

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

THE December number opens with quite a reactionary tone.

ARBITRATION WHEN IMPRACTICABLE.

Mr. T. F. Manning enlarges on the obvious fact that the exciting and ostensible cause of war is after all only one among many concurrent causes, several of which are far-reaching and deep-seated. He illustrates his thesis by —positively—defending the Crimean War! He says:—

People who take account of only the proximate cause will aver that those hundreds of thousands of lives and hundreds of millions of money were sacrificed to maintain, on the one hand, the right of a score or two of Latin monks, and on the other hand the right of a few dozin Greek monks, to repair a chuich roof. But the true cause was highly complex, and, taking all the elements into consideration, it appears to have been adequate and even imperative.

The outbreak of war in 18/0 furnishes the writer with "an argument against the value of arbitration." He cites many other cases of international strife, but only touches on the present war as an apparent exception to the rule that in serious disputes the stronger nation will nearly always strike first, suddenly and quickly. This absence of warning, he thinks, "renders appeal to an arbitration court impracticable in a majority of cases."

"A NEW IRELAND" VERILY.

A plea for a New Ireland in a New Century is put forward by Mr. Dudley S. A. Cosby. This is what he thinks necessary to qualify the Irish people for the responsibilities put upon them by the County Council Act:—

We would advocate the establishment in Ireland of a sound system of education which shall be entirely ou side the control of the priests and other religious factions, the aim and object of which will be to show them the right way to hilp themselves and no longer remain helpless logs in the hands of others—an education, too, which will create in the people a stronger desire to know reasons and a wish to judge for themselves in all things, whether political or religious.

This specific is put forward because the Irish people are too completely under the power of the priests; but the writer does not tell us by what miracle we are to establish amid such a people a system of education "entirely outside the control of the priests." And he advances this scheme with a view to bringing about a united Ireland!

THE DEARLY-LOVED LORD IN LITERATURE.

"The lament of a leader-writer," who foresees the speedy extinction of his species, is a doleful enumeration of the extirpating influences. Among these he instances the titled litterateur. He says:—

It has been discovered by many astate editors, as well as by company-promoters, that nothing draws so well as a title, and there is no difficulty in procuring the article at a proper fee. Those who have had the honour of corresponding with members of the peerage in private life are sometimes a little surprised at the great literary skill which they display in their public effusions.

I have known instances where the most capable specialists have been rejected in favour of some titled ignoramus, who was "coached" for his subject and then wrote, or had written for him, a signed article upon it.

The electric telegraph, he bewails, has ruined literary journalism; "it is no longer necessary for a journalist to be able to write." He knows an able correspondent of a leading London newspaper "who would be puzzled to string together an article in decent English."

THE LEGEND OF THE MISTLETOE.

J. Hudson, M.A., after recounting the well-known Druidical use of the mistletoe, as a "panacea" or "heal-

all" peculiarly sacred to the Deity, tells the less familiar Scandinavian legend:—

Balder, the son of Freya (or Friga), the goddess of love, dreamed a dreadful dream, which warned him that he was in imminent peril of his life. The terrified goddess, by way of securing immunity for her dear son, exacted an oath from the four elements—earth, air, fire, and water, and all things springing from them—that they would do no harm to her son. This being given, the Scandinavian gods met in their hell, and placing Bılder in their midst, amused themselves by casting stones and darts and other missiles at him. In obedience to the oaths that had been taken, these all fell off from him, leaving him unscathed.

Loki, the spirit of evil, moved with curious envy, found out that all things had taken the oath of protection save the mistletoe, which was only a parasite and not a plant, and too feeble to do harm. Loki promptly makes an arrow of the mistletoe, and puts it in the hand of Hoder, the blind god of fate, who pierces with it the heart of Balder. So Balder died, but rose again. The love-associations of the mistletoe are Scandinavian, not Druidical: coming from its (somewhat dismal) connection with Freya—the northern Venus.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Horace Seale boldly undertakes to solve the problem of space and time. Space is ether. Matter also is ether. Time is continuous motion. Mr. J. Lee Osborne gives a rather dreary picture of commercial life in Australia, especially of its morality. J. Tyrrell Baylee, writing on the minimum wage and the poor law, suggests that all paupers should be reminded that they are bound, if possible, to repay out of their own subsequent earnings what they have taken from the earnings of others. Mr. W. M. Webb pleads for a more general adoption of biology as a branch of education.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

THE Century Christmas number opens with a very daintily illustrated poem by Edith M. Thomas, entitled "The Christmas Dancers: a Legend of Saxony"—a quaint story of how three merry dancers, who would not cease their dancing at the exhortation of the priest, were doomed to dance for twelve months without ceasing. When the year-long dance was done they remember nothing save that they had danced for a day in fairy-land.

Mr. John Burroughs writes an admirably characteristic paper on "The Art of Seeing Things"—a naturalist's sermon upon the text: You must have the bird in your heart before you can find it in the bush.

"The Biography of a Grizzly" is continued. Sir Walter Besant, in a paper entitled "One of the Two Millions in East London," which is illustrated by Joseph Pennell and Phil May—a curious combination—describes the life of a factory girl in East London from her birth to her marriage.

Captain Slocum gives us the fourth part of his solitary sail round the world in the sloop Spray, dealing this time with his visit to Samoa, Australia and Tasmania.

There is the usual quantum of short stories and one or two poems of more than ordinary merit. One, for instance, by James Roche, entitled "Put up the Sword," from which I quote one verse:—

> "When the volleys of hell are sweeping The sea and the cattle plain, Do you think that our God is sleeping, And never to wake again?"

> > XUM

the He add

an

of

eco mo skil ame lik: stat exp mer fort of r pur exa

and

her

ing

has us "the the act He end

Isr. con sev has are

but prereco of h the rep pro how of w ade So: "L the sele of courat con

disp

THE FORUM.

THE November number covers a fair range of interest and variety. The two papers on the Western exploitation of China claim separate notice.

"THE PROSPECT OF A NEW SPAIN."

"Spain, Living or Dying?" is the title of the paper by the Hon. J. L. M. Curry, formerly U.S. Minister to Spain. He draws a dark picture of the Spaniard's dogged adhesion to mediæval theory and practice. But he concludes with an expression of hope. He says :-

There is, however, a prospect, under wiser coursels, of a new Spain. With universal education, fidelity to engagements, economy and honesty of administration, freedom of religion, more liberal commercial regulations, reliance on intelligent and skilled labour, Spain may yet take a high and honourable place among the nations of the earth . . . In Spain there are men lik: Moret, Sagasta, Silvela and Campos, who are broad-minded statesmen, cultured and patriotic; and we may reasonably expect that they will rise superior to the unfavourable environ-ments which block the pathway of that country...It is fortunate for Spain that in the Queen Regent the country, bereft of much that she held sacred, has a head and ruler who is, in purity of character, devotion to her religion, practice of the most exalted feminine virtues, fine intelligence, and large acquuint-ance with domestic and foreign affairs, a monarch who will in her futu:e history be honoured as a boon from heaven, an inspiring exemplar and model, in the perilous crises which have come with crushing effect upon a proul and sensitive nation.

A GOOD WORD FOR FRANCE.

The avalanche of condemnation which the Dreyfus case has let loose upon France leads Jacob Schoenhof to remind us "What the world owes to France." He recalls as "the distinguishing feature of the French Revolution" the "hearty support given by the French aristocracy to the reforms abolishing mediævalism," and contrasts the action of the British House of Lords in opposing reform. He brings up the liberal measures which French ascendency under Napoleon introduced into Germany. Much wrath has been roused by French injustice to Jews, but the writer observes that there is not a single Israelitish officer in the entire German army, while 280 commissioned officers in the French army, including several generals, are Jews. "In art, the mantle of Italy has fallen upon France": her schools of taste and design are open to the world. The writer concludes:—

From all this we may claim that if France has lost in morality and in sense of justice, as is the verdict of her foreign critics, pre-eminently in England and in America, the battle for the recovery of these priceless virtues may be safely left in the hands of her own citizens, who in time of need have not failed to clear the momentary tarnish from her shield.

TOM MANN ON LABOUR POLITICS.

The attitude of the workers in Europe and America is reported on by Mr. Tom Mann. Their present political programme he sums up in three points: "I. An eighthour workday for all trades and industries. 2. Provision of work for all who would otherwise be unemployed. 3. An adequate scheme of old-age pensions for all." The Socialist candidate in England would, he says, add "Labour for children under fifteen to be prohibited," and the nationalisation of mines, railways, and land. He selects the question of dealing with the unemployed as that on which the future largely depends. In the absence of remedial legislation, he thinks the United States the country most likely to indulge in revolution. In England at present the masses are "under a spell of apathetic contentment." Collectivists and labour-men are, however, drawing together, the former being now more disposed to compromise. The writer adds:—

While no immediate result of this rapprochement is anticipated, the next depression in trade will probably suffice to clear away the barriers that have hitherto prevented the formation of an influential labour party in Great Bitain. The one point on which there is anything approaching unanimity is the necessity for a scheme of old-age pensions; and this subject is at present more generally discussed than any other of an ameliorative character.

Mr. Mann declares co-operation and collectivism "practically identical," and looks forward to the certain doom of poverty and want.

WANTED: A PLIMSOLL FOR OCEAN TRAMPS.

Last winter's tragedies of the sea, including the disappearance of ten "tramp" cargo steamers within nine days, leads Captain A. G. Froud on a quest after causes. First he places initial defects in construction. tramps are built too shallow, a convenience for loading and unloading in shallow harbours, but a deadly peril in an Atlantic storm. Steel instead of iron is a lighter but less rigid material, both changes being defects in view of the ocean strain. Other causes are:

(2) Unequal strains while in ballast, caused by the pitching, rolling, and racing of the machinery; (3) distortion of the hull during ocean passages made alternately while laden and in ballast; (4) undermanning. Another source of trouble, scarcely less dangerou; than the foregoing, is the improper distribution of Unlimited insurance has cheapened life at sea; and inquiries are thwarted by the fear of giving evidence. The writer's plea is for legislative reform.

THE SCHOOLMASTER THE COMING KING.

President C. F. Thwing discusses educational problems of the twentieth century. Among these he puts the combination of unity and individuality in studies, the proper adjustment of generalism and specialism, and the union of vitality in a teacher with expert knowledge, of culture and power. In ending he thus magnifies his

For the solution of all these questions the nineteenth century will transmit to the new age one condition which will prove to be of value simply priceless. It is the public and special interest in education. Education has come to be recognised as one of the elemental and fundamental forces in life. It has always been an elemental and fundamental force, but it has not always been recognised as such. It now takes its deserved place with the greatest. It may now be said that it has become a stronger force than the Church, of which it was formerly a function. The schoolmaster is indeed abroad. He was formerly abroad on foot; he is now abroad in the saddle; he is a commander and director and leader. In no department of life has there been a larger increase of enthusiasm or a nobler development of interest or an adoption of wiser methods.

A CIVIL SERVICE UNIVERSITY.

Feeling the urgent need of reform in American administration, Mr. Hoffman Atkinson pleads for "civil service by special training." This is his scheme:—

The Government should establish a university, with colleges for special branches of the civil service. These should be in charge of carefully selected professors, under life tenure. Nomination of candidates should be made according to congressional districts, by competitive examination. To this extent the "patronage," to use that un-American word, would remain in the hands of congressmen; but as in the case of the military and naval colleges, its abuse would be guarded against by examinations. Graduates should enter such branches of the civil service as final examinations might prove them best adapted for. They should begin in the lowest clerical positions, and should be subject to later examinations for each promotion. It would be well to have such civil servants wear a simple, but distinctive, uniform while on duty.

miliar love.

was in vay of m the things r son. l, and asting to the eaving

found save plant, es an oder, irt of lovenot blem ether. ves a ralia, ng on at all id, if nings

Mr.

on of nnec-

very titled "—a d not were asing. ember fairyeristic alist's your

Valter ons in ll and life of o her litary g this iia. one or e, for vord,"

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

THE editor is to be congratulated on the choir of celebrities which he has secured for the authorship of his November number. British readers will notice first that he has "drawn" Mr. Balfour on the Anglican Church crisis in an afticle which of course claims separate notice.

THE RITUALIST REBELLION.

The Earl of Portsmouth interprets the crisis as a "rebellion against the Royal supremacy." He contrasts the legal limitations of the power of the Roman Pope in his own communion with the lawless freedom claimed by "our modern parochial popes." The Royal supremacy, he holds, represents the necessity for a mixed authority to decide between the intermingled civil and ecclesiastical questions. He grants that "the great historic endowments of the Church of England" are "property de jure as well as de facto alienable for whatever purpose Parliament may decide." He thus suggests the consequences of the Ritualist revolt:—

The Established Church is inconceivable without the supremacy of the Crown, just as the endowments of the State are without the State Establishment. From custom, from habit, from tradition, the Protestant Church of England is accepted by a democracy; but a new Church, a sacerdotal autocracy, will have to appeal to different clients.

PROFESSOR MARTENS ON THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

On the great theme of the Peace Conference the editor has been so fortunate as to place before his readers a survey of the proceedings from Professor F. de Martens, the "Lord Chief Justice of Europe" and Russian delegate to the Hague, and from Professor Seth Low, the American delegate. In a very different manner both of these eminent authorities cover the ground now thoroughly familiar to our readers. Two judgments by Professor Martens may be cited. He says:—

If now we ask ourselves what place is occupied among the various congresses and conferences which have taken place during the century by the Conference at the Hague, it will incontestably appear that all the international actions taken by it will ever remain the foundation, the corner-stone, of every useful attempt made towards the establishment of normal and peaceful relations between the nations. Finally, and it is a happy token to note, the longer the labours of the Conference at the Hague lasted, the more fully views were exchanged among the representatives of the different Powers, the more pronounced grew the natural respect, the more friendly grew the personal relations, the more palpable became the desire to do something for the future. This is a most encouraging fact which explains much in the past, and is full of high promise for the future.

WHAT WAS DONE AT THE HAGUE.

Mr. Low declares that in leaving resort to arbitration wholly voluntary the plan adopted showed its strength and not its weakness. Asked to say in what way has the Conference furthered the cause of arbitration,—

The writer would reply, (1) by giving to arbitration this recognised place among the means of preserving the world's peace; (2) by making notable provision for it through the establishment of a Permanent Court; and (3) by making a resort to arbitration easy.

Of the Convention for the peaceful settlement of international disputes, Mr. Low says :-

The Powers that give their adhesion to this Convention, when drifting toward war, may be called upon, by their own consent, to take the responsibility of declining to accept good offices, of declining to accept amediation, of declining to accept an international inquiry, and of declining to accept arbitration...

No one supposes that this Convention, even if universally signed, will prevent all war; but it will compel the nations, in a new way, to justify war to the public opinion of mankind. All that a body of the nature of the Conference could do has been done. It remains for other forces, and notably for public opinion in all the nations, to make effective what the Conference has proposed. In the opinion of the writer, there is no greater evidence of the wisdom of the Conference than that it has, thus fearlessly and confidently, left to public opinion the vitalisation of its work.

A HARD CHOICE FOR FRANCE.

Bernard Lazare reviews the evolution of the Dreyfuscase under the title, "France at the Parting of the Ways." He claims that events have proved the incompatibility of the army with democracy, reason, justice, established law; and so he presents the following stern alternatives:—

Now the question is brought squarely before the French people and must be solved—either the clerico-military oligarchy called the army will continue, and then France will gradually fall into the abyss; or the army and the clerical influences which inspire and support it will disappear.

THE "OPEN DOOR" IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. Frank D. Pavey, discussing the "open door" policy in the Philippines, points out that, though the treaty of peace with Spain, ratified by the Senate, legally secures for Spain the open door for ten years, yet in regard to all other nations the Constitution holds that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." Either this article must be repealed by constitutional amendment, or every port in the United States must be made by law "an open door" to the world's trade or there can be no free trade in the ceded islands. Meantime "an open door to the world's commerce" in the Philippines is pronounced by the writer to be a "political myth."

"HOW ARE YOU?" AN INSULT.

Mr. Louis Windmüller writes on "Food which Fails to Feed," and in the interest of the general health recommends freer municipal markets, education in cookery, protection against adulteration, open air exercise and so forth. He dares to say that if girls were taught how to cook a dinner, the accomplishment would "always command a husband or remunerative employment." He looks forward to a general eupeptic paradise:—

The popularity of outdoor sport, which has been developed so strongly in the latter part of the ceptury, points towards a decided improvement of our race. The time may not be distant when it will be considered a misdemeancur to be ill, and when the perfunctory question, "How are you?" will be deemed an insult, because it may imply that we have committed a crime in neglecting ourselves.

TWO POETS.

Not least among the noted contributors of the month must be ranked "Carmen Sylva," the Queen of Roumania, who supplies a charming parable in "The Story of a Helpful Queen." It was a Queen who prayed to take the burdens of others, if thereby she might bring them happiness. She took on herself the sickness and poverty and slander and guilt of others; and even by saving another mother from bereavement lost her own child. The angel-form of her lost one reveals to her her mistake in trying to banish suffering from this world, where it is a Divinely appointed means of education for the fuller life beyond. Mr. W. E. Henley contributes two dozen songs and madrigals, some extremely beautiful, others more striking than sweet, under the title 'Hawthorn and Lavender."

THE artist of the November Studio is the French painter, Jean Jacques Henner, by Mr. Frederic Lees.

two fi while unde evide articl ally a M. powe its m

Char indee to se her desc. In h Mad letter woul of it

Frei

of I

Frei

inter

fatal

serie sees the choc of 1 M. (vidu rare their Grea have this infer ever sive or k cont the thre num Wh Frei to i curi

nav

this

muc

become which from tried by I held mig

THE NOUVELLE REVUE.

THE Nouvelle Revue, which has gone down in price to two francs net a number, keeps well up to its promise, and while paying as much attention to political matters as under the editorship of Madame Adam, an effort is evidently being made to introduce general topical articles, while the fiction remains, as always, exceptionally good.

ons, in a nas been public

nference greater lisation

reyfus

Ways."

ility of d law;

French

igarchy adually

luences

policy

eaty of ecures

to all duties,

it the led by

Inited orld's

lands.

ce" in be a ils to

com-kery,

nd so ow to

com-

looks loped

rds a istant

when ed an ne in onth

ania,

of a

e the ippi-

and ther

The

e in

is a life

ongs

nore

and

nch

M. Piou opens the first November number with a powerful attack on the present French Government and its methods, while Madame Adam, whose "Letters on Foreign Politics" remain a permanent feature of the new series, gives a survey of the European situation, and sees in the Transvaal War, and what may be called the Chamberlain Policy, a great menace to France and, indeed, to the whole world. Madame Adam would like to see Russia seize the present opportunity to strengthen her position in Persia. The South African War is described by her as "unpopular, odious, and cynical." In her second contribution it is, however, a pity that Madame Adam upholds her case by quoting the forged letter of Mr. Austen Chamberlain, a letter which one would have thought was obviously false on the face of it.

THE FRENCH NAVY.

A powerful and well written article on the modern French navy, and more particularly the present Minister of Marine, M. de Lanessan, one time Governor of French Indo-China, is worthy of attention from all those interested in naval matters. The writer points out how fatal is the Republican system of constantly changing the supreme naval authority. No attempt is made to choose a man who is really familiar with the technicalities of the work undertaken so lightly. Also the writer, M. Chassériaud, not content with merely blaming individuals and systems, shows what is, in France, the very rare moral courage of telling his fellow-countrymen how their navy is regarded by their only serious rival-that is, Great Britain. He says, perhaps truly, that there would have been no Siam crisis and no Fashoda crisis had not this country been fully convinced of France's utter naval inferiority. He points out, what should be quite obvious even to the civilian mind, that no great fighting or defensive machine, like navy or army, can be either created or kept up without time, money, and, above all, a spirit of continuity. He recognises that at the present moment the British navy has a numerical superiority of nearly three to one; what is more, he does not believe that this numerical superiority can ever be seriously attacked. What he would wish to see would be the creation of French colonial and coast navies, each of which, sufficing to itself, should be able to deal with each colonial or defensive problem as it may happen to arise. It is curious to note that M. Chassériaud, though a practical navy man, does not take into account, at any rate not in this article, the submarine boat which is exciting so very much interest both in France and in America.

WORKERS' CONFERENCES.

M. Depasse contributes some interesting pages concerning the great Workers' Conferences which are becoming more and more usual on the Continent, and which are made up of delegates both from workmen and from masters. Hitherto, the greater companies have tried to evade taking part in these conferences, but little by little they have been brought to see that in their being held lay one of the very few ways in which possible strikes might be averted. The writer believes that soon the whole civilised world will see the necessity of periodical conferences of the kind. In fact, what M. Depasse hopes to see realised are Working Committees, where all those practically interested in an industry shall be able to have their say, and these conferences, which should, he thinks, take place once a month, or once every three months, would form a link between the worker and his employer which would not only directly contribute to the prosperity of each, but which would also cause them to get to know and respect one another. "Workmen could learn a great deal from the masters, and the masters could learn a great deal from their workmen." In 1891 one of the greatest coal strikes which have ever taken place on the Continent was practically terminated by a Workers' Conference which took place at Calais, and where both masters and men were represented. Unfortunately, the employers not unnaturally prefer to let things remain as they have been so long; even during the last few years great efforts have been made to abolish in France the existence of trades-unionism. M. Derasse points out that in Great Britain, where trades unionism is so strong, trade is in an exceptionally flourishing condition. "The more your workers are intelligent and responsible, the more your industries will hold their own in the world of commerce."

OTHER ARTICLES.

Other articles consist of a rather finely-worded apology for the terrible Klobb and Voulet drama; a charmingly illustrated paper on woman as she appears to the modern portrait-painters; and a semi-biographical, semi-critical account of three notable contemporary women-authors, who are, however, very little known in this country—namely, Madame Krysinska-Bellenger, Madame Meunier, and Madame Manoel de Grandfort.

Pall Mall Magazine.

THE Pall Mall Magazine for December is to be seen and enjoyed rather than quoted from. Fiction abounds, and good rictures. Among the more serious papers may be mentioned Mr. J. Holt Schooling's account of the old British State lotteries. The profits drawn by the State from this more than doubtful source averaged over half a million sterling annually in 1802-7. The accompanying cuts of lottery advertisement are very quaint. Mr. William Archer gives his second paper on the American stage. He remarks on "the almost total extinction of Shakespearean acting in America." He describes the syndicate which is composed of various theatrical firms, and which was formed for the laudable object of organising and economising the arrangements of actors. It is, however, the reverse of disinterested in its working. The leading "stars" denounced it at first, but "one by one they have fallen into line, until only three or four freelances of any standing remain in the whole country." It now threatens to be all-powerful. Mr. Henley in his ex-libris gossip inveighs against what he wittily describes as "Tit Bits Tyrannus," illustrated in the International Library of Famous Literature.

THE first martyr of English Protestantism is said by Mr. John Hyde, in the Gentleman's for December, to have been Alice, daughter of Sir Walter de Ludauk. She was shot at a Lollard camp meeting, which her father held in a cleft of the Peakland called Lud's Church, in the reign of Henry V.

THE REVUE DES DEUX MONDES.

M. BRUNETIERE'S review for November is not remarkable for many topical articles, and those that come to any extent under that head are not very pleasant reading for English people.

THE WAR.

The only reference to the war is contained in M. Charmes's Chronicle in the second November number. M. "Charmes begins by quoting two stanzas from "Don Juan" in which Lord Byron abuses his countrymen: "Those haughty shopkeepers who sternly dealt Their goods and edicts out from pole to pole, And made the very billows pay them toll," and again:—

"Alas, could she but fully, truly, know How her g eat name is now throughout abhorred; How eager all the earth is for the blow Which shall lay bare her bosom to the sword,"

The quotation is certainly apt in view of the recent outbursts of Continental opinion against England. M. Charmes goes on to say that the English claims as put forward by Sir Alfred Milner at Bloemfontein, and later developed by Mr. Chamberlain, had for their object an attack upon the internal indepen-dence of the Transvaal. There is thus at the bottom of the war a political interest, and, M. Charmes adds, a financial interest. He explains that the passion for money has entered into the whole of our national life, and the touchstone which we apply to everything is that of material gain. This plague, he thinks, has fascinated us to the point of rendering us unable to distinguish between justice and injustice, good and evil, right and violence. He quotes M. Montégut as saying that the exaggerated importance given to wealth is the great moral sin of England. In these circumstances M. Charmes regards the inertia of the Great Powers when confronted with the Boer War as by no means a creditable phenomenon at the close of the nineteenth century. "Is there still a Europe?" asks M. Charmes in despair, and he is evidently annoyed to think that England will not meet with other difficulties in her enterprise than those which result from the geographical conformation of South Africa and the heroic and desperate resistance of the Boers. England, he says, has fallen under the yoke of politicians of a new school, who do not sufficiently regard the interests and the dignity of the rest of the world. He admis that we are a great nation; but whereas we owe our greatness in the past to peace, we now dream to-day of making ourselves greater still by far different means. It may be noted in conclusion that M. Charmes makes no reference to the large blocks of South African mining shares held in France and, to a less extent, in Germany.

INDIA THROUGH NATIVE SPECTACLES.

It is not a very pleasant view of the English power in India which M. Filon presents in the first of a series of articles. From various native sources, including Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji, who, it will be remembered, sat for a short time in Parliament, M. Filon proves, to his own satisfaction, that the English have brought practically nothing but misery and poverty to India. Before the arrival of the English the wealth of India was astonishing and was not confined within a few hands, but was spread through all classes by the caste system and the collectivist organisation of the villages. When the English came all was changed, and India became an orange to be sucked dry by the Western adventurers. The period from the Viceroyalty of Lord Cornwallis to 1858 did not differ much from the first, except that the exploitation of India was conducted with more regularity and method. It was calculated in 1838 that England had abstracted more than seven hundred millions sterling from the riches of India. It might be thought that the abolition of Old John Company in 1858 was the signal for a better system, but M. Filon is far from admitting this; salaries, pensions, annuities, industrial dividends, every sort of extortion is practised, he thinks, upon the natives, who are always paying. The great extension of railway construction in India, though it provided work for the time, he regards as an unmitigated evil, because the natives have to pay the dividends, and apparently do not profit by the railways at all. In fact, M. Filon even makes England indirectly responsible for the outbreaks of plague, because the natives, being deprived of their wealth, could no longer purchase sufficient nourishment to protect them from the ravages of the disease. The remedy for this state of affairs is not to rise in revolt and chase the English out of the country; indeed M. Filon admits that India is not yet ready for self-government. His remedies are milder; first, to admit the natives to a share in the various commercial and industrial enterprises, and secondly, to admit native officials to the highest administrative posts by

FRANCE IN THE FAR EAST.

To the first November number M. Pinon contributes a long article on the position occupied by France in the Far Eastern Question. It is important to note that he declares, in so many words, that France is anxious to secure the open door in China, and he even adopts the words of Mr. St. John Brodrick, who said lately that England did not want to waste her time and energies in sterile struggles with other Powers which pursued the same great work as herself. M. Pinon, however, hints not obscurely at a general Continental alliance against the vaulting ambition of England in China, and he notes with satisfaction that it was in the Far East that the Franco-Russian alliance took a practical form for the first time, and there also, for the first time since 1870, France and Germany found themselves in agreement.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Among other articles may be mentioned a study by M. Gautier of Madame de Staël's relations with the Republic of 1798; some interesting Carlist Reminiscences by Count Remacle; the continuation of M. Dehérain's instructive articles on scientific agriculture; a description of the Ambassadorship of the Duc Decazes in London from 1820 to 1821, by M. Ernest Daudet; and a criticism by the expert, M. Lévy, on the budget of 1900.

Good Words for December is full of excellent matter. Mr. David Paterson tells very graphically "The Wonders of Coal-Tar"—the brilliant dyes, the exquisite perfumes, the antiseptics, the saccharine, extracted from this bye-product of gas manufacture. Mr. John Ward supplies much up-to-date information about the Egyptian Sphinx under the title of "An Old Friend with a New Face." Colin Livingston imparts a very vivid idea of life on the summit of Ben Nevis, and describes especially the cloud effects to be seen there. Among these is a genuine Brocken spectre, the figure being furthermore surrounded by a rainbow-like halo, called a "glory," which coruscates as it moves. As many as 1,500 visitors have been counted in a month since the observatory has been opened. The writer suggests the building of a sanatorium on the summit, since the mean particles of dust in a cubic inch number 1,160 against 165,000 in London.

XUM

ind

att

we op

ve

Br fer

spe fai

rea

in

for

H

he

th

thi

th

go

me

Ga

Le

lei

on

le

H

ci

C

w

th

ri

di

be

be

th

th in R

tr V

a S S fe th

THE REVUE DE PARIS.

WE have noticed elsewhere M. Malet's really terrible indictment of King Milan of Servia, the first violent attack on a living sovereign which has ever been, so far as we are aware, published in a leading Continental review.

GREAT BRITAIN AND THE TRANSVAAL.

The first November number of the Revue de Paris opens with what may be called a typical, and therefore very unfavourable, analysis of the relations of Great Britain and the Transvaal. The writer, who has preferred to remain anonymous, has evidently made a special study of his subject. He admits, with considerable fairness, that many Englishmen and Englishwomen really believe the Transvaal War justified, and he puts in a few very clear words the usual arguments brought forward by those who uphold Mr. Chamberlain's policy. He declares, however, that these views are much more held by the lower classes than by what he calls the governing classes: "The Englishman rarely thinks for himself," he observes; "he accepts, without criticising them, the leading articles of the newspaper that has his confidence, and when he is pleased with a government he will, on a whole, accept what that govern-ment chooses to do." Then at great length the writer ment chooses to do." tells us the story of South Africa from the days of Vasco da Gama to the present time.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

M. J. C. Roux concludes his vivid account of the Suez Canal. The fact that he was actually one of M. de Lesseps' most trusted friends and assistants of course lends special interest to his work. De Lesseps was not only a great engineer, he seems also to have been, at least in the middle of his life, a great administrator. He was determined to bring some of the benefits of civilisation to the country surrounding his beloved Canal, and under his auspices the company built the Hospital and the Sanatorium of St. Vincent de Paul, where the employes and the workmen who actually did the manual work were nursed gratuitously. The sanatorium is at some distance from the hospital; more lately dispensaries have been opened, children's schools have been founded, and co-operative stores and clubs have been inaugurated. M. Roux goes at great length into the financial affairs of the Suez Company. He points out that during the first seven years of the company's existence the £20 bonds could be bought for £12; they were worth last May close on £160.

LETTERS OF GEORGES SAND.

Some exceedingly charming letters of Georges Sand, and which are full of human as well as of literary interest, are published in the second number of the Revue. In one of these she gives her views as to what should constitute a young people's library: books of travel she puts first on the list; among novels, all Walter Scott's and Fenimore Cooper's she declares are instructive, amusing and healthy. She would approve of a certain amount of theatrical literature: Corneille, Schiller and Goethe, and an expurgated Shakespeare. She would also admit a certain amount of poetry, and a few good fairy tales, but she adds, with great good sense, that it is important to leave even children and uneducated people to make to a certain extent their own choice; they will know what they will best be able to ntellectually digest.

THE LATER NAPOLEONIC ERA.

It is curious to see that as time goes on the French writers, and apparently the French readers, return with interest to the later Napoleonic era. Very curious to the student of modern history is the account, which seems to have been founded on a number of original documents, of Louis Napoleon's effort to provoke an insurrection at Strasburg in the year 1836. Louis Philippe very wisely pardoned the arch-conspirator, and Prince Louis Napoleon found himself, to his great disgust, shipped off to America on board the French frigate Andromeda. Those left behind were formally tried early in 1837 amid a scene of considerable popular enthusiasm; they were all acquitted.

Other articles deal with the condition of the Théâtre Français in 1817; Lieutenant X. continues his not very interesting account of the Americans in Manila as seen from the deck of a French man-of-war; and Messieurs Depont and d'Eckardt analyse Pan-Islamism and the Islamic Propaganda.

-THE ITALIAN REVIEWS.

THE Nuova Antologia blossoms out this month into a number of excellent illustrations. It leads off (November 16th) with a striking portrait of Gabriele d'Annunzio, accompanying a long declamatory poem in a form of rhythmic blank verse called "Praises of the heavens, of the sea, of the earth and of heroes." There is also a biographical sketch, with some half-dozen illustrations, of the great Italian artist, Segantini, who died a few weeks ago in the prime of life, and who is principally known for his pictures of Alpine scenery. But the most weighty article in the number is one entitled "New Problems," by the venerable author and senator, Pasquale Villari. It is a scathing indictment of the financial condition of Italy as regards not only the way the finances are disbursed, but the way they are gathered in. He begins the article-which no student of Italian politics should miss-by remarking that the Italian Government is the only one in the world for which no one has a good word to say. This he attributes in the main to her economic blunders. On the one hand there is reckless extravagance, on the other the most cheese-paring economy. Fifty per cent. of the taxes fall on the very poorest portion of the population. The products of agriculture are so heavily taxed that all over the country land is falling out of cultivation, and the South, which is purely agricultural, is taxed for the benefit of the North, which is, partially at least, industrial. Administrative corruption exists everywhere. The ex-Minister reserves his conclusions for a future article; but it is evident that he looks to a more intelligent treatment of the agricultural problem as offering the best means of escape from existing difficulties.

The article that appeals most to the general public in the learned Rivista di Scienze Biologiche is one by Madame Lombroso on the evolution of thought in children. Perhaps the most definite conclusion she is enabled to draw concerns the very wide difference in clearness and precision in the answers given by the children of educated and those of uneducated parents.

The leading Italian magazines adopt a fairly friendly, or at least an impartial, attitude towards England in the matter of the Transvaal War. The Rivista Politica e Letteraria, however, publishes a lengthy and well-informed article very bitter in tone against England, summarising the history of our relations with the Transvaal, and declaring in conclusion that Great Britain has incurred the disapproval of nearly the whole civilised world by her act of aggression.

1870, at.

ly by a the minisf M. ture; Duckinnest atter. atter.

mes,

bye-

plies

hinx

ace.

the the cloud

uine

nded

cates

been

been ana-

st in

1.

It was

more

ches of

of Old

better

laries.

sort of ho are

ruction

ards as ay the rays at irectly

se the longer

om the ate of sh out is not nilder:

com-admit sts by ibutes

in the nat he ous to ts the ies in d the hints

gainst

id he

t that

or the

XUM

TWO BOOKS OF THE MONTH.

SEASONABLE SEASONING FOR THE SEASON.*

NOTWITHSTANDING the shadow that is cast over the land by the war now raging in South Africa, Christmas is Christmas still, and will be celebrated in the old way in a million homes. The element of the family reunion may be said to constitute the roast beef and the plum pudding of the season. Pleasant gossip and merry tales constitute the mince ries and lighter sweetmeats of the Christmas table. To make a merry Christmas it is well to be furnished with many merry jests and a small change of current gossip. Therefore, instead of attempting to give an exhaustive review of any one book as the Book of the Month in this number, I think it would be more useful and seasonable to extract some of the many good things which are to be found in the two contemporary chronicles of entertaining gossip that were published last month. I refer to Sir Algernon West's Recollections. which, from the title, begin with the year of his birth and continue down to 1886. The other is Sir Edward Russell's collection of good stories, published under the title of "That Reminds Me." But before pillaging the volumes for their store of anecdote it is only just to say a word or two concerning the books and their authors.

Sir Algernon West is well known to readers of these pages. Quite recently he contributed some fascinating articles to the fascinating articles to the Nineteenth Century, embodying some of his reminiscences, and in these two volumes we have more of them. The author is a good, genial gossip, whose recollections cover the whole period of English history that began with the Reform Act. He was private secretary to Mr. Gladstone during his first Prime Ministership. He was subsequently Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue, and all his life has been mixing in the best political society in London. He is a fervent Gladstonian, whose idolatry of his chief is quite refreshing in these days, in which the memory of the great man is the mark for so many cynical sneers. He has a very keen eye for a good story, and there is a very pleasant touch about his pen when he is giving us pictures of his contemporaries. Sir Algernon West has not ventured to give us anything approaching the Granville Memoirs; possibly he has this in reserve to enlighten posterity. In these books we have but the gleanings of the vintage of Eshcol. The impression, never absent from the reader, that Sir Algernon tells us only the merest shred of what he could tell us, is rather tantalising; but on the whole it enhances the pleasure of the book.

The other reservoir of anecdote which we have laid under contribution, is Sir Edward Russell's "That Reminds Me." The title is free and easy, but very much to the point; for the book pretends to be nothing more than a stringing together of stories of which the author is reminded as his pen goes a-gossiping over the events of his past life. Sir Edward Russell has been for many years the editor of the Liverpool Daily Post. He is one of the notable provincial editors who have also occupied seats in the House of Commons; and alike as journalist and parliamentary man he has had good opportunities of seeing and hearing many of the good stories current in political circles for the last thirty vears.

nor

nigh succ Hen Sun and

rega

had

Chu

for any agai

T

stor

was exp

whe

Sha

of qui figu

WOU

stan

poir

Rar

mea

the

saw

0 thro

Bud

wel

till

can

in I

to wh

as pre imp

E.

was

sen

mo

pre

Jap

tole

Gr

am

it n

ger

the lon

to

the

out

cor

F

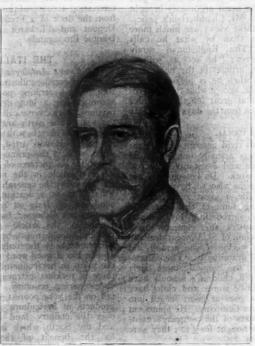

A

I

It would be a mistake, however, to think that the gossip of these two raconteurs is only political; if such were the case this article would be unseasonable indeed. But as will be seen from our extracts, they touch life on many points and raise many subjects for pleasant talk at Christmas time. Take for instance Sir E. Russell's story about Lord Randolph Churchill, and the way in which he was introduced to Shakespearian plays. It would serve as a very good beginning for an interesting and gossipy conversation. The story is as follows: When Henry Irving was playing Hamlet in Dublin, Lord Randolph Churchill, who was then married, and whose father was Viceroy of Ireland, came to see him behind the scenes. In the course of their talk Lord Randolph asked Mr. Irving what was going to happen in the play, and was much interested in having the actor's description of the fate of Ophelia, and the climax of the tragedy in the fifth act:—

He said as he was going, "I am not much of a playgoer, and in point of fact I have never seen a play of Shakespeare's before,

By permission of]

[Smith, Elder and Co.

SIR ALGERNON WEST.

(From a drawing by the Marchioness of Granby.)

"Recollections: 1832-1886." Sir Algernon West, 2 vols. Smith, Elder. 218. "That Reminds Me." Sir Edward Russell. Fisher Unwin. 128. nor have I ever read one." He went to the theatre the following night, and the next, thus seeing "Hamlet" three nights in succession; and on the third night again obtained admission to Henry Irving's room, and asked him whether he had a free Sunday, and whether he would come and lunch or dine with him and Lady Randolph Churchill, who was that night at the Viceregal Lodge. Irving consented, and went on the Sunday. He had a very pleasant day, and in the course of it Lord Randolph Churchill said to him, "Mr. Irving, I believe I have to thank you for as great a boom as ever one man conferred on another. I assure you that I knew nothing of Shakespeare and had not seen any of his plays. Since that night I have seen 'Hamlet' twice again; I have read four of the other plays, and I feel that you have really introduced me to a new world."

There are many points here for discussion. Is the story true? Was Randolph hoaxing Irving? How old was the politician at the time? And what is the experience of each of the guests round the table as to when he or she made their first acquaintance with Shakespeare?

Lord Randolph in after years became a great friend of Sir Algernon West, who speaks very highly of his quickness and industry. At first he was as ignorant of figures as he had been of Shakespeare:—

A Treasury clerk put some figures before him. I wish you would put these figures plainly," he said, "so that I can understand them." The clerk said he had done his best, and he had, pointing them out, reduced them to decimals. "Oh," said Lord Randolph, "I never could understand what those d—d dots meant."

He soon mastered decimals, and prepared and secured the assent of the Cabinet to a great Budget, which never saw the light:—

On the evening of the day on which he carried his Budget through the Cabinet, after describing to me how he had done so, he said: "There in that box are all the materials of our Budget. They are unpolished gems; put the facets on them as well as you can, but do not speak to me on the subject again till the end of the financial year." What that Budget was cannot yet be told; but it may be fairly said that it far exceeded in importance any Budget since Mr. Gladstone's great performance in 1860.

Another theatrical story told by Sir E. Russell relates to Sothern, the creator of Lord Dundreary, a character whose complete disappearance from the stage is almost as remarkable as the immense popularity which it previously enjoyed. Mr. Sothern used to be constantly improvising new "Dundrearyisms," one of which Sir E. Russell mentions as follows. An actor in the play was directed to refer to the fact that in Japan a criminal, sentenced to death, could always obtain a substitute for money down. Whereupon, credulity having been expressed, his Lordship was to turn round and say: "Oh, y—yes, th—that's so. There are a lot of f—fellows in Japan who get their l—living by it."

Another anecdote which is amusing and new is that told by Sir Algernon West, on the authority of Lord Granville. When Cetewayo was here, the famous king of the Zulus was taken round Hyde Park and was shown among other things the Achilles Statue. He asked what it meant, and was told that it was in honour of our great general the Duke of Wellington. He looked at it and then turned to one of his chiefs and said: "It is not so long ago that they fought as we do, without clothes."

That is a new story, but Sir Algernon does not hesitate to tell old ones if he thinks them good, as, for instance, the two Jewish stories. One as to the guest who stole a valuable spoon, putting it up his coat-sleeve, and was outwitted by another guest who offered to show the company a conjuring trick. Putting a valuable spoon up his sleeve, he said, "Heigh presto! you will find the spoon in the sleeve of the gentleman opposite," who, being searched, was compelled to produce the spoon, while the other walked off with his. The other Jewish story is of an old Jew, who, on dying, asked his sons not to let him go as a pauper to the other world, and to put a couple of hundred pounds into his coffin. Before the funeral one of the brothers asked the other if he had fulfilled his father's wish. "Yes," was the answer. The first was not quite satisfied. He opened the coffin and found that his brother had given the dead man a crossed cheque, payable to order. One of the most interesting stories in Sir A. West's books was told him by Browning about Mr. Ruskin. It is a ghost story, and a very good one. When Mr. Ruskin was a young man staying in a valley in Switzerland he came upon a field left waste because, the villagers told him, it was haunted, "for all the children, but not one of we, can see an old woman sitting there under the tree." Ruskin ridiculed the idea, but some time afterwards he left the place and went to a village fifteen miles off. Remembering the story he asked the family in whose house he lived, whose members had never left their native hamlet, if he might take their young daughter for a visit to the place he had left. They consented, and he drove her over. As they approached the field he said to the little girl, "Your eyes are younger than mine; tell me if you can see any one." "Nobody," she said, "except an old woman sitting under the tree." "Well," said he, "what is she like?" "I can only see her back"; and then suddenly, with a voice of fear, "Oh! she has turned now and I can see her face, with two holes where her eyes should be." This tale is a capital one for starting ghost stories. It raises the question as to whether the child had ever heard of the haunted field; or, secondly, whether, supposing she had heard nothing, the vision was not due to the transference of Mr. Ruskin's thought to the child's The story is interesting anyhow, and suggests a new interpretation of the text about things being revealed to babes and sucklings which are hidden from older eyes.

Mr. Gladstone naturally figures prominently in both books. Those who remember that Mr. Gladstone's favourite song was the Christy Minstrels' "Campdown Races" will not be so surprised as some are at Sir A. West's description of his boyish abandonment to the humour of the moment. We are hardly prepared, however, to hear of Mr. Gladstone rolling over and over down a hill in a friend's park, in pure exuberance of delight at finding himself released from the cares of leadership! Sir E. Russell describes Mr. Gladstone's breakfast parties, and chronicles his host's jokes, one of which was the story about Dr. Cumings' book, which was announced as "A Great Tribulation Coming upon the Earth." This was parodied so as to read "A Great Tribulation; Cuming upon the Earth!"

The following is a reminiscence of the same breakfast as that at which the Cuming joke did duty:—

He spoke a good deal of Madame Novikoff and the absurdity of her being called a spy. Nothing could be more open. I asked what her signature "O. K." meant, and they said the initials of her maiden name. I mentioned its slang meaning, "O. K.," "Orl Korrect." Mr. Gladstone was amused, and said it reminded him of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton line of old, a part of the Great Western system, which was called the "O. W. W.," "Old Worse and Worse." To avoid this they changed the name to West Midland, whereupon it was called "W. M.," "Worst Managed."

Sir Algernon West is responsible for the statement as gs of

sent

the

ing;

laid

Chat

title very

the

ning

to.

hich

las oing

past

ssell

ears

bool

one

cial also ouse

e as

en-

ood

and

ood

ical

irty

ike.

the

on-

; if

this

on-will cts,

any

any alk

ake

ell's

lph

in

It

ing

hen

ord

ose

lph

ay,

ion

in

and

ore,

to Mr. Gladstone's treatment of Lord Granville in 1886. Mr. Gladstone had given the Foreign Office to Lord Rosebery without a word to Lord Granville, and Lord Granville was naturally somewhat hurt. On hearing this Mr. Gladstone said :-

I am quite willing to let Lord Granville be Prime Minister, and I will be Chancellor of the Exchequer, and you may tell him so from me.

It can hardly be said that the offer mended matters.

Another story of Mr. Gladstone is, that in 1884 he said that he had a sneaking liking for Parnell, and that Home Rule for Ireland would be a matter for serious consideration before ten years were over. Mr. Gladstone introduced the Home Rule Bill eighteen months from that

Sir A. West says that Mr. Gladstone told us that nearly every year he was obliged to have his hat enlarged. There were only two men whose hats he could ever get upon his head-the first was the Duke of Newcastle's, and the second Lord Stanhope's. He believed somewhat in phrenology, as a phrenologist by feeling his bumps had told him how many qualities he was deficient in, among others being a difficulty to remember faces.

There is an interesting story of how Sir Frederick Abel tried to convince Mr. Gladstone that in future there would be no need for cutting down trees with the axe, as a ring of guncotton placed round the trunk would fell the tree in a moment. To convince Mr. Gladstone, such a necklace was put round a flagstaff in Downing Street garden. Mr. Ayrton, then First Commissioner of Works, protested, but Sir F. Abel undertook to guarantee that there would be no noise or disturbance of any kind. Mr. Ayrton was overruled. Sir F. Abel fired the guncotton. A terrific report took place which deafened everybody, and the explosion shattered all the adjoining windows which were open. The noise of the explosion was heard as far as Hyde Park.

Of Mr. Bright, Sir E. Russell tells a curious story, which, if not true, is well invented. John Bright seldom had any serious differences with his wife, excepting about the management of the children. When they came to a deadlock Mr. Bright used to say :-

"Now I tell thee if thou doesn't do what I wish I'll go straight to Mr. Gladstone and ask him to make me a knight ! Whereupon good Mrs. Bright-who never went to town in the season, by-the-bye-used at once to agree to whatever John Bright wished, saying, "Oh, anything rather than that."

Another story of Sir Edward Russell's tells how Mr. Bright was led to change his mind as to the publication of racing news in the papers. Mr. Bright at first was very much of Mr. Fletcher's opinion. Mr. Fletcher resigned the editorship of the Daily Chronicle rather than partake in the iniquity of publishing sporting intelligence. On one occasion Mr. Bright confided his troubles on this point to a Quaker, and said he did not like the publication of racing news in the Morning Star. To Bright's great surprise the good Quaker replied: "Does thee think so? I always read that." The fact that such a man had such a taste led Mr. Bright to modify his opinion on a point which he had previously considered beyond doubt.

Cecil Rhodes figures in Sir E. Russell's recollections as the hero of a characteristic scene. Mr. Rhodes, although a great talker, has intermittent intervals of silence, which sometimes last through a whole dinner. On one such occasion he sat next to Harold Frederic, who did not know his man, not even his name.

After dinner Harold Frederic said, "Who was that hopeless fool "—hopeless was not really the word—
"who was that hopeless fool that I sat next to at dinner?" That hopeless fool happened to be Cecil Rhodes. Tableau: Mortification of the New York Times London correspondent.

Sir Algernon West reproduces, among other good sayings, Lord Palmerston's explanation to the Queen of the stuffy smell she noticed when the Volunteers marched past in 1860. "Esprit de corps," he said.

Another story about Lord Palmerston is as follows:— A deputation waited on Lord Palmerston urging him to provide a proper gallery for the Chantrey pictures, then hidden away in a cellar. "Ah," said Lord Palmerston, "I will do what I can, but you must recollect the old saying: 'Ars est celare artem."

Here is a story told by Lady Rose. She asked a poor woman how her husband was. The reply came, "Oh, he is better to-day, and indeed I've always remarked that if he gets through May, he generally lives through the rest of the year!"

There is a funny story told about Sir Henry Storks, who went into Parliament at seventy-two years of age. The Whip asked him to stay till a late division, which often took place in those days at three or four o'clock in the morning. "Yes," he said, "I will, but there is never a morning when I shave myself before the looking-glass when I do not say, 'Good morning, you d-d old fool!'"

There are two stories told of Father Healy. On seeing a very tall young lady hamed Miss Lynch, he remarked, "Nature gave her an inch, and she took an ell." On another occasion a friend having remarked upon the wretched spindle-shanks of some little girls who were bathing in the sea, Healy remarked, "Surely you would not expect such heifers to have calves."

There is a great store of reminiscence in Sir Algernon West's book. Among other stories there is one of Lord Wellington. Harry Keppel, who commanded the light companies of the second brigade at Waterloo, said there was no truth in the well-known story that Wellington said "Up, Guards, and at them." But by way of compensation for destroying this legend Keppel supplied another much more characteristic. He heard the Duke call up an aide-de-camp and give him some orders. He galloped off and presently returned, saluted, and fell back. In a few minutes the Duke called him up and said: "Did you deliver my orders to General --- ?" "Yes, your Grace," said the aide-de-camp. "And what did he say?" "He said he would see your Grace d—d first." The Duke took out his glass and looked in his direction. He leaned over to Lord Saltoun and said, "By G-, he's right!"

One more story and I have done :-

Herschell related that a judge in sentencing to death a forger of bank notes, had said: "I can hold out to you no hope of mercy here, and I must urge you to make preparation for another world, where I hope you may obtain that mercy which a due regard to the credit of our paper currency forbids you to hope for here.

Sir Algernon West and Sir E. Russell have done well. Sir Algernon can do better. If he will set to work to compile his recollections, making England, instead of Somerset House, the centre of his narrative, he will produce invaluable memoires pour servir the future historian. As it is, his Recollections are too slight to be accepted as more than a foretaste of good things to come.

0101010101010101010

MI our c they foreig book (Mur stand Bish the Y which spher reade emin peop

Mi

energ

when

what

const

view belie dena in E conse there the c seen. Chin by a ence undo the c not toget No Chin by s sprin at th dawn that of re upon Brita

Th who decla pecul In th sque direc thele frees indus to re hut and religi merc

Some Notable Books of the Month.

THE YELLOW HOPE.

that rd at cecil ork

pood

n of hed

-

1 to lden

l do

est

noor

Oh,

hat

the ige.

ich

in ver

ass

ing

ed,

On

the

ere uld

on ord

ght

ere ton

en-

ner up

ed

a ou

e,"

He

ke

ed

ger

of

lue

pe

ell.

to

of ill

re

to

to

MRS. BISHOP'S VIEW OF CHINA.

MRS. BISHOP is the most famous woman traveller of our day. Her books always repay careful reading, for they are the work of a trained observer who has made foreign travel the great object of her life. Her latest book of travel, "The Yantze Valley and Beyond" (Murray, 21s. net), is a valuable contribution to the standard books on the present condition of China. Mrs. Bishop's record of three years' wandering in the valley of the Yantze is of enhanced interest because it is this region which Great Britain has claimed to be within her special sphere of influence. In Mrs. Bishop's volume the general reader will find an exhaustive but at the same time an eminently readable account of this vast region and its people and its resources.

NOT A DECAYING NATION.

Mrs. Bishop admits that the extraordinary industry, energy, and adaptability of the Chinese no doubt, when regarded from one point of view, do constitute what has been called his "Yellow Peril." But they also constitute the Yellow Hope, and it is from this point of view that she looks at the teeming millions of China. She believes that China genuinely Christianised, but not denationalised, may yet become the dominant power in Eastern Asia. If China is not dismembered but conserved, and gradually led along the path of reform, there is no doubt that it will become the widest arena for the commercial rivalry of nations that the world has ever seen. She protests energetically against the idea that China is breaking up. The empire is not disintegrating by a process of natural decay. The "sphere of influence" policy, however, if pursued in earnest, would ence" policy, however, if pursued in earnest, would undoubtedly break up the empire. The authority of the central government ought to be strengthened and not weakened, as it alone is the hub which binds together the vast provinces of the Celestial Empire. No doubt there is much decay in China, but the Chinese prefer construction to renovation, and side by side with the falling buildings new ones are springing up. China, Mrs. Bishop believes, is now at the parting of the ways; she stands to-day at the dawn of a new era. Which road she takes, whether that leading to disruption or the more hopeful path of reform and consolidation, depends in great measure upon the policy adopted and maintained by Great Britain.

THE WAY OUT.

The wretchedly insufficient salaries paid to the men who carry on the work of government are, Mrs. Bishop declares, the real crux of the situation. They make peculation and corruption all but an absolute necessity. In that direction ruin lies. The elaborate system of squeezes which universally prevails in China is one of the direct results. But paradoxical as it appears, it is nevertheless true that the Chinese in actual life are one of the freest peoples on earth. He is free in all trades and industries to make money and keep it; to emigrate and to return with his gains; free to rise from the peasant's hut to place and dignity; to become a millionaire and confer princely gifts upon his province; free in his religion and his amusements, and in his social and commercial life. The great hope for China Mrs. Bishop sees in the gradual leavening of Chinese life by Christianity and the circulation of the scientific, historical and Christian literature of the West. Mrs. Bishop says:—

If China is to be Christianised, or even largely leavened by Christianity, it must inevitably be by native agency under foreign instruction and guidance. The foreigner remains a foreigner in his imperfect and often grotesque use of the language, in his inability to comprehend Chinese modes of thinking and acting, and in a hundred other ways, while a well instructed Chinese teacher knows his countrymen and what will appeal to them, how to make points and how to clinch an argument by a popular quotation from their own classics. He knows their weaknesses and strength, their devious ways and crooked motion, and their unspeakable darkness and superstition, and is not likely to be too suspicious or too confiding. He presents Christianity without the Western flavour. It is in the earnest enthusiasm of the Christian converts that the great hope for China lies.

This is the Western ferment which Mrs. Bishop cheerily asserts may "leaven the whole lump."

A ROYAL RIVER.

These, however, are Mrs. Bishop's conclusions. The facts upon which she bases them were gathered in her many wanderings, and are recorded in chapters handsomely and profusely illustrated with 'photographs and sketches. It was only after eight months spent on the Yantze, its tributaries and the regions watered by them, that Mrs. Bishop even began to learn their magnificent capabilities and the energy, resourcefulness, capacities and "backbone" of their enormous population. She describes in detail her journey up the Yantze, which 600 miles from its mouth is still nearly a mile wide, nearly three-quarters of a mile at 1,000, and 630 yards at 1,500, with a volume of water which, at 1,000 miles from the sea, is estimated at 244 times that of the Thames at London Bridge.

MORAL BOOKKEEPING.

One of the most interesting chapters in the book is that devoted to an account of Chinese charities. It is surprising to find that philanthropy is organised on so wide a scale in China. Works of merit for human beings in great masses are admirably organised, but the indi vidual is too frequently lost sight of. The Chinese fail in acts of unselfishness and of personal kindliness. There is no personal self-denial, and that wholesome contact between the giver and the receiver which begets love and gratitude is altogether lacking. It would seem that the ideal of the Charity Organisation Society had been too thoroughly realised out in China. The Chinese are the most practical people on earth, and the system of moral book-keeping adopted by many shows this feature of the national life in a curious light. Books are sold which inculcate the practice of "virtue," and in these a regular debtor and creditor account is opened, in which an individual charges himself with all his bad acts and credits himself with all his good ones, and the balance between the two shows his moral position at any given time. Mrs. Bishop quotes several methods by which individuals seek to "accumulate merit":—

A Buddhist on a river bank pays a fisherman for the whole of the contents of his plunge net, and returns the silver heap to the water; another buys a number of caged birds, and lets them fly. Some build sheds over roads, and provide them with seats for wearied travellers; others make a road over a difficult pass, or build a bridge, or provide a free ferry for the poor and their cattle.

HOW ENGLAND SAVED EUROPE, By W. H. FITCHETT.

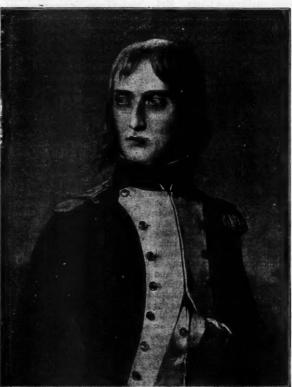

It was a happy inspiration which led Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co. to commission Mr. Fitchett to undertake to tell the story of the great war with which this century opened. There are Lives of Nelson and of Wellington in plenty, and still more numerous are the biographies and histories of Napoleon. We have also Napier's "History of the Peninsular War," and Alison's enormous "History of Europe." But there is no popular narrative of a struggle which has affected for good or ill the history of mankind, and may be said to have decided the destinies of the modern world. Mr. Fitchett had shown in "Fights for the Flag" and "Deeds that Won the Empire" capacity for lucid and brilliant vivid narrative that is unrivalled among contemporary writers. The fascination of his military and naval sketches has been sufficiently attested by their phenomenal sale, both in Britain and in Greater Britain. It may truthfully be said that Mr. Fitchett has introduced young Australia to the stirring history of the race to which they belong. But these sketches were but preludes to the work which he has now in hand, by which his reputation as a writer of popular military history will stand or fall. The conception of telling the whole history of the great struggle, first against revolutionary France, and then against Napoleon, in a book which would be as popular as a sensational novel, and which would stand examination as an accurate picture of the great world-drama, was a splendid one, and Mr. Fitchett has set himself to the task of realising it with genuine enthusiasm. It will probably be objected, not altogether without reason, at least by those who were nurtured upon Cobden's earlier political writings, that Europe would have more cause to regard England as a destroyer than as a saviour. What the history of the world would have been if England had stood aloof from the coalition against revolutionary France, or had thrown her influence into the scale in defence of the right of the French to remodel their constitution as they thought best, is, however, a theme of speculation which, tempting as it may be, we must pass by on the other side. Mr. Fitchett takes the popular view that England in the war against France from 1793-1815 was fighting the battle of European liberty. The somewhat arrogant title of the book was, of course, suggested by Pitt's last public words, when he declared "England has saved herself by her exertions and will, as I trust, save Europe by her example." This volume, which I am sorry to say the exigencies of space compel me to refrain from noticing at length, or from quoting in extracts, is the first of four volumes in which the whole story will be told. It begins with 1793, and carries the narrative down to the defence of Acre in 1799. Mr. Fitchett divides the first instalment of his history into three periods.

The first deals with England and Revolution, beginning with the march of the Guards on February 25th, 1793, and ending with Lord Howe's victory on the glorious first of June. second period is en-titled "The Hour of England's Peril," and tells the story of the mutinies which threatened the very existence of English naval power, but is illuminated by the victories of Cape Vincent and Camperdown. The third period is devoted to Bonaparte in the East. It deals exclusively with Bona-parte's Egyptian adventure, and has as its central point the Battle of the Nile, and closes with the story of the defence of Acre. The book is illustrated with portraits of the leading actors in the eventful six years, and plans of the great naval battles and of the defence of Acre. A book more admirably calculated to com-

From the frontispiece of]

["How England Saved Europe."

NAPOLEON WHEN LIEUT.-COL. OF THE FIRST BATTALION OF CORSICA.

mend itself as a prize school-book at this particular juncture it would be difficult to imagine. From the point of view of the friends of peace it may be deplored as ministering to the war spirit which is only too rife amongst us; but, on the other hand, it is well at a time when evening newspapers wax delirious over "brilliant victories" gained by trained trocps over untrained peasants in the highlands of Natal, to be reminded of the calm heroism and brave endurance with which our fathers confronted the greatest military Power in Europe.

MISS ELIZABETH BANKS introduces to the Quiver world this month the well-known "George Junior Republic," under the title "A Republic of Boys and Girls."

(UM

A dea that of a invating abullette B see y Prud on v

the

and

N

not

but

The

pas

any eve

aut

iten

ran

a li

of

dra

he

thes

Eng peor to the more your calm work amb little De to few rank and wors

It ago reply when awa the how bein

how bein fruit forei the Fren we c my o us, a truth

in E a Fro Engl

THACKERAY ON CURRENT TOPICS.

5 was ewhat

ed by d has save

I am

efrain

cts, is

y will rative

tchett

riods. with

the nning

of the

ruary

nding

owe's prious

The

en-

ur of

and very glish

it is

Cape

nper-

hird d to the ex-Bonatian

as as the , and story

e of ok is por-

ding

entful

plans

naval

the

rably

com-

prize this gine.

y be only ell at over

over

o be ance

itary

vorld olic,"

the

of vhich

MR. M. H. SPIELMANN, with the aid of an old editorial note-book, has collected the hitherto unidentified contributions of Thackeray to Punch (Harpers, 7s. 6d.). The result is curious rather than important. None of the passages unearthed from old numbers of Punch will in any way add to Thackeray's reputation. They do, however, throw some light upon the political opinion of the author of "Vanity Fair." Two hundred and fifty new items, with which Mr. Spielmann deals, cover a large range of subjects. Some of the extracts consist mostly of a line or two, while others filled a couple of columns of Punch. The book is illustrated by Thackeray's drawings and by the cartoons, only four in number, which he suggested. The most prominent characteristic of these articles is their intolerance of snobbery in any form. A considerable number of Thackeray's contributions dealt with France, the people of which country were at that moment busily engaged in the not unusual occupation of abusing England and planning imaginary schemes of invasion. The Prince de Joinville in particular dis-tinguished himself in this respect. Thackeray's retort to abuse was sarcasm. Here is a typical passage from his letter addressed to the Prince :-

Brave Prince: bold seaman: good Frenchman!-You can't see your neighbour comfortable but you long to cut his throat. Prudent Statesman-you are at peace: but you must speculate on war; it is the formal condition of the nation you represent; the refined and liberal, the honest and unsuspicious, the great and peaceful French nation. . . . Commerce is brutal and English, unworthy of the polished intelligence of the French people. Their culte is glory. Continue, Joinville, to minister to that noble worship; the more you insult your neighbours, the more "national" your countrymen will think you. Don't spare your insults, then, but suggest fresh plans of invasion with the calm assurance which renders your nation so popular all the world over. Assert your claims in the true, easy, quiet, un-ambitious, gentle, good-humoured, French-polished way, so little querulous, so calmly dignified, so honestly self-reliant! Do this and you can't fail to become more popular. Invent a few more plans for abasing England, and you will take your rank as a Statesman. Issue a few more prospectuses of murder, and they'll have you in the Pantheon. What a dignity to be worshipped by those who, if not his leaders, at any rate are the Bullies of Europe.

It is curious to find Thackeray advocating fifty years ago the opening of picture galleries on Sundays. In replying to his opponents, he remarks, "Who knows whether the sight of God's beautiful world might not awaken as warm feelings of reverence and gratitude as the talk of the Rev. Mr. Stiggins indoors, who was howling perdition at me over his pulpit cushion for not being present sitting under him?" Discussing that fruitful subject of dispute-why we were not popular with foreigners-Thackeray suggests the following solution to the vexed problem :-

It can't be helped. Do what you will, you can't respect Frenchmen. It's well of us to talk equality and amity. But we can't keep up the farce of equality with them at all. And my opinion is, that the reason why they hate us, and will hate us, and ought to hate us for ever, is the consciousness of this truth on one side or the other. It is not only in history and truth on the sale of the other. It is not only in insolv and bat les, but we are domineering over them in every table This in Europe at this moment. We can't be brought to believe that a Frenchman is equal to an Englishman. Is there any man in England who thinks so in his heart? If so, let him send his name to the publishers.

There is some excellent fooling over the American-Mexican war which is not unapplicable to the war rumours of the present time. Here is an extract :-

General Growdy's division yesterday came up with the main body of the Mexican force under General Cabunas, at Rionogo, where the New Orleans Picayune informs us that a severe engagement took place. Both parties won the victory and were repulsed with severe slaughter. President Santa Anna was present in the action, in the course of which his head was shot off. He subsequently addressed a heart-stirring proclamation to the Mexican nation, in which he described the action of the 27th, which ended in the utter defeat of the Americans, whose victory, however, cost them dear.

ONE OF THACKERAY'S CARTOONS.

(" Jeames and the Butler" on the " Papal Aggression" excitement.)

The most important article in the November Monde Moderne is a study of Hans Memling and his art, by Verhaeren. A second art article contributed by Gabriel Ferry gives us the story of the Balzac Statue.

"Beasts," by Wardlaw Kennedy (Macmillan, 4s. 6d.). The author of these "Thumb-nail Studies in Pets" originally contributed them to a school paper. It is fortunate that he has decided to give them to the general public, for more charming little studies it would be hard to find. It can hardly be classed as a book for children, and yet it will be both instructive and interesting to them; whilst at the same time being deeply fascinating to their elders. The clever sketches of Mr. J. E. Spicer add an additional attraction to an already charming

THE RISE AND FALL OF MOROCCO.

A.R. BUDGETT MEAKIN has produced an exhaustive and elaborately illustrated history of the rise and fall of the Moorish Empire (Swan Sonnenschein). Morocco at the present moment is not actively engaging the attention of the Governments of Europe, but it may do so at any moment. It is almost the last remnant of the Black Continent which has not been appropriated by one nation or another. Moorish history, it must be confessed, does not possess any very great attractions to the man in the street. It is, however, by no means lacking in picturesque incidents; in fact it is crowded with them. But Mr. Meakin, in endeavouring to cover the ground with completeness, has been compelled to introduce a good deal of the dry-as-dust historian into his narrative. His volume will be a valuable one to those interested in the country, for it contains all the essential facts within a comparatively brief compass, and the material is excellently arranged.

TWO HUMAN MONSTERS.

Amid all the confused vicissitudes of the Moorish Dominion there are two men who stand head and shoulders above their fellows. They are the Moorish tyrants Er-Rasheed II. and Ismail, who flourished in the middle of the seventeenth century. Er-Rasheed is attractive on account of his very fiendishness, which places him easily in the first rank of the monsters who have sat upon thrones. His first act was to slay, with his own hand, the slave who had assisted his escape from his brother's prison, and the culmination of a reign that was an unbroken record of treachery and torture was his treatment of helpless women, from whom he extorted the wealth he coveted by crushing their breasts beneath a box, upon the lid of which he himself jumped. This monster, however, found an even more ferocious successor in his brother Ismail. He reigned for fifty-five years, and during that period he ruled Morocco with a rod of iron; yet to-day he is remembered as the great and religious Sultan. On his accession to power he decided to make Fez his capital, and in announcing this fact he forwarded ten thousand heads, including those of women and children, slain in his rival's camp to adorn the walls of the future capital. He also ordered the bodies of his prisoners of war to be interwoven with rushes so as to form a bridge whereby his victorious army might cross a river. Many hundreds were slain by his own hand. Indeed, so fond was he of shedding blood himself that he would lop off the head of the nearest attendant to try the edge of a new sword or hatchet. To spare his own arm an executioner always stood at his side. Another favourite pastime was to pin his subjects with a lance, a couple of which were always at hand ready for use. . His child Zidan, when but seven years of age, was permitted to kill a slave with his own hand. Such are the monarchs whose deeds adorn the pages of Mr. Meakin's volume.

THE FUTURE OF MOROCCO.

As for the future of Morocco Mr. Meakin sees the best hopes of improvement in a self-denying ordinance on the part of the European Powers not to individually interfere in the affairs of Morocco under any pretext. But he is not hopeful of this coming about. Reform, if reform there is to be, must come from without. The inhabitants themselves are very contented with their government. It is better than any they have had for a long time past. It realises their ideal, for it is purely native government, the outcome of native character. All revolutions in Morocco have been religious revolutions. There is no political life, and if the people are to be roused it must be at the bidding of a Mahdi. But reform through the instrumentality of a successful Mahdi is certainly the last thing that is to be desired. There are several nations not unwilling to undertake the task of administering the remains of the once mighty Moorish Empire. Of these the most important is France, which also is in the best position to carry out any designs she may secretly cherish. The lowlands could easily be conquered, Mr. Meakin believes, but the Berbers would take a great deal of pacifying. England is indifferent. All that we need claim is the strip of land which lies over against Gibraltar. Germany would not object to a coaling station, and Spain dreams of possessing Morocco by right of inheritance. But this is a dream, and nothing more. However, as elsewhere, the rival nations neutralise each other, and Morocco jogs along in the old grooves.

Christmas Cards.

Messrs. Raphael Tuck and Sons are, as usual, well to the fore with novelties amongst their wonderful collection of Christmas cards and almanacks. Having made special arrangements with the Wedgwood firm, they are enabled to utilise their designs for the Christmas and New Year cards. Some of these Wedgwood cards containing platinotypes are very attractive and delicately got up. It is, perhaps, to be regretted that there are not more platinotypes and photogravures in the collection, but even Messrs. Raphael Tuck and Sons cannot find room for every attraction each year. Some of the calendars in photogravure are exceedingly well executed, and will do credit to the beginning of a new century. The Toy Books and Juvenile Gift-Books combine wonderful variety with much taste, and must inevitably recommend themselves to parents choosing suitable gifts for their children at this season. We are glad to be able to congratulate Messrs. Raphael Tuck and Sons on their removal into their new central City premises in "Raphael House," Moorfields.

"Primeval Scenes" for Children.

Of the many Christmas illustrated children's books there are few as clever as "Primeval Scenes" (Lamley and Co., 6s.). The letterpress is by the Rev. H. N. Hutchinson, author of several books on the early life of the world, so that his readers may be glad to know that besides being amused they are also being instructed. But the real charm of the book is the series of line drawings which fills every other page. These are by J. Hassall and Fred Burridge, and, though confessedly founded upon Mr. Reed's idea of "Prehistoric Peeps" in Punch, they possess a cleverness all their own. It is difficult to decide which artist is the cleverer, though Mr. Hassall has contributed more-sketches than his fellow-worker. The two scenes which are the cleverest of a very clever series are those entitled "Catching Wild Horses" and "The Humours of Fishing." Having made such an excellent start, it would be a pity to disappoint the public by not continuing such an excellent and altogether amusing series of sketches. Therefore we will look out for the second volume with pleasant anticipations.

THE Revue d'Encyclopédique of November 4th is a "War and Peace" number, dealing with (1) the horrors of war as represented in art and literature, and (2) the Hague Conference.

that ing its ever primedit not of the und pair mos nother fam cons

T

Wit

Clo

the 8s.) give public trepushor storiartic the Track infor offer

the t

T

will seve. Dr. Hard whice a state in and steam Ch color and 832 p conte men. North Th Socie 812 p us fut the h

the i

plate

The year of accuss but of which present pages

SOME OF THE ANNUALS.

The Magazine of Art Yearly Volume, 1899. 21s. With about 800 illustrations and a series of special plates. Cloth gilt. Cassell and Co. Aiways a handsome volume, the new volume of the Magazine of Art is handsomer than usual. For interesting letterpress, splendid engrav-ing and chaste get-up it is unsurpassed. One turns over its pages and is comforted by the reflection that not even in America would a better example of artistic printing be found. Mr. Spielmann, the gifted and genial editor, has in the last ten or fifteen years contributed not a little to that higher appreciation of art which is one of the marked characteristics of our time. In the volume under review, architecture, arts and crafts, drawings, paintings, sculpture, and all other branches of art are most completely dealt with by the best authorities; and nothing could exceed the beauty of the reproductions of famous pictures-both ancient and modern. All things considered, one can get the best value for a Christmas present in an annual of this kind.

The Girl's Own Annual (the Religious Tract Society, 8s.) has as a frontispiece a coloured plate which was given away on the occasion of the one thousandth publication of the Girl's Own Paper on February 25th. It contains besides, three other coloured plates and eight uncoloured. Its printing and binding fully maintain its reputation. There are 848 pages and hundreds—or should we say thousands?—of illustrations. Four serial stories run through the volume, and there are many articles upon other subjects. One of the chief features is the correspondence column.

must

h the e last ations

tering

. Of

in the

cretly

, Mr.

need altar.

Spain

ance. er, as and ell to ction

made they tmas

cards ately

e not find

the uted,

ndercom-

s for ole to their phael

there

and tchin-

f the

that ucted.

f line

re by eeps "

own.

verer,

etches

n are ititled

rs of would

such tches.

with

is a ors of

the

In the Boy's Own Annual for 1899 (the Religious Tract Society, 8s.) our boy friends will find plenty of bright, breezy stories to read, not to mention the mine of information on all sorts of subjects which the volume offers. The annual for 1899 is the coming of age volume—the twenty-first—of, the Boy's Own Paper. Amongst the tales, etc., which fill the 840 pages the most interesting will no doubt be the serial stories, of which there are several, by such popular writers as G. Manville Fenn, Dr. Gordon Stables, David Ker, Jules Verne, and Harcourt Burrage. There are fifteen full-page plates, of which nine are coloured, and some of these latter reach a standard which it would be hard to surpass. One of the most interesting is that showing, in colours, the flags and funnels of our steamship lines and of our fishing steamers.

Chums (Vol. vii., 1899. Cassell, 8s.) has thirteen coloured plates, chiefly dealing with military subjects, and has altogether one thousand illustrations in its 832 pages. Perhaps the best section among its varied contents is that devoted to interviews with well-known men. The serial stories are by G. M. Fenn, H. Barrow North, Fred Whishaw, W. P. Wright, Reg. Wray, and Arthur Rigby.

The Sunday at Home (Vol. for 1899. Religious Tract Society, 7s. 6d.). This year the annual contains 812 pages. It is always welcome, and the number before us fully maintains in printing, illustration, and binding the high standard of the preceding volumes. Some of the illuminated texts, which take the form of full-page plates, are very well done.

The Leisure Hour (R.T.S., 7s. 6d.), appears this year for the last time in the familiar form to which we are accustomed. It will be altered to a smaller size (S.R. 8vo.), but otherwise the magazine will remain the same, a fact which will no doubt cause general satisfaction. The present volume contains eight hundred and twelve pages full of stories, articles and pictures. It stands almost alone amongst the annuals issued by the R.T.S. in not having any coloured plates. Its ordinary engravings are, however, a very good substitute.

The yearly volume of the Quiver contains 900 illustrations and a coloured frontistice. There are five serial stories, and some forty complete tales by well-known writers. Among the various papers contributed are a series of original hymn tunes by cathedral organists. The volume is well got up and contains 1,152 pages (Cassell, 7s. 6d).

(From " Photograms of the Year 1899.")

In "Photograms of the Year," 1899, much space is devoted to the photographic exhibitions of the year. It seems a pity that in an attempt to show more of the exhibits, they have been photographed on the walls in such numbers that the reproduction is worse than useless. However, it would be unfair to take too much notice of one point in which a mistake has been made when the rest of the volume is so excellently got-up and arranged. Apart from its technical value it forms a most attractive gift-book to all amateur photographers, and it is impossible for a book to have a wider field than that. Therefore it is probable that "Photograms of the Year" will have as wide a circulation as it deserves. (Dawbarn and Ward, 3s. net).

BOOKS RECEIVED.

	-	· of revenir products in topic sequences on the BIOGRAPHY.		Yorke, Curtis. Jocelyn Errol. cr. 8vo. 286 pp(Jarrold	0/
Adone Jose H The Farl Married Life of Maria Josepha, Lady		Yorke, Curtis. Jocelyn Errol. cr. 8vo. 286 pp	6/6
Stanley m.d. 8vo. 461 pp	18/0	HISTORICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL.
Autobiography and Letters of Mrs. Oliphant, edited by Mrs. Mrs. Harry Cophill. cr. 8vo. 360 pp	6/0	"Africanus." The Transvaal Boers. A Historical Sketch. cr. 8vo paper. 158 pp	. 1/0
Chisel, Pen and Poignard; or, Benvenuto Cellini. cr. 8vo 158 pp. (Longmans)	5/0	India, Ceylon, Straits Settlements, Hong-Kong. (Brijish Empir	8
(Longmans, Cock, Mrs. Alfred. The Life of Madame de Longueville. 1, cr. 80c.)		Series I.) med. 3vo. 536 pp	e 0/0
280 pp	110	Newsham-Davis, LigutCol. N. The Transvaal under the Ougen	1/6
Douglas, M. In Lion Land; the Story of Livingstone and Stanley.	6/0	(illustrated.) cr. 4to. 93 pp	6/0
cr. 8vo. 275 pp	2/5	415 pp (Stock	8/6
Aroportkin, Frince. Memors of a Kevolutonist. So. 1. E. So. 258 pp. and 340 pp	21/0	MISCELLANEOUS.
(Dowden)	1/0	Bennett, Bertie. Tip Tail; or the Adventures of a Black Kitten
Russell, Sir Edward. 'That Reminds Me.' med. 8vo. 333 pp. (Fisher Unwin) net	12/0	Illustrated. 135 pp(Lamley and Co. Dearmer, Mabel. The Book of Penny Toys. Illustrated in Colour.
Ryley, J. Horton. Ralph Fitch. England's Pioneer to India. I. cr. 8:00. (illustrated.) 264 pp	22/0	cr. 440	6/0
870. (illustrated.) 264 pp(Fisher Unwin) Sturt, Mrs. N. G. Life of Charles Sturt, med. 8 o. 395 pp		and F. Bu ridg: 51 pp	6/0
West Sir Algerron Recollections 1822-1886 1 cr 870 2 vols	16/0	O'Moore, MacCurthy. Tips for Travellers, cr. 8vo. 156 pp. (Cnic go
West, Sir Algernon. Recollections, 1832-1886. l. cr. 870. 2 vols. (Smith, Elder)	21/0	"Rectangle." Earth Not a Glob :. l. cr. 8vo. 132 pp	5/6
ESSAYS AND BELLES LETTRES.		(Durban, Natal) Rodwell, G. New Testament Greek (a course for beginners). cr. 8vo.	0 2/0
Japp, A. H. Our Common Cuckoo and Other Cuckoos and Parasitic al Birds. (illustrated.) cr. 8vo. 2)2 pp	6/0	232 pp
Jephson, Henry. The Real French Revolutionist. cr. 8vo. 243 pp.		Salmonsen, M. We Mortals. A Play in Three Acts. paper. 147 pp. (Chicago	j
Linton, Mrs. Lynn, My Literary Life. cr. 8vo. 103 pp		NEW EDITIONS.	m
(Hodder and Stoughton)	3/6	Bryce. Impressions of South Africa, 3rd Edition; Revised. (New Pre-
Mercer, A. G., S. T. D., 1817-1822. Notes of an Outlook on Life. cr. 8vo. 293 pp	5/0	fatory Chapter and Transvaal Conventions of 1881 and 1884). cr. 8vo. 433 pp	2/0
Norway, Arthur H. Highways and Byways in Yorkshire. Illustrated by J. Pennell and Hugh Thomson. J. cr. 8vo. 284 pp. (Macmillan)	6/0	Dickens, Charles, Nicholas Nickleby. (New Century Library.)	2/0
Prescott, Annie M. Makapıla-by-the-Sea, Hawaii. Vol. I. cr. 8vo.	,	cap, 8vo. 88o pp. (Nelson) net. Thackeray, W. M. Vanity Fair. (New Century Library.) cap, 8vo. 784 pp. (Nelson) net.	-/-
Spielmann, M. H. The Hitherto Unidentified Contributions of W. M. Thackeray to Psuch. (illustrated.) I. cr. 8vo. 316 pp.			2/0
Thackeray to Punch. (illustrated.) l. cr. 8vo. 316 pp(Harper)	7/6	POETRY.
Wedmore, Frederick. On Books and Arts. cr. 8vo. 286 pp(Hodder)		Bird, R. J. Golding. Fugivive Verses. cr. 8vo. 234 pp (Stock) Gowing, Mrs. Bylmer. Boadicea (a play in four acts). cr. 8vo.
FICTION.	0/0	Moulton, Louise Chandler. At the Wind's Will. cr 8vo. 171 pp.	3/6
Blust, C. F. Charles Wavendon and Others. I. cr. 8vo. 197 pp. (Stock)
Stock)	6/0	Robertson, J. A. A Met ical Version of the Psalms. as pp. (Stock Scot, A. F. Adam and Lilith. or pp. "Burleigh") net. Somerville, G. G. The Refreat from Moscow. cr. 870. 68 pp	3/0
Burnett, Frances Hodgson. In Connection with the De Willoughby Claim. cr. 8vo. 477 pp(F. Warns)	6/0	Somerville, G. G. The Retreat from Moscow. cr. 8vo. 68 pp	2/6
Claim. cr. 8vo. 477 pp	6/0	The rope Anthology. 1701-1744. Edited by Fin. Edward Bob r.
Craib, Alexander. Malcolm Ross. cr. 8vo. 303 pp	2/6	cr. 8vo. 312 pp(Frowde)	2/6
cr. 8vo. (illustrated.) 401 pp	6/0	REFERENCE. Alabaster, Ernest. Notes and Commentaries on Chinese Criminal Law.
Crommelin, May. Kinsah. cr. 8vo. 287 pp(J. Long)	6/0	med. 870. 675 pp	16/0
(J. Long)	6/0	Dalton, Capt. Davis. How to Swim, cr. 8vo. 133 pp	6/0
(I and whall Prace)	016	Gould, R. F. Military Lodges, 1732-1839. cr. 8vo. 223 pp	-/-
Davis, Richard H. The Lion and the Unicorn. cr. 8vo. 315 pp (Heinem ann)	6/0	Healthful Physical Exercises (on the Swedish system), by a Medical	5/0
Dumas, Alexandre. The Snow on Shah Dagh and Ammalat Bev.	6/0	Man. 67 pp. Lambert, Rev. F. C. The Perfect Negative. cr. 8vo. 136 pp (Haz:ll, Watson and Viney)	2/6
cr. 8vo. 480 pp	0.00	Major, A., B.Sc. Newmann's Housewifery for the School and Home	1/0
(Digby Long) Harcourt. l. cr. 8vo. 358 pp	6/0	Major, A., B.Sc. Newmann's Housswifery for the School and Home demy 8vo. 487 pp	5/6
Haverfield, E. L. Blind Loyalty. (Story for Girls.) cr. 8vo. 2)8 pp. (Nelson)		J. Long.)	3/6
Hohler, Mrs. Edwin. The Bravest of Them All. (A Story for Young	2/0	RELIGIOUS.
Hohler, Mrs. Edwin. The Bravest of Them All. (A Story for Young People.) cr. 8vo. 214 pp	6/0	Almond, H. H. Christ the Protestant. cr. 8vo. 330 pp. (Blackwood) Cheyne, Rev. T. K. The Christian Use of the Psalms. cr. 8vo.	5/0
Hume, Fergus. The Red-headed Man. cr. 8vo. 311 pp			5/0
	6/0	Drummond, Henry. The New Evangelism. l. cr. 8vo. 210 pp	5/0
Kent, Edward. A Lawful Crine. cr. 8vo. 330 pp. (Leadenhall Press) Linton, E. Lynn. Grace Ayton. cr. 8vo. 212 pp, (Chambers) Maril, Phil. On Both Sides of the Line. cr. 8vo. 411 pp. (Redway)	3/6	Forsyth, P. T. Rome, Reform, and Reaction, cr. 8vo. 246 pp. (Hodder)	5/0
Mason, A. E. W. Miranda of the Balcony. cr. 8vo. 312 pp	61-	Gardner, Percy, Litt.D. Exploratio Evangelica. (A Brief Exami-	3/3
Masson, Rosaline, The Transgressors. cr. 8vo. 333 pp (Madmilan) Middlemass, Jean. The Yellow Badge. cr. 8vo. 312 pp (Hodder)	6/0	(A. and C. Black)	15/0
Middlemass, Jean. The Yellow Badge. cr. 8vo. 312 pp. (Digby Long)	6/0	Maclaren, Alexander, D.D. Leaves from the Tree of Life, 1. cr. 8vo.	5/0
Reay, Marcus. The Love Affairs of a Curate. cr. 8vo. 183 pp		233 pp. (Isbister) Madden, Archdeacon. Tombs or Temples. cr. 8vo. 151 pp. (Stock) Smith, John, D.D. Christian Character as a Social Power. cr. 8vo.	3/6
Reynolds, B.ssie. Loaves and Fishes. cr. 8vo. 23) pp(Stock)	3/6	246 pp (Fiode:	3/6
Reynolds, B. ssie. Loaves and Fishes. ct. 8vo. 23.pp(Stock Kodney, Harley. A Treble Soloist. C. 8vo. 312 pp(Digby Long) lilberrad, U. L. The Enchanter. ct. 8vo. 389 pp(Macmillan) [hynne, R. Boffin's Find, a Tale of the Fift es. cr. 8vo. 325 pp (J. Long)	6/0	246 pp. (Fiodde.) Stalker, James. The Ctristology of Jesus. (The Cunningham Lectures, 1899.) cr. 8"0. 238 pp	6/0
hynne, R. Boffin's Find, a Tale of the Fift es. cr. 8vo. 324 pp	6/-	Switzer, B. N. The Mystery of the Ages. med, 8vo. 277 pp	-10
(J. Long)	0/0	(Stock)	7/0

128

cha only V Sevv arra pup lette mar I I Fren sugg and on, tions other in th our l W M. M.

of l work prob acqu my r coun Engl why Fren mucl Gern Teut must mana I 1 subject surrou board comra Some brothe of inf master never

We comparate the comparate the comparate the construction of the c

LEARNING LANGUAGES BY LETTER-WRITING.

As it is now three years since we first undertook the brief account of its rise, ups and downs and changes will perhaps interest many of those who have only read the later reports.

6/0

8/6

3/6

6/0

6/0

, 2/0

2/0

2/0

5/0

3/6

6/0

2/6

3/6

5/0

2/6

5/6

3/6

5/0

5/0

5/0

15/0

3/6

6/0

7/6

We were not the first in the field, for M. Gaston Sevrette, of the Lycée of Chartres, some time in 1893 arranged, with the help of Chums, to introduce to his pupils any English boys who would like to exchange letters. Nearly five years afterwards a young Englishman wrote to me :-

I have been carrying on a correspondence with a young Frenchman for the last four years. It was brought about by a suggestion in Chums. I received a letter from a French boy; and from that day forward the correspondence has been carried on. We have been able to give each other advice and suggestions concerning our studies, our countries, commerce, and many other things. We have since then left school, taken our places in the world, and have married, but to-day we are as prompt in our letter-writing as when we began.

With all this, however, I was quite unacquainted when M. Mieille first wrote advocating such a plan, and suggesting that if the Fevue Universitaire and the REVIEW OF REVIEWS would co-operate, the scheme might be worked on a large scale. I readily agreed, for the problem of how to interest schoolboys and girls in the acquisition of a foreign language has always exercised my mind. We cannot all take our children to a foreign country and let them learn in the easiest way-and the English boy says with a shrug, "French is such a bore; why cannot all sensible people speak English?" The French boy loves his own country and his own language much more than any other language or country, and the German thinks that as the English are indebted to the Teutons for the majority of their words, his language must be the best. So I asked M. Mieille how he managed, and I here reproduce part of his reply :

I leave the boys completely a free hand in the choice of subjects. But in the beginning I suggested that the best way to open a correspondence would be to describe the school and surroundings. They described their school life, sometimes as boarders, sometimes as day scholars, and asked their English comrades for a reciprocity. Then about their games, sports, etc. Some even spoke about their family, and told all about their brothers and sisters. The holidays were an inexhaustible source of information. In short, the choice was left to the writer, the master being always glad to give his advice, but taking care never to force it, unasked, on the boys.

We have now a steady flow of applications, but at first comparatively few of our schoolmasters were willing to make a trial, though numbers approved of the idea. "Boys will not write their own language, much more a foreign one." "There is no time for such work in the school session," said others, and many feared that "evil communications would corrupt good manners." I do not suppose such men thought our English boys were to be the corrupting agents. Masters do not always think schoolboy manners perfect, and in France the masters generally supervise the correspondence, so the last argument was neither very wise nor very Christian. Neither applied to those beyond school age, and soon applications from them came pouring in. Here we were beset with difficulties. No French newspaper would or does co-operate. After a time the Revue des Revues lent valuable aid, but only for a time; and in Germany no ordinary journal has ever offered to co-operate. The organ of the Saxon Neuphilologen Verband does, but its circulation is chiefly amongst masters and students. And there is another drawback-at the time of life when our young men are most eager to learn that language which will help them on in their work, French and Germans are doing their army service. The majority of these young soldiers have little time and less money, and as, in France, newspayers are prohibited to them, they would certainly not be encouraged to write letters to foreigners even if allowed. Thus the age from nineteen to twenty-four is practically barred unless a correspondence has been established before schooldays were over. With regard to ladies the difference of up-bringing hinders our foreign friends from a large response. The bicycle, however, will doubtless change that presently; but as yet, except in Paris and some few large towns, the French girl who is comme-il-faut does not bicycle. Hence, as I need to write several letters for each individual applicant, I have been obliged to ask adults to contribute a shilling for stamps; all the clerical work I freely give.

DRAWBACKS.

This contribution is one of the drawbacks to me : for when anyone sends a shilling he or she expects value for it, and this I cannot at once give. Neither can I take the applications in order. "A." is thirty-five and in business for himself. I duly make inquiries for him, but my correspondent replies: "Cannot do anything for Mr. A—, but Monsieur G-, who is twenty-four and studying for the legal profession, would like to write to some one of his own Therefore "F.," who is more suitable, and yet perhaps applied later, can be arranged for first. National prejudices also arise now and again. Next month I hore to have space for one or two letters, examples of these drawbacks. Meantime I should very much like to receive reports, but especially from such as began a correspondence in 1897 and are still continuing it; and I should also be glad to hear from those who are writing to Spain, Denmark, Finland, Russia, Turkey, or even farther off.

NOTICES.

An English lady in London, S.W., would be very glad to meet a French lady once a week for conversation.

A student in Croatia hopes some one in England will be sufficiently interested in his country to correspond with

A Parisian lady hopes some English mother will be willing to arrange a change of homes for a child-her daughter is fifteen.

A French professor would take charge of a boy until the summer holidays, if the parents would receive him and his wife during those holidays in return.

There is to be an International Congress of Modern Languages in Paris, July, 1900. The Revue Universitaire, Messrs. Colin, 5 Rue de Mézières, invites comments from teachers. A winter "Holiday Course" is arranged in Paris at University Hall.

TREITSCHKE, author of the history of Germany in the Nineteenth Century, is the subject of an appreciation by Philip Kent in Gentleman's for December. The writer describes him as "a pupil, doubtless, of Macaulay, but a pupil who far excels his master."

ART IN THE MAGAZINES.

THE ARTS AND CRAFTS EXHIBITION.

In the art magazines there are several notices of the (sixth) Arts and Crafts Exhibition, which has been opened at the New Gallery for the last two months. It is three years since the last exhibition of the Society was held in London. Mabel Cox, who writes in the November number of the Artist, says :-

If we are to judge the exhibition as one judges the work of an individual, not by his failures or his indifferent successes, but by the excellence of his best work, we can say with certainty that the present one is a good exhibition. If, however, we are to judge it by the preponderance of good work over indifferent, the verdict is doubtful; and if, as for ou own part we judge it, by the general level of the work, the verdict, we fear, must be unfavourable.

Thus it would seem that the influence of the Society during the past few years has not been great within. On the other hand, that it has been enormous without anybody who has followed the movements of the commercial producers can have no doubt, and this influence is of far greater importance.

The Morris room contains many beau iful things, and despite our familiarity with most of them, we got a keen enjoyment from seeing them, and left them once more realising what a tremendous debt present-day craftsmen owe to the great and artistic mind that conceived them, and how Morris's influence is likely to last a great many years still.

Another interesting notice is that by Mr. H. Wilson in the November number of the Architectural Review. He, too, recognises the master's influence strongly at work, and thus refers to the Morris exhibit :-

The room is like a pictured tomb of some remote epoch, the walls storied with the deeds of its occupant, save only in this, that the man himself has pictured his own history, and there is

Of the exhibition as a whole, Mr. Wiison's verdict is more favourable than that of the Artist's critic. He savs :-

There is so much earnest work of many kinds that a connected review of it seems almost impossible. There are many new names, the general level of the work seems much higher, and there is less affectation and less straining after effect and originality than was at one time apparent.

The Studio, which makes a strong feature of applied art, begins its notice in October and does not conclude it in November. Many illustrations of exhibits are included.

Architectural Record.-Oct.

Domestic Stained Glass in France. Illustrated. René de Cuers.

Architectural Review.—Effingham House, Arundel Street. is. Nov.

William Simpson. Illustrated. G. McCullock.
The Arts and Crafts Exhibition.
Celtic Illuminated Manuscripts. Illustrated. J. A. Bruun.

Artist.-Constable. 18. Nov.

The Animal Sketches of Miss Fannie Moody. Illustrated. F. Miller.

The Influence of Browning's "Pied Piper." Illustrated. Mrs. Percy Leake.

Art, and the Teaching of Art in Siam. Illustrated. E. A. Norbury. Embroidery. Illustrated.

Oa the Making of Paints for Lustre Ware. H. C. S. Sidelights on the Methods of Mr. G. C. Haité, Illustrated. J. S. R. The Arts and Crafts Exhibition. Illustrated. Mabel Cox.

Atlantic Monthly.-Nov.

In Honour of Van Dyck. Mrs. Elizabeth Robins Pennell.

Bookman (New York).-Nov.

Art in America. Henry B. Fuller.

House .- "QUEEN" OFFICE. 6d. Nov. Leaves from a Normandy Sketch-Book. Illustrated. W. Naval Heroes in Earthenware. Illustrated. Bric-à-Brac. German Civic Silver. Illustrated. Silversmith.

Idler.-Nov.

Hans Makart; a King of Painters. Illustrated. P. G. Konody.

Irish Ecclestastical Record.-Nov.

Idealism and Realism in Art. Rev. M. Cronin.

Leisure Hour.-Dec.

Bronzes. Illustrated. Ernest M. Jessop.

Magazine of Art-Cassell, 18. 4d. Dec.

"The Qu'en of Samothrace," after W. Graham Robertson. William Lindsay Windu. Illustrated. E. Rimbault Dibdin. Iron Gates and Their Making. Illustrated. Walter Shaw

The Art Sales of the Season. Continued. Illustrated. W. Roberts.

The Lucas Cranach Exhibition at Dresden. Illustrated. Octave Maus.

W. Graham Robertson. Illustrated. M. H. Spielmann. Recent Acquisitions at Our National Museuns and Galleries. Illustrated

The Arts and Crafts, 1899. Illustrated. E. F. Strange.

North American Review.-Nov.

The Picture Gallery of the Hermitage. Continued. Claude Phillips.

Pall Mall Magazine .- Dec.

Turner Prints. Illustrated. Frederick Wedmore.

Saint Nicholas .- MACMILLAN. 18. Dec. Maurice Boutet de Monvel. Illustrated. Marie Van Vorst.

Strand Magazine,-Dec.

Sir L. A. Tadema; Interview. Illustrated. F. Dolman. A Peep into Punch, 1842 to 1899. Illustrated. John Holt

The Liberty Statue, New York; the Largest Statue in the World. Illustrated. A. Meta.

Studio .- 5, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN. 18. Nov.

Je in Jacques Henner. Illustrated. F. Lees. Sketches by Frank L. Emanuel; Illustrations.

The Art Treasures of Mr. E. A. Waterlow. A. L. Baldry.

British Decorative Art in 1899 and the Arts and Crafts Exhibition. Continued. Illustrated.

Supplements:—"Lévite d'Ephraim" and "La Madeleine," after J. J. Henner; "Portrait of Mr. E. A. Waterlow," after Sir L. A. Tadema; and Study, after G. J. Pinnell.

Werner's Magazine.-Nov.

Why We should interest Ourselves in Art. Florence P. Holden. How to enjoy Pictures. Illustrated.

Windsor Magazine.-Dec.

Tissot's Pictures of the Life of Christ. Illustrated. C. Moffett.

630

The

The Socia The

Life The The

Ame

The

Conc

Old

A So The The

Alco Socia

Ang

Inter

Scoti How

A

The T

Curio

Corn-Merli

Englis The N

Stone The R Electr

Arch

On Sc The S

Percy Compo

The U

The Som The

Twen The M

Ruskin

LIST OF THE LEADING CONTENTS OF CURRENT PERIODICALS.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN.

American Catholic Quarterly Review .- Burns and Oates. 4 dollars per annum. Oct.

The Third French Republic as a Persecutor of the Church. Rev. Reuben rated.

nody.

din. Shaw

W.

ctave

leries.

laude

st.

Holt

n the

rated.

Crafts eine," low,"

olden.

offett,

ell.

W.

Parsons.

The Origin of the Solar System. Rev. A. L. Cortie.

The Peace of the World. Rev. Chas. Macksey.

The Foundation of Aesthetics. Rev. G. H. Joyce.

The Clic Groundwork of "The Inferno" and Dante's Prototype, John

Review of the Pauline Chronology. Continued. Rev. A. J. Maas.
The Philippine Friars as Missioners. Bryan J. Clinch.
Social Standpoint in Religious Philosophy. Wifred Ward.
The Sulpitians at the Cradle of the American Hierarch/, Richard R.

Life in Modern Biology. James J. Walsh.'
The Last Ten Years of the Temporal Power. Donat Sampson.
The Making of Religion. Rev. Joseph V. Tracy.

American Journal of Sociology .- LUZAC AND Co. 35 cents. Nov.

Aims and Principles of the Consumers' League, Florence Kelley,
The Social Function of the Church. Graham Taylor.
Concerning Certain Wise Limits to Charity Organisation Society Work.
Alexander Johnson.
Old and New Aspects of the Aryan Question. Georges Vache: De

Old and New Aspects of the Aryan question.

Lapouge:
A Sociological Vi.w of Sovereigoty, Continued, John R. Commons.
The Working Hypothesis in Social Reform. George H. Mead.
The Press and Public Opinion. V. S. Yarros, Alcoholic Hypnotism. Arthur MacDonald.
Social Institutions and the Riemann Surface. Amy Hewes.

Anglo-American Magazine.—Bream's Buildings, Chancery Lane. 15. Nov.

Inter-Race Movements. Austin Bierbower.
Scotia's Ain Game of Curlin'. David Foulis.
How Japanese Boys and Girls live. Mrs. George Donaldson.
Negro Soldir si for the Philippines. A. R. Abbott.
The British and the Boers. Editor.
The Aliskan Boundary Line; Count Nesselrode and the Treaty of 1825.
David Glass.

Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science.—P. S. King. i dollar. Nov.

The Terms and Tenor of the Clayton-Bulwe: Treaty. Lindley M. Keasbey. Franchises or Monopolies—Their Public Ownership and Operation. H. E. Tremain. The Recent Production of Silver and Its Probable Future. E. Sherwood

Meade. Antiquary. - ELLIOT STOCK. 6d. Dec.

Curiosities of and in Our Ancient Churches. Continued. H. Philibert Feasey.
Corn-Mills in Shetland. Illustrated. David Christie, Merlin's Mechanical Museum. G. L. Apperson.

Architectural Record.—14, VESEY STREET, New YORK. 25 cents. Oct.

English "Georgian" Architecture—the Source of the American "Colonial" Style. Illustrated. G. A. T. Middl.ton.
The New York Capitol Building. "Illustrated. Cuyler Reynolds.
Stone in American Architecture. Illustrated. Russell Sturgis.
The Return to Stone. Illustrated. W. S. Adams.
Electric Lighting in Albany Capitol. Illustrated.

Architectural Review .- Eppingham House, Arundel Street. 18.

On Scottish Gardens, Illustrated. R. S. Lorimer, The Silchester Exhibition. Illustrated. G. Clinch. Percy's House and the Gunpowder Plot. Illustrated. Competition for a Villa in the Riviera. Illustrated. The Voracity of the Town. S. S. G.

Arena. - GAY AND BIRD. 128. per ann. Nov.

The United States and the Philippines: The United States and the Philippines:
The American Attempt at Conquest. J. H. Marble.
Some Gains from Expansion. Prof. F. Spencer Baldwin.
The Philippin: Question Reviewed. Ramon Reyes Lala.
Twen ieth Century Democracy. Carl Vrooman.
The Maybrick Case: the English Dreyfus Case. Dr. Helen Densmore.
The Society for the Study of Life. Mrs. Almon Hensley.
The Right of a Child to be Well-Born. M. M. Irwin.
Ruskin's Education. Alice Hyneman Sotheran.
Criminality in Children. Continued. M. P. E. Groszmann. APROSY, -MACMILLAN. 18, Nov.

"Liberté, Égalité, Fraternité." C. J. Langston. St. Moritz and the Engadine. Illustrated. Chas. W. Wood. H.:avenly Homesickness. Miss P. W. Roose.

A Few Distinguish d Ghosts. E. F. Cobby. The Garden of Sleep. Miss P. W. Roose.

Atlantic Monthly .- GAY AND BIRD. IS. Nov.

The Case of the Negro. Booker T. Washington.
A Lesson from the Mal y States. Hugh Clifford.
Can New Op.nings b: found for Capital? Chas. A. Conant.
Goethe's Message to America. Kuno Francke.
Justice for the Boy. Jacob A. Riis.
The Good Government of an Empi e. William Cunningham. The Obloans. Rollin Lynde Hartt.
Some New Letters of Tourgenisv. Rosa Newmarch.
Thoreau's Attitude toward Nature. Bradford Torrey.

Badminton Magazina,-Longmans, 18. Dec. Winter Sports in the Canton des Grisons. Illustrated. Mrs. E. P. L. Winter Sports in the Canton des Ortsons
Higgin
A Moorland Ride. Illustrated. Mrs. Whitehorne.
A Day with a Seal. Illustrated. Geoffrey Gathorne-Hardy.
Billiards. Illustrated. Frederic Adye.
Fishing at the Falls. Illustrated. Edw. Roper.
Colorado in the Six iss. M. O'Connor Morris.
A Plea for the Fine-Weather Sportsman. Illustrated. G. H. Jalland.

Bankers' Magazine,-WATERLOW AND SONS. 18. 6d. Dec. Some Lessons of the Year. Currency Experiments in India and Argentina. W. R. Lawson.

Old-Age Pensions. Andrew Mu ray. Blackwood's Magazine, -BLACKWOOD. ss. 6d. Dec. Samuel Pepys's Library: the Library of an Old Scholar. Charles

Whibley. Whibley,
Charles Fox and Charles the Second, G. S. Street.
A Landsman's Cruise with the Mediterranean Fleet.
A Vision of Colombo. Mrs. A. S. Boyd.
The Invis bility of the Soldier. Li-ur.-Col. C. H. Powell.
The Samoa Agreement in Plain English. Basil Thomson.
Lord Lytton's Indian Administration.

The Way On Contribution of the Contribution of th The War Operations in South Africa. A Military Contributor. Is the Transvaal War a Necessity?

Board of Trade Journal. - EVRE AND SPOTTISWOODE, 6d. Nov. The Development of Canadian Trade, Auriferous Deposits in Siberia. Trade of the Naw "Open Ports" of Formosa. The Russian Ra'lway Systems.

Bookman,-Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. Nov. Charlotte Brontë and One of Her Critics. Dr. W. Robertson Nicoll.
George Maredith. With Portrait. Hannah Lynch.
Mr. Kipling's Schoolmasters and Schoolboys. Illustrated. T. E. Page and A. H. Walker.
War Correspondents. With Portraits.

Bookman.—(America). Dood, Mead and Co., New York. 95 cents.

New York in Fiction. Illustrated. Continued. Arthur Bartlett Maurice. Frank Norris, Realist. With Portrait. Frederic Taber Cooper. Thackeray's Becky. Illustrated. A. B. M. The First Books of Dante Gabriel and Christina G. Rossetti. Luther S. Livingston.

Canadian Magazine.—Ontario Publishing Co., Toronto 25 cents. Nov.

Litera'ure in Canada. Robert Barr.
Technical Education in Canada. B. McEvoy.
Nelson, B.C.; a Typical Mining Town. Illustrated. W. F. Brougham.
An Educational Bureau for Canada. Dr. J. M. Harper.
Twenty Years on the Warpath. Frederic Villers.
Mr. D. McNicoll. With Portrait, Jas. S. Brierley.
A Canadian Engine-Works. Illustrated. Norman Patterson.
The Moose of Canada. Illustrated. Chas. A. Bramble.
When the British fought in South Africa. E. B. Bigg vr.

Captain.—George Newnes. 6d. December.
Christmas with Manville Fenn; Interview. Illustrated. Keble Howard.
Association Football, and How to Play It. Illustrated. C. B. Fry
A Boer's Account of Majuba. Illustrated. Fisher Vane.
Christmas on the Railway. Illustrated. J. A. Kay.

Cassell's Magazine. -GASSELL. IS. Dec. "The 21st (Empress of India's) Lancers at Omdurman," after Frontispiec:—"The 21st (Empress of Indua's) Lancers at Chindra W. B. Wollen.
Windsor Castle. Illustrated. Marquis of Lorne.
Sir Henry Irving. Illustrated. M. C. Salaman.
Some Stage Effects. Illustrated. W. B. Robertson.
The Royal Horse Artillery. Illustrated. B. Fletcher Robinson.

Cassier's Magazins .- 33, Bedford Street, Strand. 18. Nov. An 83-Mile Electric Power Transmission Plant. Illustrated. James A. Lighthipe.
Some Överhead Electric Travelling Cranes. Illustrated. Arthur G. Parrott. The Safety of Petroleum Fuel. Illustrated. J. Holden. Valuation of Manufacturing Property for Taxation. Charles T. Main. Recent Practice in Steam Boil.rs in Great Britain. Illustrated. W. D. Wansbrough.

Wansbrough.
The Progress in Steam Navigation. W. H. White.
Masonry Dams. Illustrated. Robert S. Ball.
An Electric Tramway in Kingston, Jamaica. Illustrated. H. Holgate.
J. Wolfe Barry. With Portrait.

J. Wolfe Barry. With Portrag.

Century Mag azine.—Macmillan. is. 4d. Dec.

A Provençal Christmas Postscript. Illustrated. T. A. Janvier.
The Art of Seeing Things. John Burroughs.
"I believe." Margaret Sutton Briscoe.
One of the Two Millions in East London. Illustrated. Sir Walter Besant.
Sailing Alone around the World. Illustrated. Joshua Slocum.
Oliver Cromwell. Continued. Illustrated. John Morley.
Zionism. Richard Gottheil.

Chambers's Journal .- 47, PATERNOSTER ROW. 18. Dec. Spectres of the German and Austrian Courts. Cultivation of Vegetable Silk in Central America. Rowland W. Cater. Knights Hospitaliers Past and Present. Sir James Outram; the Indian Bayard. Tommy Atkins up-to-date.

Church Missionary Intelligencer.—Church Missionary Society, 6d. Dec.

The Educational Wo.k of the C. M. S. and the Need for More Educational Missions. Rev. J. P. Haythornthwaite.

German Missions. Count Andrew Bernstorff.

Classical Review .- DAVID NUTT. 18. 6d. Nov. Notes on Sophocles' Antigone. Mortimer L. Earle. Some Italic Etymologies and Interpretations. Edwin W. Fay. Contemporary Review.-ISBISTER. 28. 6d. Dec.

Contemporary Review,—ISBISTER. 28. 6d. Dec.
The Government and the War. An Officer.
The Voice of "The Hooligan." Robert Buchanan.
Balmy November. Phil Robinson.
A New Gospel and Some New Apocalypses. J. Rendel Harris,
The Woman Question in Italy. Dora Melegari.
Priest and Prophet. Rev. S. Baring-Gould.
Varro's "De Re Rustica;" a Prose Source of the "Georgics." Countess

Marting-O-EssareScott. J. W. Martin.
The Age Limit for Woman. Miss Clara E. Collet.
Animal Chivalry. Dr. Woods Hutchinson.
The Venture of Faith. Miss Emma Marie Caillard.
Liberal Imperialism and the Transvaal War. Dr. J. Guinness Rogers.

Cornhill Magazine. -- SMITH, ELDER. 18. Dec. South African Reminiscences. Continued. Sir John Robinson. El Pardo. Mrs. Margaret L. Woods. Eagles and Their Prey. C. J. Cornish. Our Square. Mrs. Bernard Bosanquet. The Leading Article. Conferences on Books and Men. Continued. Urbanus Sylvan.

Cosmopolitan.-International News Co. 6d. Nov. The Paris Exposition. Illustrated. Vance Thompson.
Ancient and Modern Spectacles. Illustrated. How the World dances. Illustrated. Laura B. Starr.
Electrographs. Illustrated. Elmer Gates.
The Woman Question. Olive Schreiner.
In the Engine-Room of a War-Ship. Illustrated. H. Webster.
The Child's Proper Development. Illustrated. A Father.
Modern Education; Does It educate in the Broadest and Most Liberal Sense of the Term? Continued. Arthur T. Hadley.

Dial .- 315, WABASH AVENUE, CHICAGO. 10 cents. Nov. 1.

Idiom and Ideal.
Poe coming to His Kingdom. Henry Austin. Nov. 16.

A Memory Forever. The Passing of Matthew Arnold. W. H. Johnson.

Educational Review .-- 11, LUDGATE HILL. 4d. Nov. The School System of the United States. Chas. H. Thurber.
Voice-Training in Schools. Canon the Hon. E. Lyttelton.
Some of the First Steps in History for Young Children. Concluded. Maria F. Findlay. How I learnt to teach. Cloudesley Brereton. The New Education Office.

Educational Review .- (AMERICA.) J. M. DENT. 18. 8d. Nov. A Century's Progress in Science. Michael Foster. Changes in the Teaching of Latin in Germany. Friedrich Paulsen. Social Recapitulation. Arthur Allin.

A Freshman at Nineteen. Abraham Flexner.
The Superintendent and the Board of Education. James M. Greenwood.
Railway Geography. John P. Davis.
The Michigan State Normal College. B. L. D'ooge.

Educational Times. -89, FARRINGDON STREET. 6d. Dec. The Board of Education Act and Its Bearing on Private Schools. Rev. J. O. Bevan.

Engineering Magazine. -222, STRAND. 18. Nov. Engineering Magazine,—222, Strand. 18. Nov.
Standardising in Engineering Construction. Sir Benjamin C. Browne.
The Revolution in Machine-Shop Practice. Illustrated. Henry Roland.
Works Management for the Maximum of Production. J. Slater Lewis.
Electricity for the Auxiliary Machinery on War-Ships. Illustrated. Lieut.
J. K. Robison.
The Proposed Pacific Cable Routes. Harrington Emerson.
Electric Power Distribution and the Small Consumer. Dr. Louis Bell.
The Development of German Ship-Building. Continued. Illustrated.
Rudolph Hatck.
Evolution of Mining and Ore Treatment in Colorado. Illustrated. Thomas

Tonge. Engineering Times.-2, Great Smith Street, Westminster. 6d.

The Mechanical Transmission of Power. W. E. Buck.
Patent Rights and Patent Wrongs. G. G. Turri.
The History and Development of Motor Cars. W. Fletcher.
Modern Locomotive Practice of the World. Herbert Parker and J. Horsfall.
The Modern Warship. Rear-Admiral G. W. Melville.

Englishwoman .- 8, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Dec. A Run to Grand Canary on a Congo Boat. Illustrated. Kindergarten Teachers; Occupations for Women. Illustrated. Mrs. F. M.

Are Women Decorated by the Royal Humane Society? Illustrated. Christmas Customs. Alice Salzmann.
The Tsar and Tsariza. Illustrated. Carl Siewers.
Women Astronomers. Illustrated. Halboro Denham.

Etude. -T. PRESSER, PHILADELPHIA. 15 cents. Nov. The Evil of Forcing Development. F. B. Hawkins.
Sophie Menter and Cécile Chaminade. With Portraits. Edw. Baxter Perry.

Expositor .- Hodder and Stoughton. 18. Dec. The Sheep and the Goats. Prof. Walter Lock.
A Criticism of the New Chronology of Paul, Prof. Benj. W. Bacon.
Mr. Lewin and Professor Bacon on the Passover. Prof. W. M. Ramsay.
Richard Roche, of Heidelberg. Prof. John Laidlaw.
Apocalyptic Sketches. Continued. Rev. J. Monro Gibson.

Expository Times .- SIMPKIN MARSHALL. 6d. Dec. Sacrifice in Ancient Religion and in Christian Sacrament. Rev. E. P. Boys-

Smith. Prolegomena to the Epistle to the Romans. Prof. Adolf Deissman. Professor Rendel Harris and F. W. Crossley.

Feilden's Magazine. - TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 18. Nov. The Education Bogsy. Sir Edmund Hope Verney.

A Revolutionary Invention in Weaving. Illustrated. Prof. Robert

Bea Some Recent Experience with Steam Vehicles. Illustrated. John I.

Some Recent Experience with Steam Vehicles. Illustrated. John I. Thorn croft.
Machine Tools. Illustrated. Continued. Ewart C. Amos.
Acetylene Generators. Illustrated. Prof. Vivian B. Lewes.
Modern Appliances in Gas Manufacture. Illustrated. G. E. Stevenson.
The Building of the Great Central Extension to London. Illustrated.
Continued.

Fireside.—7, Paternoster Square. 6d. Dec. History of Artificial Teeth. Illustrated. G. L. Apperson.

History of Artificial Teeth. Illustrated, G. L. Apperson.

Fortnightly Review.—Chapman and Hall. 2s. 6d. Dec.

Professor Ward on "Naturalism and Agnosticism." Herbert Spencer.

Russian Railway Policy in Asia. With Map. R. E. C. Long.

Canon MacColl's "New Convocation." Prof. F. W. Maitland.

A Lost Principle of Beauty in Architecture. Julian Moore.

Some Lessons of the Peace Conference. Prof. T. E. Holland.

May, 1797; the Darkest Hour for England. Sidney Low.

The Sportsman's Library. F. G. Affalo.

France since 1874. Concluded. Baron Pierre de Coubertin.

"Robertson of Brighton." T. H. S. Escott.

Grant Allen. Richard Le Gallienne.

Some Notes on the Transvaal Question. J. P. Fitzpatrick.

Sir Harry Smith; a Reminiscence of the Boer War in 1848. G. J. H. Berks.

The Transvaal War; Count Muravieff's "Indiscretion." Diplomaticus.

The War in South Africa. With Map. J. H. Berkeley.

Porum.—GAY AND BIRD. 15. 6d. Nov.

How shall Purto Rico be governed? H. K. Carroll.

Spain, Living or Dying? J. L. M. Curry.

The Finnish Question. Prof. Rudolf Eucken.

What the World owes to France. J. Schoenhof.

Civil Service by Special Training. Hoffman Atkinson.

The Problem of an American Marine—A Reply. A. R. Smith.

Philadelphia's Water; Municipal Procrastination. Clinton R. Woodluff, Educational Problems of the Twentieth Century. C. F. Thwing.

The Attitude of the Workers in Europe and America. T. Mann.

Chinese Railroad and Mining Concessions. Chas. Denby.

Will Chinese Development benefit the Western World? John P. Young.

Last Winter's Tragedies of the Sea. Capt. A. G. Froud.

Justin McCarthy's Reminiscences. Prof. W. T. Trent. Forum.-GAY AND BIRD. 18. 6d. Nov.

Fran Some

The I Story The (Abstr ti Tonge

S G The S Marg: Fraga

> Fossil On St On Fo

Duch

David Hair-My M The F Hocke Prince B Motor

The I

The G Nu si

St. T

Christi

Tobog On Sta Cloud The Je Christi The S The W Hunga Plague

Who w Church The Va

The R A Glin Americ Two A Can W

How S India The Pr The Id

In The U Picture The Tr Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly.—141, FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK.
10 cens. Dec.

John Howard Payne. Illustrated. Milton E. Ailes. Some Christmas Pictures. Illustrated. Margaret Fernie Eaton. Woman as a Home-M. ker-Mary A. Livermore.

ev.

ut.

nas

6d.

all.

M.

ry.

ys-

ert

ed.

Y.

Genealogical Magazine. - ELLIOT STOCK. 18. Dec. The Memorial Window at Kingston.

The memorial window at Knigston.

Story of the Surname of B. atson. Continued. W. B. B.

The Constitutions of the Four Companies of Kingston-upon-Thames. Dr.

W. E. St. L. Finny.

Abstracts of Nelson Wills in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury. Continued

Tonge Family, of Tonge Hall, Par. Prestwick, Co. Lancaster. W. Asheton Tonge. Duchy of Lancaster Inquisitiones Post-Mortem. Continued. Ethel

Gentleman's Magazine.-Chatto and Windus. 18. Dec. The Shepherd's Year. William T. Palmer.
Margaret Ae heling; a Poet-Princess. Miss A. Shield.
Fragments of Two Persecutions. John Hyde.
Treitschke's History of Germany. Philip Kent.

Geological Magazine.—Dulau. 18, 6d. Nov. Fossil Mammalia from Egypt. Illustrated. C. W. Andrews. On Subaë ial Erosion in the Isls of Skye. Illustrated. Alfred Harker. On Fossil Dormice. Dr. C. I. Forsyth Major. On the South-Eastern Coalfield. Prof. W. Boyd Dawkins.

Girl's Own Paper .- 56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Dec. David; the Sweet Singer of Israel. Illustrated. Miss Eleonore d'Esterre-

Hair-Work as a Highly Remunerative Employment for Girls. Illustrated. Hair-Wo k as a Highly Reminierative Employment A. P. P.
A. P. P.
My Museum of Eastern Curios. Illustrated. Mrs. Brightwen.
The Princess of Wales's Tame Birds. Illustrated. Ernest M. Jessop.
Hockey for Girls. Illustrated. E. M. Robson.
Princesses Who may be Queens. With Portraits. Continued. Mar'e A.
B Hockey

Princesses Belloc. Motors and Motoring. Illustrated. Miss N. G. Bacon.

Girl's Realm.-Hutchinson. 18. Dec. The Gi lhood of the Empress of Russia. Illustrated. Sybil.
The Ladies' College, Cheltenham. Illustrated. Mrs. Raikes.
Some Great Centres of Music. Illustrated. Mrs. Stepney Rawson.
The Girls of New Zealand. Illustrated. Alien.
Nu sing as a Career for Girls. Illustrated. Miss Honnor Morten.
St. Theresa; a Virgin Saint and Martyr. Illustrated. Rev. S. Baring-

Christmas at the Beginning and the End of the Century. Illustrated. Miss Alice Corkran.

Tobogganning for Girls, Illustrated, Old St. Moritzer,
On Stamps and Stamp-Collecting, Illustrated, W. J. Hardy,

Good Words .- ISBISTER. 6d. Dec. Gloud Effects on Ben Nevis. Illustrated. Col'n Li ingston.
Th.: Jewish Colony in London. Illustrated. James Strang.
Christmas Games of Yesterday. Joubert Jeans.
The Sphinx; an Old Friend with a New Face. Illustrated. John Ward.
The Wonders of Coal-Tar. Illustrated. D. Paterson.
The Mirth of School Inspection. G. S. Ellis.
Hungarian Cattle. Illustrated. R. Hedger Wallace.
Plague-stricken Bombay. M. A. M.

Homiletic Review .-- 44, FLEET STREET. 18. 3d. Dec. Who was the Pharaoh of the Exodus? Prof. A. H. Sayce.
The Croydon Council. Bishop John H. Vincent.
Mr. Ingersoll's Use of the Bible. Camden M. Cobern.
Church Debts a Hindrance to Church Extension. Rayner S. Pardington.

Humanitarian. - Duckworth. 6d. Dec. The Origin and Cause of My English Sympathies. Prof. Arminius

The Origin and Cause of My English Sympathies. Pro-Vambery.
The Recruit. Lieut.-Col. C. M. Douglas.
The Intillectual Capacity of Women. Prof. Mantegazza.
A Glimpse of Ireland. Constance Countess De la Warr.
American Women and their Work. Katherine Rolston Fisher.
Two Aspects of Hypnotism. Arthur Hallam.
The Materialist Facilis Descensus. A. O'Neill Daunt.

Idler.-8, PATERNOSTER Row. 18. Nov. Can War be Abolished? Symposium. How Sailors fight on Torpedo Craft. Illustrated. R. P. Blake.

Indian Church Quarterly Review.—Keymer, 1, Whitefriars St. 2 Rupees. Oct.

The Prayer-Book of Bishop Sarapion. Rev. R. B. Rackham. Mission Work in Singhbum. Rev. A. Logsdail. The Ideal of Human Creation. Major C. B. Mayne. Jacopone of Todi. A. F. Ozanam. The Armenian Ordinal. Concluded. Father R. P. Jacob.

International.-A. T. H. Brower, Chicago. 10 cents. Nov. The United States Railway Mail Service. Illustrated. Louise Frances

Picturesque Wheaton, Illustrated, Dr. R. Warren Conant, The Transvaal, Illustrated, L. de Launay, Irish Ecclesiastical Record. -24, NASSAU STREET, DUBLIM. 18.

Sacramental Causality. Rev. John M. Harty. The Existence of E. il. Cardinal Vaughan. Father O'Growney. Rev. Michael P. Hickey. St. Patrick's Birthplace. Rev. Gerald Stack.

Irish Monthly .- M. H. Gill, Dublin. 6d. Dec. The Critics on "Idylls of Killowen," On Distractions. Rev. M. Russell.

Irish Rosary .- 47, LITTLE BRITAIN. 3d. Dec. "Mary of the Nation."
The Rock of Cashel in Penal Days. Illustrated, M. T. Kelly.
Priests and Nuns in the Mahdi's Camp. D. P. N.

Journal of Education .- 3, BROADWAY, LUDGATE HILL. 6d. Nov. Childhood's Three Ages. F. C. Parsons. A New System of Secondary Education for Ireland. Alice Oldham, Our Grandfathers as Children. H. H. Qu Iter. December.

The Agricultural Education Committee and Its Programme. H. Macan. Ten Years of Leaving Certificate Exams, in Scotland.

Journal of Geology.-LUZAC. 50 cents. Oct. The Ozarkian and Its Significance in Theoretical Geology. Joseph Le Conte.

An Attempt to frame a Wo king Hypothesis of the Cause of Glacial Periods on an Atmospheric Basis. T. C. Chamberlin.

The Carbon Dioxide of the Ocean and Its Relation to the Carbon Dioxide of the Atmosphere. C. F. Tolman.

Journal of the Manchester Geographical Society.—16, St. Mary's Parsonage, Manchester. Oct.

Cuba; Queen of the Antilles. J. Howard Reed. Our Indian Empire. Illustrated. E. F. G. Hatch.

Journal of the Royal United Service Institution.—J. J. KELIHER.

The French in Newfoundland. Major-Gen. R. L. Dashwood.
The Infantry Drill Book, as Illustrated by the Battles around Plevna.
W. V. Herbert.
To India: Military, Statistical, and Strategical Sketch. B. T. Lebedev.
Sharpshooters. Major H. W. Pearse.

Knowledge. - 326, HIGH HOLBORN. 6d. Dec. On the Treatment and Utilization of Anthropological Data. Continued.

Arthur Thomson.

The Coming of Man. Grenville A. J. Cole.
The Mycetozoa and Some Questions Which They suggest. Sir Edward Fry.
Hippalus and Its Surroundings. Illustrated. E. Walfer Maunder.
Flowery Plains and Bustards; Two Months' Guadalquiver. Harry F. Witherby.

Ladies' Home Journal.—Curtis, Philadelphia. 10 cents. Dec. What Christmas means in the Far West. Rev. Cyrus T. Brady.
Gail Hamilton's Letters to Whittier; a Merry Woman's Letters to a Quiet Poet. Illustrated. S. T. Pickard.
The Theatre and Its People. Illustrated. Franklin Fyles.
Should the Old Clergyman be shot? Ian Maclaren.

Lady's Realm .- HUTCHINSON. 18. Dec. Lady's Realm.—HUTCHINSON, 13. Dec.
Baron von Meyer and His Work. Illustrated. Robert Johnson,
The Prince of Wales. Illustrated.
Fashion and Beauty in Far-Off Lands. Illustrated. Florence E. Burnley.
Some Lady Amateur Photographers. Illustrated. Evelyn Wills.
Tiger-Shooting in Unknown India. Illustrated. Isabel Savory.
La Mandria. Illustrated. J. I. S. Whitaker.
How Men propose, Illustrated. A. W. Pendyn, Viscount and Viscountess Gormanston. Illustrated.

Land Magazine. -149, STRAND. 18. Nov. Does Forestry Pay? J. P. Robertson, Millets, R. Hedger Wallace,
Manorial Tenants and the Franchise in the Last Century. William St. ilin. I.
Selecting a Residential Estate. Robert E. Turnbull.
The Summer Grazing and Rearing of Cattle. E. Armitage.
Fires caused by Locomotives. F. W. Beck.

Law Magazine and Review.-CLOWES. 5s. Nov. The State Punishment of Crime. Justice Kennedy.
County Courts. Francis K. Munton.
The Legal Aspect of San Marino. Torquato C. Giannini.
The Taxation of Costs. E. S. Roscoe.
Notes on the Early History of Legal Studies in England. Joseph Walton.
The International Law Association Conference, 1899. Judge Raikes.
The History of the Newfoundland Question. Spencer Brodhurst.

Loisure Hour.—56, Paternoster Row. 6d. Dec. Housing the Poor. Rev. C. Fleming Williams.
The John Rylands Library, Manchester. Illustrated. Rev. S. G. Green. Christmas Superstitions. G. McRobert. Games and Pastiness. E. Rentoul Esler. Thomas Pringle. Illustrated. William Hay.

Library Assistant .- B. L. Dyer, Old Brompton Road. Nov. The First Edition of "Paradise Lost." Wynne E. Baxter.

Library Association Record.-Horace Marshall. 15. Nov. The Opening of the John Rylands Library, Manchester, Edwards and Ewart and the Select Committee on Public Libraries of 1849. John J. Ogle.

"Concilium Bil liographicum" at Zürich and Its Work. W. E.

Hoyle and C. Nördlinger.
On Openings for Women in Library Work. Miss Lucy Toulmin Smith.

Library Journal .- KEGAN PAUL. 50 cents. Nov. Paternalism in Public Libraries. Lindsay Swift. What can State Law do for the Fublic Library? W. R. Eastman.

Library World .- LIBRARY SUPPLY Co., LONDON. 6d. Nov. Library Anging Systems. Illustrated. Continued. J. D. Brown. Classified and Annotated Cataloguing. Continued. L. Stanley Jast. Insurance of Public Libraries. Cecil T. Davies. List of the Works of Robert Burns. J. C. Ewing.
The Library Assistant Question; Manchester and After. B. L. Dyer.

Lippincott's Monthly Magazine.-Lippincott, Philadelphia. 18.

The November Meteors. Prof. C. A. Young.
The Last Victory of Old Ironsides. George Gibbs
Old Age Pensions from a Scientist's Standpoint. John C. Chase.
An Unwritten Chapter in Our Relations with Spain, 1829. Rev. Francis S.

Longman's Magazine.-Longmans. 6d. Dec. Danton; The Evolution of a Reputation. I. A. Taylor. From a Test Angler's Diary. G. A. B. Dewar. Wild Fruits. Rev. John Vaughan.

Lute.-PATEY AND WILLIS. 2d. Nov.

Dr. Cuthbert Harris. With Portrait.

McClure's Magazine .- 45, Albemarle Street. 10 cents. Nov. Two Thousand Miles in the Antarctic lee. Illustrated. Dr. F. A. Cook. Black Friday—September 24, 1869. G. S. Boutwell. Sir Henry Irving. With Portraits. H. J. W. Dam. Decatur and the Philadelphia. Illustrated. Rev. C. T. Brady. The Chinese Eastern Railway. Illustrated. A. Hume Ford.

Macmillan's Magazine, -MACMILLAN. 15. Dec. The Fascination of the Forest. Hugh Clifford. The Fascination of the Forest. High Chinord.
Robari, West Africa.
Friedrich Nistzsche; the Tragedy of a Thinker.
An Interlude on a Chalk-Stream.
W. B. Boulton.
The Centenary of Seringapatam.
J. J. Cotton.
Games on Paper, and Elsewhere.
W. B. Thomas.
The Folly of Napoleon. David Hannay.

Metaphysical Magazine.-GAY AND BIRD. 15. Nov. Psychology and Psychurgy; the Nature and Use of the Mind. Prof. Elmer Gates. The Memory of Past Births, Continued, Chas. Johnston. Mental Healing versus Christianity. J. L. Hasbroucke. Atomic Vibration, Dr. T. W. Topham.

Missionary Review of the World .- 44, FLEET STREET. 18. 3d. Nov. George Junior Republic. Illustrated. Delavan L. Pierson.
Some Facts about Mo: monism. A. T. Schroeder.
The Doukhobors in Russia and Canada. Illustrated. Ernest H. Crosby.
Jan Hus. Illustrated. Continued. Rev. George H. Giddins.

Monthly Musical Record .- AUGENER. ad. Dec. The Exaggeration of Pianists. E. A. Baughan. Anton Rubir stein. M. Davidowa, J. W. Hässler. Concluded. F. Peterson.

Music .- 186, WARDOUR STREET. 2d. Nov. Schubert's Song Cycles. Continued. Frank Merry. The History of the Violincello. Continued. E. van Der Stracten.

Music .- 1402, AUDITORIUM TOWER, CHICAGO. 25 cents. Nov. Self-Playing Instruments. Illustrated. W. S. B. Mathews. Samuel P. Warren. Pauline Jennings. Interpretation and the Past of Art. C. E. Hoffman. Playing as a Study. F. E. Drake.

Musical Herald .- J. Curwen. 2d. Dec. Mr. Thomas Facer. With Portrait.

Musical Opinion. -150, HOLBORN. 2d. Nov. Two Songs: Some Reflections, W. Bernha'd. Handel's "Esther." Rev. J. T. Lawrence. Musical Pitch. J. C. Hadden. Beethoven's "Mount of Olives." R. Boughton

Musical Times.-Novello. 4d. Dec. Franklin Taylor. With Portrait. Romanticism in Music. Prof. Niecks, Ferdinand Hiller. Joseph Bennett.

National Review .- EDWARD ARNOLD. 28. 6d. Dec. The Coming Storm in the Far East. "Ignotus." Democracy and the War. H. W. Wilson.
The Vatican at Work. Richard Bagot.
Walter Bagehot Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff.
A Plea for Symbolic Language. Sir Chihchen Lofengluh.

American Affairs. A. Maurice Low. The Pupil Teacher in Ru-al Schools. Lady Rayleigh. A Winter's Camp in Gippsland, Australia. C. Bogue Luffmann. The Transports and the Troops. Arthur Shadwell. John Donne, Leslie Stephen.

After the War; Letter. Si: Henry Meysey-Thompson.

Natural Science.-Young J. Pentland, Edinburgh. 18. Nov. Natural Science. To Cology, Dr. Georg Duncker.
The Cereal Rust Problem. George Massee, Problem of Honeycomb. Chas. Dawson and S. A. Woodhead.
The Supposed Existing Ground-Sloth of Fatagonia. A. Smith Woodward.

New England Magazine .- 5, PARK SQUARE, BOSTON. 25 cents. Nov. American Economics of To-day. Illustrated. A. F. Weber. John Ruskin. With Fortrait, W. Henry Winslow. Mrs. Eddy; the Founder of Christian Science. Illustrated. Henrietta H. Willia

Franklin and Wrentham. Illustrated. Dr. J. C. Gallison. The Romance of Fioneering. E. P. Powell. The Great Boston Fire of 1872. Illustrated. Robert G. Fitch.

New Ireland Review .- BURNS AND OATES. 6d. Nov. Politics, Nationality and Snobs. D. P. Moran.
Early Irish Bankers and Banking. Continued. J. Salmon.
Manual Training and Technical Instruction in Ireland. G. T. P.

Nineteenth Century .- Sampson Low. 28. 6d. Dec. South African Problems and Lessons.
(1) Sidney Low. (2) Sir Henry Shippard.
English and Dutch in the Past. Mrs. J. R. Green.
Terms used in Modern Gunnery. Major-Gen. Maurice.
Stephen Phillips's Tragedy of Paolo and Francesca. Sidney ColMe'corites and Comets; Recent Science. Prince Kropotkin.
Cromwell and the Electorate. J. Horace Round.
A Negro on the Postion of the Negro in America. D. E. Tobia Plaglarism. E. F. Benson.
The Churchman's Politics; a Dialogue. Rev. A. C. Deane.
Korea; the War-Cloud in the Farthest East. Holt S. Hallett.
A Hindu Home. J. D. Rees.
Austria at the End of the Century. Count Lützow.
The Newstapers. Sir Wemyss Reid. South African Problems and Lessons

North American Review .- WM. HEINEMANN, 25. 6d. Nov. Hawthorn and Lavender; Songs and Madrigals. W. E. Henley.

Hawthorn and Lavender; Songs and Madrigals, W. E. Henley. International Arbitration:

A Russian View. F. de Martens.
From an American Standpoint. Seth Low.
France at the Parting of the Ways. Bernard Lazare.
The "Open Door" Policy in the Philippines. Frank D. Pavey.
The Dramatic Festivals of Orange. Jules Claretic.
Is American Civil Service Reform in Peril? Prof. Joseph F. Johnson.
Food Which Fails to Feed. Louis Windmiller.
The Anglican Church Crisis:
The Rebellion against the Royal Supremacy. Earl of Portsmouth.
How the Ritualists harm the Church. Arthur J. Balfour.

Open Court.-KEGAN PAUL. 6d. Nov. Rhyme and Rhythm in the Koran. W. F. Warren, Confucius. Teitaro Suzuki.
The Birth of Christianity; John the Baptist and Jesus of Nazareth. Prof. H. Grätz.

The Significance of naming Things in the Nursery. Dr Paul Carus. The Crucifix. Dr. Paul Carus.

Organist and Choirmaster .- 9, Berners Street. 3d. Nov. Music at the Church Congress. C. W. P.

Outing .- International News Co. 25 cents. Nov. The Golfers' Open Championship, 1899. Illustrated. Chas, Turner, A Glimpse at Shanghai. Illus rated. E. M. Allaire. Cycling over an Old Vi ginian Fike. G. H. Streaker. Autumn Sport in Tennessee. D. C. Fitch.

Overland Monthly .- SAN FRANCISCO. 10 cents. Oct. Ocean Traged McCurdy. Tragedies on the Northwest Coast. Illustrated. James G. The Great Sanitary Waterway of Chicago. Illustrated. Chas. S. Raddin. Philippine Annexation Justified. Irving M. Scott. California in '49. Illustrated. A. S. Marvin. The City of Education in California. Illustrated. Edw. B. Payne.

The Old Tioga Road, California. Hlustrated. C. H. Shinn.
A Protected American Shipping needed. A. R. Smith.
The Royal Forests of England. Illustrated. F. Reddall.
A City of Education. Continued. E. P. Payne.
Californian Naval Reserve; the Making of Citizen Jack Tars. Illustrated.

Douglas White. Paidologist.-Cambray House, Cheltenham. 18. 6d. per ann. Nov.

Exceptional Children. G. E. Shuttleworth. Hearing as a Factor in the Education of a Child. Children's Autobiographies. Sarah E. Wiltse.

Pall Mall Magazine .- 18, CHARING CROSS ROAD. 15. Dec. The American Stage. Continued. Illustrated. William Archer. Lotteries, Luck, Chance, and Gambling Systems. Illustrated. J. Holt Schooling.

XUM

The

Anto Alge

AN

The

Mich

The A Fe The

The The

The

Mys The Long

The

The

Wal

Unit

Phy

The

Pers Wes

Rob

Our

Mr.

Live

Spec

Inte

The The The

New

Ceci The

East

The

Roy

Arm

R

F

Parents' Review .- KEGAN PAUL. 6d. Nov. The Religious Training of the Young. Rev. W. C. Compton. Antonin Roche; a Veteran Teacher. A Pupil. Algebra through Geometry. P. G. O'Connell.

Physical Review .. - MACMILLAN. 35. Oct. On the Magnetic Shi-lding Effect of Tri-lamellar Spherical and Cylindrical Shells. A. P. Wills.

A New Respiration Calorimeter and Experiments on the Conservation of Energy in the Human Body. Continued. W. O. Atwater and E. B.

Positivist Review .- WM. REEVES. 3d. Dec. Dr. Robinet. J. H. Bridges. The Conquest of South Africa. E. S. Beesly.

Social Peace. Chas. Gaskell Higginson

ov.

Nov

tta H.

rof.

G.

d.

Practical Teacher .- 33, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Dec. Michael E. Sadler and the National Home-Reading Union. The Case for Manual Training in Schools. J. Gunn. A Festival Day in Buda-Pest.
The Royal College of Science. Continued.

Presbyterian and Reformed Review.—MacCalla and Co., Philadelphia. 80 c.nts. Oct.
The Fatherhood of God, viewed in the Light of Ch.ist's Personal Teaching on the Subject. Principal John M. King.
The Ordination of Messiah. Rev. R. McCheyne Edgar.
The Vanishing Sense of Sin. Rev. John H. Edwards.
Mysticism: True and False. Rev. Jas. Lindsay.
The Catholic Apostolic Church. Rev. Erskine N. White.
The Popular Demand for Young Ministers. Rev. N. J. M. Bogert.

London House Refuse. Ralph W. Johnstone.

Security of Tenure for Medical Officers of Health. T. W. H. Garstang. The Inebrates Act, 18,9, regarded from a Public Health Point of View. St. Clair B. Shadwell. Public Health .- 123, SHAFTESBURY AVENUE. 18. Nov.

The Prevention of Plague through the Suppression of Rats and Mice. Dr. Doriga.

Public School Magazine.-131, TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 6d. Nov. Wakefield Grammar School. Illustrated. Philip Whitwell Wilson. The Board of Education Act. Canon Rawnsley.
The Aldershot Camp, 1839. Illustrated. Chas. Falkner.
United Services College. Illustrated. A. H. Walker.

Cheltenham College, Illustrated, A. S. Owen.
The Education of a Public School Boy in the Time of Socrates. Illustrated, Athol Forbes,
Physical Column.

Physical Culture—a National Necessity. Illustrated. C. H. Roche.

Puritan.-James Bowden. 6d. Dec. The Christian Church and Recreation. Illustrated. A Special Commissioner.

Berniniscences. Cont'nued. Dr. T. Guinness Rogers.

Wesley's "Old Room"; the First Methodist Preaching House. Illustrated.

Charlotte Mason.
The Jew. Arthur S. Quick.
Recollections of the Rev. C. M. Birrell. With Portrait. Rev. F. B. Meyer.
Robert Blatchford; a Son of the People. With Portrait. A. E. Fletcher.
Presbyterianism in the Nineteenth Century. J. A. Drysdale.

Quiver.-Cassell. 6d. Dec. The George Junior Republic. Illustrated. Miss E. L. Banks. Our Feathered Refugees, Illustrated. Miss F. A. Fulcher.

Railway Magazine .- 7), TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 6d. Nov. Mr. Henry Plews, General Manager, Weat Northern Railway, Ireland; Interview. Illustrated. Interview. Intervi.w. Illustrated.
Liverpool Street Great Eastern Railway Station. Illustrated. Scott Damant. Special Newspaper Trains. Brunel Redivivus.
The Case for Queensland's 5t. 6in. Gauge. Illustrated. Rebus.
Interlocking—as it is and as it ought to be. Illustrated. George Mumford.
The Severn and Wye Joint Railway. Illustrated. E. A. Clark.
The Ethics of Pilotage. Illustrated. Geo. Skipton Eylot.
The Oxford and Aylesbury Tram Road. Illustrated. F. Goodman.
The Londonderry and Lough Swilly Railway. Illustrated. A. J. Chisholm.
New Zealand Railways. Illustrated. Charles Rous-Marten.

Review of Reviews.—(America).—13, Astor Place, New York.
25 cents. Nov. Review of Heviews.—(AMBRICA).—73, ASTOR PLACE, NEW YORK.
25 cents. Nov.
Cecil J. Rhodes; Character Sketch. W. T. Stead.
The Results of the Peace Conference in Their Relations to the Monroe Doctrine. F. W. Holls.
The Problem of Territorial Expansion. J. Gould Schurman.
East Cleveland; a Model Suburban Village. C. E. Bolton.
The Toledo Manual Training School. John Henry Barrows.

Royal Magazine.-C. A. PEARSON, 4d. Dec. The Art of the Camera. Illustrated. Roderick Grey.
Royalty in Fancy Dress. Illustrated. Mary Fermor.
Armies That do not mean to fight. Illustrated. Herbert Vivi n.
Earthquakes; the Upheaval of a Monnent. Illustrated. C. E. Williams.
Fighting the Up-to-Date Smuggler. Illustrated. Arthur Goodrich.
Trade-Marks of Our Towns. Illustrated. J. Holt Schooling.

Saint Peter's .- 37, Essex Street, Strand. 6d. Dec. The Königsberg Coronation of 1861. Justin McCarthy. Perugi. Illustrated. A. F. Spender. The History of the Catholic Church in the United States. Alice Worthington Winthrop.

School Board Gazette.-Bemrose. 18. Nov. Limitation of Popular Education. School-Planning. Continued. Interchange of Teachers.

School World,-MACMILLAN. 6d. Dec. Some Dangers of Boarding School Life. Alfred Thompson.
The Sallèze Method of Teaching History. Illustrated. Ethel M. Reily.

Scottish Geographical Magazine, -STANFORD. 18. 6d. Nov. Address to the Geological Section of the British Association, 1839. Sir Archibald Geikie. The Transvaal and the O ange Free State.

Scribner's Magazine. - Sampson Low. 18. Dec. American Scaman in the Antarctic. Illustrated. Albert White Vorse. The Possibilities of Antarctic Exploration. John Wesley. Illustrated. Augustine Birrell.

Strad .- 136, FLEET STREET. 2d. Dec. Walter H. Mayson. Illustrated. Rev. W. Meredith-Morris. Eugene Poloniski. With Portrait. John Broadhouse. Antonius Stradivarius. Continued. H. Petherick.

Strand Magazine, -George Newnes, 18. Dec. Strand Magazine.—George Newnet. 18. Dec.
Are Indian Jugglers Humbugs? Interview with Charles Bertram. Illustrated. A. J. Johnson.
A Burlesque Bull-Fight. Illustrated. A. H. Broadwell.
Heroes of 1892. Illustrated. Affred T. Story.
Signalling in the Army and Navy. Illustrated. Herbert C. Fyfe.
1792; a Hundred Years Ago. Illustrated. Alfred Whitman.
Christmas Day in the Army. Illustrated. Horace Wyndham.
Mr. Birch; the Champion Orange-Peeler. Illustrated. A. B. Henn.

Sunday at Home, -56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Dec. The Dawn of Light in Central Africa, Illustrated, Continued. Albert B. Lloyd.
The Two Selwyns. With Portraits. Rev. A. R. Buckland.
Frank Crossley. With Portrait. W. Stevens.

Sunday Magazine,—Isbister. 6d. Dec.
The Bible; the Greatest of Books. Illustrated. Harold Macfarlane.
Where Children Play. Illustrated. F. D. How.
Christmas Greenery. Charles Middleton.
Reminiscences of the Kipling Family. Illustrated. Mary Benson.
Rev. Jane Munro Brown. With Portrait. David Paton.
Impressions of Hebron. Illustrated. M. Alford.

Temple Bar. - MACMILLAN. IS. Dec. A Lost People in Burmah. H. Fielding.
Frances Burney. Mary Dormer Harris.
The Great Seal of England. Michael MacDonagh.
The Idea of Evolution in Browning's Poetry. Chas. Fisher,
The Humours of Eighteenth Century Opera.

Theosophical Review .- 26, Charing Cross. 18, Nov. The Doukhobortzi. By a Russian. Hermes th: Thrice-Greatest according to Manetho, High Priest of Egypt. G. R. S. M. ad. G. R. S. M. and.
Theosophy in the Home. Mrs. L. Williams.
The Legend of the External Soul, Mrs. Hooper.
A Plea for Less Dogmatism, in Public Teaching. E. Martin Webb.
The Latest Step in Modern Philosophy. Concluded. Bertram Keightley.
The Life of the Householder. Mrs. Annie Besant.
Ancient Peru. Continued C. W. Leadbeater.

Travel.-Horace Marshall. 3d. Nov. Our World's Cycling Commission. Continued. John Foster Fraser and Viva Chilé. Illustrated. May Crommelin. A Prisoner of the Khalifa. Illustrated. M. x Müller. A Wedding in Cologne. Illustrated. Dr. Lunn.

United Serrice Magazine. - WILLIAM CLOWES. 25. Nov. Edward Vernon, Admiral of the White Squadron. H. Vernon Venables Kyrke and A. Venables Kyrke. Kyrke and A. Venables Kyrke.
Concerning Nerve in the Navy. A. A.
Some of My Shipmates. Continued. Robert Lendall.
Li War Allowable? Rev. Philip Young.
The South African Question. Britisher.
Marlborough. Continued. William O'Connor Morris.
With Machine-Guns in Tirah. Capt. H. P. de la B-re.
The German Sphere of Influence in China. Edward Harper Parker.
The Renewal of the Italian Field Artillery. Lieut-Col. Cav. Felice Mariani.
The Civil Employment of Reserve and Discharged Soldiers. Col. W. T.
Dooner. Dooner.

Werner's Magazine,—43, EAST 17TH STREET NEW YORK.
25 cents. Nov.
How to See the Play. Continued. C. Barnard.
Oratory and Eloquence. P. J. Burrell.
Schubert. T. W. Surette.
Washington Irving.

Wesleyan Methodist Magazine.—Charles Kelly. 6d. Nov. A Visit to Iona. Illustrated. R. Corlett Cowell.
Famous Women of China. Illustrated. Chas. Bone.

Westminster Review .- F. WARNE. 28. 6d. Dec. Westminster Review.—F. WARNE. 2s. 6d. Dec.
The Causes of Wars. T. F. Manning.
Do the Contagious Diseases Acts succeed? Continued.
The Minimum Wage and the Poor Law, J. Tyrrell Baylee.
A Plea for a New Ireland in the New Century. Dudley S. A. Cosby.
The Lament of a Leader-Writer. Leader-Writer.
Biology as a Branch of Education. Wilfred Mark Webb.
Space and Time. Horace Seal.
The Mistletoe. J. Hudson,
Some Features of Commercial Life in Australia. J. Lee Osborn.

Wide World Magazine.—George Newnes. 18. Dec. In the Khalifa's Clutches. Illustrated. Continued. C. Neufeld. Underground Fires at Broken Hill, N.S.W. Illustrated. Ras Ras de S. Underground Fires at Broken Hill, N.S. W. Hubstrated. Ras use Magnussen.

Mrs. Martin's Cure for Caterpillars. Illustrated. N. Lawrence Perry. How Colenbrander fought the Zulu. Illustrated. E. St. John Hart. What I saw at the Sneke Dance. Illustrated. G. W. James. The Saving of the Cotopaxi. Illustrated. Gerald Hand. Adventures in Search of Wild Cacti. Illustrated. F. A. Walton. How We fought the Runaway Islands. Illustrated. F. H. E. Palmer, The Shinto Fire-Walkers of Tokio. Illustrated. Yei Theodora Ozaki. Among the Outlaws of Pennsylvania. Illustrated. E. Leslie Gilliams.

Windmill.-434, STRAND. 15. Oct.

"Salammbô." W. B. Wallace.

Windsor Magazine.-WARD, LOCK. 18. Dec. Some Winter Sports and Pastimes. Illustrated. G. R. Falconer.
Canadian Sketches. Illustrated. Harry Furn'ss.
Rudyard K pling. Illustrated. Chas. Ellot Norton.
Mother-Lo. e. Illustrated. Marie Core'i.
How the Public Schools honour Their Dead Heroes. Illustrated. George A. Wade.
Coaching in Sno vstorms in the Good Old Times. Illustrated. A. W. Jarvis. Six Battleships wrecked in One Night in Samoa. Illustrated. Frank

Woman at Home. - Hodder and Stoughton. 18. Dec.

Som: of Our Contributors. Illustrated, Th: Christmas Card Craze. Illustrated, Mrs. E. T. Cook, The Duk: of Westminster and His Family. Illustrated, Mrs. S. A. Tooley,

Young Man,-Horace Marshall, 3d. Dec. Young Men in the Colonies; Interview with Rev. W. H. Fitchett. With Young Woman, -Horace Marshall, 3d. Dec. Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler at Home; Interview. Illustrated. What It means to be a Lady Journalist.

A Visit to Alexandra House. Illustrated. The Care of the Insane.

THE GERMAN MAGAZINES.

Allgemeine Konservative Monatsschrift.—E. Ungleich, Leipzig. 3 Mks. per qr. Nov.

G. Stosch. Bap: 8-m. G. Stosch.
Friedrich Franz III. of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. J. Pentzlin.
Reformed Catholicism. Dr. Rieks.
Palæontology and Evolution. Dr. E. Dennert.
The Transvaal War. U, von Hassell.

Alte und Neue Welt,-Benziger and Co., Einsiedeln. 50 Pf. Nov.

The Vatican Library. Illustrated. Gabriel Meier. The Zither in the 19th Century. W. Kummer. The New German Civil Code. C. Burla. Acetylene. Illustrated. Dr. M. Wildermann. Turkish Burial-Places. Illustrated. J. Gottwald. The German Catholic Congress at Neisse. Karl Muth.

Daheim.-Poststrasse 9, Leipzig. 2 Mks. per qr. Nov. 4.

The Boers. E. von Weber,
The Pestalozzi-Fròbelhaus at Berlin. Illustrated. Frida Schanz.
Nov. 11.
The Boers. Concluded. E. von Weber.
November 9 and 10. Max Steinfurt.

Religious Art. Illustrated, Dr. H. Chiemberg.
The History of the Catholic Church in Austria. E. Heyck.
Nov. 25.
The Excavations at Priene. Illustrated. Paul Elsner.
Austria and the Catholic Church. Continued. E. Heyck.
Trade and Commerce in the Transvaal. G. Nuoffer.

Deutscher Hausschatz,-F. Puster, Regensburg. 40 Pf. Heft 2. Paris. Illustrated. Continued. Dr. J. B. Weckerle.
Siberia. Continued. T. H. Lange.
The Japanese Festival of the Dead. Illustrated. Ernst von Hesse-Wartegg.
Vincens Priessnitz. With Portrait.
The National Festivals of Antwerp. Illustrated. G. Cietmann. The Chinese Criminal Code, England and the Transvaal. Illustrated. A. Dierschke.

Deutsche Revue.—Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart.

6 Mks. per qr. Nov.

The Secret Agents of Louis XVIII. Graf. Remacle.
Fragments of an Unpublished Diry of a Russian Grand-Duchess. Continued. Luise Lüdemann.
The Psychology of Mysticism. Ludwig Stein.
How to fight Tuberculosis. Dr. H. Leyden.
The History of Religion in India. Albrecht Weber, R. W. Bunsen. Hans Jahn.
William II.'s First Visit to the East. Gen. Izzet Fuad Pasha.
Physics in the 19th and 20th Centuries. E. Gerland.
World History. Dr. F. Guntram Schultheiss.

Deutsche Rundschau.-Gebrüder Partel, Berlin. 6 Mks. per qr.

The Headquarters of the 2nd Silesian Army under the Crown Prince Friedrich Wilhelm of Prussia, 1866. Continued. J. von Verdy du Vernois. Schopenhauer in relation to the Natural Sciences. Paul Schultz. Youthful Reminiscences. Continued. Paul Heyse. Frau von Krüdener.
The Poetry of the Veda. Concluded. H. Oldenberg.
Parallel Dreyfus Cases. Z.

Deutsche Worte.-Langegasse, 15, Vienna. 50 Kr. Oct. Kautsky v. Bernstein, F. Ott.

Gartenlaube. - ERNST KEIL'S NACHF., LEIPZIG. 50 Pf. Heft 12. The Prophesied End of the World in November. Dr. H. J. Klein. Andreas Hofa's Country. Illustrated. Karl Wolf. The Garman "Forty-Eight" Men in America. Gan. F. Sigel. Villa Falconiari at Frascati. Illustrated. Telegraphy without Wires. Illustrated. F. Bandt.

Gosellschaft, — J. C. C. Bruns, Minden. 75 Pf. Nov. 1.
Railways for China. P. Scheerbart.
Marie Stona. With Portrait. Dr. E. W. Braun.
Dickens. Ernst Gystrow.
Giovanni Segantini. G. Hermann.

The Goethe Celebration at Frankfurt. O. Wehr. Nov. 16.

Lyric Poetry of To-Day. Continued. R. Steiner.
Multatuli in German. G. Landauer.

Kunstgewerbeblatt.-E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPZIG. 1 Mk. Nov. Furnished Rooms at the Berlin, Munich, and Dresden Exhibitions, 1839.

Illustrated. A. L. Plehn.

Neue Deutsche Rundschau.—S. Fischer, Berlin. 1 Mk. 50 Pf.

Social Growth. Dr. F. Oppenheimer. Letters from Karl Marx to His Children, 1881-1882.

Nord und Süd.-Schlesische Verlags-Anstalt, Breslau. 2 Mks. Nov.

Otto Erich Hartleben. With Portrait. H. Landsberg. Snobbism; Europe 1898-9. Optimist. Domenico Cirillo. R. Kossmann. Roccoo Days. P. F. Krell. Fermentation (in Physiology). E. Sokal. The History of Literary Censorship. J. Māhly.

Ueber Land und Meer .- Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart. 1 Mark. Heft 4.

Stilt-Walking in Les Landes. Continued. Illustrated. P. Kauffmann. Naval Life, Continued. Illustrated. R. Schneider. The Technical High School at Berlin. Illustrated. F. Hood. National Life in Belgium. F. A. Bacciocco. Grünewald, Berlin. Illustrated. F. Hood. The War in the Transvaal. Illustrated. Dr. M. Öhnefalsch-Richter. Vom Fels zum Meer.—Union-Deutsche-Verlagsgeszellschaft, Stuttgart. Alexander Ereiben von Cleichen Pursunger.

The Tree in Saga and in Art. Alexander Freiherr von Gleichen-Russwurm. Japanese Women. Illustrated. W. F. Brand. The Green Werrastrand. Illustrated. W. Schulz. Heft 6.

The Imperial Picture Gallery at Vienna. Illustrated. Dr. H. Dollmayr. Siam. Illustrated. Ernst von Hesse-Wartegg. Nov. 8, 1799. Eduard Fuchs.

Die Zeit .- Günthergasse I, VIENNA IX./3. 50 Pf. Nov. 4. The Language Ordinance and Anti-Semitism. Prof. T. G. Masaryk, Peter Kropotkin. G. Brandes.

Nov. 17.
The German-Americans. Dr. H. Münsterberg.
Bulgaria and the Banks. R. Rotheit.

Nov. 18.
City Railways in Europe, America, and Vienna. A. Czepelka.
The Vienna Secession. R. Multer.
Karl Dittersdorf. R. Wallaschek.
Nov. 25.

Corruption in Galicia. I. Daszynski. Strategy. Karl Bleibtreu.

XUM

The The

> Pene Ame Ann

A

The The The Fran

> Kar The

> > B

Con Co Libe The

Cec

The Jou Agr Is t Is t

The Ha

Zeitschrift für Bildende Kunst,-E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPZIG. 26 Mks. per ann. Nov.

The Cranach Exhibition at Dresden. Illustrated, K. Woermann. Max Klinger. Illustrated. Julius Vogel. The Façade of Sena Cathedral. Illustrated. L. M. Richter.

Zeitschrift für Bücherfreunde.—Velhagen und Klasing, Leipzig.

2 Mks. Nov.

Schiller's "Robbers"; First Editions, etc. Illustrated. Prof. R. Genée. Pocket-Books and Almanacs in Austria and Switzerland at the Beginning of the 19th Century. Illustrated. Dr. A. Schlossar. "Novæ Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum." Conclud.d. Dr. E. Schwetschke.

THE FRENCH MAGAZINES.

Annales de Géographie.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 5 frs.

Penepl in. Continued. W. M. Davis. The Physical Martonne. Physical Geography of Morvan and Auxois. Illustrated. E. de

The Map of Franca, With Maps. G. Bigourdan. America and Americans. A. Oppel.

eorge

W

rank

oley.

With

39.

S

Annales des Sciences Politiques.—108, Boulevard Saint-Germain, Paris. 3 frs. 50 c. Nov.

The English Arm; M. B.
The Political Development of Canada. O. Festy.
The Origins of the French Administrative System. Concluded. G. Alix.
France and Nigeri . E. Baillaud.

Association Catholique. -3, Rue de L'Abbaye, Paris. 2 frs. Nov. 15.

Karl Ma. K. G. de Pascal.

The French Law regarding Professional Associations. V. de Clercq.

The Duty of Christian Proprietor. Paul Lapeyre.

Bibliothèque Universelle, -18, King William Street, Strand. 20s. per annum. Nov.

Conrad Ferdinand Meyer and Louis Vulliemin. Charles Vulliemin. The Philippines. Continued. Edmond Pluchut. Dramatic Music in Russia. Concluded. M. Delines. A Winter in Spain. Ernest Mu et. France and the Dreyfus Trial. Continued. Ed. Tallichet, Correspondant .- 14, Rue de L'Abbaye, Paris. 2 frs. 50 c. Nov. 25. Liberty of Education in France; Letter to Ministers, etc. Mgr. Turinaz.

Freemasonry and Liberty of Education. P. Nourrisson.

The Recruiting of Officers in the French Army.

Cecil Rhodes, M. D. Onsart.

The Simplon Tunnel. J. Michel.

Journal dos Économistes.—14, Rue Richelleu, Paris. 3 frs. 50 c.

The Origin of Cash Credit in Scottish Banks. A. E. Sayous. Agriculture in France, 1883-1833. L. Grandeau. Is the Positivism of Auguste Comte scientific? Ch. H. Limousia. The Banks of the United States. G. François.

Ménestrel.-a bis, Rue Vivienne, Paris. 30 c. Nov. 5, 12, 19, 26. Jean Jacques Rousseau as a Musician. Continued. A. Pougin.

Mercure de France.—15, Rue de l'Echaudé-Saint-Germain, Paris. 2 f.s. Nov. The Ravages of Militarism. Marcel Collière.

Monde Moderne. -5, Rue Sr. Benoir, Paris. 1 fr. 60 c. Nov. Contemporary Women Novelists in Germany. Illustrated. H. Nogressan. Soulou and Mindanao. Illustrated. E. Verhaeren. Soulou and Mindanao. Illustrated. A. de Gériolles. Emperor Charles IV. of Germany in France. Illustrated. A. Babeau. The Balzac Statue. Illustrated. G. Ferry. Rome. Illustrated. A. d'Agiout.

Nouvelle Revue,—18, King William Street, Strand. 55 frs. per annum. Nov. 1. The Benefits of Concentration. J. Piou.

Mre Benents of Conferences. H. D.-possee.
Letters on Foreign Politics. Madame Julistte Adam.
Three Contemporary Women of Letters. E. Ledrain.
On the Upper Niger. G. Bastard.

On the Upper Nager. G. Bastard.
Nov. 15.
Klobb and Voulet; the Soudan D:ama.
The Théâtre Français. A. Bernheim.
M. de Lanessan; Ministar of Marine. Comte Chassériaud.
Letters on Foreign Politics. Madame Juliette Adam.
Poli

Nouvelle Revus Internationale.—a3, Boulevard Poissonière, Paris. a fra. 50 c. Nov. Unpublished Fragments by Count Tolstoy.

Urbain Rattazzi. Mms. Rattazzi. Militarism. Pierre Denis. Militarism. Pierre Denis.
Tristan and Isolde. A. de Bertha.
The Transvaal War. Commandant E. B.

Réforme Sociale .- 54, Rue de Seine, Paris. 1 fr. Nov. 1. Workmen's Associations and Employers' Associations. H. Clément. The New Session of the "Unione de la Paix Sociale." A. Delaire. It e Basques. Aché D'ibildos.

Fi e Basques. Aobé D'bildos.

Nov. 16

The Origin of the "Unions de la Paix Sociale"; Unpublished Letters from Comte de Butenval to Emm. de Curzon.
Social Work in East Flanders. E. Dubois.
The French Peasant and the Peopling of Tunis.

J. Saurin.

Revue de l'Art Ancien et Moderne. —23, RUE DU MONT-THABOR, PARIS. 7 frs. 50 c. Nov. 10. Giovanni Segantini; In Memoriam. Illustrated. R. de La Sizeranne. M. Gétôme's Statue of the Duc d'Aumall. Illustrated. P. M.

M. Gérôme's Statue of the Duc d'Aumals. Illustrated. P. M. The Pauvert Collection of Medals. Illustrated. E. Babelon, Jean Baptiste Siméon Chardin. Illustrated. L. de Fourcand.

Revue Blanche. -23. Boulevard des Italiens, Paris. 1 fr. Nov. z.

The Soudan. Jean Rodes. Nov. 15. Gustave Kahn. The Nationalist Idea in France. Gus The Dreyfus Affair. Charles Péguy.

Revue Bleus .- FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 6d. Nov. 4. The Last Months of Chopin's Life. Mme. M. Poradowska. Russi in Justice. Ary Leblond.

Russi in Justice. Ary Leblond.

Nov. 11.

The Military Crisis in France. A. Gervais.
Russian Justice. Concluded. Ary Leblond.
Nov. 18. The English Military Problem. Art Roë. Henry Fouquier. Zadig. The French Huguen its at the Cape. S. C.

S. Cornut. And rench Huguenns at the Caps. S. Cornut.

Nov. 25.

Madame Alfred de Vigny. Léon Séché.

Th: English Military Problem. Continued. Art Roë.

French Society during the Consulate. Gilbert Stenger.

Revue des Deux Mondes.—3, King William Street, Strand.
30s. per half-year. Nov. 1.
France and the Far East. R. Pion.
Madame de Stael and the Republic of 1798. P. Gautier.
The Prisons of Art. R. de La Sizeranne.
The Carlists; Recollections of a Frontis War. Comte Remacle.
Science and Agriculture; Arable Land. P. P. Dehérain.

Science and Agriculture; Arable Land. P. P. Dehérain.
Nov. 15.

A Europe without Austria. C. Benoist.
Th. London Embissy of the Duc Dec 1282, 1822-1821. E. Daudet.
The Budget of 1900. R. G. Lévy.
The India of To-day; The Economic Situation and Pub ic Life. A. Filon.

Revue d'Économie Politique.—22, RUE SOUFFLOT, PARIS. 20 frs. per ann. Oct.-Nov.

The Australasian Land Ques'ion. R. Dalla Vota.
The East End of London in the Ninsteenth Century. A. E. Sayous,
The Regulation of the Bank of France. Continued. C. Brouilhet.

Revue Encyclopédique.-18, King William Street, Strand.

Revue Encyclopedique. —18, KING WILLIAM SPREET, STRATS, per qr. No.: 4, 4
War and Peace. Illustrated. R. Debardt and Others. Nov. 18.
European Expansion in China. Map and Illustrations. C. Béguin. Nov. 18.
France under Louis XII. Illustrated. A. Le Glay.
French Dramatic Criticism. Illustrated. G. Geffroy.

Nov. 25.

The War in the Philippines, 1836-38. M.ps and Illus:rations. C. Béguin.
The High Court of France. A. Hustin.

Revue Générale,-16, Rue Treurenberg, Brussels. 12 frs. per annum. Nov.

Protestant Missions. Archibald J. Dunn.
The Evolution of the Bulkan Question. Baron J. de Witte.
The Reform of Taxation. X. Thibaut.
A Chapter of the History of the Council of Flanders. P. Duponchel.

Revue Internationale de Sociologie. -- 16, Rue Soufflot, Paris.

The Teaching of Sociology in Secondary Schools.

A. Fouillée
The Federation of the Latin-American Republics.
O. d'Araujo.
Centralization and Decentralization.
A. Model. A. Fouillée and Others.

Revue pour les Jeunes Filles.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. r fr. 50 c. Nov. 5.

Women Poets of the Nineteenth Century. Dauph'n-Meunier. Sketches of Constantinople. Mme. Raoul Fabens, Literature and the Kitchen. E. Guillon. Collections of Faience and Porcelain. P. Murcel. Girls in Holland. T. d'Ulmès.

"Philosophie du Bonheur" by Paul Janet. Jeanne Violet. From Paris to the Château Neuf at Saint Germain. E. Morel.

Revue de Métaphysique et de Morale. -5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 3 frs. Nov.

Determinism and Contingency. Ch. Dunan. The Axioms of Geometry. B. Russell. Science and Philosophy. Continued. E. Le Roy.

Revue du Monde Catholique. 76, Rue des Saints-Pères, Paris. r fr. 50 c. Nov. r.

Cast lar and Religion. Bourgine.
The French Autumn Manœuvres, 1833. Continued. J. d'Estoc.
Recollections of B. ittany. E. Pillet.

Nov. 15. African Monarchism. Continued. Dom Besse, Decentralization. Jean Favre.
The Transvarland de Oringe Free States. Ch. de Vitès.
Turgot. Who in Guerra and the Oringe Free States.

Revue de Paris.—18, King William Street, Strand. 60 frs. per annum. Nov. 1.

Great B-itain and the Transvaal. XXX.
Unpublished Works. A. Chénier,
The Suez Canal. J. Charles Roux.
The House of the Poor, F. Gregh.
King Milan. A. Malet.

Nov. 15.

Panislamia and the Islamic Propaganda. G, Depont and I, T, d'Eckardt, Concerning a Youth. George Sand, Prince Louis Napoleon at Strasburg. A. Mathiez. The Americans at Manila. Li-utenant X.
Paul Janet, Professor of Philosophy. E. Boutroux.

Revue Politique et Parlementaire.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris.
3 frs. Nov. 20.

The Crisis in the French Republic. Th, Ferneuil.
The French Army in 1893. L. Boudenoot.
Mutualism, Socialism and Progress. J. Siegfried.
The Evolution of Political Parties in Belgium. A. Halot.

Revue des Revues,-12, Avenue de L'Opéra, Paris, 1fr. Nov. 1. The French Clergy, With Diagrams.
The War in South Africa. Illustrated
The Religion of Death. Jean Finot.
Unpublished Letters of George Sand.
Concluded. G. d'Heylli. Wagner. Paul Souday.
The University in the Rue Danton, Par's. Dick May. Nov. 15.

The Mussulman Origin of the Jesuits. V. Charbonnel, People's Universities. Illustrated. Prof. J. Delvaille. Romantic Women. Illustrated. R. Deberdt. A Visit to Aldershot. Continued. Capt. de Malleray. The South American Indian. Comte J. de Brettes.

Revue Scientifique.-FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 6d.

The Progress of Neuropathology. M. Vires. Slavery in Tunis. A. L.ir.

Nov. II. The Mission of Experimental Physiology. P. Héger. The Electric Activity of the Solar Corona, A. Souleyre. Nov. 18.

The Place of Science in the Material and Moral Education of the People. M. Berthelot. The Navy in Recent Wars, T. A. Brassey.
The Electric Acti ity of the Solar Corona, Continued. A. Souleyre.

Nov. 25. Metals in Ancient Times. Alfred Ditte. The Bubonic Plague at Oporto. A. Calmette.

Revue Socialiste.—8, Galerie du Théâtre Français, Paris. 1 fr. 50 c. Nov. Reply to Socialistic Crivicism. Ed. B. mstein. The Crisis in South Af ica. Paul Louis. The Naturalisation of Alge im Jews. Continued. L. Durieu.

Revue Universitaire. - 5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 10 frs. per ann. Nov. 15.

Report of Examinations of 1899. Prof. M. Croiset. Modern Education of Girls. M. Dugard. A Pedagogic Experience in Germany. Prof. M. Jouffret. Paul Janet. Victor Delbos.

Revue de l'Université de Bruxelles.—37, Boulevard du Nord, Brussels. 1 fr. 50 c. Nov. The Mission of Experimental Physiology. Paul Héger. Contemporary Russian Literature. H. Jefferys.

Semaine Littéraire .- 4, Boulevard du Théâtre, Geneva. 15 c. Nov. 4.

The American Press during the Cuban War. O. Guerlac. Nov. 11, 18, 25. Swiss Painters. Illustrated. T. de Wyzewa.

Université Catholique.—Burns and Oates. 11 frs. per half-year.

Mother Marie Eugénie de Jésus, Dom P, Renaudin, Louis Veuillot, Abbé Delfour, Thomassin, R. Parayre, An Unknown Portrait of Bossuet, The Triple Alliance, Continued, Comte J, Grabinski.

THE ITALIAN MAGAZINES.

Civiltà Cattolica.—Via di Ripetta 246, Rome. 25 frs. per annum. Nov. 4.

The Concordat between the First Consul and Pius VII. Positivism and the Genesis of its Scientific Phenomenon Pico dalla Mirandola and Antonio Rosmini. Nov. 18.

Material and Spiritual Bread. The Congress of Lyons and Freedom of Education.

An Important Document bearing on the Concordat.

Cosmos Catholicus .- VATICAN PRESS, ROME. The Catholic Congress in the Marches. Count E. Sode ini. The Great "Pardon" of Rocamadour. Illustrated. Boyer d'Agen. From Brindisi to Corfu. Marquis McSwiney.

Flegrea,-PIAZZETTA MONDRAGONE, NAPLES. Oct. 20. Sister John of the Cross; a Romance. Matildo Serao.
G. Segantini. V. Pica.
The Plays of François de Curel. R. Forster.

Nov. 5. Sister John of the Cross. Continued. Matilde Serao.

Nuova Antologia, -VIA S. VITALE 7, ROME. 46 frs. per annum.

The School Problem in Italy. Continued. Prof. E. Cocchia.
The Municipal Elections at Milan. C. O. Corn ggia.
Recent Excavations in the Roman Forum. Prof. E. Pais.
Socialistic Evenings in London. Prof. A. Loria. Nov. 16.

New Problems. P. Villari, Giovanni Segantini. L. Beltrami, The Laws and Regulations of the Chamber of Deputies. Sidney Sonnino. Detached Thoughts. R. Bong.i. Agrarian Reform. The Editor.

Rassegna Nazionale.-Via della Pace 2, Florence. 30 frs. per ann. Nov. 1.

Public Morality. R. Bettazzi.
The Policy of Francis I. de Medicis. G. E. Saltini.

The Coming Municipal Elections at Milan. A. de C. d'Arzago. The Neglected Italian Catholics of Ame.ica. X.

Nov. 16. Modern Education. G. Signorini. The Sale of a Botticelli. M. B. Paoli. A We. kat Casentino. C. Pozzolino-Siciliani. Italian Diplomats in China. G. Senzapaura.

Riforma Sociale.—PIAZZA SOLPERINO, TURIN. Oct. 15. The Commercial Policy of Italy. L. Fontana-Russo. Production and Value. A. Graziadei. Boards of Conciliation in Germany. Prof. M. Matteotti.

Rivisita Internazionale.-VIA TORRE ARGENTINA 76, ROME. Nov. Christian Morality; a Reply. S. Talarno. The Monetary Question in Persia. Prof. E. Lorini. An Industrial Investigation in Italy. Prof. Simonetti.

Rivista Musicale Italiana.—Fratelli Bocca, Turin. L4, 50. Nov. 4.

Instrumental Music in Italy in the 16th, 17th, and 18th Centuries. Con-Instrumental Music in Italy in the 16th, 17th, and 18th Centuristinued, L. Torchi.
Karl von Dittersdorf. H. Kling.
The Song of the Soldiers of Modena. A. Restori.
Jacopo Tomadini and His "Resurrection of Christ." S. Pistorelli.
Savonarola as a Musician. O. Chilesotti.
The Unity of Rhythm. J. N. Co-dero.
The Ricordi-Leoncavallo Case. N. Tabanelli.

Rivisita Politica e Letteraria. -3, VIA MARCO MINGHETTI, ROME. The Slavs and Italians in Austria. XXX. Great Britain and the Transvaal. A. Pierantoni. Segantini, the Poet of the Alps. A. J. Rusconi.

Rivista di Scienze Biologiche.-VIA CARLO ALBERTO 3, TURIN. Notes on Vegetable Biology. F. Delpino. Human Speci:s and Varieties. G. Sergi. The Evolution of Thought in Children. P. Lombroso.

C

d

Artist

The 1

Matth

How

Our I

The I A Stu Want

Amer

Wha

Kr

Spec Mod Goet

R

The

0

1

THE SPANISH AND PORTUGUESE MAGAZINES.

Cludad de Dios .- Real Monasterio del Escorial, Madrid.

20 pesetas per annum. Nov. 5. Barometric Pressure and Its Relation to the Phases of the Moon. Angel R.

Artistic Education. Luis Villalba.

The Monte de Piedad and Interest at 2 per Cent. Pedro Rodriguez.

España Moderna.—Cuesta de Santo Domingo 16, Madrid.

España Moderna, —Cuesta de Santo Domingo 16, Madrid.
40 pesetas per annum. Nov.

Matthew Arnold's "Drama in Persia."
American Poets. Ruben Dario.
How to reform the Constitution of 1876. Adolfo Posada.
Our Laws and How to Improve Them. P. Dorado.

6d.

eople.

RD.

C.

r.

O Instituto. - University of Coimbra, Portugal. od. Nov. The Economic Doctrines of Karl Marx. A. A. Pires de Lima.
A Study of Damio de Goes. Souas Viterbo.
Wanted—An Official Portuguese Dictionary. Revista Brazileira,—Travessa do Ouvidor 31, Rio de Janeiro.
60s. per annum. Nos. 83 and 90.
Mark Twain and John Fiske. Oliv.ira Lima.
Haeckel's Influence in Sociology. Sylv io Romero.
The Press of Pernambuco during the Independence, 1821-1825. Alfredo de

The Tercentenary of Velasquez. Cunha E. Costa.

Revista Contemporanea, -CALLE DE PIZARRO 17, MADRID.

2 pesetas. Oct. 30. Philosophy of History. Mariano Amador. Provincialism versus the Greater Patriotism in Spanish Politics. J. S. de Toca.

Légal Responsibility of Epileptics. Dr. De Moor,
Nov. 15.
The Working Classes and Combination. M. G. Maestre,
Legal Responsibility of Epileptics. Continued. Dr. De Moor,
The Moses of Michael Angelo. Miguel Costa.

THE DUTCH MAGAZINES.

Elsevier's Geillustreerd Maandschrift,—Luzac and Co., 46, Great Russell Street. 1s. 8d. Nov. Alexander Hugo Bakker Korff. Illustrated. Johan Gram. Two Days in Jogjakarta. Illustrated. Dr. J. Groneman. The Van Dyck Festival in Antwerp. Illustrated. Max Rooses.

De Gids.-LUZAC AND Co. 38. Nov. America and Europe from Sociological and Other Standpoints. R. P. J. Tutein Nolthenius.

What should Our Children read? Nellie van Kol.

Björnstjerne Björnson, Dr. R. C. Boer, Sarah Bernhardt, J. N. van Hall.

Vragen des Tijds .- LUZAC AND Co. 28. 6d. Nov. The New Es imates for Fortresses and Fortifications. General A. L. W. Seyffardt.
Prisons and Reformatories; How to treat Their Inmates. A. de Graaf.

Woord en Beeld,-ERVEN F. BOHN, HAARLEM. 16s. per annum. Nov.

Cornelius Lely, Engineer. With Portrait. R. a. van Sandick.

THE SCANDINAVIAN MAGAZINES.

Kringsjaa .- Olaf Norli, Christiania. 2 kr. per quarter. Oct. 31. The November Meteoric Display. S. A. Ramsvig.
Ole Gabriel Ueland. With Portraits. O. A. Overland.
Spectrum Analysis. S. A. Ramsvig.
November 15.
Modern Theology. With Portraits. N. G. Göransson.
Norwegian Psychology. Rasmus Flo.
Goethe. Continued.

Nordisk Tidskrift.—P. A. Norstedt and Sons, Stockholm.
10 kr. per annum. No. 6.

The Language of Women. Gustaf Cederscl iöld.
The African Slave Trade. Ulrik Sverdrup.
A "Wireless Telephone" in Use in South America. Illustrated. X.

Ringeren.-City Passage, Christiania. 2 kr. per qr. Nov. 11. Simon Newcomb. With Portrait. P. Engelbrethsøn.
The Childhood and Youth of Runeberg. Continued. Kristian Glöersen.
November 18.
René Worms. With Portrait. K., V. Hammer.
Concerning Henrik Wergeland. J. A. Schneider.
The Celtic Element in Norse Wood-Carving. Lars T. Kinsarvik.

Tilskueren.-Ernst Bojesen, Copenhagen. 12 kr. per annum. Nov. The World's Literature. George Brandes.
Preface to Prince Kropotkin's Autobiography. Georg Brandes.
Obscene Literature. V. Bentzon.
Gotfred Rump's Work. Nic. Lützhöft.

THE RUSSIAN MAGAZINES.

Russkaya Muisl.-V. M. Zavrof, Moscow. Oct.

The Eternal City.
The Fountain and Mechanism of Psychical Action.
The Papacy in the Epoch of Humanism.
Mordern Georgian Literature.
The Third Zionists' Congress.

Russkoe Bagatstvo.-1-9, Spasskaya and Backavaya St. Oct.

The Understanding of History.
Agricultural Labourers in Samara,
The Dreyfus Aff ir.
The South African Drama. The Economic Principle in the Problem of the Origin of Art. Vyestnik Yevropuî.—Stasyulovitch, 20, Galernava, St. Petersburg. Nov.

The Tragedy of Faith. The Northern Caucasus. Extra-School Education in Germany. War and the Idea of Peace. Turgenieff and Fete.

Zhenskoe Duelo, -- 10, GONCHARNAYA, St. PETERSBURG. Nov. Female Types of George Eliot, Recollections of V. Krestovskaya, Woman's Position in Armenian Literature,

. 68/0788

BOOKS ABOUT WAR AND BOOKS ABOUT THE WAR.

"IS WAR IMPOSSIBLE?"

An English translation. The Russian By M. Bloch.

Library (Grant Richards; price 6s.).

This is the translation of the famous book which made so much stir in Europe this year. M. Bloch is a Warsaw banker and political economist, who has satisfied himself that under the present economical conditions prevailing on the Continent a great war is impossible except at the cost of suicide. This thesis he has elaborated in six great volumes, the last of which has been translated and published in England and America under the above title.

M. Bloch's book has been popularly credited with being one of the things which weighed heavily with the Tsar of Russia, and led him to summon the Peace Conference. M: Bloch attended that Conference, and is now preparing to exhibit in Paris next year an object-lesson of the horrors of modern war. The book, which is copiously illustrated, and contains a mass of information as to modern militarism, and also as to the economic condition of Russia, has been very favourably noticed. As a handbook for thoughtful persons it is one of the best, for no one can find better food for interesting and paradoxical conversation at Christmas time.

"WAR AGAINST WAR."

We have still a few copies of the file of War against War, the penny weekly which was published early in the year as the chronicle of the Peace Crusade. It is the best memorial of that Crusade, and as its value as a curio in journalism is likely to rise, collectors and Crusaders might be glad to secure the remaining copies, which can be had at eighteenpence each, post free.

"WAR AGAINST WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA"

is a penny weekly edited by W. T. Stead. It appears every Friday, and will continue to appear so long as the present war lasts.

Among the other publications issued in connection with the opposition to the War in South Africa are the Stop the War! A four-page illustrated leaflet containing a memorial to the Queen; the story of the origin of the trouble in the Transvaal; and an article entitled "Majuba; or, Honesty the Best Policy," This four-page closely-printed (and illustrated) leaflet is supplied for distribution at 5s. per thousand.

The Truth About the War. Price one penny, or £1 per thousand, for distribution. It is a pamphlet of sixty-

Why Not Stop the War?—A protest against "putting it through."-This pamphlet is in course of preparation. It is an examination of the contention recently urged that Christianity is a failure; and a vindication of the Majuba settlement. It contains a reprint of Mr. Chamberlain's great speech in favour of giving up the Transvaal; and a summary of the disclosures made before the South African Committee as to the complicity of the Colonial Office in the conspiracy of 1895 against the Transvaal Republic.

Shall I Slay My Brother Boer? Price sixpence, post free. Are We in the Right? An Appeal to Honest Men.

Price sixpence.

The Scandai of the South African Committee. Price

All the above may be obtained from the REVIEW OF REVIEWS office, Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, W.C.

READING FOR THE WINTER SEASON.

THE winter season is here, and people have more time to devote to reading in the long evenings. It may be well, therefore, to call our readers' attention to the Circulating Library which was started in connection with the REVIEW some years ago. The object tion with the REVIEW some years ago. of the Library was to enable villages and small towns, where no free library as yet existed, to obtain some of the best literature of the day at a very moderate cost. A list of books was carefully selected so as to comprise all branches of literature both serious and entertaining.

Some fifty books are sent out to any group of persons or institution subscribing to the library, packed in a strongly-made box. This box of books is changed quarterly or half-yearly as may suit the convenience of the centre. By this system it is possible for any institution or number of persons to obtain a constantly changing supply of literature at a very small cost. For thirty shillings a quarter about two hundred books per annum are supplied. Everything is done to simplify the task of the local centre. All the books are numbered, and plainly marked on the cover with a label identical with the colour of the box to which it belongs. Catalogues of the books are sent with each box, while a card for entering the names and addresses of the members of the Circles is also supplied.

At present three series of boxes are issued. One contains from forty-five to fifty volumes-poetry, history, travels, fiction and illustrated magazines. These books have been carefully selected so as to cover as wide a field as possible, and at the same time contain a number of new and standard novels. A cheaper series of boxes is also supplied. The boxes contain more volumes, but they are of a simpler description. For those who do not wish to have any heavy reading, a special series of boxes has been compiled, consisting almost entirely of modern and standard fiction. As the library is intended primarily to encourage serious reading, these last boxes are only supplied to centres which are willing to pay a year's subscription in advance. Several people, while not requiring the books themselves, have undertaken to provide an institution in which they are interested with a constant supply of literature, which is very much appreciated by the inmates.

Any newsagent, bookseller, or other tradesman in a village or small town who cares to make his shop a local centre for the REVIEW OF REVIEWS' Circulating Library can obtain a box of books quarterly, which, if he could keep half their contents in constant circulation at twopence per week, would enable him not merely to add a new feature of interest to his business, but also to cover his quarterly subscription and make a profit of nearly three pounds a year.

Anybody who wishes to try the experiment of commencing a small circulating library should make application to the Secretary at once; for most of the reading of the year-in the country, at least-is done in the winter months. Further information, if required, from the REVIEW OF REVIEWS CIRCULATING LIBRARY, Temple House, Temple Avenue, London, E.C.

In an unusually good December number the Sunday Magazine gives a sketch by David Paton of "the Rev. Jane-Munro Brown," of Brotherton, first duly elected weman pastor of an English Congregational Church. The good lady, who claims descent from the Covenanting martyr John Brown, has not been to college, but her election has been approved and endorsed by the Yorkshire Congregational Union. 5

It on to one control of the cost. Orise of cost. Orise of cost. Orise of cost. Orise of titude o

One
ory, oks ield
r of s is
but not exes
ern
ded exes pay hile

ken ted ery

ary
uld wol a ver

om-ca-of ter the lay ev. ed he ng er k-

VIIM

